As a boy James E. Cawthon attended the Eddy Literary & Scientific Institute, at Eddy, Texas, graduating in 1900, and then entered Baylor University with the Sophomore Class. Ill health compelled him to leave school before graduating, and he sought the fine climate of El Paso, where he took up the study of law with the firm of Patterson, Buckler & Woodson. He was admitted to the bar April 3, 1912, after passing a creditable examination before the Board of Legal Examiners, and locating at Denison, the former home of his wife, immediately entered practice. There he rapidly acquired an enviable reputation and demonstrated his ability in numerous important cases. During the latter part of 1914 Mr. Cawthon, with his family, removed from Denison to El Paso, sacrificing an extensive and growing practice at the former place, for the excellent climatic conditions as well as opportunities offered by the latter. During the four years spent with the firm of Patterson, Buckler & Woodson at El Paso he gained a wide acquaintance in the city, and takes up his new work in that place with every guarantee of continued success. While a member of the Grayson County Bar, Mr. Cawthon was recognized by his fellow members as a thorough student, and distinguished by the open candor and fairness with which he treated all his cases.

In 1909, prior to his admission to the bar, Mr. Cawthon married Mrs. Alice Stobie Hay, a daughter of William Stobie, a prominent and extensive land owner of Sunnyside, Washington. Mr. Stobie was one of the pioneer promoters of irrigation projects in that state. Born in Scotland, William Stobie many years ago became identified with the northwestern sections of the United States, and his career as an Indian fighter would rival that of the famous Buffalo Bill. In politics Mr. Cawthon is a progressive Democrat, thoroughly in accord with the National Administration at present and an ardent admirer and supporter of President Wilson. He is a man of religious inclinations and practices, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and in every important act of his career so far has stood rigidly for principles that make for the betterment of mankind and human interests.

MARTIN HANSON. Martin Hanson was but ten years of age when he first came to Brownsville, but his permanent residence here dates back to his twentieth year. For a long period he was prominently identified with the activities that contributed to the development and growth of the city along building lines, and the recognition of his abilities as a business man earned him preferment in public life, where he has proved no less capable in the dual capacity of fire marshal and building inspector. Mr. Hanson is a native of Louisiana, born at New Orleans, in 1857, and is a son of Martin and Christina Maria (Senstrum) Hanson. His father learned the trade of carpenter and builder in his native city of Christiana, Norway, and as a young man emigrated to the United States, pursuing his chosen calling in New Orleans and Baton Rouge until he had accumulated, through thrift and industry, enough means to enable him to establish a home of his own. He accordingly returned to Europe and married Miss Christina Maria Senstrum, who was born at Boros, Sweden, and shortly afterward they came this country and located in New Orleans. From that time they came in 1866 to Brownsville, where both spent the remainder of their lives.

Martin Hanson commenced his education in New Orleans, and subsequently attended school in Brownsville, from which latter city he returned to New Orleans, where he completed learning the trade of carpenter and builder. There, in 1874, he became a member of the famous "White League," which was eventually successful in ousting the troublesome "carpetbaggers," and in overthrowing negro rule. Returning to Brownsville in 1876, he established himself in business here, and gradually became engaged in building and contracting. Many of the principal structures of the city were erected by him, among them the original public school, and he became one of the most widely known men in his line in Cameron county. Throughout his business career, although his extensive interests kept him busily occupied, he found time to devote to the needs of his city, was city alderman for four years and county surveyor for twelve years. He was prominent in all movements which made for progress and advancement along the lines of education and municipal reform. In 1911 Mr. Hanson was appointed city fire marshal, and as such has developed the fire department into a high state of efficiency, his high qualities of leadership being here brought forcibly into play. For the past several years he has also served as city building inspector, where his long experience in the erection of structures has enabled him to safeguard the interests both of the city and its people. Mr. Hanson is known as a conscientious official, who has brought to his work a high regard for the duties and responsibilities of public office. During his long residence in the city he has formed a wide acquaintance, in which he numbers numerous sincere friends. His fraternal connections are with the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World, and he was formerly a member of the original Brownsville Rifles, of which he held the rank of first sergeant.

Mr. Hanson was married to Miss Ella Lynd. He is the father of seven children, namely: Martin Charles; Matilda; Margaret, who is now the wife of J. A. Cobonini; John L.; Mary Christina; Richard Martin and Ella Lynd.

THOMAS M. McCORRY. A retired cattleman making his home in Stratford, Mr. McCrory has lived in Texas since the close of the war and in different counties of central and western Texas, acquired and operated large cattle interests until his retirement from the business in 1904, since which time he has made his home in Stratford.

T. M. McCrory was born in Butler county, Alabama, in March, 1849, the youngest of eight children born to Thomas and Nancie (Faul) McCrory. The father was born in South Carolina, and the mother in North Carolina, and they were married in Alabama. The father was a planter who emigrated to Arkansas, and then in 1866 came to Texas, locating in Freestone county, where he followed his regular occupation until his death in 1867 at the age of fifty-four. The mother died at Stratford in 1909 when at the advanced age of ninety-three years.

Mr. McCrory spent his school days in Arkansas, where he obtained the education which fitted him for his practical career. After the family came to Texas he began raising stock in Freestone county, gradually increased his holdings in proportion to his industry and good business management subsequently transferred his operations to Navarro county, and continued actively as a stock man from 1866 until December, 1904. He sold out part of his interests in Navarro county, moving to Stratford, where he was again identified with stock raising until 1904, since which time he has disposed of practically all his interest in that line and has enjoyed the competence of his early years. He is a director in the state bank.

He is a Democrat and a member of the Presbyterian church. In Navarro county, in November, 1880, Mr.

McCrory married Miss Belle Gamewell, a daughter of J. C. Gamewell, who was from the State of Tennessee. Mr. and Mrs. McCrory have a fine family of children. Nora V., born in Navarro county in 1853, is now the wife of Mr. H. D. Hanks, of Freestone county, and has two children; Lou C. McCrory, born in Navarro county, in February, 1885, is cashier of the First State Bank of Stratford; Della, born in Navarro county in 1887, and died in Stratford in 1911; James G., born in Navarro county in 1890, died May 23, 1903, at Stratford; Vesta and Lester, twins, born in Navarro county, in 1894, the latter dying in November 1903, as a result of a fall from a horse.

STEPHEN E. COUCH. The owner of nearly two townships of land in Crockett county, a banker and business man of Ozona, Mr. Couch is one of the pioneers of Crockett county, where he has resided for a quarter of a century, and in that time has built up a generous portion and won many of the better things of life in addition to material prosperity.

Stephen E. Couch was born in Canada, on August 29, 1856, and spent about the first twenty-one years of his life in his native country. His early education was obtained in the public schools there and after leaving school he went onto his father's farm and worked until he crossed the international boundary line and started for Texas. He first located in Hamilton county, where he was engaged in ranch work for several years and then in 1888 he moved to Crockett county where he began operations on his own account. By good business management and by the energetic work which is necessary for success in ranching, Mr. Couch has become one of the leading ranchers and cattlemen of west Texas, and now has a fine estate of forty-five thousand acres near Ozona.

Mr. Couch is vice president and one of the organizers of the Ozona National Bank. This bank is housed in a fine stone building, two stories high, and the directors and stockholders represent the most influential and substantial elements in the county, so that the bank has prospered from the beginning. Mr. Couch was one of the organizers of the Wool Growers Central Storage Company at San Angelo, and is one of the vice presidents of that institution. He is a director of the San Angelo Bank & Trust Company, and is a member of the Ozona Commercial Club. In the town of Comanche in September, 1903, Mr. Couch married Mrs. Clara Lee Meadows, daughter of the late T. J. Holmsley, of Comanche county. Mrs. Couch is an active member of the Episcopal Church, and that is the church which receives her husband's favor and support. In Masonic circles, Mr. Couch is one of the leaders in west Texas. He has taken the degrees along both the York and Scottish Rite branches, and is affiliated with the Blue Lodge, Chapter, Council, Commandery and Shrine and with thirty-two degrees of Scottish Rite. At one time he served as district deputy grand master of the Grand Masonic Lodge and while in this office was delegated to lay the corner stone for the beautiful new school building at Ozona, also for the bank building and the corner stone for the school house in Sonora. Mr. Couch is a Republican in politics and for a number of years served as county commissioner of Crockett county. During his membership on the board the present handsome court house was built at Ozona. Mr. Couch has many and varied affairs to interest him, but when away from the responsibilities of business he probably enjoys more than anything else his hours in his fine private library, and reading is his hobby.

LITTLETON E. COLLINS. Though not a native born Texan, Littleton E. Collins is in every way entitled to consideration as one, for he has made this state his home and scene of all his activities since he came within its borders in 1855 with his parents as an infant. Since 1876 Coleman has been his home, and here he has been identified with many of the leading industrial enterprises of the city and county. Since 1892 he has been connected in an official capacity with the First National Bank, his status with that institution since 1902 being that of president. A brief record of his life and work thus far is as follows:

Littleton E. Collins was born in Troup county, Georgia, on February 11, 1855, the son of Henry W. and Loraine (Sturdevant) Collins, both of Georgia. The father was a merchant, and in 1855 he came to Texas with his family, settling in Upshur county, and there maintaining a continuous residence until 1888, when he established himself in business in Coleman county. He died in 1893, honored in the places where he had been known as a worthy citizen and as a veteran soldier of the Civil war, having fought in General Walker's division in the Confederate army. The mother is still living at the age of seventy-nine years, and is enjoying fairly good health.

Four children were born to these parents, the eldest being Littleton E. Collins of this review. He was born in Georgia, as has been stated, but being a mere infant at the time of the family exodus to Texas, he gained all his educational training in this state. He began in his teens to teach school, and continued with a pleasing measure of success in that work until 1878, when he engaged in the drug business in Coleman. That enterprise held his attention until 1892, in which year he accepted a position with the First National Bank as cashier. His rise was steady in that association, and in 1902 Mr. Collins was elected to the office of president of the bank, which post he still retains and has filled with honor and distinction.

Other business enterprises have claimed his notice in the years of his residence here, and he is president of the Coleman Compress Company, besides having served in an official capacity in the Coleman Cotton Oil Company from the time of its organization up until its dissolution about a year ago. He is now treasurer of the Coleman Sewer Company of this city.

A Democrat of the stoutest convictions, Mr. Collins has been active in political circles of the county. He is a Mason with Royal Arch and Chapter affiliations, and is also a member of the Eastern Star, the Odd Fellows and the Rebekahs. The Coleman Club is a local organization of which he has been a member for some years, and his religious affiliations are with the Baptist church, of which he is treasurer and a member of the board of deacons.

On February 18, 1880, Mr. Collins was married to Miss Cora Payton, in Coleman. She is a daughter of W. W. Payton, long engaged in the hotel business in Coleman and widely known in the state, but who retired a few years ago and died in 1911, in Fort Worth.

Of the nine children born to Mr. and Mrs. Collins, seven are living of whom brief mention is here made as follows: Mrs. Naynie Love; Mrs. Florence Pitman, of Rosebud, Texas, where Mr. Pitman is engaged in the drug business; Henry M. is a teller in the First National Bank; Nell, living at home; L. E., Jr.; Harry, and Mary Collins.

The family is one that enjoys a splendid social standing in the city, and their home is the scene of many pleasant social functions.

JOSE CASSIANO. It was as a member of one of San Antonio's most distinguished old families as well as for the honorable accomplishment of an individual career that the late Jose Cassiano was paid many unusual tributes of respect when he died at San Antonio February 7, 1914.

The history of the Cassiano family is closely interwoven with the picturesque and important details of old San Antonio life and customs. The founder of the Cassiano line was Jose Cassini, who was born of a noble family in Italy in 1787, and left home and at an early age began a life of wandering which in 1812 brought him to New Orleans, where as a merchant he acquired considerable property, and then moved to San Antonio. In that period of his career he made a number of voyages from Galveston to New Orleans for supplies. His name gradually acquired the Spanish form of Cassiano. In San Antonio he did business on the main plaza where the Southern Hotel subsequently stood. About 1828 Jose Cassiano married the widow of ex-Governor Antonio Cordero, who was governor of Texas at the beginning of the nineteenth century and whose name figured prominently in the early annals of American exploration and intercourse in Texas. Mrs. Gertrude Cordero, who became the wife of Jose Cassiano, was the daughter of the famous Colonel Ygnacio Perez, head of one of the original thirteen Spanish families of Canary Islanders who founded the civic community of San Antonio. Colonel Perez is known in history as the Miles Standish of the old city. One of the landmarks of San Antonio most frequently visited is the old Governor's Palace on Military Plaza. The large iron ring on its front wall is said to have been used many times by Colonel Perez, when he tied his horse after returning to the city from a foray against the Indians in the vicinity of San Antonio. The Cassiano family also has many other relics including articles of the Cordero family, and books and parchments and jewelry and other possessions some of which have a history of several hundred years and go back to the original home of the family in Spain. An unusual honor was paid to Mrs. Gertrude Cordero Cassiano when she died in 1833 in that she was buried near the altar in the San Fernando Cathedral at San Antonio. This privilege was accorded her on account of her piety, charity and prominence in church affairs. During the Texas Revolution of 1835-36 Jose Cassiano and his family espoused the cause of the American forces, offering all of his holdings at San Antonio when the city was captured. During the Republic he recouped his fortunes, and was a man of large means and prominence in affairs of his community. His death occurred January 1, 1862. The only child of his marriage to the widow of Governor Cordero was Jose Ygnacio Cassiano, who was born in 1828, and who married Margarita Rodriguez, another direct descendant of one of the Spanish Canary Island colonists of San Antonio. Jose Ygnacio Cassiano died at San Antonio in 1882 and his wife passed away in 1877. They were survived by four sons and two daughters.

The late Jose Cassiano, the oldest son, was born at San Antonio in 1856, and was reared and educated in that locality. He early became prominent in local politics, and about his first occupation after leaving school was to take charge of a train of wagons engaged in freighting between San Antonio and Chihuahua. After that he was connected with the wool and the hide business during the high tide of its prosperity in San Antonio.

His first political office came in 1882 when he was elected county tax collector, and served four years. Mayor Callaghan then appointed him city tax assessor, and he served one term in that office, and in 1888 was again elected county tax collector and continued to serve in that capacity by election year after year, and always giving an unfaltering fidelity to his official performance, until 1898, having given eighteen years to his official duties.

On retiring from the collector's office Mr. Cassiano purchased considerable farm property and conducted two ranches near Elmendorf and a third in Wilson county. It was on his ranch at Elmendorf that he was suddenly taken ill and died. Mr. Cassiano was also president of the San Antonio Sand Company which had a large business in sand and contracting.

Mr. Cassiano married Miss Pauline Hafner, who was born in San Antonio and of German parentage. There are two sons: Frank Cassiano, who for a short time was city clerk of San Antonio; and Jose Cassiano, Jr. The late Mr. Cassiano was prominently identified with the upbuilding of San Antonio, and had a large circle of friends in business and political circles. He had mem-ship in the Kranken Kassen Verein, the Beethoven Locomotive and the Sociedad Benevolencia, a Mexican charitable organization.

DUANE MEREDITH, M. D. The practice of medicine is his regular calling of Dr. Meredith at Wichita Falls, but his practice he combines much ability and inclination with the studious part of his profession, and enjoys nothing so much as original research. He worked as a young clerk to get money to complete his medical education, and as he is still in his early thirties, his friends predict for him a brilliant career in medicine. Duane Meredith was born near Rice, in Navarro county, Texas, March 3, 1881. His father, Elisha Meredith, a native of Mississippi, came to Texas in 1873, settling in Navarro county, where he was a farmer and stock raiser. During the Civil War he served six months in the Home Guards as a private, but saw no active participation in battle. He now lives practically retired in Archer county, a Democrat in politics and a member of the Baptist church. The maiden name of his wife was Mary Brown-Duncan, a native of Mississippi, who died in 1910 at the age of sixty-three. She was the mother of nine children, six of whom are living, and Dr. Meredith was one of twins and third in order of birth. The paternal ancestors are English and were among the early settlers of Virginia. On the maternal side the Duncans were Scotch, and one of the maternal ancestors gave the name Durham, North Carolina.

Dr. Meredith received a common school education in Archer county, where he spent most of his youth, and completed his literary studies in the high school at Wichita Falls in 1900. When he left school at the age of nineteen he became clerk in the drug store of Dr. Robinson, where he not only picked up a knowledge of pharmacy, but gained much practical knowledge to help him in his subsequent career as physician. He worked as a clerk and licensed pharmacist for four years, and then in 1910 graduated from the Texas Christian University, at that time known as the Medical Department of Fort Worth University. In 1905 he passed the State Board medical examination and received a license to practice medicine from the State Board of Examiners, and has since been identified with his profession since that date. His first practice was at Petrolia, but after six months he moved to Dundee, Texas, where he remained three years. In 1910, on graduating M. D., he located in Wichita Falls, and has a satisfactory general practice. Dr. Meredith has served as assistant professor of pathology and chemistry during the last year of his college work, and has a standing offer of a chair in the University. At Wichita Falls he maintains a finely equipped laboratory for private research work, and as an investigator and chemist probably ranks foremost among the medical fraternity of Wichita Falls. He is examiner for the Oklahoma National Life Insurance Company, for the Guarantee Life Insurance Company of Houston, and for the Knights of the Maccabees. He has membership in the County and State Medical Society, and for the past two years has served as secretary of the Wichita County Society. He also belongs to the American Medical Association and the Pan-Handle District Medical Society. His lodge and civic associations are with the Blue Lodge of Masonry, the Maccabees, the Eastern Star, the Chamber of Commerce and he is a deacon in the Southern Presbyterian Church.

At Wichita Falls, December 7, 1905, Dr. Meredith married Miss Amelia Kerr, a native of Missouri, and daughter of A. F. Kerr, who is district clerk of the one hundred and thirty-fifth judicial district. The three children born to Dr. Meredith and wife are: Mary Caroline, born at Dundee, Texas, August 31, 1907; Elisha Elmore, born at Wichita Falls, April 1, 1909, and John Albert Meredith, born at Wichita Falls, May 8, 1912. Their home is at 1200 Broad Street, and the doctor's offices are in the Moore and Bateman Building. Dr. Meredith in politics is a Wilson Democrat, and at times takes an active interest in political affairs, especially in the way of helping his friends, but has never sought office for himself. All his time is devoted to his profession and to the research work of which he is so fond, and as he is a man of literary tastes and enjoys his home, he never lacks for diversion and wholesome occupation.

JAMES W. A. CLARK. Now living retired at Corsicana, which as a business man he has aided in its growth and development for nearly forty years, James W. A. Clark is distinguished among the old settlers of the town as proprietor of the first laundry of Corsicana, and the business which he founded in the early days is still continued by a relative. He also served in the office of postmaster, and has had an interesting career.

A native of London, England, James W. A. Clark was born in Chingford within the sound of the Bow bells, and was about the last child christened in the old church that Dick Turpin robbed. His birth occurred April 17, 1841. His father, James Clark, a native of Essex, lived and died in Hertfordshire, was a miller by trade, and represents old Anglo-Saxon stock that settled in eastern England many generations ago. James Clark married Annie Wheeler, and their children were James W. A.; Emma, who married F. Hand; Sarah; Lizzie; Joseph; and Zoe, all of whom except James spent their lives in England. In the earlier generations of the family and through a female branch was the famous portrait painter, Thomas Gainsborough, who lived from 1727 to 1788, and whose pre-eminent place among British artists is a standard fact known by all who are familiar with English paintings. It was Mr. Clark's grandfather who told him the story of Gainsborough, and hoped that he would never forget that the family in the earlier generations produced this eminent artist, a number of whose splendid portraits are found in the galleries and private collections and whose painting of the Duchess of Devonshire disappeared some years ago, and a large reward is still outstanding for its return.

James W. A. Clark grew up in London, was educated in the national schools and learned the carpenter's trade. In 1872 he was a passenger on board the ship Constantine, called a "swallow-tailed liner," leaving England and arriving some weeks later in New York. Mr. Clark went directly to Chicago, thence to Menominee, Michigan, found work in a saw mill, spent the following winter in Tennessee, the next summer was in northern Iowa and working at his trade in North McGregor, some months later was a carpenter doing service for people at Carthage, Illinois, later at New Athens in the same state, and after a few weeks spent at Austin, Minnesota, came down into the southwest and has been continuously identified with the great state of Texas ever since. His first location was at Sherman, where he had his first experience in the laundry business. The winter of 1875 was spent in Galveston, and in March, 1876, he came to Corsicana and from that time until 1902, when he retired, did a valuable service to the community as a laundryman. Mr. Clark was among the first white laundrymen in the state, and was the first to engage in that business in Corsicana. His first shop was a hand laundry at the corner of Seventh street and Fourth avenue, and later a steam laundry plant was erected in the same location. When he retired from business in 1902, the plant was turned over to Roy Cannady, his step-son, and the Clark Steam Laundry and the old Corsicana Steam Laundry are now operated as one concern.

Mr. Clark was naturalized as an American citizen in Corsicana soon after he came there, but first declared his intentions at Menominee, Michigan. He even went so far, on the urging of his friends, as to vote at Menominee during the Grant-Greeley campaign of 1872. At that time he had not yet declared his intention of becoming a citizen, but owing to the lax regulations and the excitement of politics he was allowed to vote. Mr.

Clark on becoming a citizen accepted affiliations with the Republican party, and has never deviated from that faith. He has been chairman of the congressional district committee, and his party gave him the nomination for congress in 1908. He has served as precinct, county and congressional chairman, and has been a delegate to many Republican state conventions. He fought the "Bull Moose" movement and is still one of the strong supporters of the old party. In 1901 Mr. Clark was appointed postmaster at Corsicana as successor of L. Revare, and gave capable administration of that office for four years and ten months. President McKinley during a recess of congress first selected him for the office, and President Roosevelt gave him a formal appointment which was confirmed by the senate. When Mr. Clark retired from the office in 1906, he was succeeded by H. E. Kinslow. Since that time he has lived practically retired, looking after his private affairs, and during the course of his business career has erected a number of houses upon vacant lots, and in that way has contributed to the upbuilding of the city. Mr. Clark is an Episcopalian in religion, and has no affiliations with secret orders.

At Dallas, Texas, in 1879, he married Mrs. Lena Cannady, who was born in Ohio. During the Civil war she was engaged as a teacher at Bluffton, Indiana, and it came to her attention that some persons were assembling stealthily at her schoolhouse after the close of the daily session. Her suspicions were aroused, and without taking counsel from anyone she determined to discover what the purpose of the meetings was. Procuring a ladder, she climbed into the loft of the building, pulled the ladder up after her and closed the trap door. She waited a while, and then heard and saw three persons enter the room, and begin a discussion of plans for introducing arms into Indiana for the friends of the Confederacy known under the organized name of Knights of the Golden Circle, whose purpose was to distribute these arms among the Knights, and at a given time and signal to attack the guards of Confederate prisoners in the state and kill off all the Union men in that locality. The Knights who thus met in session in the little schoolhouse were Dr. Horton, Milligan and Courtright. As a result of the disclosures made during that conference Mrs. Clark learned that arms were to be shipped to Terre Haute billed under a label as Sunday school books, and were to be delivered to members of the disloyal organization authorized to receive them. Mrs. Clark lost no time in revealing the conspiracy to the Federal authorities, who promptly arrested Dr. Horton, and subsequently captured other offenders when they attempted to get possession of the supposed Sunday school literature at Terre Haute. While Mr. and Mrs. Clark have no children of their own, Mrs. Clark by her first marriage has a son, Roy Cannady, already mentioned as the proprietor of the Corsicana Steam Laundry.

WILLIAM CARSON BOYETT. As a merchant, as a stock raiser and farmer, and in public affairs William Carson Boyett has been identified with Brazos county for many years and in the community of College Station is now serving in the capacity of postmaster.

William Carson Boyett was born in Brazos county, Texas, August 8, 1860. His father, James Boyett, who settled in Texas before the war, was well known in his time in Brazos county, and among his other children is Captain Bovett of Bryan, whose career is noted elsewhere in this work. In the community now known as College Station, William C. Boyett spent his boyhood, and had acquired all his education before the state established the Agricultural and Mechanical College at that point. He therefore began his career as a farmer and stockraiser without the scientific equipment and laboratory experiments with which young farmers in that vicinity now execute their business, and his own educational advantages were simply those of the country school. He was interested in and aided from early boyhood the stock business as conducted by his own family, and when he became of age he located within a mile of College Station and continued the cattle business as a grower, feeder and shipper. That industry he followed actively for twenty years, and is still more or less closely identified with it, and owns a large and well improved and valuable farm in Brazos county. In 1887 Mr. Boyett engaged in the mercantile business at College Station, and the store under his name has been conducted without interruption for more than a quarter of a century. Soon after he began to purvey merchandise to the community he was also appointed postmaster, and has combined merchandising with official duties for many years.

Reared in a Democratic atmosphere and acting with that party all his life, Mr. Boyett began going to state conventions when a young man. His first service as a delegate was in the convention that nominated Sul Ross for governor; subsequently was in the Hogg convention of 1890, and in the famous Houston car-shed convention where the Hogg and Clark faction split, and his support was given to the candidacy of Governor Hogg; was in the convention naming Hon. Charles Culberson for governor, later when Governor Sayres was named for the party ticket, was on the roster of delegates at the convention which made S. W. T. Lanham governor of Texas, and the Campbell convention which named the Palestine statesman found him again on the roll of delegates from Brazos county. Mr. Boyett supported Colquitt in both his campaigns for governor.

Aside from his local service as postmaster, Mr. Boyett was himself chosen to public office for the first time in July, 1904, when nominated against another candidate for county clerk, and elected in the following November. He was re-elected in 1906, and served four years altogether. He took office succeeding Mrs. McMichael, who filled out the term of her deceased husband. When his service as county clerk was over Mr. Boyett returned to his former business enterprise. At the present time he is one of the directors of the Bryan Cotton Oil Mill. There are no relations with fraternal orders to be noted, and he was brought up in the Methodist church.

Mr. Boyett was married in Brazos county in December, 1879, to Miss Lillie Medora Royall. She was one of seven children, and her father, William B. Royall, came to Texas before the war, was a Confederate soldier, and spent his active life as a farmer. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Boyett are briefly named as follows: Bertha, who is the wife of Wade Cox of Bryan, has one daughter, Lorain; Claud by his marriage to Jessie Wicker has a son, Raymond; Wert, who is state feed inspector of Texas at the Agricultural and Mechanical College, married Ethel Deaton; William A., who is a farmer, married Annie McGregor and their three children are Linwood, Annie Bess and Jack; Ima, whose husband Will Edmonds is manager of the College Station store for Mr. Boyett, has one son, Will; Gladys is the wife of Coleman Hardy of Brenham, Texas; Guy is a member of the class of 1916 in the A. & M. College, and the younger children are Norman, Oran and Alton, the latter two being high school students in Bryan.

LAWRENCE B. WESTERMANN. One of the ablest and best known building contractors in Texas resides at Fort Stockton in the person of Lawrence B. Westermann. Mr. Westermann has been identified with Texas since 1900, was a resident and in business at Big Springs until 1911, and since then has had his business headquarters at Fort Stockton. He has a large establishment for dealing in general building material, including lime, cement, all kinds of lumber and mill timbers, and conducts an extensive general retail business in this line. As a building contractor he has been a competitor with the largest ms in the state, and has secured some of the best contracts, particularly in west Texas.

Mr. Westermann at the present writing is completing a new courthouse and jail at Fort Stockton, which the county is erecting at a cost of one hundred thousand dollars, and these buildings are of stone and of splendid construction that will last for years, and will serve as a monument to his individual enterprise as well as to the public spirit of the community. Mr. Westermann has also built the First National Bank at Fort Stockton, a building in colonial style with four massive colonial columns supporting the entablature; he built the First State Bank in this city, the Pioneer Building, the Rooney Mercantile Company's building, the Stockton Building, the Park Company's building, the Rooney Gibson Building, Judge Odom's beautiful residence and many others. He is at this writing just beginning the concrete work on the main canals of the Fort Stockton Irrigated Land Company. He is an architect and has himself drawn the plans for the construction of the new First National Bank Building. Mr. Westermann organized the Stockton Building Company, and also organized the Park Company, which erected the Park Building, and is a prominent stockholder in both concerns.

Lawrence B. Westermann is a Kentuckian by birth, and belongs to one of the old families of that state. He was born in Newport, Campbell county, April 24, 1874. His parents were E. F. and Martha (Rowland) Westermann, both born and reared in Kentucky, and later residents of Fort Worth, Texas. The father was a contractor and builder by profession, and it was under his direction and instruction that the son entered the same business.

Lawrence B. Westermann had a public school education in Kentucky, and spent most of his early years at Paducah. He took up building and contracting on an independent basis, after he had been associated with his father for some time, and first came to Texas in 1900, following the destructive storm of September which practically wiped out the city of Galveston. His services as a building contractor were very useful and opportune during the year which he spent in that city, and he was connected with many important works of reconstruction and remodeling after the flood and hurricane. From Galveston he came to Dallas, which continued to be his business headquarters until March 7, 1907, when he took up his residence at Big Springs. Mr. Westermann during his residence in Dallas erected among other large buildings, the structures at Lake Cliff Park and built a great many private residences in that city. He was awarded a contract for the construction of the court house at Howard county, and that building was completed in 1908. He had done much building in Pecos City, including the store of the Pecos Mercantile Company and the First Baptist church of Pecos. He built in 1909 the high school building at Odessa, the county jail in Howard county and the complete list of his important contracts would be too long for mention in this article.

Mr. Westermann is a Republican in politics. Throughout his residence in Texas he has been first of all a practical and successful business man but at the same time has manifested a degree of public spirit which has been useful in every community where he has made his home. He was married July 26, 1895, to Miss Nellie Bingham, who was born in Ohio, a daughter of the late Major John Bingham, a former officer in an Ohio regiment during the civil war and later a prominent citizen of Athens, Ohio. He has three children of Mr. and Mrs. Westermann are Kathleen, Laurys and Burwick. Mr. Westermann and wife are members of the Methodist church south, and are highly esteemed citizens of Fort Stockton.

Concerning Texas, Mr. Westermann says that after traveling over many states it has become his settled conviction that west Texas offers more golden opportunities to the young men of honor and ambition and persistence than any other part of the country. He himself has been successful and he enjoys evidences of prosperity in others.

THOMAS H. SPRINGER. Of the old and well-remembered merchants of El Paso, one of the most prominent was the late Thomas H. Springer, who had been a wholesale and retail furniture dealer in this city for a quarter of a century. A successful business man, he displayed much public spirit in civic affairs, was a kindly and highly esteemed associate and friend. His death, which occurred January 9, 1909, closed a career of substantial achievements and good citizenship.

The late Thomas H. Springer was born May 23, 1859, in St. Mary's county, Maryland, a son of Thomas H. and Sarah J. (Harding) Springer. The father was born in Wilmington, Delaware, and the mother in Philadelphia. The Springer family has an interesting ancestry. The founder of this branch in America was Charles Christopher, one of the Swedish colonists, who in the seventeenth century established a colony in Delaware and vicinity. The land on which is now located the city of Wilmington was originally owned by this Charles Christopher. The late Mr. Springer was in the seventh generation from that original settler in America.

Mr. Springer obtained his education in the schools of his native county, and finished at Wilmington, Delaware, where he made his home with an uncle, Lewis R. Springer, a prominent architect of that city. His father, being a farmer, Thomas H., was reared in a country environment and had the wholesome training of a farmer's son. When twenty-one years of age he came into the Southwest, locating at Abilene, Texas, where he owned a furniture business for about three years, and then in 1883 came out to El Paso, thus becoming one of the pioneer residents of this city. For a time he was employed by others and then in 1887 established a furniture business by opening a small second-hand store on North Stanton street. From this beginning he developed an enterprise which for many years was of pretentious proportions, and one of the best known establishments for furniture, crockery and chinaware in west Texas. At 216-218 San Antonio street he had a large double store, one side being devoted to furniture and the other to chinaware, and he also occupied the second and third floors as salesrooms. Through honorable business methods he built up a large trade and the business was continued after his death until 1912.

In politics the late Mr. Springer was an active and influential Democrat. He represented the third ward in the city council during the administration of Mayor C. R. Moorehead, and did much community work, especially in connection with the Chamber of Commerce and the fire department. He was one of the founders of the Business Men's Protective Association and took a leading part in developing its activities to a point where they were especially useful to the local business welfare. In Masonry Mr. Springer had taken both the York and Scottish Rites, was a member of the Lodge, Chapter and Commandery, and had attained thirty-two degrees of the Scottish Rite. He was also affiliated with the Order of Elks. He gave much attention to religious affairs, and from 1902 until his death was treasurer of the Baptist church.

At Abilene, Texas, on November 16, 1885, Mr. Springer married Miss Mary Louise Rogers, daughter of Stephen and Rhoda Jane (McKnight) Rogers. Mrs. Springer was born in Karnes county, Texas, March 27, 1865, and belonged to one of the pioneer families of this state. Her father and mother were respectively natives of Texas and of Tennessee. Her grandfather, Davis Rogers, had come to Texas during the era of the Republic. The five sons and one daughter of Mr. Springer and wife are Roy H., Victor T., Charles E., Frank P., Louise Isabel and Lewis R. Mrs. Springer and several of her children reside at 709 North St. Vrain street. It was in the circle of his home that the late Mr.

Springer found his best recreation and pleasure, and he not only provided well for his family in a material sense, but gave them a wealth of affection which established him securely in their loving memory.

WILLIAM N. FOWLER. Postmaster at Fort Stockton, Mr. Fowler began his career in the stock business in west Texas thirty-five years ago, identified with various localities, and experiencing all the ups and downs of the business for many years, and since 1907 has held his present office in Fort Stockton.

William N. Fowler was born in Brown county, Texas, March 28, 1859. He has the distinction of being the second white child born in Brown county, and his parents were the first couple married in that civil subdivision of the state. His father, James H. Fowler, who was born in Missouri, and is now living retired at Sweetwater, came to Texas in 1846, and spent all his active career in the stock business. During the war he served as captain of a company of scouts for frontier protection and has seen every phase of the developing of Texas since it first became a state. He is an active member of the Presbyterian church and has always interested himself in religious affairs. His fraternity is the Masonic Order. He married Mary Ann Chandler, who was born in the State of Mississippi and they were married in Brown county, Texas. She is also living and is a member of the Presbyterian church. They had seven children, of whom the Fort Stockton postmaster is the oldest.

William N. Fowler has spent all his career in his native state, had his early education in private schools in Johnson county, later finishing with a course at Mansfield College, and up to the age of twenty remained at home and worked on his father's farm. His father was engaged in the horse and cattle raising business and he was thus given a thorough training in the occupation which he himself has followed for so many years. When he started out on his own account in 1878, he chose his first location in Nolan county, where he was in the hog and cattle business until 1885. He then moved his stock and outfit to Brewster county, where he remained three years, during which his enterprise was constantly growing and he was getting rank as one of the largest and most successful stockmen of the west. After selling out his interests in Brewster county, he spent about three years in traveling over the various states and territories, and thus located in Sweetwater, where he turned his attention to the sheep business. For seventeen years he was one of the large raisers of sheep, and his flocks roamed over thousands of acres of range land of west Texas. He then moved to Fort Stockton, and conducted a store here for a time, which he later sold, and since 1907 has been postmaster of the city.

Mr. Fowler in Ellis county on January 26, 1880, married Miss L. May Powell, daughter of Ben Powell of Bosque county, Texas. Mrs. Fowler was the devoted wife and mother of the family for fourteen years, was a good Christian woman, an active member of the Baptist church, and her death occurred in 1894 at the age of thirty-three. They were the parents of four children, three daughters and one son, namely: Mary Lou, deceased; Ana, wife of E. E. Shaw, a resident of Abilene; Otho, who is assistant postmaster, and Della, wife of Elmer Moore, of Fort Stockton. Mr. Fowler was reared in the Presbyterian faith and favors that denomination. He belongs to the Fort Stockton Club, and is an active worker for the Republican party. He enjoys outdoor life and nothing better suits him than traveling by team and wagon over the country, and spending his nights in camp. He owns valuable property interests in Fort Stockton, and while not a wealthy man has prospered and has provided liberally both for himself and family.

GEORGE J. TRAINER. County assessor for Sutton county, Mr. Trainer has been connected with the official life of this county for a number of years and is a well known and highly esteemed citizen of Sonora and vicinity.

George J. Trainer was born in the city of San Antonio, August 5, 1872, and has practically spent all his life in this state. Mr. Trainer says that his fondness for Texas is the result of his belief that everything good can be found in this state, which is remarkable for its resources and opportunities, the character of its people, and its schools, churches and other facilities for good and wholesome living. Mr. Trainer received his early education in the public schools and subsequently entered college at Canandaigua, New York, where he attended for two years. At the age of eighteen, he left college and began his practical career as a ranch foreman on a ranch in West Texas. After about four years he moved to Sonora, where he began clerking in a store. After about three years he engaged in business for himself, and had one of the prospering mercantile houses of Sonora for about seven years. He then sold out and returned to his former position in the store, and is still engaged in that capacity.

In November, 1912, Mr. Trainer was elected county tax assessor for Sonora county, and previous to this had served in the position of county commissioner for eight years, or four terms. He was married in Sutton county, December 22, 1895, to Miss Frances Adams, a daughter of D. Q. Adams and wife of Sutton county. Eight children, four sons and four daughters, have been born to their union, named as follows: Corinna, deceased; Ralph D.; F. Alice; George J., Jr.; Evelyn; Gracie A.; Columbus E.; and Wiley M.

Mr. Trainer while a member of no one church prefers the Catholic, and favors and supports all benevolent and religious works. He is a Democrat and one of the leaders of his party in Sutton county.

ROBERT E. JOHNSON. The picturesque and flourishing little city of Marble Falls will always keep alive the memory of the Johnson family, of whom General Johnson was the founder of the town many years ago, and his son Robert had the distinction of serving as the first mayor after it was incorporated as a city, and at the present time is again filling that office with efficiency.

General Adam R. Johnson, one of the oldest and most venerable Texans, who is now living at the age of nearly eighty years, passing his days in blindness at his home in Burnet was born in Kentucky in 1834, and came to Texas in 1854. He lived on the frontier, was an Indian fighter during pioneer times, and went through many of the arduous and dangerous experiences of the early days on the west Texas border. A surveyor by profession, he followed a pursuit which particularly brought him into connection with the roughness and dangers of outdoor existence. From Texas he entered the Confederate army during the war in the capacity of scout, and by merit and efficiency as a soldier was promoted from one grade to another until he came out as a general with a distinguished record, which will be found in more specific works relating the service of Texas troops in the war. He came home from this service and for some time was a merchant in Burnet county. He became the founder of the town of Marble Falls, owning the town site and promoting its early growth and development. In 1890 he built the college which is so important an institution at Marble Falls. For many years he combined his real estate interests with a large enterprise as a rancher and cattle raiser. He has been influential in Democratic circles of the state, and was frequently prominent in public affairs until his retirement. General Johnson married Josephine Eastland, who was born in Tennessee, but they were married in Texas. She is a devout member of the Episcopal church. There were nine children in the family, of whom Mayor Johnson was the second and the oldest son.

Robert E. Johnson was born in Burnet, Texas, February 27, 1868, and with the exception of about three years,

Benjamin F. Lacey

ring which time he was in Arizona and Old Mexico, lived in Texas all his life. As a boy he attended the public schools of Burnet, and also had a short course of study in the University at Georgetown. When fourteen years old he accepted a place in his father's office at a salary of fifteen dollars a month and board. After gaining the advantage of this experience for six years, he moved to Marble Falls, and took charge of the business relating to the promotion of the new town, which his father had established. During that time he had charge of the sale of lots and other matters in connection with the town, and conducted a general real estate business. From there he moved to Llano and was in the lumber business for about two years. He was then associated with Mr. F. H. Halloway, for whom he managed a large cotton business at Llano for about ten years. After that he was in Arizona and Old Mexico for three years, in mining, enterprise, and then returned to Marble Falls, and opened his office as a real estate man. He carries on a general real estate business with loans and abstracting, and operates extensively throughout this part of the state. For years prior to the Spanish-American war, Mr. Johnson was a member of the Texas State militia, and on the outbreak of the war with Spain he accompanied his company as second lieutenant, and joined the first Texas volunteer infantry, which served in Cuba during the war. Mr. Johnson was married in Burnet, December 7, 1886, to Miss Maria Lewis Williams, daughter of R. B. Williams of Botetourt county, Virginia. Their six children, four sons and two daughters, are as follows: Mary Burks and Thomas Badger, deceased; and Adam Rankin, Charles Eastland, Ross Hudson, and Maria Lewis. The family worship in the Christian church, and fraternally Mr. Johnson is affiliated with the Woodmen of the World. He is an active member of the Business Men's Association, and is an influential worker in the Democratic party, a keen student of local affairs, and larger politics. As already stated, he was the first citizen to be honored with the choice of Mayor of Marble Falls, after its incorporation, and after an interval of about six years, he was again chosen to the office, in which he is now serving. Mr. Johnson is very fond of the game of baseball, and music, literature and all the good things of life appeal to him. He is a firm believer in the opportunities and resources of the great state with which he has been identified from birth and is of the type of modern Texan, who is doing most for the progressive development of his state.

BENJAMIN JOHNSTON TILLAR. The residence in Fort Worth of Benjamin Johnston Tillar dates back to the year 1894, and from that time to the present he has been engaged in a variety of pursuits, all connected with the rising mercantile, commercial and financial interests of the city, with whose growth he has been intimately related, and with whose phenomenal prosperity he has prospered. Mr. Tillar has been interested in a number of financial institutions, as a matter of business or duty, and has been trustee and director of a number of large enterprises, where his prudence, sagacity and capacity, united to an unswerving fidelity, have been of great service in tiding them over the shoals and quicksands which ruin so many great ventures. In the management of his father's large estate, he has been called upon to exercise the highest order of ability, and in no particular has he failed in fully discharging the trust reposed in him. Few men of the city have been charged with such great responsibility; none have been more faithful to their charge.

Benjamin Johnston Tillar was born at Selma, Drew county, Arkansas, September 17, 1866, and is a son of T. W. and Antoinette (Pruitt) Tillar, natives, respectively, of Virginia and Mississippi. After early preparation in the primary schools, Mr. Tillar pursued an academic course in the University of Arkansas, where he was graduated in 1886, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Succeeding this he commenced the study of law in the office of Judge U. M. Rose, of Little Rock, Arkansas, with whom he remained one year. Mr. Tillar still feels that he owes a debt of gratitude to Judge Rose for his wise counsel, his earnest, zealous teachings and his kindly interest in his pupil. One of the ablest lawyers of Arkansas, at one time Judge Rose was called upon by a joint committee of senators and legislators, soliciting him to accept the United States senatorship from his State, but this offer was refused. In 1887 Mr. Tillar entered the University of Michigan, from which he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Laws in 1888, and in that same year returned to Little Rock, and entered the office of Judge W. S. McCain, with whom he remained two years. At the end of this period his health failed, and he was advised by his physicians to engage in out-of-door work, and accordingly in 1891, he became a cowboy on a cattle ranch in the western part of Texas, and in the vicinity of Midland was engaged for three years in the various duties that fall to the lot of the "puncher." Refreshed in mind and strengthened in bodily health, in 1894 he came to Fort Worth and embarked upon his career as a financier, identifying himself with the National Live Stock Bank, of which he was vice president at the time it was merged with the American National Bank of Fort Worth, in 1897. He is still a member of the directing board of this institution. In the meantime, in 1895, he had re-entered the ranching business, this time as a member of the firm of Bush & Tillar, which eventually became one of the great enterprises of its kind in the Lone Star State. He continued in partnership with Mr. Bush until June, 1906, when he disposed of his holdings, and during the following two years sought rest and retirement from the multitudinous duties and cares that had attended his handling of the vast interests with which he had been connected. He was not permitted to live in retirement for long, however, for in June, 1908, his father died, at the age of seventy-five years, and his enormous estate, valued at several millions of dollars, was turned over to the administration of Mr. Tillar, who, as trustee and manager, has continued to handle the interests of the heirs to the present time. It would be difficult to name an individual who possesses in a greater degree the confidence of his associates and the public at large. His prudence and conservatism are exceptional, and yet he possesses the contradictory qualities of boldness and courage when opportunity appears; his prescience is almost infallible; his integrity of the highest. To name the great enterprises with which he is connected would be to transcend the limits assigned for this review, yet the mention of a few of the more important may give some idea of the scope of his operations: The Westbrook Hotel Company of Fort Worth, of which he is vice president; the Greater Fort Worth Realty Company, of which he also is vice president; the Fort Worth Wagon Company and the Syndicate Land Company, in which he holds directorships; and the Bush & Tillar Cattle Company and the Rennolds & Tillar Land & Cattle Company, of which he is manager. He is a director of the Fort Worth Chamber of Commerce, where he is relied upon by his fellow-members for counsel, guidance and leadership. He has not been indifferent to the social amenities, and has numerous warm friends in the Fort Worth Country Club, where he is a member of the directing board.

Mr. Tillar was united in marriage with Miss Genevieve Eagon, who was born in Texas, a daughter of Dr. Samuel Eagon, a prominent practicing physician of Dallas.

WILLIAM G. SNIPES, M. D. The profession of medicine in Fannin county is represented by a body of physicians, efficient, successful and earnest men, who come largely from the common people in the humble and industrious walks of life. The tendency of its leaders is toward a studious and observing life and to keep the profession abreast of the advance in science and to render real service to the race.

Closely associated with relief work in the medical sphere in Fannin county is Dr. William G. Snipes of Ladonia, whose career of practice and residence here spans a period of a dozen years and whose achievements mark him as a frontiersman and a pilot among his professional brethren. His literary preparation for life was acquired in Cloverport Academy, Hardeman county, Tennessee, and his personality was introduced to the professional world as a country teacher in his native heath. After two years he took up the study of medicine at Vanderbilt University and finished his course there with graduation in 1887.

Dr. Snipes came from the farmer class of citizenship and was born May 20, 1860. His father was John Wesley Snipes, born in North Carolina and a son of a Methodist minister who spent his life in that state and was of the Scotch strain of the British Isles. The latter reared a large family containing several sons whose posterity fill the professions of law and medicine and is represented among the citizenship of the commonwealths of North Carolina, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Texas.

John Wesley Snipes was born in 1820, was educated after the fashion of his time, and came to mature years with a knowledge of one of the real essentials in education. His physical ailments prevented his rendering active aid to the south in the war, and his rheumatic afflictions made his life on the farm something of a burden. As a man he ever displayed that character of honor found in the gentleman of the old school, and his influence for morality and righteousness worked to the advantage of the Methodist church in which he brought up his family. He married Miss Sallie Bradshaw in Tennessee, and passed away in 1895, while his wife died in 1900. Their two children were William G. and Walter L., the latter being a lumber dealer of Jackson, Tennessee.

Dr. Snipes engaged in active practice upon his graduation and located at Mercer in his native county. He did his work there until his departure for Texas in 1901. That year he identified himself with Ladonia and has been ministering to the afflicted and sharing the duties of citizenship in social life for more than a decade.

After practicing a number of years, Dr. Snipes spent one winter in the Douglas Sanitarium in Nashville and since coming to Texas he added to his efficiency by taking post-graduate work in the New Orleans Polyclinic and in the Chicago Polyclinic. He affiliates with the county and state medical societies as a member and with the Odd Fellow and Woodmen of the World fraternities, and is identified with the church of his fathers. In his social sphere he is simple and unaffected, denoting the strong man he is held to be, and nature endowed him lavishly with ideal qualities for the profession he graces.

On February 22, 1894, Dr. Snipes married in Memphis, Tennessee, Miss Armine Pope, a daughter of Reverend Joseph Pope, a Presbyterian minister and a representative of one of Tennessee's early families. Rev. Pope married Miss Sophronia Estes and passed away where he spent the active years of his life. Dr. and Mrs. Snipes are without children.

TOM E. CRANFILL. Different members of the Cranfill family have been distinguished in Texas for several generations. Dr. James B. Cranfill, LL. D., has a national reputation as an editor and author, a clergyman, and a leader in the Prohibition party. A son of this distinguished Texan is Tom E. Cranfill, of Dallas, a young business leader whose achievements easily give him rank among the foremost in the commercial circles of the north Texas metropolis.

Dr. James Britton Cranfill, who is now retired from professional work of all kinds and is engaged in business at Dallas, has achieved success and precedence in three professions,—medicine, the ministry, and journalism and authorship. He was the founder, and for many years the editor and publisher, of the Baptist Standard, which during his ownership and individual control was the greatest Baptist paper in the world. Dr. Cranfill was born in Parker county, Texas, on the 12th of September, 1858, a son of Eaton and Martha Jane (Galloway) Cranfill, who were numbered among the pioneer settlers along the northwest frontier of Texas. His early education was obtained in the common schools of Gonzales county, and in 1879 he was granted the degree of Doctor of Medicine by the Texas Medical Board. Among other honors paid him for the practical achievements of his career was the degree of Doctor of Laws, conferred upon him by Simmons College, in 1900.

Dr. Cranfill was engaged in the practice of medicine from 1879 until 1882. He then took up newspaper work, as editor of the Gatesville Advance, in the county seat of Coryell county, and he continued as the publisher of this paper until 1886, from which year until 1888 he was editor of the Waco Advance, in the city of Waco. He was financial secretary of Baylor University during 1888-9 and was superintendent of the Baptist mission work of Texas from 1889 to 1892. In the year last noted, Dr. Cranfill founded the Texas Baptist Standard, of which he continued as editor until 1904. He was editor of the Baptist Tribune during the period from 1905 to 1907, inclusive, and has filled a position as editorial writer for the Associated Prohibition Press. Dr. Cranfill was ordained a clergyman of the Baptist church in 1890, and was vice president of the Baptist Young People's Union of America in 1891-3. His prominence in the Prohibition party caused him to be selected as its candidate for vice-president of the United States in 1892. Since 1888 he has served as a member of the executive committee of the party. Dr. Cranfill has been a trustee of the Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, and has honorary membership in the Texas Eclectic Medical Association, the Philomathean Society of Baylor University, and the Dallas Art Association. To many he is best known for his work as author and editor. He is the author of two earnest and helpful works, entitled: "Courage and Comfort," published in 1899, and "Cranfill's Heart Talks," published in 1906. In 1895 he edited "Carroll's Sermons," and in 1907 published Riley's History of Texas Baptists.

On the 1st of September, 1878, was solemnized the marriage of Dr. James B. Cranfill to Miss Ollie Allen, of Crawford, Texas. Of this union Tom E. Cranfill was born in Coryell county, in 1881. He was reared and educated in Waco, and spent several years as a student in Baylor University, at the time when the distinguished Dr. Burleson was the administrative head of that institution. Mr. Cranfill took a prominent part in college affairs and was captain of the first football team at Baylor University, besides which he participated actively in other branches of college athletics. After the opening of the great oil field about Beaumont and during the excitement there in 1902, Mr. Cranfill left the university and added his vigorous young personality to the throng of eager fortune seekers. Although he had just attained to his legal majority, his acumen and good judgment brought to him success in the oil business. In the latter part of the year 1902 Mr. Cranfill removed from Beaumont to the city of Dallas, where he has since been actively engaged in the real-estate business, with operations whose scope and importance have made his reputation far transcend local limitations. Although still in his early thirties, he has established the foundation for a splendid fortune. Mr. Cranfill became a member of the firm of Seay, Cranfill & Company, and upon its incorporation under this title he assumed the office of vice president, a position which he now holds, the other members of the executive corps being as here noted: Ben T. Seay, president; Robert B. Seay, Jr., secretary and treasurer; and Britt Cranfill, assistant secretary.

This alliance of successful, hard-working men, each

Yours truly,
Reese Saturn.

an expert in his respective line, is noted for its remarkable success. It has the world's record for lot sales. This record was established during a sale in Trinity Heights, south of Oak Cliff, where within four days a total of 487 lots were sold,—762 having been sold in a single day. Another fine record made by the firm, or company, is that since 1903 they have sold the lots on which more than 35,000 Dallas citizens are now living,—enough to make a large city. Furthermore, it is the record of this firm that not a single purchaser has ever lost a cent in his investment, while most of the investors have enjoyed a large increase in the value of their properties. Seay, Cranfill & Company have promoted, sold and populated the following named tracts and additions to Dallas, and each one represents residence property of the highest grade: Trinity Heights, Ray's Addition, Deere Park, Columbia Addition, McKell's Homestead, Ross Avenue Annex, McKell's Addition, Ross Avenue Addition, Fairland Annex, Grand Avenue Addition. Huaco Heights in Waco and Crockett Place in Galveston.

Aside from the important work thus achieved in connection with the real-estate operations that have greatly conserved civic and material progress in Dallas, Seay, Cranfill & Company have gained a reputation that has brought them into prominence in similar enterprises in other cities of Texas, so noteworthy has been their success in promoting these extensive enterprises. Mr. Cranfill personally represented his corporation at Galveston, in June, 1914, where they placed upon the market the beautiful Crockett Place Addition, in which they sold between 900 and 1,000 lots within an almost incredibly short period. In connection with the development of the fine Huaco Heights Addition to the city of Waco, Mr. Cranfill, who is president of the Huaco Heights Company, sold within one year residence lots in this addition to the value of $300,000.

Seay, Cranfill & Company in recent years have had an interest in nearly every large enterprise launched in Dallas, and deserve a large share of credit for their participation in the growth and development of the city during the twelve years of their identification with its interests. Not only through the sale of residence additions but also in the handling of business property have they enjoyed continuous success. In matters where the object is to invest and safeguard large amounts of capital in property for commercial or industrial enterprises, their advice and counsel have been sought in constantly cumulative way, and those who have entrusted important affairs to the care of this firm know how well and honorably their interests have been conserved.

In this highly efficient organization Mr. Cranfill is a specialist in the sale of additions, of which department he has had personal charge, as intimated in foregoing statements. Therefore the record-making sales previously noted must be accredited largely to his initiative and executive ability. Added to his optimism in the matter of the present greatness and splendid future of Dallas, and an enthusiastic love for his work, are unbounded energy and alertness and a thorough knowledge of his business. In a day when only the most highly trained and most efficient can hope to succeed in the face of ever increasing competition such as exists in a city of the metropolitan status of Dallas, Mr. Cranfill stands as a young man who easily, and without apparent effort, is a leader among his fellows.

Mr. Cranfill is a member of the board of directors of the Dallas Chamber of Commerce, in which body he represents the real-estate fraternity of the city. He is secretary and treasurer of the Texas Mortgage & Investment Company, and is president of several local corporations. Fraternally, he has attained to the thirty-second degree in the Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite Masonry, besides having received the chivalric honors in a Dallas commandery of Knights Templar, representing the maximum York Rite affiliation, and he holds membership also in the adjunct organization, the Ancient Arabic Order Nobles of the Mystic Shrine.

Mr. Cranfill has a home and family of which he is justly proud. In Dallas was solemnized his marriage to Miss Mai Seay, daughter of Ben T. Seay, and more specific data concerning the well known Dallas family of which she is a representative will be found on other pages of this publication. Mr. and Mrs. Cranfill have four children: Mona Mai, Isabel, Thomas Mabry, and Martha Eleanor. The two children last mentioned are twins, and in the baby show held in Dallas in May, 1914, they brought distinction to themselves and pride to their parents by being selected as prize winners. The boy, Thomas Mabry Cranfill, won first prize offered for boy babies, and scored 99.5 points. This is said to be the highest score ever made by a twin babe in a contest of this character. The little daughter, Martha Eleanor, made a score of 99, which no doubt would have been higher save for the fact that she had been ill prior to the show.

REESE TATUM. The mayor of any of the thriving western towns of comparatively few years' growth has about as much on his hands as has the mayor of a small-sized eastern city, for though life is not so complex, a western town accomplishes as many miles along the road of progress in a year as an eastern city has covered in the past ten or fifteen. Therefore, Mayor Tatum of Dalhart has a position that is no sinecure. That he has succeeded in filling the post to the utmost satisfaction of the citizens of this important town in the Panhandle region of Texas is proof of his executive ability, as well as his good business sense. He is one of the most successful criminal lawyers in this section of the state and has won his prominent position by dint of painstaking study and hard work.

Reese Tatum was born in Maury county, Tennessee, on the 4th of April, 1878, the son of Jesse B. and Harriet E. (Reese) Tatum. His father was a native of Rutherford county, Tennessee, and spent his life as a farmer. He was at one time a prominent stockman in Tennessee, but during the Civil War became totally insolvent by paying security debts and the freeing of his slaves. Later in life he removed to Van Buren county, Arkansas, where he died on June 21, 1890, at the age of sixty-seven. Mrs. Tatum was born in Alabama, near Tallahassee, but was only a child of three when her parents removed to Tennessee. Here she grew up and was married. Two of her brothers were prominent in the Civil War, both of them being captains at the close of the war. Mrs. Tatum died in Texas, on the 9th of August, 1903, at the age of seventy-three. Fourteen children were born to Jesse B. and Harriet Tatum.

Of these children, Reese Tatum was the youngest. He was sent to the public schools of Tennessee during his boyhood, but he was not very old when he had to stop school and help his father on the farm. He was an ambitious lad and determined that he would some day be something else than a small farmer, for scientific farming with all its possibilities had not then been introduced into the South. He, therefore, at the age of nineteen began to read law, and for one year struggled along by himself. At the end of this time he entered the offices of Colonel Wm. Crawford and Chas. W. Crow, at Corsicana in Navarro county, Texas. This firm had a reputation for handling criminal cases throughout the State of Texas, and was probably at that time about the best firm of criminal lawyers in the state. He remained with this firm seven months and was then admitted to practice. This comparatively short time of preparation shows what unusual gifts the young man possessed, not only mental gifts, but the power of concentration which brilliant men so often lack. After his admission to the bar he began the practice of his profession in Corsicana, still remaining with the firm under whom he had studied. He was with them for two years and then, in 1902, came to Dalhart, and opened up a law office. He soon proved his worth and his practice has been constantly on the increase. He is looked upon by members of his profession in other sections of the state as an authority on both civil and criminal law, and his personal popularity with them is great. Mr. Tatum was elected mayor of the City of Dalhart on the 4th day of April, 1911, and still holds this office. He has proved most efficient and has won an enviable reputation as an executive. He has one of the most complete law libraries in the state and his literary library in his home is considered one of the most elaborate in the state and is one of the best selected libraries to be found.

In politics Mr. Tatum is a member of the Democratic party. He belongs to the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and is a Yeoman. He is very enthusiastic over the future of the Panhandle region of Texas. He believes that in the course of time, and that the time is not far off, this region will be the most prosperous part of the state, and now it is the greatest section for stock raising in the United States.

Mr. Tatum was married to Miss Fannie B. Hunter at Waxahachie, Texas, on the 7th of August, 1900. Mrs. Tatum was born in the State of Texas, the daughter of George J. and Virginia (Blanco) Hunter. Mrs. Tatum died on March 15, 1910, at the age of thirty-two, leaving two daughters. Regina B. Tatum, who was born August 22, 1902, in Corsicana, Texas, is now in the high sixth grade of the high school of Dalhart. Margaret H. Tatum, who was born in Dalhart, on February 5, 1905, is in the third grade of the Dalhart public schools.

CYRUS S. MCFARLAND. The mercantile enterprise of Ladonia is unusually well represented in the firm of Jackson-McFarland, a business which successfully endeavors to supply all the wants of the trade throughout a large radius of country surrounding Ladonia, and whose annual volume of business is exceeded by few similar establishments in northeast Texas. The manager of this business is Cyrus S. McFarland, who represents one of the oldest families of northeast Texas and whose career as a farmer, merchant and public spirited citizen is worthy of more than casual note.

Cyrus S. McFarland is a son of the late Jackson McFarland and a grandson of James McFarland, both of whom were pioneers in the Republic of Texas, and among the very first settlers in Fannin county. It is a very interesting and exceptional family record, and a more detailed account of the earlier generation of McFarlands will be found on other pages of this work in the sketch of James F. McFarland, a brother of Cyrus S. "Bose" McFarland as Cyrus is everywhere known in Fannin county, was born at the old family home five miles north of Ladonia, March 1, 1865. He was trained to the labor of the farm and his education was in the country schools and the schools of Savoy. He was past his majority when he left the farm and on beginning commercial life in Ladonia he engaged in the retail liquor business, a line with which he continued until the liquor traffic was prohibited in Fannin county. He also owned a meat market during a portion of the time and finally gave up both those lines of enterprise in order to engage in general merchandising as a member of the firm of Blakney-Stevens-Jackson Company. This was subsequently reorganized as the Jackson-McFarland Company, of which the constituent members were J. E. and C. T. and Miss Fannie Jackson, and C. S. and S. J. and James F. McFarland and N. T. Scott. The retirement of the first two mentioned Jacksons, leaves the McFarland brothers and Miss Jackson and N. T. Scott as proprietors, with "Bose" McFarland as manager of the firm. This store embraces three distinct departments with important adjuncts, and has the confidence of the trade over a wide scope of territory.

Although busy with commercial pursuits for a number of years, Mr. McFarland has never lost interest in his old vocation. Farming has always been one of the profitable features of his enterprise, and he has done much to increase the general upward tendency in rural development upon all the lines controlled and operated by him. He has about two hundred and fifty acres under plow, besides much other land devoted to pasturage and other uses. He makes a specialty of the raising and breeding of mules, and he sends a number of this stock to market every year.

On December 26, 1886, Mr. McFarland married Miss Susie Lee, a daughter of Rev. Reece D. Lee, whose life has been devoted to the ministry of the Christian church and to farming in Fannin county, where his people were among the pioneer settlers. The Rev. Lee first married a Miss Cobb, and their children were J. Houston G. Lee, now a practicing lawyer in Bonham, and Mrs. Halsey Bufford of this state. The second wife of Rev. Lee was Miss Nancy Oliver, and Dr. Robert E. Lee of Windom and Mrs. McFarland are the children of that union. Of the three children of Mr. and Mrs. McFarland, the first died in infancy. William S. is a graduate of the Texas Christian University at Fort Worth in the class of 1913, and Miss Ethel graduated from Belmont College at Nashville in the same year.

JACK R. GARLAND. Three generations of the Garland family have contributed to the agricultural activities of the state of Texas, and all of them have been prominent and prosperous, taking their places among the leading men of their communities, and wielding an influence commensurate with their positions and their personalities. Jack R. Garland represents the third generation, and, though still a young man, he has made worthy progress in the field of enterprise that he has identified himself with. An extensive farmer and a foremost dealer in real estate and insurance he will be found an influential factor in the affairs of the town of Annona at all times, and his popularity and position in the community in which he was born and has passed the most of his life thus far is well established.

The Annona business man and farmer whose name heads this review was born at the country home of his parents less than two miles distant from Annona, on September 1, 1874, and his childhood, youth and more mature years have here been passed. He is the son of Joe D. and Jessie (Latimer) Garland, and the grandson of Jack Garland and his wife, Nancy (Johnson) Garland. It may be stated here that Jack Garland, the paternal grandfather of the subject, was born east of the Mississippi river in North Carolina.

He came to Texas with his family in 1853, settling four miles west of DeKalb, in Bowie county, this state. He was the owner of slaves, and as a farmer and trader he manifested a remarkable prowess, and gained a pleasing state of prosperity. His surplus cash he invested steadily in Bowie and Red River county land, and at one time in his career owned as much as twenty-three thousand acres, and was properly numbered among the land barons of East Texas. Among his business enterprises was a tanyard which he operated for a number of years following the war, and the people whom he employed as laborers constituted a veritable colony, rendering his influence over the two counties a most widespread one. Despite his many cares and responsibilities he continued in social and business harmony, at ease with the world and enjoying life at its best. He was a hopeful, cheery and trustful man. He maintained no religious belief that might be named as such, and in all his life was never found allied with any fraternal society. When he passed away the community lost a master financier and business man, and one of the most influential characters the county had known. His wife, Nancy (Johnson) Garland, died in 1882 and their children were: Mrs. M. C. Sloan, of Annona, who died December 31, 1913; Mrs. Maggie Winston, now deceased; and Joe D., the father of Jack Garland of this sketch and who died April 21, 1914.

Manuel E. Flores

Joe D. Garland was born at Henderson, Tennessee, in 1836, and was a boy of seventeen years when he accompanied his father's family to Texas in 1853. He had gained some little education in the log cabin schools of the day, but fell far short of having gained what might be termed an education. There was nothing to detract his thoughts from the farm and farm life until he reached his majority, and at that time the Rebellion came on, with its demand for men. Joe Garland promptly enlisted in the Texas Cavalry, and was serving with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel when the conflict closed. He had served in the Trans-Mississippi Department, and had participated in many of the engagements of the war. He escaped without personal injury, although he was captured and incarcerated in prison, from which he managed to effect an escape after some time, and duly rejoined his regiment. When the war ended and peace once more settled down over the land, Joe Garland returned to his native fireside and turned his energies to the work of the farm. He established his home in Red River county, where he held closely to his vocation as stockman and farmer, and the evening of life found him surrounded with all the comforts of life, and the maturity of his earlier plans is everywhere manifest in the substantial improvements everywhere seen on his vast domain. Like his father before him, he maintained an attitude toward the public and toward the general welfare of the community that made and held him a conspicuous figure therein, and gave him rank among the best citizenship of the place.

Politically, Mr. Garland continued unambitious and inconspicuous. He affiliated with the dominant party in Texas, however, in a somewhat impersonal way, and his churchly relations were with the Methodist body, and were distinguished by the enthusiastic support he has long given the denomination. He lived a straightforward, honest Christian life, never wavering in his allegiance to church and cause, and responded generously to the demands made upon him for service as steward, trustee or Sunday school superintendent, as the call to service came. His bequests to church work in its varied forms were ever in keeping with his means and with his zeal, and he was a well known layman at annual conferences of the church.

Prosperity walked hand in hand with Mr. Garland, and his business enterprises always met with favor. His estate, comprising nineteen hundred acres of the choicest land in the vicinity of Annona, is valued at one hundred and fifty dollars per acre, and with the profits of his extensive interests he generously advanced and enhanced the social conditions of his locality by looking well to the higher education of his children. He was a firm and sturdy advocate of education as a guaranty of good citizenship, and every dollar he spent with that principle in mind showed a goodly return of interest. Mr. Garland married Jessie Latimer. She was a daughter of Russ Latimer, one of the old pioneers of Red River county, and a member of the state legislature prior to the war. Mrs. Garland died in 1895, leaving six children, of whom brief mention is made as follows: Nannie, the wife of Dr. J. C. Barton, of Clarksville, Texas; Mrs. Joella Dooley, of Muskogee, Okla.; Leda, the wife of J. B. Wright, of Selina, Texas; Jack R. of this review; Wirt R., one of the able young business men of Annona, and Roy, who is finishing his education at the A. & M. College of Texas.

Jack R. Garland followed his country school training by a course of study at the Davis Military Academy at Winston-Salem, North Carolina, then spent a year at Blossom, Texas, in Lamar College, then a season at Central College, followed by a course in the Southwestern University at Georgetown. Mr. Garland chose a commercial career, rather than that of the farm, to which he had been trained by his father, and when he had completed his education he engaged in the merchandise business at Annona as a member of the firm of Garland & Daniel. The firm continued thus until 1904, when Mr. Garland purchased the interest of his partner and continued alone until 1910, when he was succeeded in the enterprise by Adams & Williams, by purchase, after which the young merchant turned his attention to real estate and insurance, together with the conduct of his own large farm. The place, comprising one thousand acres under plow, employs twenty-two families in its maintenance, all housed in comfortable tenant homes, built or maintained at his order. His substantial contribution to his home town is seen in a fine double brick store, in which his father joins him in ownership, and in his own residence, the finest example to be found in the town. His activity in real estate is expended in the capacity of a broker, and his insurance contracts embrace both life and fire. He helped to promote, as an original stockholder, the First National Bank of Annona, and his substantial and well sustained aid of the movement for improved roads is a matter of common report. He has never broken the example and practice of the men of his family with respect to the non-seeking of official life. Alert and ready for any emergency, he stands among the foremost men of his town, and is never in the rear guard when there is work to be done in the advancement of the best interests of the community, and his enthusiasm for such matters is ably supported by his native vigor and capacity for service.

On December 1, 1896, Mr. Garland was married at Blossom, Texas, to Miss Mary, the daughter of Judge John A. Brewer, an uncle of Governor Earl Brewer, of Mississippi, whom the judge brought up in Lamar county, Texas. Judge Brewer and his wife, who was a Miss Johnson, are the parents of Mrs. Garland and a son, John Brewer, of Blossom, Texas. The Garlands have two children, Joe D., and Jessie Louise.

MANUEL E. FLORES. For more than forty years a resident of El Paso, there is no one among his contemporaries who bears a finer reputation for probity in business and private life than Manuel E. Flores, whose career in this city has identified him closely with public and business affairs, and who is known and esteemed by all classes of citizenship.

Manuel E. Flores was born in Santa Fe, New Mexico, January 13, 1851. His parents were Santiago and Refugio (Cisneros) Flores. His father was born in Sonora, Mexico, and his death occurred in 1871 and his remains now rest in the Juarez, Mexico, cemetery. The mother was a native of New Mexico, where she died at the age of forty-two, and she now rests at Santa Fe. The parents were both devout members of the Catholic faith, and were noted for their kindness of heart and charity in all their relations with their fellow-men. The Flores family, through its various representatives, has typified the best of the kindly, courteous qualities of the Spanish race in the southwest, and it has produced in Mr. Manuel E. Flores one of the ablest and most useful citizens of the city of El Paso.

Manuel E. Flores received his early education in private schools in New Mexico, and from there went to Oakland, California, where he took a special course in the Oakland College. Subsequently he pursued a thorough course in the Sonora College at Hermosillo, Mexico, where he was graduated in 1878. There is probably not a citizen in El Paso who surpasses Mr. Flores in scholarship and linguistic ability, and he has thorough and fluent command over several languages.

His home was in New Mexico until he was about eighteen years of age, since which time El Paso has been his residence, although his activities have often taken him from this city. During the first eight years of his active career in Franklin, now El Paso, he managed a large mercantile establishment for Eynocente Ochoa, the multi-millionaire banker of Juarez, Mexico. Following this experience he was engaged in teaching in both El Paso and in Juarez, for about four years, and then he entered the government service in the customs department under Dr. Dwight C. Marsh. He was stationed at Franklin, Texas, now El Paso, and was continued in the customs service for about six years. He then received nomination for district and county clerk of El Paso county, and it is a high tribute to his citizenship and standing as a man that he was elected by the largest majority in the history of the county. His popularity among the people and his efficiency as an official caused him to be retained in that office for fourteen years. He then had charge under special contract of the commissary department in the El Paso Smelting Works for four years. He was then engaged in the mining business himself for a time until he opened his present office.

Mr. Flores does a general brokerage business and is now, and has been for many years, the official Spanish interpreter for the United States district court for the western district of Texas. His fluent use of Spanish, English and French equipped him pre-eminently for this office, and he is a valued official of the court in expediting its relations among the several people who compose the larger part of this population in this section. He does a large real estate business, especially among the Mexican people. He is not a regular member of the bar, yet his business both as interpreter and in other lines has made it necessary for him to be thoroughly posted on both Mexican and American law.

Mr. Flores has been twice married. His first wife, Leonora Stevenson, died and is buried in Ciudad Juarez, Mexico. She was a daughter of Hugh Stevenson, one of the pioneer Americans who settled in El Paso in the fifties, and became very wealthy. Mr. Flores' second marriage occurred in El Paso in 1894 when Paula Pino became his wife. She formerly resided in Socorro, New Mexico. The three daughters and two sons of Mr. Flores are named as follows: Refugio, who married A. Salas, and resides in El Paso; Thresa, William, James, and Paulito, all at home. All have received excellent advantages in the local schools and colleges, and are well fitted for the responsibilities of their individual careers. Mr. Flores and family affiliate with the Catholic church. He has been president of the Fraternal Brotherhood and one of the most active official members of that organization. He has been a member for many years of the Spanish-American Society known as La Mutualista of El Paso. He is also a member of the Spanish Syndicate. In politics he is a Republican, though he now takes no active part, except as a voter. Mr. Flores owns a fine ranch near El Paso and the activities of this place afford him his principle diversion from other business cares. Mr. Flores is one of the business men of El Paso, enjoying the respect of all citizens as a high-class and cultured gentleman, and in all the exigencies of life has acted his part with honor and fidelity. As one who has lived for more than forty years with a record of honorable achievement and activity in one of the most important of Texas cities, his career has a fitting place in the history of this great state.

ALEX W. MAAS. Although a resident of San Antonio only since 1910, Alex W. Maas has become well and favorably known in business circles of the city by reason of the extent of his dealings in city realty. He belongs to a German family, which for several generations has been prominent in Berlin, in which city Mr. Maas himself was born, in 1863, a son of Albert William and Fredericka (Lineous) Maas.

William Maas, the grandfather of Alex W. Maas, was born in Germany, rose to high position in official life there, and for a number of years served as police commissioner, or chief of police, of Berlin. The family was founded in the United States by Albert William Maas, who with his wife and children came to this country in 1869 and located in the city of Chicago. An architect by profession, Mr. Maas became distinguished in his calling, worked for some years with Mr. Root, of the later firm of Burnham & Root, famous World's Fair architects, and eventually became senior member of the firm of Maas & Koneman, and as such superintended the construction of Chicago's first building of sky-scraper proportions, a ten-story structure at the corner of Wabash avenue and Van Buren street. He was also the architect for buildings for the old Chicago, Indianapolis & Vincennes Railroad, was a man of splendid education in his calling, having taken a course of seven years in architecture in Berlin, and was very active, energetic and progressive. Although his advanced ideas and utter indifference to the rules of precedent caused him to lose several large fortunes, his indomitable perseverance and unending resource led him to attack each new venture with the same zeal, energy and enthusiasm. In 1897 he left Chicago and went to Mississippi, having promoted and organized the German Silk & Agricultural Company, an ambitious colonization project, founded the town of Colonia, and colonized a large number of German farmers. This idea was too advanced for his day, and Mr. Maas lost fully a half million dollars in the project, a loss from which he never fully recovered. He died in 1907, having spent several of the remaining years of his life at Meridian, Mississippi. His wife was born at Glambaag, near Berlin, Germany.

Alex W. Maas was a lad of six years when brought to the United States, and the greater part of his education was secured in the public schools of Chicago. For six years he also attended the German-American Institute in that city, and learned the profession of architecture, which he followed for several years in connection with building operations. Removing from Meridian, Mississippi, he lived for eighteen years in New Orleans, and was married in that city to Miss Josie Holland. Subsequently he spent about three years in the Beaumont (Texas) oil fields, where he became associated with prominent and wealthy Texans in several large oil projects, and early in 1910 came to San Antonio, where he has since made his home. He has devoted his attention to dealing in real estate, and is now known as an expert in realty values. His business has grown to large proportions, and his sound judgment, unswerving integrity and great energy have placed him in a position of prominence among the business citizens of his adopted city. Mr. and Mrs. Maas have four children: Bessie, Shirley, Esther and Herbert.

Among the most treasured possessions of Mr. Maas is a sword, which at one time belonged to no less a personage than the great Marshal Ney of France, given to that famous officer by Napoleon. The interesting history of this weapon, and the manner in which it came to its present possessor was fully given in an article which recently appeared in a San Antonio paper, from which we are allowed to quote:

"It does not often fall to the lot of any person to be in possession of an implement of war valued at $50,000. But Alex W. Maas, of 409 Kendall street, has such a weapon. As would be supposed, it does not stand in the corner of the hallway or on the front porch, but is kept in a vault of the San Antonio Loan and Trust Company. This sword is a treasured heirloom in the Maas family. It is said to have been given by Napoleon Bonaparte to Marshal Ney directly before the ill-fated invasion of Russia and, as the story that has come down through the years goes, was worn at the battle of Moscow by the man was unto Napoleon as his right arm.

"Though the French Eagles were forced back from the land of the Czar by the burning of the Russian capital and the inhospitable snows, Bonaparte continued to sway the rest of Continental Europe, and one year after the horrors of the retreat from the empire of the Russ, Ney was sent by his imperial master to preside over the capital of Prussia. With him went his wife nd daughter. It was there that love, making light of international complications, laughing at the hate of the average Prussian for the average Frenchman, made its residence known in the same, sweet, conquering way.

"The grand-uncle of Alex W. Maas, loving everything Prussian, despising everything French, wooed and won the heart of Mlle. Ney. Death intervened to prevent a marriage which, in all probability, both French and Prussian influences would have sought to stop. On her deathbed, Mlle. Ney requested that her German lover receive her father's sword and one of his uniforms. That is how Edward Maas came to own this almost priceless relic and it tells why the San Antonio representative of the family has it in his possession now.

"The man who got the sword by the wish of a dying woman never married. It came to Alex W. Maas' grandfather, William Maas, to his son, Albert William Maas, and then to its present owner. Both the grandfather and granduncle of Alex W. Maas were police commissioners in Berlin and the family was one of prominence a century ago, the time at which the romance between Maas and Mlle. Ney started, and ended in her death.

"Twenty-six years ago the sword was exhibited in the hall of the United States Senate and every member of that body held it in his hands during that exhibition. About that time, too, Albert Maas was offered $26,000 for the relic. The offer came from Paris through a Mr. Coffee of the Leonard Company of New York. Mr. Maas refused to accept this sum. Though more than a century old, the sword still preserves much of its original beauty. On one side of the shield is the coat-of-arms of France. On the other is the letter 'C,' showing it to have been made while Bonaparte was consul and before he donned the imperial robes and adopted imperial ways. This fact leads to the conclusion that the weapon must have been worn by Napoleon himself, it probably having been at his side at some of his most notable victories.

"Owning a sword graven with a history like this entails, it is little wonder Mr. Maas values the relic at half a hundred thousand dollars. Mr. Maas' children have displayed the sword to their playmates at both the High school and the Brackenridge school. Naturally, it has aroused much interest."

ANDREW F. JONES. For about thirty-seven years Andrew F. Jones has been identified with the free and open life of the west Texas country, for many years having been one of the range cattlemen, and now a successful modern stock farmer in Sterling county. During this period of thirty-seven years he has prospered in a material way, and has well deserved all that he has won. At the same time he has reared a family, and as a tribute to the climate he states that he has never had to call a physician in service to any member of his household.

Mr. Jones spent his boyhood during the troublous period of the Civil war, and thus had little schooling, and learned his chief lessons by practical work, rather than from any books or school instruction. He was born June 10, 1852, in Walker county, Georgia, where the family, of Welsh and Irish stock, were numerous in the early days, and were slave holders and planters both in Georgia and Tennessee. His parents were Lewis and Sarah Jones, both of Georgia. The father was a farmer, and died in 1852 in the same year that Andrew was born. The mother died in 1861. Andrew was the youngest of the eight children. The mother brought her children to Texas in 1859, locating in Hunt county, where Andrew grew up and where from his earliest boyhood he worked in order to support his mother and sister. When he started out for himself, it was as a worker for wages, and he was for several years connected with a business which at the time was a very important one, and which many years ago was supplanted by the railroads and other transportation facilities. He engaged in freighting with ox teams, and mules from Greenville to Jef-erson, and also further north to Sherman, White Rock, McKinney, Kentuckytown, the distance from Greenville to Jefferson being one hundred and twenty-five miles, and the other places lying from one hundred and sixty to one hundred and eighty miles further north. It required many days of slow and toilsome progress to take a load of goods over this route, and the work was not without much variety of incidents and occasional danger. He continued in that line for five years and in 1874 sold out his interests and quit the transportation business. He then went to Coleman county, in 1875, and spent a number of years on the extreme frontier. Coleman county was practically unsettled at the time, and railroads were many miles to the east and the south of that locality. He engaged in the cattle business, and the first five years was employed as a cowboy for other cattlemen. He then moved to Sterling county, and continued working for wages at from thirty-five to forty dollars a month. Then in 1880 he bought a small herd of cattle, and from that start has been continuously engaged in the cattle industry up to the present time. At different times he has also done a great deal in raising horses. In a few years time he had increased his herds to one thousand head, and was considered one of the prosperous cattlemen of the west. Thirty years ago such cattle as he has, sold from eight to ten dollars per head. The old Texas steer which then made up practically all the great herds in west Texas, has long since gone out of existence, but the same grade of cattle at the present time would bring from thirty-five to fifty dollars a head. When he began the cattle business, the entire region of west Texas was free range, and there was practically no limit to the feeding range until after 1886. In 1883 Mr. Jones, with foresight in anticipation of a time when the range would be overcrowded, began taking up state land, and is now living on a section of the land which he acquired thirty years ago. He has increased his holdings from time to time, until his modern stock ranch in Sterling county comprises fifteen hundred acres. When he first saw west Texas, the plains were still the haunt of buffalo and Indians, and the stockmen lived more or less in constant fear of Indian raids. In 1881 occurred perhaps the last general raid from the Indians, and in that year the troops and rangers and cattlemen effectually cleared the country of their ancient foe. Mr. Jones was in one hard clash with the Indians, in company with four other cowboys, some eight or ten rangers, and a man named Anglin was shot in that fight and fell from his horse as he was charging the Indians, his body falling by the side of Mr. Jones.

From the time he cast his first vote until the present, Mr. Jones has been a loyal supporter of the Democrat party and its principles. He is affiliated with the Woodmen of the World. On January 18, 1883, Mr. Jones married Miss Lee Miller of Sterling county, a daughter of Gideon Mills. Her father was a well known stock farmer, and had a noteworthy military record having served in the Mexican war, and also as a Confederate soldier, going through the Civil war from 1861 to 1865. He died at the good old age of eighty-seven years. Mr. and Mrs. Jones have three children, a son and two daughters. Willis Jones is married and lives in Sterling City. Miss Birdie and Miss Myrtle make their home with their parents.

MARSHALL SPOONTS. A Fort Worth attorney who represents one of the largest corporations engaged in business in the state, Marshall Spoonst is one of the younger members of the Texas bar, but is a creditable and worthy successor of his eminent father, the late Morris Augustus Spoonst, whose career in the law and public service gave him a place among the foremost Texans of his day.

The Spoonst is of genuine Holland Dutch stock. The notable facts which would distinguish it from almost any family that might be mentioned is the fact that every male member, excepting one for several hundred years has followed the practice of the law. This exception was in the case of the grandfather of Mr. Spoonts. Grandfather Spoonts was exiled from Germany by Napoleon, and after the reconstruction came to America and settled in Leesburg, Virginia. He was an architect and builder, and it is an interesting fact of the history that he erected the wing of the capitol at Washington, now occupied by the Supreme Court of the United States. The grandmother of the Fort Worth lawyer was Miss Mary Vanderbilt, a niece of Commodore Vanderbilt. When she was eighty years of age she was considered one of the handsomest old ladies in America.

The late Morris A. Spoonts, father of Marshall Spoonts, had a career as a lawyer and public man too well known to need extensive mention. He easily occupied the front rank in the Texas bar. He represented as a lawyer many large institutions and corporations, and was chief counsel for many railroads. His death occurred July 27, 1912, and he left a comfortable fortune which represented his many distinguished services as a lawyer and a reputation that will long give his name distinction in this state.

Marshall Spoonts was born at Buffalo Gap, in Taylor county, Texas, December 18, 1879, a son of Morris A. and Josephine (Puett) Spoonts, both of whom were native Texans. His education was continued from the public schools and the Fort Worth University, but he did not graduate, instead entering the office of his father, with whom he remained for five years. He was admitted to the bar of Fort Worth on January 20, 1903. After five years' association with his father he formed a co-partnership with Mr. Morgan Bryan, and the law firm of Bryan & Spoonts had a liberal share of the legal business in the courts of Fort Worth and Tarrant county during the five years of its existence. The firm represented several railways and corporations. In January, 1913, Mr. Spoonts opened up his present luxurious offices in the Thomas Building, and enjoys a large general practice, but particularly as representative of the Houston & Texas Central Railroad in its state litigations, and also as representative for a number of insurance companies transacting business under the Texas laws.

On July 9, 1907, Mr. Spoonts married Miss Lorine Jones, daughter of William W. Jones, of Corpus Christi, Texas. They have no children. Mr. Spoonts is a member of the Masonic order, the Elks and the Knights of Pythias.

ENCARNACION SALINAS is a native of Mexico, but has resided in Texas for more than thirty-five years, and during this time has been prominently identified with agricultural pursuits and with the official life of Starr county, where for the past nine years he has served in the capacity of county clerk. His successive re-election to this office gives evidence of the esteem in which he is held by the citizens of his county, and his wide popularity is shown by his numerous friends throughout this section.

Mr. Salinas was born at Mier, Tamaulipas, Mexico, in 1865, his parents being both natives of that country, and in 1877 accompanied them to Starr county, Texas, where his father became a successful rancher and stockman, having a large property north of Rio Grande City. Mr. Salinas was given good educational advantages, and his boyhood and youth were spent on the home ranch, where he remained until 1904, in which year he was first elected county clerk of Starr county. At that time he took up his residence in Rio Grande City, and every two years he has been re-elected to this office. His service has been of a conscientious and efficient nature, and he has at all times shown his ability in handling the large business interests of the county.

Mr. Salinas was married to Miss Rafaela Munoz, who was born in Mier, Mexico, and they are the parents of four children, namely: Amalia, who is the wife of Adolph Oosterveen; Encarnacion A., now a student at Cumberland Gap College, Tennessee; and Daniel A. and Narzaria, who both live with their parents.

PUTT DARDEN MATHIS. An enthusiastic Mason since he reached his majority, Putt Darden Mathis, recently appointed Secretary of the Scottish Rite Masonic Bodies in San Antonio, is a most fitting person for such a position, and that it is one that will be well handled by him is a foregone conclusion. Mr. Mathis resigned his position as despatcher of trains with the International & Great Northern Railroad Company on February 1, 1913, to assume the duties of his new office.

Born in Choctaw county, Mississippi, on February 9, 1883, Putt Darden Mathis is the son of W. G. and Alice (Barmore) Mathis. The father was a native son of Choctaw county, born there in 1850, and he lived for many years at Mathiston, Mississippi, a town named in his honor, on the Gulf & Ship Island Railroad, where he owned a large body of land. Some of that land Mr. Mathis donated to the railroad company, including a station site, as a bonus toward the building of the road, which was then known as the Georgia Pacific. With the completion of the road, Mr. Mathis became the first station agent at the place, which the company designated as Mathiston, and he continued in the railroad service for several years, but later removing to Hattiesburg, Mississippi. In 1902 he removed from that town to Texas, taking his family with him and locating in the town of Taylor, where he is now engaged in the tailoring business, in partnership with his youngest son, W. T. Mathis. The Mathis family, it may be said, is one that is well known in the south, and is one of creditable ancestry and achievements. The mother of Mr. Mathis was a sister of Col. Joseph P. Mullen, of Ardmore, Oklahoma, where he was known for one of the most prominent and wealthy lawyers of the state. Alice (Barmore) Mathis, the wife of Mr. Mathis, is also the daughter of a prominent Mississippi family, and four of her elder brothers were killed in action at the battle of Gettysburg. Six children were born to W. G. and Alice Mathis. Besides Putt Darden of this review, there are C. R. and W. T. Mathis, and three sisters, namely: Ethel, the wife of Joe Hall of Brownwood; Ola, the wife of J. R. Coston, also of Brownwood; and Dessie, the wife of Joe Honea of Kingsville.

Putt Darden Mathis was reared and educated at Mathison. He was fifteen years old when he began his railroad career in station service on the Gulf & Ship Island Railroad, near Gulfport, as agent and telegraph operator at a small station. He remained on that road until he was seventeen, when he came to Louisiana and became telegraph operator for the Western Union at Lake Charles, and later at New Iberia. From the latter place he went to Houston, Texas, and took service with the Southern Pacific in the same capacity, remaining with that road for four years. He was then given a position as train despatcher with the Houston & Texas Central Railroad at Austin, Texas, and he remained there until October, 1907, when he went to Mexico to join his brother, C. R. Mathis, who was in the railroad service in the Republic. Mr. Mathis remained there in that work for two years, returning in April, 1909, to Texas, when he accepted a position as train despatcher at San Antonio with the International & Great Northern Railroad. In this position, which carried with it much of responsibility, he had had charge of the despatching of trains on the long division from Taylor to Laredo. He filled the position with all efficiency and in a manner most satisfactory to his company, resigning voluntarily on February 1, 1913, to accept the proffered office of Secretary of the Scottish Rite Masonic bodies in San Antonio. These bodies are included in the Bexar Lodge of Perfection, No. 9, which was instituted on September 19, 1912, and which embraces all degrees from the fourth the fourteenth; and in Pilgrim Chapter No. 6, Knights Rose Croix, which was instituted on January 28, 1813, and which embraces the degrees from the fifteenth to the eighteenth inclusive.

As has been previously intimated, this is a position in which Mr. Mathis is eminently fitted by inclination and knowledge of the order, for he has been an enthusiastic Mason since his early manhood. Soon after he reached his twenty-first birthday he took the Blue Lodge degrees in Lodge No. 279 at Brownwood, Texas, and not long thereafter took the Scottish Rite degrees at Houston. Mr. Mathis has been twice married. His first wife, who was Mabel Anna May, was born in Caldwell, Texas, and died in Mexico, while they were living in that country. She was the mother of his two children,—Elsie, born in June, 1904, and Anna, born in October, 1905.

ANTONIO L. GHIO, Texarkana, Texas, for many years one of the prominent and influential citizens of this place, is now living retired.

Mr. Ghio is an Americanized Italian. He was born in the province of Genoa, Italy, April 10, 1832. In 1849, he came to America and landed at New York. From that city he traveled, principally in the South and in the islands of the Caribbean Sea. He was at New Orleans and Shreveport in 1852. Subsequently he went to Fort Smith, Arkansas; Kansas City, Missouri; Jefferson City, Missouri, and St. Louis. In the last named city he engaged in business with relatives who were living there. This business association was only for a brief period, however, for in 1854 he returned to New York and again he became a commercial traveler, making that city his headquarters. Among the places he visited was Boston, where he met Miss Augusta Cassasa, who was born in the province of Genoa, Italy, who was reared in Boston. They were married in that city October 4, 1862.

In the fall of 1863 Mr. Ghio engaged in business at Cairo, Illinois, where he lived for three years. Afterward he was in business in Chicago for two years and a half. From there he moved to Jefferson, Texas, at that time the leading commercial city of the state, where he established a successful business and laid the foundation for his fortune. Recently, when he and his good wife celebrated the anniversary of their wedding day, after years of happy married life, a local paper, under date of October 7, 1912, printed the following:

"Special to The News, Texarkana, Tex., Oct. 6.—Yesterday from 3 to 6 o'clock P. M. Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Ghio held a reception at their home in celebration of their golden wedding anniversary. Large numbers of their friends of the city's oldest and most prominent people were present as invited guests, and the aged couple were showered with congratulations and best wishes.

"Mr. and Mrs. Ghio have resided at 320 West Third Street continuously since November 1, 1874. Mr. Ghio is eighty years of age and Mrs. Ghio is sixty-eight. They were married in Boston, Massachusetts, October 4, 1862. They have been blessed with seven children, three daughters and four sons, all of whom survive except the eldest son. They are: Ambolina, widow of J. T. Griffin; Ida, wife of Homer L. Vaughan; Maria Belle, wife of J. H. Fidler; Victor A., Antonio, Jr., and Augustine J.

"Mr. Ghio has had a somewhat eventful career. He began traveling in the South for a New York house in 1852, and continued such employment until his marriage, a period of ten years. After his marriage he resided for a time in Boston, going later to New Orleans, Baton Rouge (La.), Cairo and Chicago, in each of which cities he was in business for longer or shorter periods. In 1869 he moved to Jefferson, Texas, then one of the greatest commercial points in the state, and here engaged in business with great success.

"Mr. Ghio was one of the founders of Texarkana.

He attended the first sale of town lots, December 8, 1873, and purchased several pieces of business and residence property, which he still owns, besides holding much larger real estate properties in and near the city, which he subsequently acquired. Among his original purchases are some of the choicest business properties now in the business center of the city. He brought his family here immediately afterward and on November 1, 1874, they moved into their present home, in which the three younger children were born.

"From the beginning of his residence here, Mr. Ghio has been one of Texarkana's most public-spirited and enterprising citizens. In 1877 he built the first opera house in Texarkana, which was also the first brick house of any kind ever constructed in the city on either side of the State line. Ten years later (1887-8) he developed and opened to the public Spring Lake Park, two miles north of town, and which is now the chief pleasure resort of the city, and a year later he built at great expense a fine driveway all the way from the city to the park, and which by consent and usage has since been known as Ghio's Boulevard. No man has done more to foster and advance the material and commercial interests of the community, and he still holds a high place in the councils of the city's leading men.

"In 1880 Mr. Ghio was elected Mayor and was thrice re-elected, filling the office until 1886, when he declined to stand for another term, although urged to do so, and with full assurance that there would be no opposing candidate. Later he served three terms as Alderman from his ward. Since coming here he has acquired a large share of this world's goods, and he is now spending the evening of his years, taking his well earned rest, in the quiet of his home."

PRICE ADEL HIGGINS. It was a popularity such as few men attain and the thorough confidence of a large community in his ability and efficiency which first elected Mr. Higgins to the office of county and district clerk of Ector county, and for eight successive terms he had been chosen to the same position.

Price Adel Higgins was born in Guntersville, Alabama, and belongs to an old southern family, members of which have in nearly every generation been on the frontier helping to extend civilization a little further into the west. His parents were John and Nancy (Cowan) Higgins, the father a native of Kentucky and the mother of North Carolina. The father left Kentucky when a young man, took up his residence in North Carolina, where he married his wife and then moved into Alabama, locating at Guntersville. He was in that state in time to participate with the local soldiery and in the warfare which finally rid the state of its hostile Indians. He became a planter, also had a merchandise business in Marshall county, and acquired large wealth and influence, in that locality, which was his home during the remainder of his life. During the Civil war all his property was destroyed and like many other southerners he was nearly bankrupted by the issues of that great strife. He was himself a soldier and an officer in the Confederate army. He and his wife had four children, of whom Price Adel was the youngest.

Mr. Higgins attended public schools at Guntersville up to the time he was nineteen years old, and in 1882 came out to Texas, which has been his home now for more than thirty years. He attended school for a time in this state, and then obtained a position on a cattle ranch. For nine years he followed the cattle trails as a cowboy, and rode herd throughout Texas, Indian Territory, Arkansas and Kansas. He finally decided to settle down and leave the pursuits of the range, and with that intention he obtained a clerkship in a store at Snyder. From Snyder he moved to Odessa in Exeter county, and has been known to the people of this vicinity for many years, and his business record is an open book to all. For two years he was in a store, and then in 1898 was first elected to the office of county and district clerk.

Mr. Higgins has always been an active supporter and believer in the principles of the Democratic party. He has passed through all the chairs of the Knights of Pythias, and is also affiliated with the Order of Elks. He is owner of a pleasant home in Odessa and also possesses other property in this vicinity.

On August 1, 1891, he married Miss Bessie Winne, who was born in Alabama, a daughter of E. F. Winne. There are four children in the Higgins family, named as follows: Gessner, the oldest, is now a student in Trinity University; Winne; Lela; and Hugh, the youngest, popularly known among his play fellows as Joe Bailey, after the noted Texan of that name.

STEVEN W. POWERS. It is a generally accepted truism that no man of genius or acknowledged ability can be justly or adequately judged upon the morrow of his death, chiefly because time is needed to ripen the estimate placed upon his life work. This remark is in no sense inappropriate to the subject of this review, the late Steven W. Powers, who for years was one of the leading business men of Jones county. Mr. Powers was born in Newton county, Missouri, December 15, 1850, and was a son of James and Lottie Powers. His father was a farmer in Ellis county, Texas, whence he came in 1862, and about 1869 returned to his former home in Newton county, Missouri, and there his death occurred in 1872, of spinal meningitis. His widow survived until 1882, and was the mother of eleven children, Steven W. being the seventh in order of birth.

Steven W. Powers received only a limited education in the public schools, as the advent of the Civil war caused such excitement and general disturbance in his home neighborhood that the youth was able to get his schooling only by making the most of every opportunity that presented itself. He was but twelve years of age when he accompanied his parents to Ellis county, Texas, and about twenty-one when he returned to Newton county, Missouri, but after the death of his father he again came to the Lone Star state, where, for three years he was engaged in operating a cotton gin. The remainder of his life was spent in farming. He was successful in his business ventures and a typical self-made man, winning his way cleanly and fairly to a place of prominence among the men of his section. On March 20, 1878, Mr. Powers was married to Miss Ida B. Foster, daughter of Henry and Virginia (Garr) Foster, of Newton county, Missouri. Mr. Foster was a farmer and stockman of Newton county, Missouri, until coming to Jones county, Texas, in 1878, and here his death occurred June 2, 1903, his wife surviving until December 7, 1905. Nine children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Powers, namely: Edwin C., Pearl, Lottie, Mary and James, who are all married; and Steven, Nora, Zene and Georgia, who all reside with their mother and are being given their education at Christian College, Abilene, where they are being prepared to fight the battles of life. Mr. Powers was a Democrat in his political views, but took only a good citizen's interest in public matters. He was a faithful member of the Christian church, and was a liberal supporter of its movements. He took a pride in all that affected Abilene or its people, and could be counted upon to ally himself with all movements that made for progress or good government. In his death his city lost a good citizen, the business world a competent and energetic participant in commercial affairs, and his family a kind husband and indulgent father.

Mrs. Powers' mother belonged to the noted Garr family, which originated in Germany, and Mrs. Powers now possesses a large volume containing the history of the family dating back several generations. It was commenced in 1844, by John Wesley Garr, M. D., and after his death was completed by his son, John C. Garr, of Virginia, being published in book form under the title: "Genealogy of the Descendants of John Garr and son of Andreas Garr, who emigrated from Bavaria, Germany, in 1732. With Portrait Cuts of Leonard, Abram, Benjamin, John Wesley and John Calhoun Garr, Coat of Arms, Biographies, Wills, History, etc., and published by the author at Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1894."

For several years prior to his death, Mr. Powers was in poor health, but he uncomplainingly and resolutely kept up his spirit until his death, caused by the accidental discharge of a gun in crossing a wire fence, November 16, 1895.

LIBRADO BUTCHOFKY. One of the earliest born native residents of El Paso, and actively identified with business enterprise in this city since 1900, Mr. Butchofsky represents the early settlers of this city, and has had a successful career as a druggist. He was born in El Paso August 18, 1864, being the first of two children. His father was Frank Messick, who was born in Germany and came to America during the early sixties, becoming one of the pioneer residents of El Paso, where he followed a career as merchant for some years, and subsequently moved into New Mexico, where he died in 1880. He married a native of Mexico, Candelaria Chacon, who had lived in El Paso from the decade of the fifties. She died in 1869. The other child of her marriage was Manuela, now the wife of John Carson, of Silver City, New Mexico.

After the death of his mother, Mr. Butchofsky and his sister were adopted by Mrs. Lupe Butchofsky, the sister of their mother, and were reared and educated by her and took her name. Mr. Butchofsky was reared and received his education in the schools of Silver City, New Mexico, up to the time he was eighteen years of age, and then began the study of pharmacy as a drug clerk. He followed this occupation in different locations in New Mexico, and in 1900 came to El Paso as pharmacist. In 1906 he established the El Paso Pharmacy, at the corner of Second and Ochoa streets, which he conducted until September, 1913. In the following month he engaged in business at 3006 Alameda street.

In politics he is a Republican, but takes no active part in party affairs. He is a member of the Catholic church. On October 13, 1892, at Las Cruces, New Mexico, he married Miss Mary Wood, daughter of David Wood and a native of New Mexico. Their three children are Leonard, who is taking civil engineering course; Lena, who graduated at the El Paso high school; and Richard, now in the grade school.

CHARLES H. PAGE. In the prolific field of architecture it would be difficult to discover a more remarkable career than that of Charles H. Page, head of the firm of C. H. Page & Brother, of Austin. It is remarkable in that he has never enjoyed a technical training in any of the accredited institutions devoted to his specialty, his education being virtually confined to his own experience in his chosen profession. Not yet forty years of age his accomplishments have included the designing of plans and the direction of the construction of numerous state, railroad and school buildings, colleges, court houses, lodges, bank buildings, warehouses, office buildings, churches and residences, and his work easily places him foremost among the men of his calling who aim to build beautifully useful structures—that is, to satisfy by one and the same design the demands alike of use and beauty. Whether one considers the parental objections he was forced to overcome, the struggles of his youthful ambition and inclination in gaining his training, or his final phenomenal achievements, his career must be recognized as a notable one in the ranks of a vocation fertile with distinctive accomplishments.

Mr. Page was born in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1876, and is a son of Charles H. and Anna (Hogg) Page, natives of England. His father, a successful St. Louis actor, came to Austin in 1882, having secured the act for pointing and cleaning all the granite on the floor of the newly-erected capitol building, and from that time thereafter brought his family to this city. Here he spent the remainder of his life, passing away in 1911. As a lad in the public schools of Austin, Charles Page gave evidence of marked architectural inclination and ability. It was his parents' desire that he should become a brick layer, and during the summer months he worked at that trade and as a tilesetter, in the meantime pursuing his literary studies in the graded schools. He soon tired of his uncongenial occupation, however, and not being able to win his parents' consent he left home when but a lad and sought employment and experience in various architects' offices throughout the country, applying himself devotedly to the study of the various styles in the large cities. He was a lad of about sixteen years when, in 1892, he entered the ranks of his calling and laid the foundation for his present extensive business. He designed and superintended the building of the Austin National Bank Building, the first of his many large undertakings, and since that time his rise has been rapid and impressive. The numerous monuments to his genius and ability include the following: State Buildings—Texas World's Fair Building, St. Louis, Missouri; Industrial Institute Building, Pasteur Institute, State Convent Home, Negro Ward Building, and two tuberculosis cottages for State Lunatic Asylum, Austin; and City Orphan's Home, Corsicana. Austin; Apartment House for Mrs. L. McKean, Austin, and Savoy Apartments, Houston.

In 1907 Mr. Page took into partnership his brother, Louis C. Page, who was born in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1883, and since that time the firm has been C. H. Page & Brother, with well-appointed offices at Nos. 347 to 352 Austin National Bank Building. Mr. Page has various other interests in the city of his adoption, and is at this time president of the Stelfox Jewelry Company. He is well known in club life and fraternal circles, holding membership in the Austin Country Club of Austin, the Houston Club of Houston, and Lodge No. 201, of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. During Governor Sayers' administration he served as lieutenant-colonel on the Governor's staff.

In 1907 Mr. Page was united in marriage with Miss Marian Maas, daughter of Capt. Louis Maas, an old pioneer citizen of Austin. One child has been born to this union: Charles H., Jr. The beautiful family home is located at No. 708 West Twenty-fourth street.

DR. GEORGE WALLEN DAWSON. The people of Dalhart, Texas, and indeed of the whole of this part of the Panhandle, feel extremely grateful to Dr. George Wallen Dawson, of Dalhart, for he made it possible for them to possess something that a small and especially a new town rarely has, that is a sanitarium that is to Dalhart what a large hospital is to a city. The doctor has only been in Texas a few years, but in this short space of time he has won a wide reputation as a skillful practitioner and has made many friends. His personal popularity is due in no small measure to the geniality of his disposition and to the fact that in spite of the fact that his profession has led him in the dark places of men's lives, he has kept his faith in human nature and is always ready to believe the best of people.

Dr. Dawson comes of families old in the history of our country. On his father's side his family line can be traced back to Commodore D'Oson, of England. When the first of the name to settle in America arrived on these shores he changed his name to Dawson. The first member of the family was Major John Dawson and he served under General Washington. He died in 1837, ten children surviving him, among whom was Samuel Dawson, the great-grandfather of the doctor. He settled in Virginia and there lived out his life. When he died he left a family of nine children, among whom was Gibson Dawson. The latter emigrated to Kentucky and there reared his family of three sons, all of whom entered the ministry. Among these sons was W. H. Dawson, the father of the doctor. He was born in Daviess county, Kentucky, in 1844 and grew up in his native state. He was educated for the ministry and entered that of the Baptist church, spending his life in this calling. In the early days of his ministry he was a circuit rider, for communities were scattered and circuit riding was the only practicable way in which people could be reached. He presided over a number of churches and spent many weary hours riding over the rough wood roads to reach his distant parishes. He died in 1908.

On his maternal side the doctor's ancestry is equally interesting. His mother was a Howard, and his grandfather, born of poor parents, was forced to make his own way from the time he left home as a boy. He was a sea-faring man and was one of the survivors of the ill-fated Dead Sea expedition, sent out from England. Upon his return after this experience he came to America with his family and settled in Kentucky. He was named Galliton Howard and he died in Kentucky in 1897. His daughter, Martha Howard, was born and reared and married in Kentucky, in Daviess county. After the death of her husband, she remained in Daviess county, and there she is living today, hale and hearty at the age of sixty-six. Four children were born to W. H. and Martha Dawson, in addition to Dr. Dawson there being J. C. Dawson, of Kentucky; Miss Cora Dawson, also of that state, and Dr. A. W. Dawson, of Montgomery, Alabama.

Dr. George Wallen Dawson was born in Hancock county, Kentucky, on May 14, 1871, the second child of his parents. In his youth he attended the grammar schools of Kentucky and then as he grew older he began to think that he would like to study medicine. Consequently he entered the Kentucky School of medicine at Louisville, from which he was graduated with the degree of M. D. in 1894. He next took a post-graduate course at the Cincinnati Medical College, at Cincinnati, Ohio, and returning to Kentucky after the completion of this work, he located in Davis county and there began the practice of his profession. He was successful from the very beginning and as his experience increased he became an extremely able physician.

He remained in Kentucky until 1907 and then, having heard of the Panhandle region of Texas and the need for physicians in that section he came out to Dalhart and established himself. The first thing he did upon his arrival was to purchase a plot of ground and erect upon it the building now known as the Trans-Canadian Sanitarium. Dalhart being a rapidly growing place and a junction point for two railroads there was a crying need for something of this sort. It is a building of eighteen rooms, equipped with all that is most modern in hospital furnishings, and with every appliance for handling surgical and emergency cases. In fact it is a first class hospital and would do credit to a larger city. It has been developed to its present condition of efficiency through the indefatigable efforts of its founder and proprietor and he works unceasingly to see that the patients have every attention and every chance to recover their health.

In addition to his busy days at the hospital much of Dr. Dawson's time must be given to his work as surgeon for the Rock Island Railroad and the Fort Worth and Denver Railroad at this point. He is a member of the Trans-Canadian Medical Society, of the American Medical Association, of the Texas State Medical Society and of the National Railway Surgeons' Association. In the fraternal world he is a member of the Ancient Free and Free and Accepted Masons, being a Knight Templar in this order. He is also a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

Although the Doctor is not active in politics he is a staunch member of the Democratic party, and in religious affairs he is a member of the Baptist church.

On the 26th of October, 1896, Dr. Dawson was married to Miss Willie C. Mitchell, of Henderson, Kentucky. Mrs. Dawson is a daughter of Anthony and Lutetia Mitchell, and her family were among the early settlers of Henderson. Three children have been born to Dr. and Mrs. Dawson. The eldest, William Artis Dawson, was born in Davis county, Kentucky, on the 4th of September 1897, and is now a student in the high school in Dalhart. George Wallie Dawson was born in Davis county, Kentucky, on June 16, 1900, and is now in the grammar school in Dalhart. The youngest John Coleman Dawson also a student in the grammar school, was born in 1903 in Davis county, Kentucky.

THOMAS A. BOOTHE, M. D. The career of Dr. Thomas A. Boothe, of Cleveland, Texas, furnishes an excellent illustration of the success which may be gained through a life of industry and earnest, well-applied effort. Losing his father in childhood, he was compelled to spend his youth in hard and unceasing labor and to acquire his education as best as he might, yet so strong was his determination and so unconquerable his spirit that he has not alone risen to a foremost place in the ranks of one of the learned professions, but has made his name known and respected in financial, mercantile and social circles.

Doctor Boothe is a native of Liberty county, Texas, and was born February 6, 1857. His father settled here in childhood, during the war between the United States and Mexico, the family making the journey in a wagon and settling in what was then Polk county. This community was subsequently in three different counties, owing to changes in the boundary lines. The grandfather of Doctor Boothe was a farmer, and died prior to the Civil war, being buried where other members of the family and his wife lie at rest, near the Oakshade Cemetery. He reared the following children: David, who spent his life on the old home place and at his death left two children; William S., the father of Dr. Thomas A.; Abram, who died near Tarkington's Prairie, and left a family of four children; Fred, who died after the Civil war and left no issue; Maria, who married Wyatt Donohue and died on Tarkington's Prairie; and Cynthia, who married Mr. Carr and spent her life in Liberty county, leaving two children at her death.

William S. Boothe was but a lad when he came to Texas, and here he received but limited educational advantages, and like his father adopted the vocation of farming as his field of life endeavor. At the outbreak of hostilities between the South and the North he cast his fortunes with the Confederacy, and became a member of a company that left Texas as cavalry, but was dismounted at Little Rock, Arkansas, and was attached to the great Army of the Tennessee. He met his death as a soldier at Atlanta, in one of the last battles of the war. Mr. Boothe was a Baptist. He married Mary Beatty, of Scotch-Irish descent, a daughter of Thomas Beatty, who came to Texas about the year 1837 and first settled in Jasper county, but died in Tyler county, Texas. Mrs. Boothe died at the age of fifty-eight years, in 1894, and was the mother of Dr. Boothe of this notice; Sallie, who married Dr. Jephtha Haynes and resides at Houston Heights, Houston, Texas; and Willie, of Bruner, Texas, who is now Mrs. Light.

Having lost his father when he was still a child, Doctor Boothe was left to his own resources to secure an education. His mother remained a farmer and they raised some stock and did their utmost to improve their property. The best school the Doctor attended was in Jasper, and ten months would embrace every day he was inside a schoolhouse. He remained on the homestead farm until he reached the age of twenty-six years, when he was induced by the offer of public work at logging on the Nechez river, and subsequently accepted a clerkship in a drug store at Colmesneil, Tyler county. At that place he was given the opportunity to read medicine under the preceptorship of Doctor Haynes, and next worked in a mercantile establishment at that place, thus saving the funds that took him through medical school. Doctor Boothe entered Barnes Medical College, St. Louis, in 1893, and finished his course in that institution in 1895. Following this he took up the practice of his profession at Nacogdoches, remaining on the J. J. Hayter plantation for one year, and then came to Cleveland, which since has been his field of practice. He has steadily advanced in his profession and in public confidence, and is now in the enjoyment of an excellent professional business. He is identified with the Polk County Medical Society, which includes Cleveland. In 1896 Doctor Boothe entered the business field as the proprietor of a drug establishment, and in 1913 assisted in the organization of the First National Bank, of Cleveland, Texas, of which he is vice president and a director. He is also engaged in the grain business as a retail merchant, and has made himself a small farm in the vicinity of Cleveland. Although his interests are extensive and demand constant attention, he has found time to contribute to the welfare of his community, and no good movement fails to enlist his aid. In politics, he is a democrat, but his affiliations are only as a voter. He was a Wilson man in 1912. He has been recently appointed the postmaster of Cleveland, a third class office, and the nomination was made by the president. Fraternally, he is a Blue Lodge Mason and a past master his lodge and its secretary, and also holds membership in the local lodge of the Woodmen of the World. On June 17, 1900, in Liberty county, Texas, Doctor Boothe was united in marriage with Miss Nora Tarkington, a daughter of John L. Tarkington, of Tarkington's Prairie, a farmer and stockman, who came to Texas among the oldest citizens of his section of the county. He married Miss Lydia West, and Mrs. Boothe was the youngest of three children, the others being William; and Jennie, who is the wife of Jeff Brantley. To Doctor and Mrs. Boothe the following children have been born: Bronson, Troge, Dixon, Frank, Viera, Norine, Gladys and Thomas.

J. H. Knuth

JOSEPH H. KURTH. Conspicuous among those men who have contributed much to the development of the logging industries in Angelina county in the past two decades and who have, in consequence of their prominence and accomplishments earned the right to specific mention in this historical and biographical work, Joseph H. Kurth stands forth with especial significance. Since 1888 he has been operating in this county, and his early connection with the lumber industry was one that in no wise compared with the breadth and scope of his present identification therewith. Today he occupies an eminence among the lumbering and railroad men of the district that he has earned through his own activities, and his place in industrial and financial circles is secure.

Born in Germany, in the famous university town of Bonn on the Rhine, in the year 1857, Joseph H. Kurth was there reared and educated. He continued a resident there until he reached the age of twenty, his advent into America dating from the year 1878, and his first landing place being Galveston. He had some education, but little training in manual labors of any sort, but he went to work as a mill "hand" in the sawmills of Galveston, and in the mills of that city and in Beaumont and other mill towns, he acquired a close and intimate knowledge of the lumber business. He was never able to confine himself wholly to the task in hand without permitting himself the privilege of looking into the details of the "job" higher up, and it was this highly valuable characteristic that has brought him his opportunities, one upon another, with the passing years. Coupled with this trait was his ability to recognize an opportunity when it presented itself before him for his acceptance or otherwise, and so it was that in March, 1888, just ten years after he had left his native land, the raw German youth found himself a mill owner in what is now Keltys. The mill, to be sure, was a small one, and he made the purchase from one J. A. Ewing & Co. It was located on the Cotton Belt Railroad, two miles east of Lufkin, and at a point, as has already been stated, that is now called Keltys. Here has Mr. Kurth been engaged in lumber activities from that day to the present time, and his manufacturing business has been one of the foremost in the county. Somewhat early in his career, Mr. Kurth took S. W. Henderson into partnership with him, the firm doing business under the name of Kurth & Henderson. In 1889 the business was incorporated, with a $75,000 capital stock and they enlarged the plant very appreciably soon after that association came into being. The plant burned in 1906, and they rebuilt on a larger and more pretentious plan, and the capital was increased to $225,000 under the name of the Angeline County Lumber Company, of which Mr. Kurth is and always has been since the incorporation, president. The fine modern plant of the company is a most creditable one, and it has a capacity of 100,000 feet of lumber per day, the output of the mill being all yellow pine. This company, it may be said, built and owns and operates the Angeline & Neches River Railroad, thirty miles in length, and extending from Keltys and Lufkin to Chireno. Mr. Kurth is president of this road, as he is of the Lumber Company, and the line is operated from the offices of the company at Keltys.

Mr. Kurth has a fine residence at Keltys, with ample grounds, where fruits and garden vegetables for home use are raised in profusion. He is very much of a home man, despite his strong penchant for business, and it should be mentioned here that in addition to his railroad and lumber interests, he is vice president of the Lufkin National Bank, president of the Lufkin Foundry and Machine Company, of Lufkin, Texas, president of the Pawnee Land & Lumber Company of Louisiana, and has other business connections of similar order.

Mr. Kurth is a Scottish Rite Mason of the thirty-second degree, and is also a member of the Ancient Arabic Order of the Nobles of the Mystic Shrine. He has further fraternal connections in his membership in the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Hoo Hoos, an organization which lumbermen are invariably found to be identified with.

In 1882 Mr. Kurth married Miss Hattie M. Glenn, who was born in Texas. They have five children: Joseph H., Jr., Ernest L., Roy W., Melvin E. and Robert L. Kurth. The family enjoy the undivided respect and esteem of a wide circle of friends in Keltys and throughout the county, where they are well known for their many excellent qualities of heart and mind and where they have made their home for so many years.

FRED JONES SHIPLEY. Since he engaged in the activities of independent life, Fred Jones Shipley has devoted himself to educational work, and he has made praiseworthy advance in his profession, his present position of county superintendent of schools of Hill county coming after years of rural and village experience in the pedagogic science. He has added not a little to the efficiency of the system of education in Hill county, and is generally agreed that his service to the public has been a most worthy one thus far, with promise of still greater benefits to follow, should he continue in public service.

Mr. Shipley is a Texas product, born in Tehuacana, Limestone county, Texas, on November 12, 1879, and he is a son of J. R. and Eliza Josephine (Moser) Shipley, natives of Morristown and Knoxville, Tennessee, respectively. The father was born in Morristown on November 19, 1858, and the mother in the year 1865. J. R. Shipley was for years engaged in the practice of medicine and he also devoted himself in a general way to farming in Hill county, but in the year 1909 the state of his health came to be such as to induce his practical retirement from professional and agricultural activities, and he has since that time occupied himself as the Hillsboro representative of the Fort Worth Record.

To Dr. and Mrs. Shipley were born eleven children, the eldest being Fred Jones Shipley of this review. The others are here mentioned, with facts relative to their present whereabouts and activities. Rolla M. married Lillie Pope, and is employed by the Cotton Belt Railroad, making his home in Hillsboro.

Nannie L. married Robert Priddy, a farmer of Hubbard, Hill county, and they have one child, Clyde Priddy.

Mamie Florence married Joseph F. Mason, a merchant and farmer at Irene, Hill county, and their children are Maurine, Joseph F. and Perry.

Perry married Nell Dickson, of Hillsboro, a salesman, and they live in this city. They have one son, Theodore.

Walker C. married Belle Horten, and they make their home in this city. They have no children. Nellie J. married Charles Whitworth, a Railway clerk, and they have a daughter,—Justine. Stella M. married Luther Roark, a professional ball player, living at Elk City, Oklahoma.

The remaining children are: Edna J., deceased; and Grace B. and Hunter C., who are unmarried and are with their parents in Hillsboro.

Fred Jones Shipley had his early education in the schools of Limestone county, followed by a course in the University at Waxahachie, Ellis county, where he remained to the age of eighteen years. He then took up a Normal course of study at Culbertson, after which he began his professional activities as a teacher in the rural schools of Hill and Limestone counties. For seven years he labored in those fields, gleaning a goodly fund of experience, and meanwhile carrying on his studies in order that he might be fitted for higher places when the opportunity came. His first step from teaching in village schools came as principal at Brandon, and he was there in that capacity for one year, after which he came to Hillsboro, as principal of the city schools, continuing for four years. In 1910, so far had he advanced in his work and so well did he stand with the public, that he was elected to the office of county superintendent of schools, which office he still occupies.

Mr. Shipley, aside from his educational activities, has found time to interest himself in other matters in Hillsboro, and he is found to be a stockholder in the Southern Traction Company, and he is prominent in fraternalism here, having membership in the Royal Arch Masons, the Elks, the Odd Fellows, the Woodmen of the World, the Moose and the Pretorians. In line with his profession, he is a member of the State Conference for Education in Texas and is active in that body. He will be found in attendance at all Teachers' Institutes, and is usually a speaker on public programs having education for their main topic. He is a member of the faculty of the summer school, of Baylor University, Waco, Texas, for the summer of 1914, Department of History and Civics, and a member of the State Summer Normal Board of Examiners, Austin, Texas, 1914. He gives of his energies and influence to the matter of furthering educational work in Texas through suitable legislation, and is prominent as a writer along the lines of his work.

Mr. Shipley with his family has membership in the Methodist Episcopal church, South, and in his political leanings it is perhaps unnecessary to say that he is a staunch Democrat. He is a member of the Third Regiment Band of Texas, and it should be further stated that he is active as a member of the Hillsboro Boosters Club. A man of much civic pride, he is well known in the city and county for his activities along these lines, and his prominence in citizenship is no less great than it is in matters of educational interest.

Mr. Shipley married Miss Ella Pruitt, daughter of J. C. and Susie (McGuffey) Pruitt, of Hubbard City, the marriage taking place in that place on October 28, 1903. They have two children, Fred J., Jr., and La-Trelle.

JAMES H. WOOLLY. A banker, landowner and farmer at Normangee, James H. Woolly has extended interests which class him as one of the leading men of affairs in Leon county, but when he first came to this section in 1871 from Arkansas his possessions as a young man just getting his start in the world comprised a team of mules and about three hundred dollars in cash. He was only recently married, and came from southern Arkansas and northern Louisiana with wagon and his mule team, and was accompanied on that trip by an old bachelor, Noble Groves, who also settled in Leon county and spent the rest of his days in this state. For the first two years Mr. Woolly with his uncle, Joyce Woolly, who was one of the early settlers of Leon county, having located there in 1851, rented some land and lived in a humble tenant house until able to secure a tract of his own on Sanan Prairie, comprising two hundred acres in the midst of the woods. His land was bought on credit, and he and his wife began housekeeping in a box house. By 1883, when he disposed of his interests in that locality, Mr. Woolly had redeemed more than a hundred acres to cultivation, and was already on a fair way to prosperity.

Mr. Woolly has lived in the present community about

Normangee since 1882. A corporation of farmers dealing in general merchandise, known as the Grange Corporation, hired him to take charge of the business. Five years later the corporation was dissolved, the majority of the stockholders withdrawing with interest and dividend, and the others selling out to James H. and Joyce Woolly. These two partners continued together two years, and the uncle then sold to James H. Woolly, who remained a merchant at old Rogers Prairie until December, 1906. He then moved his business to the new town of Normangee on the two lines of railroad, and continued there until January, 1913, and since retiring from mercantile efforts has devoted his time to real estate, to building development in Normangee, and to his extensive farming interests. While merchandising Mr. Woolly was also raising stock, buying land and in general agriculture. At the present time his possessions include some two thousand acres of land, about twelve hundred of which are under tillage. A great deal of his surplus capital has been invested in improvements and few men in Leon county has done so much to increase the area of improved land and the general volume of agricultural crops. He has a number of tenant houses on his land, and from fifteen to twenty families find employment. As a builder at Normangee two of the brick business houses have been erected by him, and he has supplied the money for several others. Mr. Woolly was vice president of the first bank organized at Normangee, and in October, 1912, assisted in the organization of the First National Bank and is now its president. As a stockman Mr. Woolly has given much attention to raising the standards on his own ranch, and has introduced some of the best blooded strains obtainable.

In connection with politics there is little to say, since Mr. Woolly has performed his duty only as a voter, has shunned convention work and has been content to increase the prosperity of the community through his individual business enterprise. In religion he is a Methodist, and has aided in the erection of several church buildings, about Normangee. While sympathizing with the purposes of the old-land fraternal organizations he has never joined a lodge.

James H. Woolly was born in Union county, Arkansas, January 13, 1851. With limited opportunities to obtain an education, he made the best use of them, and his industry and ability have caused him to suffer little by early handicaps. His father, Reason Woolly, who was a farmer and merchant at Caledonia, Arkansas, where his death occurred at the age of eighty-seven, was born in South Carolina in 1811, lived for some years in Alabama and later in Arkansas. He furnished a son to the Confederate service during the war, to the cause of which he was opposed, though when the conflict was begun he supported the Confederate government. He was a member of the Methodist church and a Mason. By his marriage to his first wife, a Miss Smith, Reason Woolly had the following children: Wayman, a Confederate veteran who lives near Groveton, Texas; Elizabeth, who died in Union parish, Louisiana, was the wife of Jo Rhodes, who was killed during the war. Reason Woolly for his second wife married Eliza Ann Rhodes, a daughter of Henry Rhodes, who died in Arkansas, where he had been a slave holder and planter in Union county. Mrs. Reason Woolly, who died about twenty years ago, had the following children: Laura, wife of William Hall of Quanah, Texas; Mrs. Josephine Cullen of Union county, Arkansas; James H.; Lou, who died unmarried; Alice, who is the wife of A. J. White and lives at Eldorado, Arkansas; Ella, who died in Eldorado, the wife of William Owen; and Robert, who died in Union county leaving a family.

James H. Woolly was married in February, 1870, to Miss Mattie Cobb, daughter of Captain H. B. Cobb. Mrs. Woolly accompanied her husband to Texas, died in 1890 without children. The present wife of Mr.

Reuben Vaile Witter

Woolly was Miss Mattie Dawkins. Her father, Colonel P. Dawkins, who settled in Texas at a comparatively recent time, was from South Carolina, and by his marriage to Miss Agnes Martin had the following children: Preston, Anna, John, Thomas, Mrs. Woolly, and Maggie. Throughout his business career Mr. Woolly has followed a liberal policy in his varied dealings as a capitalist. He has aided many homeseekers in obtaining farms, and has loaned out a great deal of money on easy terms, and not one of his debtors has ever had reason to complain of his treatment and he has never taken advantage of his fortune.

REUBEN V. WATTS is one of Texas' famous sheriffs and has won his distinction and the right to his title by actual achievement as a sleuth and an enforcer of the law. His administration of his office has set a new record in the annals of thief-catching, and professional criminals have learned to shun his dominion when plying their nefarious occupation. Sheriff Watts is the ideal officer, in stature above six feet tall, large of frame and firmly built, with a leisurely stride that has on more than one occasion deceived the unwary into thinking that he is not an agile and active man. His full, ruddy face is beardless, and in his eyes there may be seen the glint that denotes the presence of the force which impels him to follow an offender with untiring perseverance and the greatest courage. Such is the man who has cleaned up the criminal docket of Angelina county and made its felons settle with the law.

Sheriff Watts has been a resident of Texas for thirty years. He was reared seventeen miles east of Meridian, Mississippi, near the village of Rosser, Alabama, where he was born August 19, 1856. His country life on the farm may have given him his sturdy build and iron constitution, but it secured him little literary training, for his educational advantages were few. His father was John R. Watts, who settled in Alabama in 1833, coming from Barber county, Georgia, where he was born in 1810, received a college education and became a merchant at Rosser, and at the latter place he died on his farm in 1883. He was a Democrat in politics, and his religious connection was with the Baptist church. John R. Watts married Elizabeth Asbury, who moved at an early date from Georgia to Alabama with her father, Jesse Asbury, the latter of whom was a slaveowner and at the outbreak of the war between the South and the North brought his darkies to Leon county, Texas, as a refugee. After the war he returned to Alabama, but left two sons and a daughter in Texas, and the sons subsequently died in Falls county, and left families, while the daughter is Mrs. Winnie Seals, of Marquez, Texas. Mrs. Elizabeth (Asbury) Watts was born August 9, 1815, in Georgia, and died May 30, 1905, in her Mississippi home. She and her husband were the parents of the following children: William H., of Cuba, Alabama; Jesse, who died in Mississippi in 1893; John T., who was killed at the battle of Rehoba, Mississippi, as a Confederate soldier, in the last battle in which his regiment participated; Richard, who was killed in the battle of Rebecca, Mississippi, as a Confederate soldier; Vinson, who was killed at Bentonville, South Carolina, while wearing the uniform of the Confederacy; Tandy, who was a Confederate cavalryman and died at Meridian, Mississippi, in 1886; Archie, who lives at Hattiesburg, Mississippi; Reuben V., of this review; and Joseph, a resident of Laurel, Mississippi.

John R. Watts was a son of William Hicks Watts, and his grandparents were Richard H. and Elizabeth (Townsend) Watts, who were of Scotch-Irish stock and of Colonial people of Georgia. William Hicks Watts and Jesse Asbury were both soldiers of the War of 1812, and their plantations were tilled by slave labor. The latter was the father of six children.

Reuben V. Watts' education was curtailed by the outbreak of the Civil war, in which all of his older brothers took an active part. At the age of sixteen he wished to go to a military school, but met with the objection of his father, who had seen enough of military life in the war between the states, in which he lost several sons, in addition to having had his slaves set free and his farm destroyed. Thus the youth was forced to rely upon himself for his education, and he continued to remain upon the home farm until his father's death. Upon coming to Texas he sought work on a farm at Marquez, and spent a year working for fifteen dollars a month in this line, but during the next year took a clerkship with Nelms & Manor, at Lovelady, and while there added to his education materially by practical experience. When he left the store he was appointed deputy sheriff, a position in which he served for three years, and in 1898 came to Lufkin and took a clerkship with the Angelina Trading Company, and thus secured another five years' experience, which went far toward completing a practical education. In 1904 he won the nomination for sheriff in a Democratic primary against four competitors and was elected in November. He has been re-elected four times, with a gradually fading opposition, his majority once reaching 1,500 in a vote of 2,500 in the county. He succeeded Thomas C. Mantooth and began a vigorous campaign for the apprehension of old offenders and new. In the discharge of his duties Sheriff Watts has traveled the United States east and west, north and south, from the Lakes to the Gulf and from ocean to ocean. He has brought to the bar of the Angelina county court every man under indictment, and a number of old scores have been put in process of settlement by him which had almost faded from memory. The case of the Lightfoot brothers is one of the noted ones with which he dealt successfully. The brothers were burglars and dangerous and desperate men. They committed crimes in the county in 1903 and made good their escape—temporarily. When their hiding place was finally located by Sheriff Watts they were under the name of Mundays and were day and night convict guards at De Funiak Springs, Florida. They made it a practice to sleep with their guns, but on the occasion of their capture one of them was ill and without arms and the other was induced to give up his by a ruse of the captain of the camp, who told him that his brother was worse, and when he gave up his weapon he was promptly covered with it, and the ride to Texas with the big sheriff at once started. The boys were tried and convicted and given long prison terms.

The most noted case dealt with by Sheriff Watts, however, was the discovery and capture of Jesse Reynolds, who was a fugitive for twenty-nine years and charged with the murder of George Padgus. The crime was committed in 1882, and no sheriff had been able to secure a trace of Reynolds. Somehow, Sheriff Watts located him in the state of Florida and learned that he was living under the name of J. H. Brown. He likewise learned that Brown had joined the Masons and that the higher degrees of the order had been denied him when it had been rumored that he was a murderer, and found out that Brown was a successful merchant in that state and a prominent bank president. It was while traveling in Florida, enroute for the Lightfoot brothers, that Sheriff Watts chanced to meet a state detective, who, with Watts' description of Brown, caused him to be located and gave the Texas detective the tip.

When Sheriff Watts went to Gainesville, Florida, for his prisoner, he had never seen him, but his acquaintance with Reynolds' relatives made him familiar with the family resemblance, and when the several prisoners of the jail were lined up before him he at once "picked his man." The identification convinced Reynolds that a further denial of his name was useless and took the Texas sheriff behind a building to argue the point of his liberty. The most potent argument resorted to was the offer of $16,000 in cash, but the sheriff at that time was doing business for the state of Texas and accordingly brought his prisoner back to the scene of his crime, where he secured bail and returned to his family.

The record made by Sheriff Watts as an officer led to his candidacy for the appointment of United States marshal of the Eastern District of Texas in 1913, and his petition to the President contained the endorsement of one hundred and twenty-seven members of the House of Representatives of Texas, twenty-seven of the Senators, all of the supreme judges of both courts of the state, and of numerous men of prominence in private life in Eastern Texas, yet the Texas United States senators made another recommendation for the place in the face of this formidable showing. Mr. Watts' interest in politics has led him into the councils of the Democratic party at home, and as a delegate to the state convention that nominated Governor Ross.

On October 6, 1889, Sheriff Watts was united in marriage at Lufkin, Texas, with Miss Beulah Duncan, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wiley Duncan. Mr. Duncan was a native of Pontotoc county, Mississippi, while Mrs. Duncan was born in Alabama, although she married her husband in Mississippi. Mrs. Watts was born in Texas. She and her husband have been the parents of two children: John Duncan and Miss Della. Mr. Watts has been interested in fraternal matters, and is an Odd Fellow and an Elk and past district deputy grand chancellor of the Knights of Pythias and captain of Company 8 of the Uniformed Rank.

DR. WILLIAM J. CALVERT. In preparing a biographical review of Dr. William J. Calvert, whose high professional achievements are based upon an intimate and comprehensive knowledge of medical science, the writer is compelled, through the limitations of his own knowledge as well as that of the average reader, to limit himself to tracing his personal career, to enumerating the professional honors which he has received, and to mentioning the studies which have engaged his thoughts with the methods by which, as an educator, an author, and a demonstrator, he has made distinct contributions to his profession.

Dr. William J. Calvert was born in 1871, at Lexington, Kentucky, and was there reared and educated, attending Kentucky University (Transylvania University), at Lexington, from which institution he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Arts in the class of 1893. During the following year he studied chemistry and biology as post-graduate work in the same university, and in 1894 matriculated in Johns Hopkins Medical College, Baltimore, from which he graduated in the class of 1898. Following his graduation, in honor of the high rank he had attained as a student in the medical college, he was appointed an assistant surgeon in the regular United States Army, with the rank of first lieutenant. In that capacity he was sent to the Philippines, accompanying the Sixth Artillery. On arrival at Manila, he was placed in service as a member of the Board of Health of that city, and in that capacity was a member of the staff of the provost marshal. Doctor Calvert is given credit in the records of the military occupation of Manila with having discovered the first case of bubonic plague in the Islands, and for some months after this discovery he was energetically engaged in the dangerous work of combating this dreadful disease in Manila.

In 1903 Doctor Calvert was appointed to a chair in the medical department of the University of Missouri, at Columbia, where for eight years he taught clinical medicine, diagnosis, clinical pathology, etc. During this time he kept up active research work and was as diligent a student as he was a teacher. He made a number of valuable contributions to the medical press, several of which have since been given a place in the medical text books, particularly those of Doctor Osler, under whom he had studied at Johns Hopkins. In Osler's modern medicine that great physician used for an entire chapter Doctor Calvert's thesis on the bubonic plague.

Doctor Calvert first came to Dallas in 1909 and established in practice here, but later returned to his duties at the University of Missouri. He came back to Dallas, however, to locate permanently, in the fall of 1913, and has already achieved a place of high standing that is commensurate with his talents, not only with the medical profession of Texas, but as well with the general public. In the medical department of Baylor University, located at Dallas, he fills the chair of clinical medicine and to the medical faculty of this institution he has long been known for his ability as a teacher of clinical medicine and diagnosis. His work as a general practitioner is largely in the nature of consultation; in such service his skill as a diagnostician makes his work of great value to the surgeon. He is making a life work of that branch of his profession which investigates the diagnostication of and the treatment of all diseases.

To further carry out his plans and ambitions, Doctor Calvert installed, in the summer of 1914, a laboratory for clinical pathology in his offices in the Southwestern Life Building.

WILLIS D. TWICHELL. Every one is more or less familiar with the importance which attaches to those who are able to determine the limits of possessions, point out precise directions and foretell the difficulties and expense attaching to prospective enterprise. The exigencies of the frontier magnify the usefulness and importance of reliable guides in these matters, placing capable surveyors among the most important citizens in exploring, developing and settling a new country. Beginning in 1885 and continuing to the present Willis D. Twichell has been a most active surveyor in West Texas and has been identified with many important undertakings.

Since 1901 he has served in the capacity of State Surveyor of Texas, with headquarters at Amarillo. His long experience has made him intimately familiar with all the territory lying between Kansas and the Rio Grande. A surveyor in the widest sense of the term, is one who is skilled in the art of measuring and delineating the surface of the earth of managing and developing estates, of determining the value of all descriptions of landed and house property, and of measuring and estimating the work involved in any building operation. Few men, however, qualify in all branches of surveying, the greater proportion preferring to specialize along one particular line. Mr. Twichell has shown himself possessed of the knowledge and ability to prosecute the duties of any of the various lines of surveying. Another distinction that belongs to him is that he is a self made man, for when he embarked upon his career as a lad of sixteen years he had neither financial support nor assistance from influential friends, but was compelled to work out his own success. A brief review of his career will illustrate how ably he has accomplished this task.

Willis D. Twichell was born at Hastings, Dakota county, Minnesota, March 24th, 1864, and is a son of Daniel Wilson and Catharine (Coons) Twichell. His parents, natives of New York, were married in that state in 1854, and migrated to Minnesota the following year, where they were pioneer farming people. In 1868 the mother died, leaving three children, Willis D. being the youngest. In 1874 the family moved to Ohio, where the father died in 1906 at the age of seventy-five years.

Willis D. Twichell received his education in the public schools of Minnesota, Ohio, and other schools. His spare time was utilized in working to secure the means with which to continue his studies. In 1883 he was graduated from the National Normal University at Lebanon as Bachelor of Science. The following years he took a post-graduate course in Civil Engineering. For two years Mr. Twichell was engaged in teaching school in Ohio and then began the practice of his profession at Springfield. In December, 1885, he was sent to Tom en county, Texas, to represent a company developing property near what is now Garden City, in Glasscock county. The following year his services were employed by the Capitol Syndicate, and for that company surveyed the largest Texas ranch, embracing a greater area than the State of Connecticut. In about one year a vast area was fenced and divided into pastures, watered with wells and windmills sufficient to sustain one hundred and fifty thousand cattle.

In 1887 Mr. Twichell was associated with Mr. W. S. Mabry at Tascosa, which was at that time a typical frontier town and the Capitol of Oldham Land District, in which Mr. Mabry was the official surveyor, this being an important post and office in that period. The second year at Tascosa Mr. Twichell became a partner in Mr. Mabry's extensive surveying business, remaining with him until 1889. The partnership was then dissolved, and Mr. Twichell remained at Tascosa and Mr. Mabry acquired a position at San Antonio which he still holds. In 1890 Mr. Twichell located in Amarillo, that being the commercial center of the Panhandle of Texas. There he has continued his surveying career, his operations and assistance in developing bald prairies into fields of waving grain, being familiarly known in every county in West Texas.

In 1901 he was appointed State Surveyor, a position which he has continued to fill to the present time. The Panhandle Country has had the usual disturbances resulting from carelessness in surveying original land lines. His experience and close application to every phase of his work has given Mr. Twichell a thorough knowledge of the topography and the surveyed lines of West Texas. He came on the ground near the close of the period when the original surveys were made. Since that time he has been closely identified with every undertaking connected with his profession throughout the western part of the states, knowing the country in all directions since permanent settlement began in the great Panhandle region. His reputation for strict probity and impartial skill in his work has on many occasions called him as referee in disputes between contending land owners, and has been a means of settling many important controversies affecting the lines of lands. All parties interested having agreed to abide by his resurvey. The amount of work Mr. Twichell has done in this way, if aggregated, would cover a territory equal in size to a dozen or more counties. The benefits accruing from this means of avoiding prolonged and expensive controversies innumerable, each one retarding the general development and prosperity and good cheer, can hardly be estimated.

A faithful, conscientious and efficient public servant, Mr. Twichell has won recognition through sheer merit, and with this the esteemed confidence of the people. He has a firm belief in the future of the state. It is his opinion that western Texas is advancing more rapidly than ever before. Mr. Twichell has had more experience in his line than any other man in West Texas, and is therefore competent to judge of such matters.

In 1895, at Amarillo, Texas, Mr. W. D. Twichell was married to Miss Eula Trigg, daughter of Frank J. and Columbia (Gray) Trigg, who still make their home in that city. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Twichell, five of whom are still living, named as follows: Lera, Mamie, Trigg, Catharine, and Alice.

JAMES E. ROBERTSON. Today is surely the day of the man who knows when and how to seize an opportunity, for a man who has foresight enough to see into the future is also able to make the most of his opportunity once he has secured it. When James E. Robertson realized that railroading was going to be one of the great interests of the state of Texas, he also realized that the railroad supply business would keep pace with the railroads. This was many years ago but his belief has been amply justified and his business has grown from its first modest size to a large and important concern. He is one of the progressive men of El Paso, Texas, and in addition to his railroad supply business is interested in many of the most important industrial and financial concerns of the city.

Born in that state which has supplied the south with so many of her best men, Virginia, James E. Robertson grew up in that atmosphere of culture and refinement that always surrounds an old and settled community. He was born on the 5th of April, 1873, at the home of his father, Maj. J. E. Robertson, of Appomattox county, Virginia. His mother was a daughter of Maj. John W. West, of Bedford county. Mr. Robertson lived in Virginia until he was twenty years of age. Then being full of energy which could find no outlet in the agricultural community in which he was reared he set out for the west and came to Texas, locating in Texarkana, where he was associated with his brother in the Texarkana College and Conservatory of Music. He only remained there for a year, for his talents lay along industrial lines, and he therefore came to El Paso where he has lived ever since, with the exception of two years when he lived in Mexico City, Mexico, and was engaged in the mining supply business. When he came to El Paso he established his present business which has grown so remarkably. He now occupies very handsome offices and does an extensive business, quite a contrast to his small beginning. Hard work and a knowledge of his business from the ground up is what has won this success for him. Among his other numerous interests may be mentioned the Manhattan Rubber Manufacturing Company, of which he is the representative in El Paso. He is also the manager of the El Paso branch of the Ludlow Saylor Wire Company, and is senior member of the firm of J. E. Robertson and Company, engaged in the mine, mill smelter and railway supply business, and also in the sale of coal and coke. His financial interests are concerned with the Rio Grande Valley Bank and Trust Company of El Paso, in which he is a director.

Mr. Robertson does not care to take an active part in the political game other than to cast his vote at the polls, in doing this he reserves the right to vote independently of any party, preferring to vote for the man he considers best fit to serve. He is a member of the chamber of commerce and of a number of clubs, including the Toltec Club and the Country Club of El Paso and the Country Club and American Club of Mexico City. He has always taken a keen interest in Masonry, and belongs to both the Scottish and York Rite bodies, also to the Mystic Shrine. In religious affairs Mr. Robertson is a communicant of the Protestant Episcopal church.

In 1894 in the city of St. Paul, Minnesota, occurred the marriage of James E. Robertson and Miss Alys L. E. Lyon, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Lyon, of Staunton, Virginia. Mr. and Mrs. Robertson have three children, as follows, James E., Jr., David Wentworth and Alys Lyon Robertson. Mr. Robertson's residence is now in Los Angeles, California, and his time is therefore divided between El Paso and Los Angeles.

CHARLES E. CANTRELL, M. D. An able, popular and representative member of the medical profession in northern Texas is Dr. Cantrell, who is engaged in practice in the city of Greenville, Hunt county, where he has a large and important clientele and where he has achieved a specially high reputation as a skilled and successful surgeon. Realizing the expediency of concentration in professional work, he now gives his attention almost exclusively to surgery, and as a specialist in this branch of practice his interposition is asked without reservation by many of his honored confreres in the profession.

Dr. Cantrell was born at Lead Hill, Arkansas, in that portion of Marion county that is now included in Boone county, and the date of his nativity was March 15, 1859. He passed the period of his childhood and youth in northwestern Arkansas and southwestern Missouri, and was afforded the advantages of the schools of each of these states. He early formulated definite plans for his future career, and bent his energies fully to the attaining of his ambition, which was that of preparing himself for the medical profession. He was finally matriculated in the medical department of the University of Arkansas, at Little Rock, and in this institution he was graduated as a member of the class of 1893, and with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. Prior to entering the University he had prosecuted his technical studies under efficient private preceptorship and had become eligible for practice after the first year in the University, which was 1885.

In 1893 Dr. Cantrell came to Texas and established his residence at Wolfe City in Hunt county, where he built up a substantial and lucrative general practice and where he continued to reside for five years. On January 1, 1899, he removed to the city of Greenville, the county seat, and here he has since followed the work of his profession with all of zeal and devotion and with splendid success. He is associated with his brother, Dr. William Cantrell, in the ownership and conducting of the Cantrell Hospital, the successor to the Physicians and Surgeons Hospital in Greenville, an institution of modern equipment and the best of facilities, with accommodation for about thirty-five house patients. Special provision is made for surgical cases, with an operating room supplied with the most modern accessories and the best of sanitary provisions. This hospital was established in 1900, by Drs. Cantrell, Wolfe & Cantrell, and Miss Paul Beattie was made its superintendent. In 1902 the institution passed into the exclusive control of Drs. Charles E. and William Cantrell, who have retained Miss Beattie as superintendent. Dr. William Cantrell is the junior of his brother by about twelve years, and is likewise a graduate of the medical department of the University of Arkansas. The Institution provides excellent facilities for the use of the members of the medical profession in Greenville, and has proved a valuable addition to the semi-public institutions of the city in which it is maintained. The Drs. Cantrell both devote the major part of their time and attention to the surgical branch of their profession, and they are now serving as division surgeons for the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad.

For the past several years Dr. Charles E. Cantrell has made it a practice to take post-graduate work in surgery about three times each year, and thus he has kept in touch with the most advanced systems and availed himself of the most modern accessories. He has taken effective post-graduate courses, with important clinical work, in the leading medical colleges and the principal hospitals of Chicago and New York. He is a close and appreciative student of the best standard and periodical literature of his profession, and has been a valued contributor to the same, especially along the line of surgical science, in connection with which he is widely known among the members of his profession. He has the distinction of being a member of the board of trustees of the American Medical Association, and this position is one of responsibility, as the board has direct supervision of the tangible property interests of the association, as well as of its publishing and other affairs, the body now having assets of more than a million dollars. The Doctor also served six years as a member of the judiciary council of this national body, and thus it may be readily understood that his professional reputation far transcends local limitations. He is one of the most active and valued members of the Texas State Medical Society, of which he has served as president and of which he is now a trustee. He is also a member of the North Texas District and the Hunt County Medical Associations. He is deeply interested in the effecting of hygienic and sanitary progress and the safeguarding of the public health in general, and in a personal way his research in medicine and surgery has been exceptionally broad. He may well be termed one of the advance guard in the ranks of his profession, and he is appreciative of the dignity and responsibility of his chosen calling, with the result that he is animated by high ethical ideals and a distinct desire to prevent as well as to mitigate human suffering and distress.

Dr. Cantrell was married to Perrilda E. Doshier on October 6, 1878, and they have a family of ten children, four sons and six daughters, all of whom are living and one son and three daughters are married. The Doctor has fraternal affiliations with the Masonic order and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

IRVING H. ROBERTS. It is in connection with concrete construction work that Irving H. Roberts is well known among the energetic progressive men of Wichita Falls, Texas, where, since 1905, he has contracted for the greater part of the work of this nature that has been carried on. He has made a place for himself among the substantial men of his section through the force of his own industry and individual effort, for since young manhood he has depended entirely upon his own resources. Mr. Roberts was born in Blackhawk county, Iowa, March 11, 1868, and is a son of A. M. and Margaret (Klinefelter) Roberts.

A. M. Roberts was born in Illinois, and after his marriage removed to Iowa, subsequently removing to Kansas, and then again locating in Iowa. He has been engaged in agricultural pursuits all of his life, and now, at the age of seventy years, is carrying on operations on a property in the vicinity of Denver, Colorado. His wife was born, reared and educated in Wisconsin, and still survives, being sixty-seven years of age. They have had three children: Ray, who is a resident of Colorado and engaged in farming; Mrs. S. E. Johnston, living at New Hampton, Iowa; and Irving H.

The oldest of his parents' children, Irving H. Roberts secured his early education in the district schools of Blackhawk county, Iowa, and this was supplemented by attendance at Dixon (Illinois) College. Upon completing his studies, he at once became connected with a concrete firm, and has continued to follow this line to the present time. For some years Mr. Roberts centered his activities in Iowa, but in 1905 came to Wichita Falls, Texas, and in this city has built up a reputation for business ability, reliability and excellent workmanship. Since locating here he has had charge of the greater part of the city contract work in the construction of curbing, sidewalks and lake work, also most of the concrete work on the handsomest business buildings in the city, and ownership in The Stompfli Roberts Building, Majestic Theatre, tenement and warehouses are evidence of his faith in his home town. In connection with his contracting business he owns and controls the Roberts Cast Stone Plant, where he casts and manufactures all ornamental and building stone.

Essentially a business man, Mr. Roberts has not sought preferment in public life, but shows his good citizenship by giving his hearty support to all things which promise to be of benefit to his adopted locality.

In June, 1911, Mr. Roberts was united in marriage with Miss Ethel B. Bristow, daughter of John and Virginia Bristow, of a well-known Illinois family, Mr. Bristow being an engineer of Pearl, Illinois. In his political views Mr. Roberts is a Republican and at all times has stanchly supported his party's candidates and policies. He has been interested in fraternal work and is well known in Masonry, in which he has advanced to the thirty-second degree and is senior warden of the commandery. He is also a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Modern Woodmen of America.

HOWARD FOGG. It would be difficult to describe in a few words the varied relations of Mr. Fogg to the business enterprise of El Paso, for he is without doubt one of the busiest and most hustling men in west Texas. His interests are not confined to ownership of stock passive investments in a number of different concerns whose directors and real managers have no personal relations with him, but on the contrary he is the real head and the genius and moving spirit of most of the enterprises with which his name is associated. It should be noted first of all before attempting to give a brief description of his career that Mr. Fogg has earned his present position by hard work and by an exhibition of an enterprise which is exceptional even in the state noted for its enterprising and vigorous men.

J. A. Roberts.

Howard Fogg was born August 1, 1875, in Medina county, Texas. He was the oldest in a family of five children, all of whom are now living, born to J. Frank and Nannie (Ragsdale) Fogg. The Fogg family is of Scotch stock, and the first members to come to America settled in Massachusetts. The Ragsdale family were among the early settlers of Texas, and the older members of the Ragsdale family had many battles with the Indians and with the hard conditions existing in Texas during its early settlement. Mr. Fogg's mother had six brothers who all lost their lives in the Civil war as Confederate soldiers. J. Frank Fogg, the father, was born in Virginia, and came to Texas during the early sixties. For twelve years he served as sheriff of Tarrant county, of which Fort Worth is the county seat. He was also postmaster at Abilene for four years and was very active in political and public affairs. In politics he was a Democrat and a member of the Baptist church. During the earlier days he was noted as one of the conductors of the stage line from Texas across the western country for a distance of four thousand miles to California. This was prior to the construction of the first railroad lines across the country. The senior Fogg was a very enterprising and public spirited man, and during his earlier career accumulated a small fortune, but losses incidental to business finally left him in only comfortable circumstances. He died on Christmas Day, 1910, at Fort Worth, when sixty-three years of age. The mother, who was born in Henderson county, Texas, in 1848, is now sixty-five years of age and resides in Fort Worth. She is very active in church work, being a member of the Baptist church, a lovable woman and much beloved by her neighbors and many friends, having always interested herself in practical charity and having lived a devout Christian life.

Howard Fogg attended school and spent most of his early life in Fort Worth, where he graduated from the high school in 1889. The same year he began his practical career, and if one reads between the lines there are many evidences of hustling spirit which animated him during those early years while he was getting firmly entrenched in the business world. On leaving school he became connected with the Fort Worth laundry, and was in that line of business for several years until he found that it was not adapted to his ambition, and he then left. It is a matter of interest to know that Mr. Fogg was in his earlier years a professional base-ball player, and was for some years connected with Fort Worth team. In the old days of the north Texas baseball circuit, he was locally famous as pitcher and catcher for the Fort Worth team. After that varied experience he took another tack, and this time found the course which led to real success, and high attainments. He began humbly enough, as an usher in the old Fort Worth Opera House in 1899. About that time the moving picture was introduced as an element in our national amusements, and Mr. Fogg has the distinction of having established at Fort Worth in 1902 the first moving picture theatre in the state of Texas. From that time forward his career has been successful and it is only necessary to recount as briefly as possible the various enterprises with which his name has been connected. At the present time he is best known as an amusement purveyor, and theatrical owner and manager. He owns and manages the El Paso Opera House, Crawford Theatre, Happy Hour Theatre, Majestic Theatre and the Airdome Theatre, all in El Paso, and is vice president and general manager of the Tri-State Amusement Syndicate, Incorporated and is sole owner of the Jolly Ideals Musical Comedy Company. From 1906 to 1909 he was engaged in the theatrical business at Hot Springs, Arkansas, where he conducted the Grand Theatre and the Lyric Theatre. For a time he also had the palace theatre at Memphis, Tennessee. He then returned from Arkansas to Texas, locating at El Paso permanently in the Spring of 1910, and has since come to control and own the theatres above mentioned.

Though Mr. Fogg is in almost every sense a practical and self-made man he attributes much of his success to the assistance of his wife, who has planned and counseled with him in his various enterprises ever since their marriage. He was married at El Paso in 1905 to Miss Margaret Long, daughter of D. M. Buck, of Clifton, Texas. Mrs. Fogg is a native of Texas and belongs to one of the highly respected families of Hill county. Mr. Fogg has four daughters, Beatrice, Louise, Nannie and Mildred, by first wife, May Stewart Fogg, and they live with his mother at Fort Worth, Texas.

Mr. Fogg is a Democrat in politics, and at times has taken an active part in political affairs. He is affiliated with the Order of Moose, the Elks, the Woodmen of the World, and belongs to the Cactus Club and the El Paso Chamber of Commerce. He is also a member of the Affiliated Theatrical Managers Association of New York. His membership also includes the El Paso Automobile Club. His church is the Baptist. He believes thoroughly in El Paso's greatness, both present and future, claims that the city is the most progressive of all Texas cities, and having chosen it as his home intends to reside here during the rest of his life. Mr. Fogg is also a member of the Sons of Confederate Veterans.

Though Mr. Fogg has always been a mixer with men of all classes, and bears the reputation of what is termed a "Good Fellow" it is noteworthy that he is thoroughly temperate, has never drank a drop of intoxicating liquors in all his life, nor has he smoked or used tobacco in any form, and is entirely free from the vices to which the average of mankind is addicted. Mr. Fogg served on the executive committee of the Jubilee Entertainment Organization of the Chamber of Commerce when El Paso entertained the citizens of New Mexico and Arizona at the statehood celebration of November 20, 1911.

Out from El Paso about twenty-five miles at Berino, in New Mexico, is a four hundred and forty acre ranch, known as Fogg's Ranch. This is an enterprise, which of itself is a large and important business, and Mr. Fogg gives his active supervision to its operation. It is best known probably among stock men as the home of some of the finest registered Poland China hogs to be found in the southwest. The herd is headed by "Statesman No. 181089," one of the finest individual hogs that ever lived, winning the first prize in the Dallas Fair of 1911, and weighing five hundred pounds when only nine months old. The herd on the Fogg Ranch includes a number of others of the "big-bone" type of Poland China hogs, and some of them are only slightly inferior to the leader of the herd. Mr. Fogg has on the ranch the services of Mr. J. Ed. Hayes as general manager and herd breeder, a man who has devoted all his life to this particular business. The Fogg Ranch is almost an ideal place, and besides its hogs is well stocked with horses and cattle. It has a beautiful six-room modern residence, is fenced and crossed-fenced, and has all the latest modern out buildings and improvements, including tenant houses. Though a manager is always on the place, Mr. Fogg gives much time to looking after the details of his farm, which is a competitor among his enterprises for his attention and care. His theatrical interests are also managed by a competent subordinate, but it is noteworthy that Mr. Fogg always has his finger on the general and specific details of all his enterprises and is the real head of all the undertakings which have been mentioned. He owns and uses constantly a large touring automobile, so that the distance between the city and his ranch is only nominal, and he is constantly driving about looking after his affairs. Mr. Fogg is also an enthusiastic hunter, and has never lost his enthusiasm about the great national pastime. During 1912 he was the active head and manager of the El Paso baseball team.

JOHN W. FLOORE. A former banker and recognized as one of the most successful business men of Cleburne, John W. Floore has had a career of changes and incidents which are of interest to every student of successful men. Keen ability as a trader, a free spirit and a certain venturesomeness in moving rapidly from one point to the next in business affairs, a knowledge gained partly by experience and partly native, of men and affairs, has perhaps been the distinguishing characteristic of his progress.

Born in Noxubee county, Mississippi, July 7, 1851, John W. Floore was one of five children born to Benjamin E. and Amanda (Daniels) Floore. His father was a North Carolina man, a farmer and operator of grist and saw mills, who died in 1903. The mother was a native of Tennessee and died in 1900. The other children in the family were: Elizabeth, wife of Gilbert Clark of Gholson, Mississippi; William H., who died at the age of twenty-three and was then a bookkeeper; Jennie, wife of Mr. Edwards of Cleburne; and Sidney S., a farmer.

Mr. Floore up to the age of twenty years lived at home, was educated at Summerville Institute in Mississippi, and then went into northern Arkansas. At Shoal Creek, he was employed for six months in the general store of Saddle & Hixon. That was followed by four months as a school teacher, and at the age of twenty one he arrived in Texas and first located in Smith county. Having a small supply of money, he bought a span of mules and harness and found employment at five dollars a day for himself and his team in grading a section of the original line of the International & Great Northern Railroad. Four months at that and he then took a contract to supply the labor camp with water at five dollars a day, and continued in that work for three months. Selling his team he took a job as laborer at two dollars a day on the pile driver. That likewise was an employment of brief duration, for only four months. After that, going to Tyler, he entered another field of experience, becoming clerk in a general store at a stipulated salary of four hundred and fifty dollars for the first year. The second year his wages were raised to six hundred dollars, but after three months work at that salary he was placed in entire charge of the office, and was made bookkeeper, his new position giving him a salary of a thousand dollars a year. About the same time he began lending money, and that has been a business with him to a greater or less extent ever since. On September 1, 1878, he formed a partnership with R. H. Brown, and opened a dry goods store in the name of Floore & Brown. He was half owner of the store from September 1, 1878, to January 1, 1883, selling out his interests in the latter year. Since then he has had his home in Cleburne, a period of thirty years, and has been one of the important factors in this city's business affairs. Buying one-third interest in the private bank of Herd, Allen and Barnes, he was for a number of years one of the best known of Cleburne's bankers. The business was continued as a private institution until 1888, when largely through Mr. Floore's efforts it was given a national charter, and is now known as the National Bank of Cleburne. He acted as general manager of the National Bank from 1888 to 1902, and in the latter year disposed of his holdings, and retired from official connection with the bank. Since then he has conducted an office for loans, through his accurate knowledge of men and business situation has seldom had a reverse throughout his long business career.

Mr. Floore is an Independent in politics, and for two years served as an alderman in the Cleburne City Council. He is the owner of five business houses, two hotels and twenty residences in Cleburne. Every one has the utmost confidence in Mr. Floore's ability as a financier, and in the handling of money conservatively and profitably he has few superiors in the state. He takes his recreations largely in traveling and has liberal resources with which to gratify his tastes in this direction.

CHARLES A. KRAUSE. A successful life that is the result of hard work and a careful attention to business is that of Charles A. Krause, of El Paso, Texas. At the age of twelve years he was assisting in the support of his mother and two sisters and this early introduction into the serious side of life made him a man before his time. He has won his success through his unaided efforts, and in so doing has won the friendship and respect of all with whom he has come in contact.

Charles A. Krause was born in San Antonio, Texas, on the 16th of July, 1872. He is the son of Rudolph and Helena (Oberkamp) Krause, and his father was born in Germany. He came to America when he was a young man and settled in Texas before the Civil War. During this war he enlisted in one of the Texas regiments and fought in Louisiana and other parts of the South as one of the defenders of the Confederacy. After the war he became a resident of Austin, Texas, where he became a prominent attorney and where he was also a notary public. He died there in 1906 at the age of sixty-five. Rudolph Krause married Helena Oberkamp in Louisiana. She was also a native of the German Empire, but had been brought to this country as a child by her parents, who settled in Louisiana. Here she grew up and received her education. She is still living, at the age of sixty-two and makes her home in El Paso.

Five children were born to Rudolph Krause and his wife, and of these Charles A. Krause was the next to the eldest. He was brought up in Louisiana and attended the schools of Donaldsville. He was not able to go to school for very many years, however, for his assistance was necessary to the support of the family. After leaving school he entered a printing office and there learned the printer's trade. He worked at the trade for eight years in Louisiana and then came to Texas, where he located in El Paso in 1886. He continued working at his trade until 1895 when he concluded to take up another line of industry and with this in view he learned the trade of a baker. He worked at this trade for a time and finally bought the business of which he is now the head. This bakery business he has developed into one of the largest and most prosperous concerns of its kind in this section of the state. He employs twenty-two men regularly and often has to hire more help in a rush season. He does principally a wholesale business but he uses three retail wagons, and his business is growing with the growth of the city.

The sole fraternal affiliations of Mr. Krause are with the Woodmen of the World, and in religious matters he is a member of the Roman Catholic church. He was chief of the volunteer fire department of the city of El Paso and has done some splendid work in this capacity. In politics Mr. Krause adheres to the principles of the Democratic party but he prefers to vote an independent ticket.

Mr. Krause was married to Emma E. Gemoets, in El Paso, Texas, on the 15th of April, 1895. Mrs. Krause is the daughter of F. L. and Mrs. J. G. Gemoets, of Belgium, and she came to America in 1885. They have become the parents of five children, as follows: Helen

Chas A Krause

1 Jeanette Krause, who were born on October 14, 1907, and are now attending St. Joseph's Academy, in El Paso; Charles Joseph, who was born on July 2, 1901, in El Paso and is attending St. Mary's Academy; John Leon, who is also a student at St. Mary's Academy and was born in El Paso on the 1st of March, 1903; and Virginia Regina, who was born on November 1, 1907, and is going to school at St. Joseph's Academy with her older sisters.

GEORGE CARDEN MOUNTCASTLE. One of the big cattle-men of the state and one who is largely concerned in irrigation land and irrigation projects in these parts is George Carden Mountcastle, a resident of the state since 1896. He began his activities then in the grain, cattle and land business and has since continued, branching out from time to time and gaining prominence and popularity among the leading operators of this section of the state. As president of the Mountcastle Land & Irrigation Company, he is widely known in and about Fort Worth, and maintains offices in the Grain and Cotton Exchange Building in this city.

George Carden Mountcastle was born in McMinn county, Tennessee, on August 11, 1849, and is the son of Christian Eli and Sarah E. (Loughmiller) Mountcastle. He received his education at the Oak Grove Academy of McMinn county, Tennessee, and was graduated from that efficient and popular school in 1870, coming to Texas in the following year and locating in Collin county. In 1874 Mr. Mountcastle founded the town of Allen in Collin county, and there continued to make his headquarters until 1885, when he moved to McKinney and remained there for five years. During that time he was operating between McKinney and Dallas, caring for his land, cattle and grain interests which had begun to accumulate during his years in Allen. In 1896, Mr. Mountcastle went to Kansas City, Missouri, and for four years was there engaged actively in the grain business, to the exclusion of all other interests. After his four years in Kansas City, Mr. Mountcastle returned to Fort Worth in 1888 and there became southwestern manager for the extensive grain concern known as the J. Rosenbaum Grain Company, and he still retains that office, in addition to his many other business connections. This concern carries on an extensive grain business in Texas and Oklahoma, and is one of the best known of its kind in the state.

Mr. Mountcastle is himself a heavy cattle owner, and secretary and treasurer of the Val Verde Land & Cattle Company, of Crockett county, the same owning and operating vast tracts of land and owning prodigious numbers of cattle and horses. He is president of the Toyah Oil and Development Company of Fort Worth, with large oil land holdings in West Texas and Louisiana, and is secretary and treasurer of the Abe Mayer Cattle Company of Fort Worth. As president of the Mountcastle Land & Irrigation Company, having extensive holdings throughout the state and irrigating thousands of acres of arid land, he is performing a great work for the state of Texas, and is sharing largely in the beneficent work of making the waste places to bloom and yield bountifully to those hardy and courageous people who are ever willing to undertake life in a new and untamed region.

Mr. Mountcastle married Miss M. A. Chesnutt, the daughter of James M. Chesnutt, and they have one daughter, Mrs. Alla Mountcastle Merrill.

JOSEPH ALBERT BURGER. A native son of San Antonio, representing one of the old French families of southwest Texas, Joseph Albert Burger is one of the men who has been most actively concerned with the development of the rich agricultural district about the Alamo city. The management of land and cattle and general real estate activities have long held his attention, but for several years he has focussed his energies upon his model ranch of a thousand acres in Atascosa county, one mile from the town of Poteet. This is in the famous irrigation belt, and the Burger ranch has conspicuously proved the magnificent resources of the land in the vicinity of San Antonio when cultivated under irrigation.

Born in San Antonio in 1863, Joseph Albert Burger is the son of Joseph and Bridget (Schleier) Burger, both of whom were born in Alsace-Lorraine of French parentage, and came to Texas during the fifties. The elder Joseph Burger was a man of excellent education, a musician and composer of ability, and had come to Texas at the request of the Catholic clergy to take charge of the music in the Catholic church at Castroville, the seat of the famous Castroville colony. The town and surroundings did not quite meet his expectations, and about 1860 he moved to the city of San Antonio, engaged in business affairs, and lived there until his death in 1866.

Joseph A. Burger was reared in San Antonio, attended the local schools, also the A. & M. College of Texas, and has witnessed the entire development of that Texas metropolis from the beginning of the railroad era. Since reaching majority his business interests have been chiefly in real estate lands, both in the city and country, and his property holdings have been of increasing amount and value for a number of years. Some particular mention should be made of his thousand-acre ranch in Atascosa county. It lies along Atascosa Creek, was formerly used principally as a stock range, but its rich deep soil made it peculiarly attractive and valuable for agricultural purposes, and it is one of the best properties in the vicinity of San Antonio. The feature that has made the ranch famous, and a model place visited by hundreds of prospective investors every year, is its artesian well, which furnishes an inexhaustible supply of flowing water, gushing out at the rate of 3,000 gallons a minute. The well is 1,240 feet deep, and furnishes an abundant supply of water for irrigation and stock purposes. For a number of years Mr. Burger has raised some record crops of cotton and corn, and a part of his farm is devoted to the cultivation of onions and other winter vegetables. With the irrigation resources so well developed, the ownership of a thousand-acre ranch in southwest Texas constitutes a business property of almost inestimable value and one that will produce increasing revenues with each succeeding year. The Burger ranch has another important resource in its underlying vein of coal, and as soon as transportation facilities have been provided the mining of this mineral will be developed on a commercial basis. The coal is of an excellent quality of lignite, approaching bituminous coal, and of much higher grade than the ordinary lignite in Texas.

Mr. Burger was married in San Antonio to Miss Ellen M. Grove, a native of that city. Their five children are named Selma Ella, Mary Adeline, Frederick Harold, Joseph Milton and Evelyn Lucile.

H. G. HENNE, now well established in the practice of law at New Braunfels, is a young man who has found much favor in public affairs. H. G. Henne is senior member of the firm of Henne & Fuchs, is a graduate of the University of Texas and has been a member of the bar for the past ten years.

H. G. Henne was born in New Braunfels, Comal county, in 1882, a son of Louis and Emelie (vom Stein) Henne. Louis Henne was born in the city of Hanover, Germany, on June 20, 1840, at the age of five years he accompanied his parents to America, arriving at New Braunfels in November, 1845. He grew up and was educated in that old German town, and at the age of seventeen his father died, leaving him the acting head of the family. He married Emelia vom Stein on April 20, 1861, and his death occurred on May 14, 1912, his widow surviving. Louis Henne was one of the foremost men of New Braunfels at the time of his death, having for many years held a place of prominence as a merchant and property owner in the district, and the proprietor of stores at New Braunfels, Rockdale and Thorndale. These concerns, all of which were flourishing centers of trade in after years, were built up from small beginnings and were successful as a result of Mr. Henne's invariable rule to transact business upon the strictest basis of honor and integrity, the Golden Rule being the practical motto of his career. He was a high type of citizen, generous and public spirited, and was rightly known as one of New Braunfels' most highly respected and beloved citizens. At the time of his death he was head of the Louis Henne Company, the Henne Lumber Company, Henne & Tolle in New Braunfels, and of Henne & Meyer Company of Rockdale and Thorndale. To him and his wife were born five children, namely: Mrs. Theo Tolle, Mrs. S. H. Frieze, Louis Henne, Jr., Adolph Henne and H. G. Henne.

Mr. H. G. Henne was reared in New Braunfels, attended the primary schools, subsequently was a student in the San Antonio Academy, and finished both his literary and professional studies in the State University at Austin. Mr. Henne was awarded the LL. B. degree at the Law Department of the University in 1903, and in the same year took up the active practice of law in his home town, and has continued with increasing success in private practice and with notable service in community affairs. He has served as city and county attorney and also acted by appointment as special district judge. His association with Mr. Fuchs has proved a most agreeable one, and the firm enjoys an excellent reputation for skillful handling of all legal business entrusted to them. Mr. Henne married Miss Inez D. Gordon of Chillicothe, Missouri, on September 26, 1912.

VANCE STEWART. When Vance Stewart came to El Paso in November, 1909, fresh from his studies, which had embraced a wide scope and fitted him for the legal profession, he first identified himself with the law department of the El Paso, Southwestern and Rock Island Railroad companies. After eighteen months in that connection he withdrew from corporation service and with George G. Shannan associated himself as a partner, under the firm name of Stewart & Shannan. Since that organization was effected, he has gained a foremost place in the ranks of El Paso lawyers, and stands high in the esteem of the profession and the laity.

Born in Cleveland, Ohio, on May 1, 1883, Vance Stewart is the son of James W. and Laura (Merriam) Stewart. The father, who was born in Pennsylvania, moved from that state to Ohio and settled in Cleveland about 1878. He is a lawyer and is still active in that city. He has given valued service to his state in the capacity of senator in 1904 and also served as Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, as well as having been otherwise active in public and civic affairs. He was at one time chairman of the board of education of Cleveland, serving in that important position for eight consecutive years, and during that time effected much of good to the cause of education in the city. He is a Republican in politics, and long known as one of the successful men of the city. The mother was born in Cleveland and was the daughter of an old Ohio family of English extraction, the name of Merriam being one that has long stood high in the annals of American history. She was married in Cleveland in 1881, and became the mother of nine children, six of whom are living, and of that number Vance Stewart was the first born. The mother is also still living and makes her home in Cleveland, where she has passed her entire life.

Vance Stewart as a boy divided his time between attendance at public and private schools in Cleveland, continuing in study there without undue happenings until the age of eighteen years, when he entered Princeton University and was graduated from the academic department with the degree of A. B. He then entered the Western Reserve University Law School where he attended until 1907, after which he went abroad and continued his studies for two years in Switzerland and Germany, giving considerable of that time to a study of Roman Law and the basic principles of our common law. He then returned to the United States and entered the University of Denver, at Denver, Colorado, where he took a thorough course in Mining and Irrigation. In December, 1909, his studies being completed, he came to El Paso, and here entered upon the practice of his profession in the law department of the El Paso & Southwestern R. R., which company maintain their general offices in El Paso. He continued thus for eighteen months, then severed his connection with the road to engage in independent practice.

Mr. Stewart is a Democrat, but he is not one who is interested in the political machine of the district, having no ambition to be gratified in that field, and well content to give his time and attention to his own interests. He is a member of the Presbyterian church, and one of the socially prominent men of the city. He has a genuine interest in the progress of his city, and his character as a citizen is most admirable, while his enthusiasm in regard to the future of Texas is one of the finest things about him. He maintains his offices in the American Bank building. Mr. Stewart married, March 26, 1913, Miss Wanda Race, a native of El Paso, and a daughter of W. E. Race, superintendent of the water company and prominent in politics in El Paso. Mr. Race is a native of Iowa and Mrs. Race, who was formerly Belle Saunders, is a native of Marshall, Texas.

CHARLES W. REESE. The proprietor of a successful grocery business in El Paso, Charles W. Reese began his career on a Georgia plantation, subsequently followed the machinist's trade for a number of years and finally found the opportunities which he was seeking in El Paso, where he has resided since 1911. Charles W. Reese was born in Coweta county, Georgia, December 8, 1876, being the eighth in a family of ten children born to John P. and Emily (Moseley) Reese. His father was born in Georgia of Welsh descent, the first ancestors having come to America before the Revolutionary war, and the various members of the family were represented in the Colonial and national wars. The father was a planter and had accumulated a fair amount of property before his death. He was also active in public affairs, and served as tax collector and tax received in Coweta county for a number of years. In politics he was a Democrat, was clerk of the Baptist church for more than half a century, and was very devout in religious matters. During the Civil war he became a private in the Thirty-seventh Georgia Infantry, was a soldier under General Joe Johnston, during most of his service and was in the war four years. He died on the old home place in Georgia in 1906, when seventy-three years of age. His wife, also born in Coweta county, Georgia, belonged to an old family of the state, and her death occurred on the home place in 1908, at the age of sixty-eight.

Charles W. Reese received his early education in the public schools of his home county, and his early life was spent on the plantation. At the age of eighteen, he entered a shop to learn the machinists' trade, and served an apprenticeship of three years. When he had fitted himself for practical work in the trade he followed the business as a journeyman machinist for seven years. In November, 1911, he came to El Paso and established his grocery store at 504 Mesa Avenue, and since then has

In politics, Mr. Reese is a Democrat, and is affiliated with the Masonic Order, having attained thirty-two degrees of the Scottish Rites. He is also a member of the Knights of Pythias. At Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, he married Miss Jamie Brown, daughter of Alfred Jenkins. Mr. Reese was born in Kentucky, and belongs to a very prominent family. They have no children, and their residence is at 508 Mesa Avenue.

ALVIN M. OWSLEY. Probably no member of the Denton county bar has a more distinctive place in his community for a young man than Alvin M. Owsley, whose capabilities have enabled him to win a position of leadership. Mr. Owsley has recently completed a term as representative in the state legislature, and declined to again become a candidate in order to devote all his attention to his practice.

For the past forty years the name Owsley has denoted exceptional ability in the law and prominence in the public life of Denton county. Alvin M. Owsley was born at Denton, June 11, 1888, and is a son of Hon. Alvin C. Owsley. His father, who is a native of Missouri, married after coming to Texas, Miss Sallie M. Mount, who is a native of this state. The elder Owsley moved from Missouri to California, and about 1873 located in Denton, where he began the practice of law. At that time he was only nineteen years of age, and was qualified for practice by a special act removing his minority disabilities. While recognized as one of the leading lawyers in his part of the state, Alvin C. Owsley will probably be remembered for his useful legislative career. Some of the chief points in his work during three terms as representative of his district in the legislature should be mentioned. He was author of the Separate Coach Law, which was adopted in 1891; wrote the first Trust Law of Texas in 1889, a law which subsequently became a model for legislation in other states; was one of the subcommittee of five which drafted the Railroad Commission Law of Texas, and which with some amendments is still in force; was a member of the judiciary committee No. 1, of the committee on internal improvements, chairman of the committee on penitentiaries. He was author of what is known as the M. K. & T. Railroad Consolidation Bill, by which that railroad company was compelled to give up its foreign charter. In all three cases he was one of the legislative leaders, and both before and since his legislative career he has taken a prominent part in politics and state affairs.

In a family of eight children, three sons and five daughters, Alvin M. Owsley was the oldest son. His early education was acquired in the private schools of Denton, by attendance at the North Texas State Normal, and in 1905 he entered the Virginia Military Institute at Lexington, where he was graduated in 1909. His special prominence while in that school is indicated by the honor paid him as first captain and president of the final ball in 1908, and as president of the Y. M. C. A. in 1909. Between the preparatory school and university Mr. Owsley, during 1909-10, has filled the position of commandant of cadets at the Rugby Academy in New Orleans, and then entered the law department of the University of Texas. After finishing his course there he was admitted to the bar in 1912, and while in the university was a member of the debating team which participated in the inter-collegiate debate with the University of Mississippi in 1911 at Oxford, Mississippi. On getting his license to practice Mr. Owsley joined the firm of Owsley, Sullivan & Owsley at Denton, and has since been junior partner of Owsley & Owsley.

Soon after finishing his course in law school and at the solicitation of his many friends in the One Hundred and Forty-sixth District, Mr. Owsley accepted the nomination in 1912 for representative in the Thirty-Third legislature, and was elected without opposition. During the following session he served as a member of the appropriation committee, the reform in criminal procedure committee, the committee on constitutional amendment, the judiciary committee, the committee on supreme judicial districts, and was chairman of the committee on public buildings and grounds. One special honor paid him during his legislative career was his appointment to make the nominating speech in behalf of Hon. Morris Shepard for the United States senate. In the legislature Mr. Owsley was easily one of the most popular members, and besides his influential relations in promoting the work of that body formed friendships with public men all over the state. It was a high honor paid him at the commencement of his career, and on retiring from the office he had the satisfaction of knowing that he has performed his duties creditably and with scrupulous integrity, and from this service retires to devote himself with renewed energy and ambition to gaining success as a lawyer.

Mr. Owsley has numerous fraternal and social connections, including membership in the Woodmen of the World, the Knights of Pythias, the Modern Order of Pretorians, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and with the Beta Pheta Pi and the Delta Sigma Rho college fraternities. He is a member of the First Christian church at Denton.

W. H. BRUCE, A. B., A. M., Ph. D. The president of North Texas State Normal College at Denton has made a distinguished career in the field of education, and his record is noteworthy both on the administrative side and in the field of creative scholarship. For nearly thirty years Dr. Bruce has been active in school work, and is therefore an exceptionally experienced educator, with practical and progressive ideals, and one of the able men who are shaping the facilities of public schools so as to serve the proper end in a scheme of twentieth century society.

William Herschel Bruce was born near LaGrange, Georgia, April 8, 1856. His father, Hilery S. Bruce, was a physician, and his mother's name was Catherine R. Pruitt. Both parents were reared in Georgia, later settled in Alabama, and during the Civil war the father held the rank of surgeon in the Forty-seventh Alabama Regiment. The great-grandfather, Azial Bruce, came from his native Scotland to America and settled in Greene county, Georgia.

Dr. W. H. Bruce in the course of his career has acquired a liberal education and more than an ordinary share of scholastic honors. He graduated A. B. in 1883 from the Alabama Polytechnic Institute at Auburn, subsequently Baylor University of Texas gave him the honorary degree of A. M., and the degree of Doctor of Philosophy comes from Mercer University of Georgia, his major work leading up to the degree having been performed in mathematics, French and physics.

It is a long record of service which Dr. Bruce has to present in education and can be only briefly outlined in this sketch. Beginning as a teacher at the age of nineteen in his native state of Georgia, he taught in rural and village schools in Alabama, and in 1884 came to Texas. He was superintendent of schools at Blanco, Texas, 1884-93; superintendent of schools at Marble Falls, 1893-96; superintendent of schools at Athens, 1896-99; was president of John Tarlton College at Stephenville, Texas, 1899-1900; was professor of mathematics at North Texas State Normal at Denton from 1901 to 1906, and since 1906 has held the executive office of president at this important branch of the state's higher educational institutions.

In the intervals of his major responsibilities as an educator, Dr. Bruce served as teacher of mathematics in the University of Texas during the summer schools in 1897, 1898 and 1900; was conductor and a teacher in summer normal schools at San Marcos, San Antonio, Port Lavaca from 1892 to 1901. In 1905 the Texas State Teachers Association honored him with the office of president. He was chairman of the State Board of Examiners from 1905 to 1910. His original contributions to educational literature are chiefly as co-author of Sutton & Bruce's arithmetic and co-author of Bruce & Cody's geometries. Dr. Bruce is a member of the Academy of Science and a Fellow of the Texas Academy of Science. In Masonry he took his first degrees in the Blue Lodge in 1885, the Royal Arch in 1904, and became a Knights Templar in 1906, having filled all offices in the Blue Lodge except that of Worshipful Master, and all offices in the Commandery except Commander. He is a Baptist and his political affiliation is Democratic.

At Denton in 1909 Dr. Bruce erected one of the most attractive homes in that city, a ten-room two-story residence, with all modern improvements, costing approximately five thousand five hundred dollars. Dr. Bruce has a fine home and family, and his children are likewise noted for attainments in scholarship. At Loachapoka, Alabama, November 6, 1879, he married Miss Lillie O. Hart, a daughter of an extensive Alabama planter, Thomas D. Hart. The children are, Maud Bruce, born June 16, 1882; Byron S. Bruce, born September 5, 1885; Ralph T. Bruce, born April 11, 1888; Homer L. Bruce, born August 23, 1892. Miss Maud Bruce, who was a student at Baylor University and acquired her degree Ph. B. from Southwestern University, is a teacher and bacteriologist now living in Opelika, Alabama; Byron Bruce won his degree as a graduate pharmacist and doctor of medicine in the University of Texas and is now a practicing physician at Dallas; Ralph T., who was a student in Baylor University, is cashier in a bank at San Saba, Texas; Homer Bruce, the youngest, took his bachelor of arts degree at the University of Texas, and is now one of this state's Rhodes scholars, in attendance at Oxford University in England.

BENJAMIN F. MITCHELL. Few citizens of Gainesville are better known than is Benjamin F. Mitchell, whose business operations have extended over a wide area and have brought him into contact with a great number of people, representing all spheres and conditions of life in the Southwest. Fertile in resource and of versatile talents, he has entered actively into the professional, business and public life of the community, and every new undertaking has been prosecuted with a zeal and energy which have merited, and invariably attained, success.

For twenty years a resident of Gainesville, and having during that time been a factor in local affairs, in business, and in the law, Mr. Mitchell recently received a high local honor in his appointment to the office of postmaster at Gainesville. He was indorsed not only by the city and county officials of Gainesville and Cooke county and about one thousand patrons of the post-office, but by many of the leading men of the state for the postmastership. His application for the appointment was placed before the proper federal authority by Senator Morris Shepard and Hon. Cato Sells and Representative John H. Stephens, and on June 5, 1913, President Wilson approved his application for the office. The postoffice under his administration has been run as a business for the benefit of the community, and Mr. Mitchell is at all times in close touch with office affairs and has already done much to improve service to this locality.

Benjamin F. Mitchell was born in Pulaski county, Missouri, October 25, 1866, and is a son of William H. and Nancy E. (Nelson) Mitchell. His paternal grandparents, natives of Virginia, migrated to Kentucky and later to Missouri, while his maternal ancestors, who were born in Tennessee, went to Missouri about the same time, 1840, all being farming people. William H. Mitchell was a farmer, and while in Missouri was influential in Democratic politics, serving Pulaski county for some time as county treasurer. In 1874 he brought his family to Texas and located on a farm in Cooke county near where the town of Woodbine came into existence with the advent of the building of the M., K. & T. Railway in 1879, and there spent the remainder of his life in agricultural pursuits. He and his wife had ten children, namely: Dora Geneva, died in infancy. Josephine died when four years old. Benjamin F. is the third of the family. Minnie, who married B. L. Moss, a farmer of Woodbine, Texas, has four children, as follows: Myrtle, who married I. E. Norman, a mail carrier at Woodbine, has one daughter Gladys; Gertie, married H. H. Henry, of Cooke county, a minister of the Gospel; Hazel is the wife of Luther Ware, a Cooke county farmer, and has one daughter; Wayne is unmarried and lives in Cooke county. Dennie Lee, fifth in the family, was a practicing physician and died in Cooke county in 1907; he married Miss Melissa Ware and they had two children: Frank, unmarried and a clerk in a store at Woodbine; and Ruby, who is the wife of Carl Clement, a Woodbine merchant, and they have one child. Dr. Fred A. is a dentist in San Antonio, and by his marriage to Miss Annie Bertram, a native of Oklahoma, had one son, Henry A., now a postoffice clerk at San Antonio, Texas. Berry, the seventh child, is deceased. Claude N., a railroad conductor with headquarters at Denison, Texas, married Emma Demaree, and they have one child, Jennie. Mellie S., the wife of Bart B. Martin a farmer at Woodbine, has a family of five children, namely: Raines, Tennie May, and Henry, all attending school, and Fred and Elizabeth, the youngest.

Benjamin F. Mitchell was a boy of eight years when brought to Texas by his parents, and his early educational training was secured in the Finch schoolhouse, a log building in the country about nine miles east of the city limits of Gainesville. He grew up on the home ranch in Cooke county, remaining under the parental roof and continuing to assist his father until he was twenty-six years of age. In the meantime he took a course at Sam Houston Normal Institute at Huntsville, Texas, and embarked upon his career as a country school teacher. Later he gave up the profession of educator and became a country merchant, and while thus engaged, in October, 1890, took a civil service examination and subsequently received an appointment in the Pension Bureau at Washington, D. C. He held this office from November, 1890, to January, 1893. During that time he was a student and pursued a course in law at the National University Law School in Washington, and was given his degree Bachelor of Laws May, 1892. On returning to Texas Mr. Mitchell entered upon the practice of his profession at Gainesville, and in November, 1898, was elected county judge of Cooke county. He continued his able service in this office until November, 1902, when he became assistant county attorney, and in April, 1905, resigned his office to accept a clerical position, by appointment of the civil service commission, in the Department of Commerce and Labor at Washington, D. C. In March, 1906, having resigned, Mr. Mitchell purchased the Gainesville Signal in the following year. This paper he bought more as a hobby than as an investment, made it a decided financial success and gave the people of his city and county one of the best weeklies published in this section of the state. He also invested heavily in real estate, being the owner of 1,200 acres of ranch land in one tract and 150 in another, and of this about 500 acres are under cultivation, the balance being in pasture land. A great deal of cattle raising is done for the market, and the land is well improved and operated under the share system.

On March 23, 1893, Mr. Mitchell was married at Woodbine to Miss Avie Moss, who was born in Cooke county, Texas, December 1, 1873, daughter of E. M. and Melissa (Coleman) Moss, the former of Kentucky, and the latter f Texas. There were eight children in the Moss family, of whom six are now living: Avice, wife of Mr. Mitchell; J. Bird, living at Valley View, Texas; W. Clifford, also a resident of Valley View; Eunice, wife of J. E. Murrell, of that place; Florence, wife of C. P. Sebastian, of Valley View; and Hubert A., who also lives there. To Mr. Mitchell and wife were born five children, two dying in infancy. Merlin, was born at Woodbine, Texas, January 9, 1896, and is now attending the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, where he is preparing himself for scientific farming and stock raising. Ruth M., born at Gainesville, April 12, 1900, will enter her first year in the Gainesville high school in the Fall of 1914. Eugenia, born May 27, 1905, in Washington, D. C., is attending the Gainesville grammar school.

Mr. Mitchell has made a good deal of political history for himself and stands high in his community. He has been an earnest worker in behalf of prohibition, and it is due to his efforts personally and to his paper, The Gainesville Signal, in large measure, that Cooke county stands in the temperance column of Texas counties. He was a delegate to the San Antonio State Democratic convention in August, 1890, and has been sent in that capacity to nearly every state convention since that time, has served as chairman of Cooke county Democratic Executive Committee for the First ward of Gainesville for four years, and at this time is chairman of the Democratic Executive Committee of Cooke county. By Peter Bradford, president of the Texas Farmers' Union, he was appointed one of the Farm Life Commission of Texas, a commission which was formed for the purpose of keeping in touch with farm conditions in the state and to co-operate with the State Commission, making suggestions in regard to what is advisable for the improvement of rural conditions in every manner that affects the proper utilization of their resources and the advancement of home and social affairs. During the last presidential campaign, the Signal was one of the most stalwart and enthusiastic supporters of the Democratic candidates, Woodrow Wilson, Morris Shepard, and Judge Ramsey.

Mr. Mitchell is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, his fraternal connection is with the Woodmen of the World, and while a resident of Washington he was a charter member of Oak Camp in that city. He owns a beautiful brick residence at 1111 South Lindsay street, valued at fifteen thousand dollars, with all modern improvements, and one of the handsomest homes in Gainesville.

Commencing life in comparative obscurity, laboring in humble occupations with steady industry, practicing sobriety and economy, Mr. Mitchell has prospered in his career. He has seen a large city grow up about his home with marvelous rapidity, and he has profited beyond the fortune of most men in the value which a growing community confers upon a fortunate location.

JOHN R. HAYNES. This name has a number of associations with Texas educational, church and professional affairs, covering practically all the time since pioneer beginnings. Mr. John R. Haynes is one of the prominent members of the Dallas county bar, and has practiced in that city since 1895.

John R. Haynes was born in Ellis county, Texas, in 1867, a son of Rev. A. J. and Melissa (Patterson) Haynes. His father, who was a pioneer settler in north Texas and widely known as a minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian church, was a native of North Carolina, when four years of age was taken by his parents to Kentucky, settling in the vicinity of Paducah. He was liberally educated for his time, was qualified as teacher and became a minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian church. At one time he was a teacher in Bethel College at McLemoresville, Kentucky, located about twenty-five miles south of Paris, and continued with that institution after its removal to McKenzie in North Tennessee. His career as a teacher and minister was continued at Arkadelphia, Arkansas, for a few years, and in 1853 he moved with his wife and two children to Fannin county, Texas, settling near Bonham. The date of his removal proves him a pioneer. From North Texas he soon moved to Dallas, and organized and erected the building for the first Presbyterian church in that city. It was also the second house of worship built in what was still a frontier town, at the forks of the Trinity. Mention should also be made in this connection of the great assistance rendered him in his church work at Dallas by the father of Captain Henry H. Smith, now of that city. The old church building stood near where the passenger depot of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway now stands. From Dallas Rev. Haynes moved to Ellis county, and later became financial agent for Trinity University at Tehuacana Hills in Limestone county. His later years were spent both in the faculty of instruction and also in a business way at the old Buffalo Gap College in Taylor county, Texas, and his death occurred at Abilene, the county seat of that county, in 1896. Rev. Haynes was a nephew of Hon. Landon C. Haynes, who was United States senator from Tennessee, a noted orator, and one of the best known men from the south. Landon C. Haynes was the maternal grandfather of Bob and Alf Taylor of Tennessee, and Rev. Haynes was thus a first cousin to those distinguished Tennessee statesmen and orators. The mother of John R. Haynes was born in Carroll county, Tennessee, in 1831, a daughter of Chesley Patterson of that county. She is still living in good health and spirits, and greatly venerated by her children and descendants. Her home is with her daughter, Mrs. Thompson, in Dallas.

John R. Haynes grew up in Ellis and Limestone counties, spent several years as a student in old Trinity University at Tehuacana, and also in the Buffalo Gap College at Abilene. He prepared for his profession in the Cumberland University Law School at Lebanon, Tennessee, graduating with the class of 1895 and the degree of Bachelor of Laws. In the same year he began the practice of his profession in Dallas, and has continued with uninterrupted success in that city to the present time. His interests and work have kept him in a restricted field, and it is as a civil lawyer that he is best known to the Dallas bar. Since 1902 Mr. Haynes has represented the Louisville & Nashville railroad in all that company's litigation in Texas, but aside from this has been identified with little corporation practice.

In April, 1914, Mr. Haynes was elected a member of the board of education of Dallas, and is now a member of that important municipal body. That is the only public service he has rendered through a formal office. Mr. Haynes is a member of the Central Presbyterian church of Dallas. His wife, who he married in Dallas, was Miss Etta Lucas, daughter of Alfred K. and Mary A. (Cole) Lucas, a pioneer Dallas county family. The old Lucas home is directly north of the present city on the Cedar Springs road, and is one of the noteworthy landmarks in the vicinity. Mr. and Mrs. Haynes have a daughter, Mary Alice Haynes.

JAMES H. GILLESPIE. A Dallas merchant whose career has identified him with that city for more than twenty-five years, James H. Gillespie is perhaps best known for his work in the educational field, and as former superintendent for the State School for the Blind. He has had much experience in the detailed administrative duties of public office, and is one of the best known men in Dallas county.

James H. Gillespie was born at Lebanon, Wilson county, Tennessee, in 1859. His parents were Rev. William Paxton and Mickie (Lester) Gillespie. His mother was born in Wilson county, Tennessee, and died in Ellis county, Texas. His father, a noted educator in Texas and a minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian church, was born in Blount county Tennessee, and graduated from Cumberland University at Lebanon in the class of 1857. Entering the work of the Cumberland Presbyterian church, he held charges in Tennessee and North Arkansas until 1865, and having during the previous year made his first excursion into Texas, then brought his family and became permanently identified with this state. The family first stopped in Fannin county near Bonham for about a year, lived three years in Ellis county, and then moved to Tehuacana in Limestone county. At the old seat of Trinity University Rev. William P. Gillespie was professor of Latin and Greek for about twenty years. Nearly all his later years were spent in Limestone county, and he died while on a visit to his daughter in Dallas in 1905. Rev. William P. Gillespie's mother, whose maiden name was Kilburn, was a second cousin to General Sam Houston.

The residence of the family at Tehuacana and the presence of his father as a member of the faculty of old Trinity University made it natural that James H. Gillespie should acquire his higher education in that institution. He also attended business college at the Eastman's Business College at Poughkeepsie, New York. Mr. Gillespie was following the example of his father when he took up teaching, and began his work in that profession at Dallas in 1887. Educational activities engaged him until 1900. His home has been at Dallas since 1887 with the exception of the period during which he lived at Austin. Mr. Gillespie was auditor of tax collectors' accounts in the State Comptroller's office at Austin from 1901 to 1910, and during 1910-11, for one year, toward the close of Governor Campbell's administration, he served as superintendent of the State School for the Blind at Austin. His public services at the state capital finished he returned to Dallas in 1911, and engaged in the hardware business under the name of the Oak Cliff Hardware Company at 614 East Tenth street in Oak Cliff. Mr. Gillespie's work as an educator, business man, and his popularity as a citizen has helped to make his name well known in Dallas county, and at this writing he is candidate for the office of tax collector. His special fitness for this office is generally recognized because of his general business experience and particularly his experience as auditor of tax collectors' accounts in the department at the state capital.

Mr. Gillespie married Miss Virginia Hefner of Colorado county, Texas. Their seven children are: Mrs. Eula Dixon Rumpel, Mrs. Mabel Kate Puff, Mrs. Carrie Virginia Mullins, Earl Hefner Gillespie, Mrs. Gladys Rochelle LeGear, Mrs. Jimmie Groseclose, and Miss Willie Agnes Gillespie.

ALEXANDER GORDON FRENCH. The editor and publisher of the Marfa New Era has had a long and varied experience in business affairs and in newspaper life, most of it passed in Texas, and is one of the best known members of his profession in the state. The New Era is a modern newspaper which presents to its large reading circulation a digest of all the noteworthy happenings in Presidio county of west Texas, and has also been a forcible organ of opinion and a first class medium for advertisers.

Alexander Gordon French was born in England, February 23, 1851, and was reared in the city of London. He belonged to one of the prosperous families of England and was given liberal advantages first in a boarding school and subsequently in the London University, where he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Arts at the age of nineteen. He then entered commercial life in London, advanced to a successful position and on leaving his native country for the United States was a member of the London Stock Exchange. When about twenty-one years of age Mr. French came to the United States and spent two or three years as a weigh-master in the iron and ore industry in New Jersey. In 1874 he came to Texas and has been a resident here ever since. For about twenty years he had his home at Austin, and was principally identified with the newspaper business while there, serving at one time as correspondent for the London Times. Among the newspaper undertakings of former years which is still well remembered is the Austin Sifter, which was established by Mr. French. He was also for about a year interested in a mercantile enterprise in the old town of Indianola, Texas, but soon returned to the newspaper business. In 1905, having sold out his interests in Austin, he came out to Marfa, and became managing editor of the New Era. Two years later he severed this connection and went to Del Rio, where, in partnership with H. W. Schutze, he established the West Texas News, now a well known journal which was conducted under his management for four years. At the end of that time he returned to Marfa, and in partnership with George W. Mecklin bought the Marfa New Era and has been manager and editor of this bright and newsy sheet to the present time. The mechanical equipment of the New Era office is very complete and the firm does a large business in job printing. At London, England, in 1870, Mr. French married Miss Mary Weatherhead, a daughter of Governor John Weatherhead, of Holloway, London. Mrs. French died in 1884 at the age of thirty, and is buried in her old home at High Gate Cemetery, in North London. She was a very devout Christian and an active member in the English church. The three children, one son and two daughters, are all deceased. In Marfa, Mr. French is affiliated with the Methodist church. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and takes an active interest in Democratic politics. Among the sports he is especially fond of baseball and cricket.

ERWIN T. BACKUS. Some illustration of the remarkable growth, extent and organization of the automobile industry is found in the Dallas plant of the Ford Automobile Company. As everyone knows, the Ford machine is manufactured in the great automobile center of Detroit, where the Ford Automobile Works is one of the chief factors in a great industrial city. But the distribution of the machines to a world-wide market is a great business in itself. Instead of sending the cars complete to the various distributing points, it has been found more profitable to ship the parts, "knock down," thus saving large amounts in freight charges through decrease in bulk and also added convenience of handling. In a number of cities outside of Detroit are located large and imposing factories and warehouses, at which no manufacturing of original parts of machinery is done, but which are devoted entirely to the assembling of the various types of the Ford machine.

Such a plant was completed at Dallas in the summer of 1914, and is located at the corner of Williams and Henry streets. It is strictly an assembling plant, to which the parts are sent from Detroit and made into complete automobiles. This Dallas plant is designed to supply the Ford machines over the larger part of Texas and a portion of Oklahoma. The Dallas plant is a beautiful building of modern style of industrial architecture, and a greatly appreciated addition to the industrial life of Dallas, since three hundred and fifty or four hundred men are employed in the various departments of the works. The building is four stories high with basement, on a foundation 208x125 feet, and the construction is of reinforced concrete throughout. This plant was made necessary on account of the growing business of the company in the southwest, built up largely through the energetic and aggressive salesmanship of the southwestern manager for the Ford interests, Mr. Erwin T. Backus.

A Gordon French

Erwin T. Backus is a Detroit man, born in that city 1884, a son of T. L. and Ann Louisa (Geist) Backus, both natives of Detroit. The family were pioneers of that city, and for a long course of time have been prominently identified with its commercial affairs. Mr. Backus' father is a partner in the Richmond-Backus company, manufacturers of blank books, bank stationery, etc., a well known house that was established in Detroit in 1848.

Mr. Backus was educated in the grammar and high schools of Detroit, was a student in Cornell University and also the University of Michigan, and graduated from the latter in 1906 as a mechanical engineer with a degree of mechanical engineer. His experience was then brought into practical employment with the Pierce-Cleary Company of Buffalo. Returning to Detroit, he entered the selling end of the automobile business, and there became associated with the Ford Automobile Company. In 1909 that company sent him to Texas as its southwestern manager, with headquarters in Dallas. His splendid ability and thorough knowledge of the automobile trade enabled him to extend and organize a business in the southwest that is in keeping with the national and international scope of the great Ford company.

Mr. Backus is a member of the Dallas Chamber of Commerce, of the Dallas Automobile Club, and active in civic affairs. He was married in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, to Miss Hazel Cushing of that city.

MENTER BRADLEY TERRILL, A. B., A. M. It is seldom that the qualities which make for success in the field of educational work and those which give men prominence in the world of business are found combined in one individual, but in the case of Menter Bradley Terrill, of Dallas, it would seem that Nature has been kind and generous in her gifts. As owner and head master of the Terrill School for Boys, he is noted as an educator, while his unusual capacity for business has enabled him, from a beginning of borrowed capital, to acquire the foundation of a substantial fortune and to have a school that in commercial rating and financial resources ranks with the best business houses. His school has acquired the reputation as an institution conducted on the best business principles and enjoying the confidence of the best business men. His success as a financier has justly drawn to him the friendship and confidence of leading bankers and captains of industry in Dallas and throughout Texas.

Professor Terrill was born at Moberly, Missouri, in 1867, his parents being James W. and Bettie (Bradley) Terrill, the latter deceased, and the former now living at San Angelo, Texas. The father, like the son, is a noted educator, but is now retired from active life. James W. Terrill, A. M., was also born at Moberly, Missouri, where his father, Rev. Benjamin Terrill, a Baptist minister and native of Kentucky, was one of the earliest settlers, the family originally coming from Virginia. James W. Terrill was born in 1837, and was educated at William Jewell College, Liberty, Missouri, where he graduated prior to the Civil war. Before the outbreak of hostilities he came to Tarrant county, Texas, where, early in 1861, he organized and was elected captain of Company E, Fifteenth Texas Infantry. The remainder of the family, who had located near Grapevine, in Tarrant county, returned to their home in Missouri after the war commenced and did not return to Texas. James W. Terrill with his company and regiment joined Gen. Pat Cleburne's division and saw service throughout the great campaigns which were waged about Chattanooga, Atlanta and Nashville, and after the battle of Atlanta, and while commanding his company at the battle of Jonesboro, he received three severe bullet wounds, one in the leg, one in the head and one in the left lung, the two latter being sufficient to kill the ordinary man. His left lung was entirely shot away by a minie ball.

and the surgeon pronounced him fatally wounded. He has all his life been a man of extraordinarily strong vigor, both physically and mentally, and remains so to this day. After the war he became an educator, and so continued for a long period of years. He became president of Mount Pleasant College, Huntsville, Missouri, and as such built up a fine school there, and later, removing to Tennessee, became the founder and president of Winchester Normal school, located in the town of that name. This he conducted successfully for a number of years. Both in his school at Winchester and in Missouri he received and educated a large number of pupils from Texas, many of whom have since become prominent in the state. In 1907 he retired from educational work, and, wishing to be in the same state as his son, moved to San Angelo, Texas where he now resides.

Menter Bradley Terrill was seven years old when his father removed from Missouri to Winchester, Tennessee, and in that town grew up and received instruction under his father in the Winchester Normal. He also became a teacher under the elder man, and, in addition, taught privately at other places, and in various public schools in Tennessee, Alabama and Georgia. He finished his academic course in his father's school, and following this organized the first system of graded schools in that town, but left Winchester in 1894 and located at Denton, Texas, where he took charge as president of the North Texas Normal College. It is a part of the history of education in Texas that Professor Terrill built up and made this fine school. The original college building was owned by the city of Denton, and under a contract with the city council Professor Terrill conducted the school as his own private enterprise. Starting with less than forty pupils, at the end of his seventh year he had over 600. In the year 1899, through legislation at Austin, the school was taken over by the state, but as the appropriation for its maintenance was not made until two years later, Professor Terrill continued as president and owner of the college until the close of the school year in 1901. It then became a state institution and as such has since continued.

Selling out all his interests at Denton, Professor Terrill decided to equip himself more thoroughly for his life work, and accordingly, in the fall of 1901, entered Yale University, and there received the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1903. He was the valedictorian of his class, being the first man in the history of that noted institution with less than the regular four years' work to be so honored. He spent three years in Yale, two years as an undergraduate and one year as a graduate, and in 1906 the University conferred upon him the degree of Master of Arts. At Yale Professor Terrill made a notable record, being awarded a fellowship under the Scott Hurt foundation, and receiving numerous other signal honors. In fact he was an honor student throughout his career at Yale. He specialized and made an exceptional record in economics, and was awarded the medal of the Richard Cobden Club of London for showing the highest proficiency in economics at Yale, and was offered attractive inducements by the authorities at Yale to remain as assistant instructor in that branch.

In 1906 Professor Terrill located at Dallas and founded the Terrill School for Boys. He purchased as a home for the school the property at the northwest corner of Swiss avenue and North Peak street, a very fine location, in the heart of the best residence district. Beginning with only one building, he has gradually increased the capacity until he now has a group of five buildings, while the entire equipment is of the finest and most modern character. He employs a faculty of eleven teachers, all of whom are A. B.'s from leading universities, and several A. M.'s and the attendance has gradually increased from year to year, the number during the term of 1913-14 being 200, of whom sixty were boarding pupils. It is a preparatory school of the highest class, and its graduates are admitted on Professor Terrill's certificates to the great universities without examination, his boys being represented as students in such institutions as Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Cornell, Dartmouth, Lehigh, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and many others. His students come from the very best families in Texas and the Southwest, the roster showing the family names of many of the state's most distinguished citizens.

A short history of the school and its advantages as taken from its pamphlet, is here given: The Terrill School was established by the present Head Master in September, 1906, in response to a demand in North Texas for a preparatory school for boys that would combine sound scholarship with proper physical and moral training. The attendance is limited to 200, sixty of whom are resident pupils. Each year for six years the demand for membership in the school has exceeded by a considerable margin the capacity of the plant. This has enabled Professor Terrill to select to a large extent the boarding patronage and to eliminate quickly such undesirable boys as may happen to come among its number. Pupils are accepted only by contract for the entire year, and this assures to each patron an ability on the part of the school to employ men as instructors who possess strong personalities, sound scholarship, and much experience and tact in dealing with boys. It also insures to the school independence sufficient to maintain high standards of conduct and scholarship. Perhaps the chief care of the Head Master has been to develop in his boys a rugged honesty in all matters, great and small, and to cultivate those feelings and principles which lead a boy to believe in himself, in the possibilities of his own powers, and thus beget in him an ambition to live nobly and do the great work of a man in this world of great men. The conditions, in a school of the highest standard, must be such as will bring a boy at once and regularly face to face with hard work, and yet throw about him such influences as will be most helpful toward inspiring him to a faithful discharge of his duties. That school reaches the highest degree of efficiency which so trains its pupils as to place them in a right relation to the social and moral demands upon them, and which develops in them the great powers for continuous, hard work. "Perhaps the most valuable result of all education is the ability to make yourself do the thing you have to do, when it ought to be done, as it ought to be done, whether you like to do it or not."

Three adjoining residences comprise the school home. These buildings are heated by hot water and gas systems; are lighted by electricity; the plumbing and toilet conveniences are modern, and the interior finish and furnishing are such as should characterize a home of simple refinement. Each boy has a separate bed, together with wardrobe and chiffonier accommodations. These rooms are not fitted up for study—as no boy is expected or allowed to study in his bed room. Special rooms are arranged for study and all boys are required to report there and work under the supervision of teachers. This plan insures that any boy may have needed assistance in preparation of lessons and that he does not idle his time in conversation. Such a plan also furnishes inspiration and strength to a boy to do his own work regularly and thoughtfully, for a body of boys at study has a strong, compelling influence on the individual boy.

A greatly deserved tribute should be paid to Mrs. Terrill, as she, equally with her husband, has been instrumental in building up this institution. She is Ada (Thurman) Terrill, a native of McMinnville, Tennessee, and is a graduate of the Winchester Normal, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, under her husband's father. Before her marriage to Professor Terrill she was principal of the high school at McMinnville, and in the Terrill School is teacher of English.

JOHN F. WEEKS. A successful member of the El Paso bar since 1911, Mr. Weeks began practice as a lawyer in Texas twenty years ago, and has been successfully identified with his profession and with the largest political life of the state throughout these years. For a number of years he was a prominent railroad attorney, and in politics has done much campaign work and has been associated with the leading men in the public life of the state.

John F. Weeks was born in Robeards parish, Louisiana, October 21, 1866, a son of Dr. James A. and Martha (Jones) Weeks. His father, a native of Georgia, moved to Louisiana in early life, and became very prominent both in his profession and in public affairs in that state. Before the Civil war he represented his district in the state senate, and during the war gained distinction as a regimental soldier of the Confederate army under Colonel Sweat. In 1876 he moved to Angelina county, Texas, where he continued active in his professional service up to his death in 1893, when he was eighty-five years of age. The mother, a native of North Carolina, represented a well-known old family, and was a relative of the well-known old evangelist Sam Jones, being a cousin of that noted religious revivalist. Her death occurred at Lufkin in Angelina county, Texas, in 1888, at the age of sixty-five. There were five sons and two daughters in the family, John F. being the youngest. The others are Wiley Weeks, a rancher and stockman of Angelina county; James A., of Angelina county; C. W. Weeks, of Angelina county; B. A. Weeks, of Angelina county; Mary Mitchell, wife of one of the pioneer settlers of Texas, and a resident of Nacogdoches.

Mr. Weeks attained his early schooling in Texas for the most part and in 1886 was graduated from the East Texas College. His reading in law was begun and continued under Col. H. G. Lane, at Homer, in Angelina county, and he was admitted to the bar in July, 1888. He began his practice at Lufkin, in Angelina county, and was soon identified with railroad practice, moving in 1892 to Jacksonville, Texas, where he was local attorney for the Cotton Belt Railroad for ten years. He then moved to Palestine and was railroad counsel for the International & Great Northern, and remained in that city until 1911, at which date he came out to El Paso and formed a partnership with Col. M. W. Stanton.

In 1910 Mr. Weeks served as special district judge at Palestine. He took a very important part in the campaign of Governor Campbell for the Democratic nomination a few years ago, and he also stumped the state for Senator Bailey during his campaign for election as delegate-at-large to the National convention. During the last presidential campaign, he was a delegate-at-large from Texas and was one of the few original Wilson men in El Paso. Mr. Weeks is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World, and he and his family worship in the Methodist church.

At Lufkin, Texas, September 15, 1889, Mr. Weeks married Mrs. Emma Cupp, daughter of Captain J. B. Cochran, the maiden name of her mother was Martin. The three children of their union, all born in Jacksonville, Texas, were as follows: Miss Annie, born in 1893, and a graduate of the Harrison College at San Antonio; Miss Mary, born in 1895, now a student in the Southwestern University at Georgetown, Texas, and Henry Grady, born in 1897 and attending Southwestern University at Georgetown. Mr. Weeks finds his recreation chiefly in hunting and fishing. He is a loyal citizen of El Paso, one of the many men who thoroughly believe in the great future of this western industrial city.

WILLIAM HENRY VIRGIL HARRIS. Now manager of the promotion department for the Dallas News and affiliated journals, William H. V. Harris has had an ve career in business since leaving college, is a native of Dallas county, and his family were among the early settlers of that county.

William H. V. Harris was born near Richardson in Dallas county March 7, 1876, a son of the late Captain William H. and Letitia (Rodgers) Harris. His mother still living, and his father died in Dallas in 1911. The Harris family had its first American ancestor in 1711. William Harris, the great-grandfather of William H. V. Harris was born in the north of England, married there, and came to America and settled in Virginia. He subsequently became a pioneer in Kentucky, and was one of the first ministers of the Cumberland Presbyterian church in that state, where he died about 1845. Harvey Harris, the grandfather, was born in Kentucky March 25, 1807, and was one of fifteen children, five of whom were Cumberland Presbyterian ministers. He died August 18, 1842, at a comparatively early age, and had been a farmer. He was twice married, and his second wife, Sarah I. T. Jones, was the mother of the late Captain Harris.

Captain William H. Harris, who was born in Simpson, Kentucky, January 1, 1838, grew up on a farm, and in the fall of 1855 at the age of seventeen came to Dallas. He worked as a blacksmith, as a farmer, and as a teamster, and in February, 1862, enlisted in the Confederate army as third lieutenant of Company of the First Texas Squadron. He was soon promoted to first lieutenant and in September, 1862, to rank of Captain. He was with the great cavalry leader John Morgan in all his raids through the south and north, but when Morgan was in Indiana and Ohio Captain Harris had been sent back on special service to Tennessee, and after the capture of General Morgan devolved upon Captain Harris to collect the remnant of his command and he then joined General Joe Wheeler. After the fall of the capital of the Confederacy, he had made arrangements to accompany a body of troops that were to escort President Davis to Mexico, and was with the Confederate president a few days before his capture. Captain Harris surrendered at Mississippi, and reached Dallas after the war in June, 1865. After the war he engaged in cattle speculation, and later settled down to farming at Richardson in Dallas county. Before the railroad came to Dallas he was engaged in freighting for a time, but his chief success came as a cotton raiser and general farmer near Richardson in Dallas county. About twenty years ago he left the county and lived at McGregor a few years, then went to Palestine, and for about fifteen years was engaged in the hotel business, and finally returned to Dallas, where he died. Captain Harris was one of the most prominent leaders in the Grange movement in north Texas. When the Grange was organized in September, 1873, he was elected master, and was also an officer of the Texas State Grange for eight years. At one time he was superintendent of the Texas State Grange Fair. He was a very active member also of the Odd Fellows. He and all his family were active members of the Cumberland Presbyterian church. Captain Harris was first married March 5, 1867, to Miss Prudence E. Baird, who died August 12, 1869. On October 7, 1874, he married Miss Harriette L. Rodgers, and of that union William H. V. Harris is the only child.

Mr. Harris' early life was spent in Richardson, where he lived for ten years at McGregor and attended school, graduating from the high school of that city in 1893, and later entered Trinity University at Tehuacana, from which he graduated in the class of 1898 as valedictorian and with the degree A. B. Since then all his business activities and his home have been at Dallas. He was for a time in the general offices of the Cotton Belt railroad at Tyler, Texas; for eight years was in the collection department, over a considerable area, for the International Harvester Company, and then for six years was cashier of the Citizens' State Bank of Richardson. In 1911 Mr. Harris became connected with the Dallas News, and is now manager of the promotion department for the News, the Semi-Weekly Farm News and the Dallas Evening Journal.

Mr. Harris married Miss Daisy Fancher, daughter of Judge R. F. Fancher of Groesbeck, who was one of the first graduates of old Trinity University. Mr. and Mrs. Harris, who reside at Oak Cliff, have one child, Katharine Harris, born in June, 1904. She has become famous as the subject of a portrait by the noted artist, Walter Russell, who is an author, illustrator, and a recognized authority on child beauty, having at one time painted a series of child portraits for the Ladies' Home Journal. Mr. Russell when he first saw Katharine Harris pronounced her as one of the two most beautiful children he had ever seen, and obtained permission to paint the portrait, which is now regarded as probably the masterpiece of the artist, and the picture has been accepted by the Dallas Art Association and is hung in the Art Gallery at the State Fair Grounds among its permanent pictures, and has also been reproduced in color by a large New York lithographing concern.

J. H. BOOTH. A comparatively young man in the business affairs of Texas, representing an old family of this state. J. H. Booth is at the head of one of Dallas' distinctive business concerns and is a progressive leader in the affairs of that city. Mr. Booth is president of the Inter-State Forwarding Company, operating a general storage and United States bonded warehouse.

J. H. Booth was born near Gilmer, Upshur county, Texas, in 1876, a son of J. R. L. and Frances (Brown) Booth, both of whom are now deceased. His father, a native of Virginia, lived a few years in Georgia and from the latter state emigrated to Texas in 1851, becoming a pioneer in what is now Upshur county. He took the valiant part of a soldier during the war between the states in the Confederate army, and lived in Upshur county until 1888, when with his family he moved to Tyler. His father was James Robert Booth of Virginia, and this branch belongs to the famous family of that name of which the actor Booth was a member. They are of English origin. Three brothers of J. R. L. Booth were also in the Confederate army and two of them were killed in battle. Frances (Brown) Booth belonged to still earlier pioneer stock in Texas. She was a native of this state, and her father, William Brown, came with his parents to Texas, then a part of Mexico, in 1831, and settled in what is now Gregg county, East Texas, in what was the Nacogdoches district during the days of the Texas Republic. William Brown, who was one of the prominent characters in the affairs of the Texas Republic, saw service in both the war with Mexico and in the Confederate army during the war between the states.

Mr. J. H. Booth has lived in Dallas since 1894, and acquired most of his education in Tyler. For several years he was connected with the wholesale trade and other mercantile affairs in the city, and for about four years handled the credits and adjustments for the Studebaker Corporation in its branch business at Dallas. In 1913 Mr. Booth organized the Inter-State Forwarding Company, of which he is president, treasurer and general manager. This company occupies a splendid fireproof warehouse, six stories and basement, steel and concrete construction, at numbers 3200 and 3206 Main street. Built for the company in 1913 this is a building which represents the modern style of commercial architecture, and is absolutely fireproof, not a single piece of wood entering into the construction. The company is the only exclusive merchandise storing and forwarding concern in Dallas, the designated bonded warehouse for the port of Dallas, and is also bonded to the state government, and the warehouse receipts issued by this company are negotiable papers accepted at current value anywhere in the district. The company at present handle about one hundred carloads of freight every month, and also does a large general storage business. It has its own automobile trucks, while railroad tracks deliver cars directly to the doors of the warehouse. Large quantities of the merchandise shipped into Dallas from eastern markets by car load lots are delivered to the Interstate Company, which distributes this merchandise for shipment in less than car load lots and also for local delivery. A prominent feature of the business is the storage of automobiles for the great automobile companies that have branch houses in Dallas. Mr. Booth is also secretary and treasurer of the Interstate Transfer and Warehouse Company, which does a large local freight transfer business, using automobile trucks for this exclusively.

Mr. Booth was married in Dallas to Miss Adrienne Love, who was born in Aberdeen, Mississippi. Her father, W. E. Love, was for twenty-five years mayor of Aberdeen, and belonged to a family that has been leaders in the public life of Mississippi since it became a state. On her mother's side Mrs. Booth is related to the Evans family, equally prominent in Mississippi. To their marriage have been born two children, Hal Booth and Frances Booth.

G. B. STEWART is mayor of one of the most interesting and attractive, as well as one of the most progressive smaller cities of Texas. Mineral Wells is not only a great natural health resort, but owing to the enterprise of its citizens has developed remarkably as a commercial center, and its improvements now rank it far ahead of many older communities. Mr. Stewart has had a long and active experience during forty years, as a farmer and ranchman in different sections of Texas, and a few years ago located at Mineral Wells for his health, having since identified himself actively with the affairs of the municipality.

G. B. Stewart was born February 26, 1852, in Panola county, Mississippi, a son of S. G. and R. P. (Bedford) Stewart. On his father's side he is of Scotch descent, and English through his mother. There were large families of the name in Virginia, where the Stewarts first settled, and also in South Carolina. Most of the ancestors were slaveholders and planters before the war. S. G. Stewart, the father, was born in South Carolina, while his wife was a native of Bourbon county, Kentucky. They moved to Texas in 1874, first settled in Grayson county, where the father followed his business as a farmer. During the war he lived in Mississippi, had been a planter there, and enlisted in the Confederate army, but was discharged on account of poor health before the close of the war. There were eight children, five sons and three daughters, five of whom are now living.

Mayor Stewart, the youngest in the family, was educated in the common schools of Mississippi, and part of his boyhood was spent during the troublesome period of the Civil war. His first regular work was as clerk in a boot and shoe store at Memphis, Tennessee. In 1874 he came to Texas with the rest of the family, and for several years superintended his father's farm in Grayson county. In 1881 his interests were transferred to Western Texas, and for a number of years Mr. Stewart was well known as one of the leading stock men in Knox county. At the same time the general mercantile store was conducted at Benjamin under his name and management. Finally selling all his interests, owing to poor health, he located in Mineral Wells in 1907. In 1909 he was elected mayor of the city and has held that office with credit to himself and with service to the community down to the present time. During his term as mayor the population of Mineral Wells was increased from six thousand to about eight thousand, and other improvements have been even greater. The class of buildings, both for business and residence, has materially improved, and the streets and other municipal conveniences are being rapidly brought up to the highest standards. Since he became mayor the G. T. and W. Railway has come into the town, giving additional transportation facilities. The wealth of the city has increased at least twenty per cent. during the past three years.

The mayor has always been a staunch Democrat, and has both voted and worked for the good of the party. His fraternal affiliations are with the Knights of Pythias, and with the Woodmen of the World. He is a director of the Commercial Club of Mineral Wells, and is an elder in the Christian church.

In Grayson county, Texas, December 21, 1876, was celebrated his marriage to Miss Anna E. Bedford, a daughter of A. and Rachael Bedford, who came from Kentucky, her father being a stockman, and was with the Confederate army in the commissary department, and also as a mechanic. Mrs. Stewart's father died in 1908, and her mother in 1907. Three children have been born to their marriage, one son and two daughters. A. B. Stewart is now thirty-one years of age, is married and living at Overton, Texas, where he is farming. Miss Rachael is twenty-seven years of age, and lives at home with her parents, as does Miss Ruth, aged twenty-one. Mr. Stewart is an enthusiast about the advantages and facilities of Mineral Wells as a great health and commercial city. Its high altitude, its unexcelled waters, its good schools and churches, and the high quality of its citizenship are all fundamental things in the development of a thriving city.

HENRY PEYTON HOWARD, M. D. While the moderate character of the man was such as to disclaim all distinctions and avoid the publicity courted by lesser men, the late Dr. Hal Howard lived a life of such kindly service and broad capacity in affairs that few Texans have better claim to the recognition of published biography. His own active career covered practically the entire period of Texas statehood, and he was of a distinguished military family and one of his older brothers was the famous Major Tom Howard, who held official rank in the army of the Texas Republic and was one of the leaders in the celebrated Santa Fe expedition.

Henry Peyton Howard was born May 29, 1829, in Washington, D. C., and died at Dallas in November, 1913. His parents were Thomas and Nancy (Bean) Howard, both members of old Washington families. The Howards particularly have been intimately associated with Washington City since the District of Columbia was set aside and Washington established as the National Capital. The city itself in fact is located partly upon land originally the Maryland plantation of Dr. Howard's grandfather, and the old Howard home, a short distance below Washington, is still standing and owned by members of the Howard name. Dr. Howard's father, Thomas Howard, was one of the first residents of Washington and was one of the first clerks of the United States supreme court, a position he occupied for several years. The Howard family settled in Maryland during the colonial era, and the maternal grandmother of Dr. Howard was of the famous Berry family of Virginia.

Dr. Hal Howard first came to Texas a mere youth from his Washington home in 1846, carrying dispatches from the war department at Washington to General Wool, who commanded a division of the American forces in the war against Mexico. The young man went on through Texas and Mexico, joining General Wool, and was present at the decisive bat-of Buena Vista. When the war closed he returned to Washington, entered as a medical student the Columbian (afterwards the George Washington) University, and remained until graduating M. D. in the class of 1851. In that year he returned to Texas and took practice at San Antonio, a city that remained his home until 1895, when he moved to Dallas and lived there until his recent death.

Before considering some of the more important details of Dr. Howard's own career, mention should be made of his three brothers, Thomas, John and C. W. Howard, who also were early settlers in Texas, and took prominent part in its early history. John Howard was a captain in the regular United States army before the war, and C. W. Howard was also an army officer. While the men of the name have gained distinction in the professions and in business affairs, the Howards have been from early days pre-eminently a military family. Besides those of the male line who were officers, nearly all of the female descendants married army officers in Washington. The most notable character as well as one of the strongest of the family was Dr. Howard's oldest brother, Major Tom Howard, whose life and adventures would fill a volume and were to a notable degree identified with the history of the early Texas Republic. Tom Howard came to Texas in 1836 during its struggle for independence from Mexico, and, like his brother who came later, bore messages from Washington to General Sam Houston. He found Houston on the day of the battle of San Jacinto. Houston later made him a captain in the army of the Republic, and in still later years he was advanced to the rank of Major. His name is one of the most prominently mentioned in the history of the ill-fated expedition of 1839, and the historian Kendall gives him a prominent part in his narrative of that expedition. While serving with the army of Houston he was shot by an Indian arrow, and his head remained in his body for a long time before he could obtain the services of a surgeon. Not long after the establishment of Texas independence he took up his residence at San Antonio, was a prominent citizen there for forty years, and in his time was identified with every important business and municipal enterprise in that historic city. On resigning from the army of the Republic he engaged in the wholesale grocery trade, enjoyed a great success and founded a fortune. When Texas became a state his firm handled supplies for the Department of Texas, U. S. Army; these supplies they hauled from Gulf ports to San Antonio, and at times seven hundred ox carts were employed in this transportation. Major Tom Howard was the founder of the San Antonio waterworks, and no one of those who started the San Antonio gas works. Of his earlier military experience it should be said that he was a scout under General Taylor in the war against Mexico. At San Antonio after the Mexican war became one of the important military posts of the United States in the southwest, and on account of his own prominent army associations, Major Howard was especially prominent in the social activities that have always been influenced by the presence of army officers in San Antonio. The old Howard home still standing in San Antonio is one of the historic structures of that interesting city. It is situated on South Alamo street at the corner of Market street. It was built in 1850-51 by Carl N. Riotte, a self-exiled Prussian nobleman, and was designed and constructed by a civil engineer and architect named Mielepappe, who afterwards was mayor of San Antonio in the reconstruction period. The house is of two stories, of stone and lumber construction. About the middle of the '50s Riotte sold this house to Major Tom Howard, who with his family lived in it until his death. It was the scene of many brilliant social functions of the ante-bellum days, and many notable characters were its guests. One of these was General Robert E. Lee, who was then lieutenant colonel of cavalry in the United States army, and it was in the Howard house that General Lee penned his resignation from the United States army. Other famous military commanders of the South who were at different times guests of the Howard family were Albert Sidney Johnston, Joseph E. Johnston, both of the McCullochs, and General Van Dorn.

All of the Howards espoused the cause of the Confederacy in the war between the states. Dr. Hal P. Howard held the position of medical purveyor for the Department of Texas during the war, his duties being largely in the nature of procuring medical and food supplies for the army. Although for many years a practicing physician, he was in reality more of a business than a professional man, and business affairs seemed to appeal to him more strongly than the career of physician. He finally took an interest in the wholesale grocery firm founded by Major Tom Howard, and was one of the principal factors in its management until the business was discontinued. For four years during the first administration of Grover Cleveland he served as postmaster of San Antonio. Few men have so large an acquaintance with prominent people, and his own was a conspicuous part in Texas affairs from the stirring events of its pioneer days until the great era of modern development was well under way. In manner he was distinguished by the true courtesy of the heart, by all the inward graces of the Southern gentleman, and possessed and exercised a tender sympathy for his fellow-man. As already intimated, he disliked show and ostentation and shrank from all publicity. His career was marked by most exacting business demands, and it was with a splendid ability that he discharged them all. His acumen and skill in the transaction of business affairs were widely known. His administration of the colossal Bean estate in Fannin county developed the fact that he had hardly a superior in great business capacity. However, he was never in any sense of the term a grind at business. He loved books, was a student of good literature, a constant reader of newspapers and current periodicals, and much above the average man was generally and fully informed on every phase of endeavor and of local and national history. Dr. Howard's marriage at San Antonio before the war was one of the notable social events of that city, and among the guests was Colonel Robert E. Lee, afterwards the great leader of the Confederacy. His bride was Miss Lee Weir, daughter of James Weir, a pioneer of Texas and of Irish stock. Mrs. Howard is still living at Dallas, and her five children are: Miss Frances Howard; Mrs. Mary B. Hendricks; Hal L. Howard; Camilla, wife of W. H. Boykin; and Dr. W. E. Howard.

Dr. William E. Howard, son of the late Dr. Hal Howard, has for some years been one of the prominent specialists in the medical fraternity at Dallas. He was born and reared in San Antonio, graduated from the medical department of the University of Texas at Galveston in the class of 1897, and has had his home in Dallas since 1903. He is best known in the profession as a specialist in diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat, and in this department of medicine and surgery has few equals in the southwest. It has been his custom for a number of years for part of the time in each second year to take post graduate work along the lines of his specialty in New York city.

REV. HENRY ALFORD PORTER, D. D. One of the most distinguished ministers in the south, Dr. Porter is now a resident of Texas and at the head of the Gaston Avenue Baptist church of Dallas. In his own denomination Dr. Porter's name is probably everywhere recognized on account of his remarkable success as a church organizer, his brilliant intellect and forceful influence in the cause of religion. His career as a minister, covering about twenty years, began in the province of Nova Scotia, and for the past ten years he has been connected with several of the largest Baptist churches in the South.

Henry Alford Porter was born at Fredericton, New Brunswick, November 15, 1871. He comes of a family of ministers. Both his grandfather and father bore the name Theodore Harding Porter, and were both ministers. The Porters are of Irish stock, and Dr. Porter's mother, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Estabrook, was of Dutch descent.

Dr. Porter was reared and educated at Fredericton, and was graduated B. A. in 1894 from McMaster University at Toronto. He graduated from the Rochester Theological Seminary of Rochester, N. Y., in 1899, and in 1905 was awarded the degree Doctor of Divinity by Central University of Iowa. His first pastorate was in the Baptist church of Bridgewater, Nova Scotia, during 1895-96, followed by a pastorate at Kentville in the same province, in 1896-97. From 1899 to 1904 Dr. Porter was pastor of the First Baptist church of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and since then his work has identified him with the South. From 1904 to 1907 he had charge of the First Baptist church of Oklahoma City, then was pastor of the Walnut Street (First) Baptist church at Louisville, Kentucky, from 1907 to 1913. His work at Louisville as elsewhere was one of splendid success, and so well satisfied was Dr. Porter with his situation there that it required negotiations and efforts continuing for six months before he finally consented to leave Louisville and accept the pastorate of the Gaston Avenue church in Dallas. His duties as pastor in Dallas began on September 14, 1913.

During his work in Oklahoma City his congregation built the White Temple, one of the large church edifices of the United States and one of the finest examples of pure Doric architecture on the western continent. The Walnut Street Baptist church of Louisville is one of the largest and most influential churches in the south, and in the six years he was in charge over fifteen hundred members were added to the church. His resignation and departure from Louisville brought many tributes to his remarkable ability as a preacher and as a church organizer. To quote just one, from an article in the Louisville Courier-Journal, "Dr. Porter is a profound thinker, a forceful and eloquent speaker, and a great leader."

Dr. Porter has been pastor of the Gaston Avenue Baptist church less than a year. In that time its membership has more than doubled, and no other Baptist church in the entire South has so rapid a growth in the same time. The present church edifice was erected only ten years ago and is still regarded as one of the handsomest church structures in Dallas. Its accommodations were ample until Dr. Porter began his pastorate, and since then the auditorium has never been large enough to seat the congregation and all departments of the church work have been stimulated to a practical activity which makes the service of the Gaston Avenue church one of splendid value to the cause of religion and benevolence throughout the city. Under the leadership of Dr. Porter there has recently been undertaken a plan to erect the finest church in the South, one sufficient to accommodate the needs of the greatly increased membership, and it is proposed that the cost of the new building shall be hardly less than a quarter of a million dollars. Dr. Porter has for his leading members in the church a notable group of strong, vigorous young men who in business and in character and wealth rank among the foremost citizens of Dallas, and it is a fine tribute to his forceful personality and leadership that he has been able to unite these citizens and church members in a plan of religious work which will bring untold benefit not only to the congregation but to the entire community.

Dr. Porter was married in May 1899, to Miss Elizabeth M. Brethour of Tillsonburg, Ontario.

JIRAH J. PEARCE, D. O. No school or branch of medical practice has made more progress in popularity and in successful achievement during the past century than that of osteopathy. Originating about twenty years ago as a distinct school, its practices have since spread over the Union, and in fact throughout the world, and enjoys all the prestiges accorded to the older schools of medicine. The leading representative of osteopathy in the city of El Paso is Dr. Jirah J. Pearce, who has resided in this city for the past seven or eight years, and enjoys a large practice.

Dr. Pearce was born November 23, 1875, at Kirksville, Missouri, which is really the original center and mecca of osteopathy in America. The parents of Dr. Pearce were Isaac D. and Adaline K. Pearce. Jirah J. Pearce was reared in Missouri until about seventeen years of age, and up to that time had obtained his education in the public schools at Kirksville. At that time the family came west and located in Los Angeles, California, where he remained for years, and during that time was a student in the Normal and high school, and also studied for his profession in the Pacific School of Osteopathy. Graduating there in 1898, he then moved to Sacramento, where he established his office and practiced successfully for one year. During the succeeding six years he was in San Francisco, and while there occupied the chairs of anatomy and the chairs of physiology in the California College of Osteopathy. Beginning in San Francisco in 1902, he has since been active in original research work.

Dr. Pearce has been from the beginning an ardent student in all its branches, and in every community where he has practiced has stood as an authority, not only in his own special schools, but in general medicine. In 1905 he located at El Paso, and has enjoyed a continuously increasing patronage from that time until the present. He has a beautiful suite of offices in the Mills Building, one of the fine office buildings of this city. In Sacramento, California, the doctor married on June 6, 1901, Miss Lillian Merrihew a daughter of Rufus Merrihew of Albany, New York. They are the parents of one child, Merrihew Pearce. The church attended by Dr. Pearce and family is the Episcopal. He has membership in the El Paso County Osteopathic Association and was president of this association in 1910-11-12. In politics he is a Democrat, though never taking an active part in party affairs. He is fond of the great sport of baseball, and when the duties of his profession allow it he takes part in all the wholesome diversions and amusements of social life. He has chosen El Paso as his permanent home and is a firm believer in the greatness of this state and especially the beauty and opportunity of his home city. Dr. Pearce is a highly educated gentleman and has actually brought distinction upon his profession through his success and high personal character. He is a member of both the American Osteopathic Association and the Texas Osteopathic Association. Mrs. Pearce, his wife, is a beautiful singer and participates in the musical life of El Paso; thus she and her husband are prominent in social circles here.

LOUIS S. REINHARDT. Thirty-five years of continuous business relations and of strictest fidelity to the interests of the many companies represented and individual patrons have made the firm of I. Reinhardt & Son the largest general insurance business south of St. Louis. Starting as a local agency in Dallas in 1888, the business has been built to its present magnitude on principles of the most thorough integrity toward the public. As the insuring of fire and other risks is based largely upon confidence reposed in the agents, it follows that a firm having as large a business as that of I. Reinhardt & Son must possess in an unusual degree the trust and confidence of the insuring public. This in fact constitutes one of the main resources of the Reinhardt enterprise and has been acquired as a result of many years of honorable dealing. Business entrusted to this firm, it has been found, is always attended to promptly and skillfully, and this is only a general expression of the testimony of thousands who have insured their property through this house during the past thirty-five years. When I. Reinhardt came to Dallas in 1888 and offered his services to the public as an insurance agent, his first office was a box-like building only 10x12 feet in dimensions, located on the site of the present North Texas building at 911 Main street, where the firm of I. Reinhardt & Son now have their headquarters. In 1889 I. Reinhardt consolidated his business with the general insurance agency of J. B. Hereford & Company, which was the oldest firm in that line in the city, so that I. Reinhardt & Son logically may claim the distinction of not only the largest, but also the oldest insurance business in Dallas. During the first years of its existence the firm collected premiums to the value of seven thousand dollars, an amount that has since been increased nearly a hundred times, and the aggregate of the firm's business, as represented by yearly premiums, is now the largest in the South. In the general insurance world this firm represents only companies of established ability and financial responsibility, including many of the best known organizations in the world, and its business covers the general field of fire, casualty, liability and accident insurance.

The late I. Reinhardt, the founder of this Dallas enterprise, was born in Bavaria, Germany, in 1839, was brought to America at the age of eleven, and was reared in New Orleans. That city was his home until 1869, when he moved to Vicksburg, Mississippi, and in 1888 came to Dallas. His early experience was entirely in connection with mercantile business, and the remarkable success which attended his efforts in insurance indicates his versatile ability as a business man. Before his death, which occurred in Dallas in 1899, he had established his general insurance agency on a firm footing and left it to be developed on still broader lines by his sons. Mr. I. Reinhardt married Miss Mary Simon of Vicksburg, Mississippi, and she also died in 1899.

The older son, Sidney Reinhardt, and senior member of the present firm of I. Reinhardt & Son, was born in New Orleans, was reared and educated in Vicksburg, and on coming to Dallas in 1888 associated himself with his father. He married Miss Alice Blum, daughter of J. Blum, a prominent merchant of Galveston and for many years at the head of one of the large drug houses of the state. Sidney Reinhardt and wife have three daughters: Alice, Mary and Louise.

Louis S. Reinhardt, who was born in Vicksburg, Mississippi, in 1873, was reared and educated chiefly in Dallas, attending the private school at one time taught by Mrs. C. T. Dickinson and Mrs. M. K. Craig. About the time of his father's death in 1899, he entered the insurance business and has since been actively associated with his brother Sidney.

Though a successful business man and always interested in movements connected with the progress of greater Dallas, Mr. Reinhardt entered upon his first public office in the spring of 1914, when elected a member of the board of education, a position which he is filling with usefulness to the city and with credit to himself. Mr. Reinhardt married Miss Fannie Blum, a sister of his brother's wife. They are the parents of one son, Louis S., Jr., who is now a student in the Terrill School of Dallas, equipping himself for a university course at Princeton, and with the completion of his education it is proposed that he shall enter the Reinhardt insurance firm, making the third generation of the family to participate in this old and substantial house.

HORATIO DURST, JR. The Durst family is among the very oldest and most prominent of the pioneer families of Texas, and its members have been conspicuous for their attainment and service from a time when Texas was still a province of Mexico. In Houston county Horatio Durst, Jr., representing the third generation of the family in this state, is prominent as a civil engineer and surveyor, and is one of the best known men in the county.

Horatio Durst, Jr., was born on the old Durst homestead in Leon county, Texas, January 16, 1876, a son of Horatio and Anna Eliza (Barkley) Durst, the father a native of Texas and the mother of Alabama. The mother came to Texas as a child with her parents in the 'fifties, locating near Centerville in Leon county. There she met and married Horatio Durst, Sr. She was very well educated, since her parents sent her back east to attend better schools than could be found in Texas at that time. The old Durst home, just mentioned, was located along the route of the San Antonio road, the famous trail and highway connecting Mexico with Louisiana, and leading from San Antonio to Nacogdoches. It was established by Grandfather John Durst, who built a stone house on his farm there in 1843. This stone house was famous in the early days, and was constructed as a fortress, designed to withstand the attacks of the Indians and outlaws, and its thick walls were pierced with port-holes for use in times of siege. Grandfather John Durst was a settler at Nacogdoches for a number of years before Texas won its independence from Mexico in 1836. In 1845 he had moved his family from Nacogdoches to the old stone house, at a time when Horatio Durst, Sr., was a baby. Until 1896 the senior Durst made his home in the old stone house.

Grandfather John Durst was a very notable character. He spoke the Spanish language, and was also fluent in the Indian dialect, and did much work as an intermediary in disputes and negotiations between the Indians and Mexicans. He was also acquainted with the German language, and was a man of rare accomplishments. For his services as an interpreter and in various official capacities he was given several very valuable land grants by the Mexican government. During his residence in Nacogdoches county he was elected a representative from the Texas province in a deputation which went to Mexico to present certain matters to the Central government. He made the trip from Nacogdoches over the old San Antonio road, and from the Rio Grande to the city of Mexico by horseback, which was the prevailing method in those days for travel in all this country. He was a contemporary of Stephen Austin and other notables of the Texas province, and was intimately connected with many of the plans and movements which are features in early Texas history. He had a big plantation in east Texas and owned a large number of slaves. His cotton was shipped down the river Trinity to Galveston, and while on one of these trips to market he contracted pneumonia and died in Galveston. His wife, Harriet M. Durst, was also well acquainted with the German, Spanish and Indian languages, as well as with the English, and she lived to be a very old woman. Even in her old age she continued horseback riding, which was her favorite diversion, and she was very accomplished as an equestrienne. She made her home with Horatio Durst, Sr., and practically raised Horatio Durst, Jr., and he recalls riding behind her on horseback when she was an old woman. Grandfather and grandmother Durst reared fifteen children, whose descendants are now scattered all over the state of Texas.

Horatio Durst, Sr., has all his life been a farmer, and now in his old age still gives his time to that occupation, not because he needs its profits, but just because he loves to work and see things grow. Texas has no more useful or better man than Horatio Durst, Sr. He possesses great refinement, and is a man of broad knowledge and has exercised his influence in many ways for the good of his community. He received his education along with his brother, Rev. John Durst, at the old Burleson school at Independence, Texas. At the outbreak of the war he enlisted in the Confederate army as a private, served through the struggle and came out one of the leading officers of his command. He was one of the loyal soldiers of the south. Of the four children of Horatio, Sr. and Anna Eliza Durst, David Gould Durst died in young manhood; Mrs. J. P. Hail lives at Crockett; and Mrs. M. D. Scales lives at Houston and is an accomplished traveler, having spent much of her time in Europe. One child, Banigno Durst, now farming on the old Durst farm with H. Durst, Sr., was born to Horatio Durst, Sr., by a second marriage, and the following children were born to him by his present wife, Estelle Wynne Durst: Mrs. James A. Girard, of Houston; Pauline, at home; Louis J., Assistant Cashier of Centreville State Bank—in the County Seat of Leon County; and Estell and Delna, who died when young.

Horatio Durst, Jr., until he was twenty years of age remained on the home farm and assisted in its duties. At the age of twenty he took up the study of surveying and civil engineering under L. H. Hopkins, of Dallas, with whom he remained two years after he had fitted himself for his profession. On December 24, 1899, he married Miss Elizabeth Wakefield, of Midway, Texas, a daughter of I. L. and Florence (Christian) Wakefield. Their seven children are as follows: David Gould Durst, Maurice Durst and one, an infant, who are all now deceased; and Lewis Horatio Julian Cooper, Leonard Durst and an infant daughter, all at home.

After his marriage Mr. Durst lived on the farm for a year, and then moved to Crockett, where he has since had his residence. He has built up a business as a surveyor and civil engineer which takes him all over the county and state, and he is one of the most capable men in the profession in Texas. He owns a fine body of land in Houston county, and his beautiful home is located just one mile from the center of Crockett. At one time Mr. Durst held the office of county surveyor. He is progressive in his tendencies, and supports every movement for the betterment of his locality. Mrs. Durst is a Southern lady, with all the charms and attainments of her class, and has made for her family a beautiful home life. She is a member of the Order of Eastern Star at Crockett, being its acting secretary at the present time. She is also a member of the Christian church. Mr. Durst is affiliated with the Masonic order, being a thirty-second degree Mason and a Shriner, and is also a member of the Woodmen of the World.

JAMES HANNIBAL BEACH. The flourishing town of Van Horn in Culberson county bears in its present commercial organization and activities the character and influence of James Hannibal Beach, whose name is frequently associated with the title of "Father of the town" and has been a pioneer settler, a business builder and a citizen of splendid personal character and activities in this section.

Mr. Beach came to Van Horn in the early year of 1886 in order to take charge of the pumping station for the Texas & Pacific Railroad Company. At that time the pumphouse was practically alone in a wide stretch of country, covered only by the moving herds of cattle and buffaloes, and from his station in the wilderness he developed his plans and extended his activities which have finally resulted in the upbuilding of a prosperous trade center and a flourishing community at Van Horn. Mr. Beach has been superintendent of the railroad pumping station at this point through all the years since he first came here, and in addition to this has found time to extend his enterprise in many other directions. On his arrival at Van Horn he located five thousand acres of land and began the stock business. This land in 1906 he sold for $21,000. In 1903 he was appointed postmaster at Van Horn, and at the same time established a small store. After selling his ranch lands he developed this mercantile establishment to the largest in the vicinity, and it has since continued one of the best conducted and most profitable business concerns in this section. His partner is Mr. Fred Gibson, a sketch of whose career is described briefly on other pages, and who has entire charge of the store, the general store and its warehouses occupying several thousand square feet of floor space, and the stock and equipments contain every commodity required by the people of this section.

James Hannibal Beach was born in Cherokee county, North Carolina, September 20, 1849, a son of Isaac Thomas and Elvira (Murphy) Beach, both of whom were natives of North Carolina. Isaac Beach, who was born in 1813 and lived to the age of seventy-eight, was a farmer by occupation, a prominent Whig in earlier years, and subsequently a Democrat, and was prominent in his locality in public affairs, holding the offices of county commissioner, justice of the peace, and other places of responsibility and honor. He and his wife passed away in Clay county, North Carolina, where their bodies now rest.

Mr. J. H. Beach attained his education in the old-time schools of Clay county, and subsequently was a student in the J. O. Hicks college, which was one of the best schools of the state during that time. Mr. Beach has been a resident of Texas since 1872, a period of over forty years, and during the first fourteen years made his home in Grayson county, where he was engaged in farming and stock raising. His prosperous career since that time has already been reviewed.

Mr. Beach is perhaps one of the best known nimrods of Texas. During his long service with the Texas & Pacific he has acted as guard to many prominent railroad officials on their hunting expeditions, and his own record of prowess as a hunter includes thirty-four mountain sheep, many panthers and an unknown number of deer. But through all his long experience as hunter, he has never slain but one bear. Since 1870 Mr. Beach has been a Mason, and is a deacon in the Van Horn Baptist church. Among his other possessions he owns three sections of lands adjacent to Van Horn, and a fine home in the outskirts of the village.

On January 18, 1874, he married Miss Nancy Blundell, of Grayson county, daughter of John B. and Carolina Blundell, her parents being pioneers of Grayson county. Seven children were born to their marriage, three of whom are deceased, and the other four are as follows: Pink Elizabeth, wife of Fred Blythe, of El Paso; Lilly, wife of Thomas J. Allen of Catulla, Texas; Walter C., a cattleman of Hayes county, where he owns six thousand acres of land; and Ivy, wife of Mr. M. W. Winkler of El Paso.

JUDGE LAWRENCE SWEANY. A fine, stalwart, broad-shouldered, shaggy-browed old gentleman whose figure is as straight as a pine, is Judge Lawrence Sweany of Palestine. Eighty-seven years of age, and for thirty-five years a resident of Palestine, he has had a career of varied activity and usefulness, spent in many localities of America, and is still in the active service of the world and one of the most thoroughly esteemed men of his home city.

Born in Ireland, in London Valley, January 28, 1827, he is a fine example of the sturdy immigrant which has done so much to furnish the vitalizing energy to American life. His father and mother were both natives of Ireland and lived long and useful lives. They came to America in 1842, and after considerable wandering, the father finally settled in Wisconsin in 1849, taking up a section of land in Columbia county. There he and his good wife lived until the time of death. It was more than sixty-five years ago that they secured their homestead in Wisconsin and it still remains in the family, being farmed by some of the sons. Judge Sweany speaks with the deepest regard for his father, whom he recalls as one of the most honorable and industrious of men. The mother outlived her husband, and passed away in 1896 at an advanced age. Judge Sweany is one of nine children, of whom Andrew, John, Charles and Bernard are deceased, and the living are James A., Michael, Isabella, Mary and Jane. As police judge of Palestine, Judge Sweany occupies a place of important usefulness in this community, and though at an advanced age gives most capable service. During his young manhood he learned the glass-blowing trade and worked at it in Vermont and Massachusetts and subsequently in the city of Pittsburgh. He mastered every detail in the manufacture of window glass, working as a gatherer, blower, batch-mixer, and finally building and managing the first glass factory in New Albany, Indiana. He started this latter enterprise in 1866. Subsequently he moved to Chicago, and in that city he at one time owned land which is now covered by forty blocks and which at the present time has a valuation of many millions.

From Chicago Mr. Sweany returned to Pittsburgh and in 1878 located at Palestine, which has ever since been his home. During the first five years of his residence in Palestine, he was engaged in the hotel business and then entered the railroad contracting. A number of years ago he was elected a justice of the peace and altogether served four years in that office, though not continuously. In 1897 he was appointed to his present position as city judge and city recorder and has filled those offices for fifteen years. In politics he is a Democrat.

In February, 1854, Judge Sweany married Miss Mary Jane McLafferty. She was born in Armstrong county, Pennsylvania, and was a descendant of an old Revolutionary family named Griffin, of Baltimore, Maryland. Her death occurred in Palestine in 1885. She was the mother of a large family of thirteen children. Five of these, namely, James, Mary E. (the widow of Michael Maloney), Isabella, Ellen and May are still living. Those deceased are Andrew Francis, William Bernard, Lawrence, Cornelius, Charles Adolphus, Eugene, Martha and John. The son, Andrew F., was in business at Palestine and was one of the most popular men of this city, enjoying the regard and friendship of all who knew him.

In religion Mr. Sweany and family are Catholics. He is an honorary member of the Knights of Columbus. His home is a most happy and attractive one, and in the books which are to be found in almost every room, and the atmosphere of culture which pervades the place, is revealed the source of much that has been ideal and stimulating in the life of this good man and his family.

O. B. ROGERS. No more popular and respected civic officer is known in Anderson county than O. B. Rogers, who has become so well known in various important capacities in this locality. He comes of a line of loyal Southerners; both his father and his grandfather were natives of South Carolina and were keen sympathizers with the Confederate cause. The latter enlisted for service in the Civil war, to which he sacrificed his life after one year of courageous activity and of resistance to the effects of disease and exposure. He had been a man of considerable property in land and slaves and his economic convictions have been shared by his son, T. M. Rogers, who at the time of struggle between the South and the North was too young to enter that conflict. As a boy of fifteen T. M. Rogers came to Anderson county, Texas, with an uncle. At that early age he adopted this commonwealth as his home and has ever since been a loyal citizen of the Lone Star state. No other Texan in private life has shown more interest in the advancement and betterment of his state than T. M. Rogers. Agriculture and transportation are the public interests which he has most at heart. He was particularly active in promoting and assisting in the construction of the I. & G. N. R. R. through the county. He is extensively known as a fine stock breeder and in that connection has done much to improve the grade of stock, especially horses, in this county. Other agricultural lines also receive his attention, with the same success that characterizes his other efforts. Mrs. T. M. Rogers is, like her husband, a South Carolinian by birth. As Mary Elrod, she came when a child with her parents to Texas, where she met and married Mr. Rogers. Both are devout members of the Methodist Episcopal church, T. M. Rogers having been notably active in Sunday school work. Of their eight living children five are settled in life as follows: S. C. Rogers, a farmer on property near that of his father; M. E. Rogers, a dry goods merchant at Altus, Oklahoma; H. E., a business man at Greenville, Texas; Udell, now Mrs. J. C. Cely of Frankston, Texas; and O. B. Rogers, the special subject of this sketch, as tax assessor of Anderson county. The three younger sons, F. E., C. W., and John, are still living in the parental home.

O. B. Rogers, the second living son of T. M. and Mary Rogers, was born in Anderson county on August 12, 1880. He was reared in the wholesome atmosphere of his father's rural estate, where he remained until he reached the age of nineteen. He then entered Southwestern University at Georgetown, Texas, where he remained for two years, pursuing the prescribed academic course. Having completed the same, he returned to the parental home.

Thus prepared for life's activities, young Rogers' abilities were promptly recognized by his fellow-citizens of his home community. Although he had barely attained the years of his majority, he was made assistant postmaster of Brushy Creek and was also given charge of a rural mail route. This work he continued for three or four years and subsequently engaged in business at Brushy Creek, where he was successful as a druggist. After two years in this latter work Mr. Rogers had won such a high degree of esteem from his acquaintances in the county that he was nominated for the office of tax assessor. In the ensuing election he successfully made the race against very strong opponents. His work in this office, which he still holds, has been ably performed and in a genial spirit that has increased his already large number of enthusiastic friends throughout the county.

The marriage of Mr. Rogers took place in 1903. In December of that year he was united in life's closest bond with Miss Alice Mills, daughter of a family well known for its numerous famous churchmen. Her grandfather was the presiding elder at the first conference of Methodist Episcopal communicants ever held in East Texas. Her father, J. M. Mills, has been preaching for thirty-five years and her brother, J. W. Mills, is at this time presiding elder of the Timpon District, East Texas Conference. Mrs. Rogers and her husband are also active in the work of the church, Mr. Rogers having served for several years in the capacity of steward.

The household of Mr. and Mrs. Rogers has been completed by the advent of four children, who have been named as follows: Christine, Hazel, Moses and Jack. The local interests of Mr. Rogers, in addition to those of his home, include his membership in the Knights of Pythias, in Lodge No. 15 of Palestine; and in the Woodmen of the World. Mrs. Rogers is also a member of the Woodmen's Circle. Because of his estimable character and because of his achievements for a young man who is yet in his early thirties Mr. Rogers is a highly valued member of this community and a much appreciated official of Anderson county.

REV. GEORGE VINCENT RIDLEY. A life devoted to the best interests of humanity is one that is entitled to the highest meed of appreciation and recognition, and it chanced all too often that those men who have lived lives of constant self-abnegation have withheld from them anything like a reasonable semblance of appreelation on the part of their fellow men. While it would be well nigh impossible for such a man as Rev. George Vincent Ridley to meet with a full recognition of his services, so wide reaching have they been, still he has enjoyed the approbation, the high regard and the unstinted love and esteem of a wide and ever-widening circle of those people to whom he has ministered with every generous and noble instinct within him. His life has been upright, honorable and gentle; and all who have come into contact with his gracious and kindly personality have gone out benefited and uplifted. Rev. Ridley comes of one of the oldest families extant in America today, and his ancestry is one of which he might well be proud, did such an element of character enter into his unusual makeup. He is of French, German and English ancestry, and a direct descendant of Bishop Ridley, who was burned at the stake with Hugh Latimer at Oxford, England, on October 15, 1555. Bishop Nicholas Ridley, it may be stated here, was born in Northumberland, England, in 1500, and was a martyr to the early Protestant faith. He was chaplain to Henry VIII, becoming Bishop of Rochester in 1547 and of London in 1550. He was arrested under the reign of Mary, and in 1554, together with Latimer and Cramer, was sent to Oxford to defend their doctrines regarding the Mass before the divines of the two universities there. With his two compatriots he was burned "at the ditch over against Baliol College," on the date already mentioned. So much for the heretic ancestor of the good man whose name introduces this review, and it is sufficient to evidence the sterner stuff that entered into the makeup of the men of this historic old family that numbers among its most distinguished connections in the United States the Vincents of Ohio and the Burlesons and Kyles of Texas.

The parents of Rev. Ridley were George M. and Martha (Young) Ridley, the father a native of Tennessee and the mother of Virginia. The father came to Texas from Tennessee at an early date and it was he who was instrumental in the organization of Kerr county, of which he was the first county Judge. He was a planter and a slave holder, and also operated the first sawmill and shingle factory on the Guadalupe river, and one of the first in Texas. A political leader and a public man of the most potent influence, he never cared to hold those places that carried with them the usual emoluments of office, preferring to serve without remuneration. He was a high minded and unselfish character, and a devout and true Christian gentleman. The grandfather, George Ridley, built a blockhouse on the site where Nashville now stands, and defended the place successfully against the Indians. His daughter, a Mrs. Buchanan, was chief of a ladies' squad that moulded bullets during the attack, and shared largely in the honors bestowed upon the pioneer heroines of the day. George Ridley was also an officer in the United States army and a fine type of the early pioneer. He was distinguished for his benefactions, having assisted many a poor boy to an education and independence, and earning the undying gratitude of many as a result of his generosity and kindness. A man of the most humane instincts, he was one who would never permit a slave to be mistreated, and he was held as a saint among them. He lived to the patriarchal old age of one hundred and eight years, and died full of years and in the secure esteem and love of a host of people who knew him and had benefited by his life. The grandfather of the subject, as well as his great-grandfather, were veterans of the Revolutionary war: Father and son, they passed through the long struggle, and the father received numerous promotions from his superior officers for gallantry in action. George Vincent Ridley, the grandfather of Rev. Ridley of this review, was a major in the war of 1812, and fought with General Andrew Jackson, against the Blackfeet and Seminole Indians. His son, J. T. Ridley, commanded the expedition at the time when the United States government removed the Cherokees and the conquered Seminoles from Florida to the reservation. Another of the name of Ridley who gained distinction in public life, was Judge Bloomfield Ridley, who was Chancery Judge in Tennessee for twenty-four years. But little data is at hand concerning the maternal ancestors of the subject, but it is known that his maternal grandfather, Ephraim Young, fought with Lafayette in the Revolution. George Vincent Ridley is the youngest and the sole survivor of the ten children of his parents, and they also are deceased. He was born at Mount Pleasant, in Murray county, Tennessee, March 21, 1839, and received his early education in a private school, later graduating from a seven years' course in a preparatory school. He then attended Jackson College in Tennessee, and at the early age of fifteen years and three months passed his examinations and entered upon his novitiate as a minister. He then studied medicine under Dr. J. M. Dickinson, continuing in that study for two years, and then taking up the study of that subject in New Orleans and receiving in due time his M. D. degree, and Dr. Stone of New Orleans urged him to accept a position in the Medical Department of the University. He then took up his life work as a preacher and doctor, the work of the one profession fitting most admirably into the other, and the good doctor filling the dual position of minister to both body and soul. His zeal and energy proved too much for his strength, and so great were the demands made upon the kindly minister that he was compelled to give up some part of his work. He elected to drop the practice of medicine, and thereafter continued as a minister only, uniting with the Texas Annual Conference in 1863, and serving acceptably four important stations, the usual length of time allowed itinerant ministers. In 1871, because of the health conditions of his family, he located in Hempstead, Texas, where for fifteen years he resided, engaged for secular employment as a physician and druggist. During these years it was his delight to preach the Gospel as opportunity permitted or serve with distinction as a lecturer. During the first campaign in Texas in favor of State-wide Prohibition he traveled as one of the most valued Prohibition orators of the state, also doing pioneer work in the development and organization of the temperance forces in Waller county, Texas. In 1887, after re-entering the itinerant ministry, he was transferred by Bishop W. W. Duncan to the East Texas Conference and stationed in Beaumont, where for four years he served as a most efficient pastor and popular preacher. During the remaining twenty-seven years his life was devoted to the work of an itinerant Methodist preacher with a heroism, faithfulness and success rarely equaled. His life work has been conducted along the most beneficent lines, and his accomplishments have been most splendid. His knowledge of medicine proved to be of the utmost benefit to him in his work of reaching his fellows, and much of charitable labor entered into the whole scheme of his life as a result of that training. Naturally talented in medicine, he would have gained wide prominence had he continued in that profession, but he sacrificed a professional career and the honors and emoluments accruing thereto for the good of humanity, dedicating his life to his fellow men.

Alert and vigorous of mind and body, Rev. Ridley had the rare talent of applying his principles of Christianity in such manner as to produce the greatest good. As head of the boy scout movement in Fort Bend county, he is well known to the youth of the district, and fortunate indeed is the boy scout privileged to

C. J. Stewart

"trek" with this genial leader far into the country, for he profits not only in a physical way, but unconsciously in mind and soul, for the example and influence of their leader is one that has its sure effect.

Rev. Ridley has been twice married. His first wife was Miss Somerville Menifee, and she died without issue. He later married Miss Cortez Keith, whose grandfather was a French Huguenot. She is a native of Texas, and a lady of the finest attainments, socially and educationally, being a graduate of Montgomery Female College in Virginia. Four children have been born to them, one of whom, Richard Volney, is deceased. The others are Miriam LaPorte, now Mrs. John H. Briganee; Elizabeth, and Eugenia.

The family have membership in the Methodist Episcopal church, and Mrs. Ridley is president of the Women's Missionary Society. Dr. Ridley is a Mason of the Royal Arch degree, and a past master of the lodge at Mount Pleasant, Texas, while he and his wife are members of the Order of the Eastern Star.

CHAS. J. STEWART. Captain Stewart is known as one of the popular and representative hotel men of the Lone Star state and is a progressive and public-spirited citizen of the fine little city of Mineral Wells, Palo Pinto county, where he is proprietor of the Piedmont hotel. His hotel is maintained at a high standard and is most popular with the traveling public, as is it also with the many guests who avail themselves of its accommodations when visiting Mineral Wells to take advantage of the admirable waters that have made the town the most attractive health resort of the state.

The career of Captain Stewart has been eventful and varied, and the story of his life is interesting in the extreme, though only the salient points in the same can be touched in this circumscribed sketch. He is a native of Scotland and a scion of a stanch old family of the land of hills and heather, but he has been a resident of the United States from infancy and represents the best type of American citizenship. He was a valiant soldier and officer of the Confederacy in the Civil war, and he has been a resident of Texas for more than forty years, these preliminary statements indicating that he is eminently entitled to special recognition in this history of Texas and its representative citizens.

Captain Stewart was born in the city of Edinburgh, Scotland, on the 11th of May, 1847, and about two years later his parents emigrated to America and established their home in North Carolina, where they passed the residue of their lives. In the schools of that state Captain Stewart gained his early educational training, which was effectively supplemented by a course in Trinity College, at Davidson, North Carolina, and that he made good use of his scholastic advantages is shown by the fact that his first independent effort was made as a representative of the pedagogic profession. He proved himself a successful and popular teacher in the schools of his home state, and finally his spirit of adventure led him to adopt a seafaring life. As a sailor before the mast he made a voyage to Hong-Kong, China, and during his career on the sea he made six trips across the Atlantic. He was a sailor during the early stages of the Civil war and was in service on a vessel engaged in blockade running in the eastern ports of the United States and in the port of Liverpool, England. He finally retired from this service and returned to North Carolina, where he soon afterward enlisted in the Confederate ranks, as a member of the Third North Carolina Reserves. He was chosen captain of Company H of this command and his regiment was at Greensboro, North Carolina, at the time of its surrender, incidental to the close of the war. In an engagement at Fort Fisher, North Carolina, Captain Stewart was struck by a fragment of shell, which stunned him and resulted in his capture by the enemy, but he soon showed his versatility by effecting his escape, after which he rejoined his regiment. He participated in a number of spirited engagements and proved himself a valiant soldier and able commanding officer. He perpetuates the more gracious memories and associations of his army career by retaining membership in the United Confederate Veterans' Association. His father likewise was a loyal soldier of the Confederacy, and was colonel of a regiment of North Carolina militia, with which command he served until the close of the war. Colonel Stewart was a successful planter and a slaveholder in the period prior to the war between the states, and while he was conscientiously opposed to secession, believing that the nation could adjust its difficulties through more effective methods, he was loyal to his state when it voted for secession and forthwith took up arms in defense of the Southern cause.

After the war Captain Stewart again followed the life of a sailor for a few years, and about the year 1869 he established his residence at Raleigh, North Carolina, where he was for a time engaged in the dry goods business. From that place he finally removed to Pine Bluff, Arkansas, and in 1871 he came to Texas and located at Tyler, where he engaged in the dry goods business. In 1873 he held appointment as United States marshal for the eastern district of Texas, a position which he resigned at the expiration of his first term. He next removed to Kaufman county, where he turned his attention to dealing in farm machinery, but in the following year he made a trip to South America. Upon his return he established his residence on a farm in Kaufman county, and later he entered the service of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company, at Fort Worth. He continued to be connected with the construction department of this railway system for several years and then engaged in the hotel business in Fort Worth. In this enterprise he proved to be the right man in the right place, and it is fortunate for him and for the many appreciative guests whom he has been able to entertain as a hotel man that he has continued his identification with this semi-public business. In September, 1900, Captain Stewart removed to Mineral Wells, the change being made in the hope that the greatly impaired health of his wife would be improved by the fine mineral waters that have made the town famous and that have gained the approval of the highest medical authorities. Gratifying results followed the treatment accorded to Mrs. Stewart and the Captain became so impressed with the value of the local waters and the attractive and salubrious situation of the city that he determined to identify himself closely and permanently with Mineral Wells. Here the Fairfield Inn was erected for him, as a commercial and health-resort hotel, and he retained the lease of the same for seven years, during which he made the place one of unqualified popularity. In 1913, he effected the lease of the Piedmont Hotel, which he is operating most successfully and which is known as one of the leading hotels of this favored section of the state. Captain Stewart never fails in his enthusiastic efforts to exploit the substantial claims of the splendid mineral waters in his home city and to do all in his power to bring the same to the attention of those who may be greatly benefited by the remedial action of the wells. It is needless to say that he is one of the most popular, progressive and public-spirited citizens of Mineral Wells, and he has a wide circle of friends in the state that has been his home for many years.

Captain Stewart is inflexible in his allegiance to the Democratic party and has given effective service in support of its cause. In the time-honored Masonic fraternity he has attained to the thirty-second degree of the Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite, and he is identified with the leading clubs and other representative civic organizations in his home city, where both he and his charming wife are prominent in the best social activities of the community. He was made an honorary member of the Burbank Society on October 9, 1913.

In the year 1881, in the city of Fort Worth, was solemnized the marriage of Captain Stewart to Victoire Cummings, who was born and reared in France and who came to the United States in company with one of her sisters. She is a woman of most gracious personality and has many friends in Texas, which has represented her home during the greater part of her residence in America. Captain and Mrs. Stewart have no children.

ADOLPH TOPPERWEIN. A Texas product, of the third generation in this state, and from the splendid German pioneer stock about Fredericksburg, Ad Topperwein as he is familiarly known, has created a national and international fame for himself as the "world's most expert shot."

Born at Boerne in Kendall county, Texas, in 1869, Adolph Topperwein is a son of F. L. and Johanna (Bergmann) Topperwein. Both parents were born in Germany. His father came to Texas from Germany when fifteen years old in 1849, his father being also named F. L. Topperwein. They were among the early pioneers and members of the old Fredericksburg colony which located in Gillespie county. Grandfather F. L. Topperwein was a scholar and a teacher whose work was of special benefit and usefulness in the pioneer country of Texas. He was a graduate of one of the German Universities, and in the wilderness colony of western Texas became a leader and an adviser whose services in the first years were almost invaluable. Although not a physician by profession, he was sufficiently familiar with medical science to attend to the physical ailments of the colonists, and did so cheerfully without any remuneration. Those early settlers from the fatherland suffered great hardships in the first years, combating hunger and privation in an unknown wilderness, going through an epidemic of cholera, and for many years, continuing until the close of the war, suffering murder and pillage from the Indians. In his relations with the Indians grandfather Topperwein appeared more in the role of peace maker than otherwise, and was held in high esteem and as a result was never molested in their raids. He showed the wild men of the plains picture books, gave them medicine, and performed various acts of kindness for which they always remembered him.

The father of Adolph Topperwein was a gunsmith by trade, a vocation which he had learned partly in Cincinnati. By his skill in the business he was widely known in his time, and made some very excellent guns. Thus Ad Topperwein grew up in the gun business. When he was a child his parents moved to San Antonio, in which city he was reared and educated. His first serious employment was as pictorial artist and cartoonist on the San Antonio Daily Express during 1897-98. By private study he had learned drawing, and his drawings show fine artistic skill. In his home Mr. Topperwein has some beautiful specimens of his own work, chiefly drawings on leather of picturesque Texas border characters, cowboys, bad men, Mexicans, etc.

In 1898 Mr. Topperwein took up expert shooting as a profession, in which he has achieved a position of great fame. Representing the Winchester Company, he and his wife have traveled all over the United States and Canada giving exhibitions of their remarkable skill. Mr. Topperwein is regarded as the greatest living fancy and flying target shot with rifle, pistol or shot gun. He uses ordinary Winchester rifles, shooting a solid ball, and the targets he shoots at comprise oranges, apples, bits of coal, walnuts, small marbles, empty cartridge shells and other tiny objects, which are thrown into the air and hit with bullets from his rifle or revolver. On thirteen occasions Mr. Topperwein has broken the world's record shooting flying targets with a rifle. He has hit 4,954 1 3-4 inch targets out of 5,000 thrown into the air at a distance of 25 feet; and shooting at 10,000 2 1-4 inch blocks thrown at the same distance he missed only one. In the most marvelous exhibition ever known, at San Antonio, Mr. Topperwein shot at 72,500 blocks of the above size on ten successive days, missing only four out of the first 50,000 and only nine out of the entire lot. He made straight runs of 13,219, 13,292, 13,599 and 14,540. A remarkable feat performed by Mr. Topperwein, which arouses great enthusiasm, is the drawing of Indian heads in perfect outline with rifle bullets. This is done in rapid time, as fast as he can pull the trigger of his Winchester repeater.

Mrs. Topperwein who shares with her husband an unexcelled fame in this domain of accomplishment, before her marriage was Miss Elizabeth Servaty, and was born in Connecticut. She had never used a gun of any kind until her marriage to Mr. Topperwein in 1903. In ten years she has developed as the most expert lady shot of the world, and gave her first exhibition with her husband at the World's Fair at St. Louis in 1904. Since then she has traveled with him constantly, during every spring, summer and fall. She shoots with shotgun, rifle and pistol, being equally skillful with all. With the rifle she has scored 1,995 hits out of 2,000 2 1-4 inch blocks thrown into the air at a distance of 20 feet, making a straight run of 1,437. With the shotgun she has scored 100 straight a great number of times, her longest straight run being 226. She has won many high averages in open competition, shooting with equal terms with the best professional and amateur shots in the world. In 1910 in the Pacific coast handicap at Seattle Mrs. Topperwein won high average over a large field of the best shots of the Pacific coast and Canada. On the first day she made the remarkable score of 195 out of 200, which included 20 doubles, and on the final day broke the entire program of 100 singles straight. Her score at the Grand American Handicap in 1910 was 96 out of 100, shooting from 19 yards. In 1912 she appeared in competition in almost every state of the Union and scored the wonderful average of 95 percent. for about 15,000 targets all told. She uses Winchester rifles and shotguns and Winchester ammunition. Her feat in breaking 485 out of 500 targets and 961 out of 1,000 thrown at unknown angles is an unparalleled performance among women. It required four hours and thirty-five minutes continuous shooting, and displayed in a conspicuous manner her wonderful endurance and skill.

JAMES B. DAVIS. The office of sheriff and tax collector has never been a sinecure, and even in these modern years of the twentieth century, the office has many hazards and responsibilities which a similar position in east Texas does not possess. In James B. Davis are combined the best qualifications of the efficient, courageous and popular official, and for ten years he has made an excellent record as sheriff of Jeff Davis county.

His career has been one of variance, and his successful position has been altogether a result of his self-reliance and hard-working industry. James B. Davis was born in Williamson county, Texas, February 9, 1864, and belongs to an old family of Central Texas. His parents were Rev. Robert B. and Arminta Davis, the former passing away in 1887 at the age of forty-six and the latter now being a resident of Fort Davis. There were nine children in the family, James B. being the second. The senior Davis was a minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian church, began his career as a preacher when eighteen years of age, and devoted practically his entire life to the service of his church up to the time of his death.

The early education of James B. Davis was in the public schools of Texas, finishing with a course in the high school. When he was eighteen years of age he began for himself. His first work was as clerk in a dry goods store. The proprietor gave him at the beginning a salary of $25.00 per month, and he continued at this rate for two months, and at the end of nine months had so thoroughly demonstrated his ability that he was getting $75.00 per month, high wages at the time for that line of work. After two years in the one employment he took a place in a hardware store, and continued with that one firm for eleven years. Failing health then compelled him to seek another vocation, and to recuperate he came out to west Texas, and for four years followed various occupations. He then came to Fort Davis and took a position with a cattle company, with whom he remained two years and then once more went into a store, where he was employed for three years. In 1904, occurred his first election to the office of sheriff and tax collector, and by repeated proofs of the satisfaction and approval of the majority of voters he has been retained in this office to the present time.

J. B. Davis

In Burnet, Texas, on November 25, 1855, Mr. Davis married Miss Laura A. Wallis, daughter of J. M. Wallis, of Burnet. Two sons and two daughters were born to their union, of whom Ralph and Alvin H. are now deceased, while Winnie E. is the wife of J. C. Fisher, of Jeff Davis county, and Elsie Irene lives at home with her parents. Mr. Davis and family worship in the Methodist church. Mr. Davis has taken special prominent part in the Odd Fellows Order, and is a member of both the subordinate Lodge and the Encampment.

He has passed all the chairs of his lodge in Odd Fellowship, and was once a delegate to the grand lodge of the state. He is also affiliated with the Woodmen of the World and served one term as banker. He has membership with the Jeff Davis county club, a social organization. For a number of years he has been one of the influential leaders in the Democratic party in Jeff Davis county, and besides his service as sheriff he has also served several times on the school board. His interests outside of his regular business include diversion in hunting, and he is fond of the lighter amusements of life, enjoying a good theatrical performance, music and the books of his own library. Having been born and reared in Texas, Mr. Davis concludes with all due respects to all other states, that this is the best state of them all, and it is his opinion that Texas possesses everything else which the other states have, and many features besides.

GEORGE SPILLER. Honesty of purpose, steadfastness of endeavor and concentration of effort have been the qualities combined in making the career of George Spiller, of Jacksboro, a success. Intimately identified with the history and development of Jack county for more than thirty years, his activities have been centered here, and for the past ten years he has efficiently served in the capacity of county surveyor. Mr. Spiller was born in Nelson county, Virginia, December 5, 1845, and is a son of James M. and Caroline (Kyle) Spiller, natives of Virginia, the former of English and the latter of Scotch-Irish descent.

James M. Spiller grew up in the old Dominion state, and became a planter and farmer, working his fields with slave labor prior to the outbreak of the Civil war. He was also engaged extensively in contracting, and did much work on the James river and Kanawha canal. His death occurred in 1889, while the mother passed away several years before. There were five sons and five daughters in the family, of whom George was the eldest son, while another son, H. B. Spiller, also lives in Texas and is engaged extensively in the land business at Canadian, Hemphill county.

George Spiller received a good preliminary educational training in the private schools of Virginia, and he subsequently became a cadet in the famous Virginia Military School, at Lexington, Virginia, from which institution he was graduated in 1866. He was a member of the State Cadet Corps, which distinguished itself at the battle of Newmarket, during the Civil war, when the lads went bravely forth and fought under the flag of the Confederacy to repel the advance of the Federal troops. Mr. Spiller received a slight wound in the head during this engagement, and his name is found with the other cadets who took part in the war, engraved on the monument that was erected in their honor on the parade ground at the institute at Lexington. Mr. Spiller left Virginia in 1870 and located in Mobile, Alabama, where he was employed as a civil engineer by the Mobile & Montgomery Railroad Company. Later he became resident engineer of the Southern Pacific Railroad in the state of Louisiana, in which capacity he had charge of the construction of the Teache Division of that road, and in December, 1872, came to Texas and was employed by William Nelson, the locator of the land of the Great Northern Railroad that was donated by the state, and traveled extensively all over Texas in this survey, being absent from home on that occasion for nine months. In 1875 he located in Young county and took charge of the Young Land District, where he continued until 1880, in that year leaving to accept the position of roadmaster for the M. & O. Railroad, under Col. Alfred L. Rives, at Jackson, Tennessee. This position he held until 1883. 1884 was the year of his advent in Jacksboro, Texas, and here he has continued to reside to the present time. Always a Democrat, voting and working for the best interests of the party, he has been interested for some years in politics, and in 1894 was elected county surveyor of Jack county, a position which he has retained to the present time, through conscientious and faithful devotion to the duties of his office.

In November, 1879, in Jack county, Mr. Spiller was married to Miss Bell Loving, a daughter of James C. Loving, who was a well-known stockman of this county, whence he came at an early day from Kentucky with his parents, as a lad of nine years. He was a Ranger on the frontier during the Civil war and participated in much of the Indian trouble in the state, and died in 1902, having been a resident of Texas for some fifty-seven years. Mrs. Loving still survives and is making her home at Jacksboro, at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. Spiller. Oliver Loving, the grandfather of Mrs. Spiller, was one of the original pioneer stockmen and farmers of Texas, and is claimed to have been the first man to drive cattle across the plains and up the Pecos river to Colorado, which he followed for years prior to the Civil war. After the war he resumed his activities, and met his death at the hands of Indians, being wounded in that section now known as Loving county, which was named in his honor, and passed away at Fort Sumner. Mr. and Mrs. Spiller have nine living children: James, aged thirty-four years, an attorney of New York City; William M., aged thirty-two years, who is connected with the Swift Packing Company plant at Fort Worth, Texas; George, aged thirty years, with the same company at Fort Worth; E. B., who is secretary of the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, living at Fort Worth, aged twenty-eight years; O. L., twenty-six years of age, a lieutenant in the Coast Artillery Corps of the United States Army and a graduate of the United States Naval Academy; Hampden, aged twenty-four years, who is associated with his father in the land and insurance business; Kyle, aged nineteen years, a cadet in the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas; Miss Carrie Belle, aged eighteen years, a student at Milford College, Milford, Texas; and Loving, aged fourteen years, who attends the public school.

Mr. Spiller has witnessed the growth in wealth and population of Jack county, and has always been an enthusiastic "booster" of its interests, believing that no section of the great Southwest offers greater opportunities to men of ambition, industry and determination. He is a citizen of public spirit, who takes a pride in the improvement and progress of his adopted community both materially and intellectually, and supports liberally all measures tending toward that end.

JOHN THOMAS HORTON, M. D. For nearly twenty years Dr. Horton has been in the practice of his profession in Quanah, and is now the oldest physician in point of service in that city. His thorough ability as a doctor, and his kindly relations as a citizen have made him one of the best known men in Hardeman county. Dr. John Thomas Horton was born in Lincoln county, Missouri, March 5, 1857, and he belongs to a pioneer family in that state. He was the second in a family of eleven children, born to James C. and Abigail (Tuttle) Horton. Grandfather James Gillespie Horton came from Buncombe, North Carolina, and located on a farm in Lincoln county, Missouri, in 1831, and died there April 26, 1862. His wife was Elizabeth (Williams) Horton, who was born in Tennessee March 8, 1808, and who died in Texas at the age of eighty-two years. James C. Horton, the father, was born in Buncombe county, North Carolina, and when a child accompanied the family on its migration to Missouri, and crossed the Mississippi River at St. Louis, when there was no bridge and no railroads anywhere in the Mississippi Valley. In Lincoln county, Missouri, he took up his career as a farmer, and lived there until 1878, when he moved to Texas, locating in Kaufman county, where his death occurred June 1, 1906. The mother, who was born in 1834, died near Terrell March 29, 1879.

Dr. Horton was reared in Lincoln county, Missouri, where he attended the public schools, and also had some schooling in Texas. He entered medical college at Louisville, Kentucky, and was graduated M. D. in 1891. He afterwards took post graduate work in New York and began practice in Kaufman county, where he remained four years. Since coming to Quanah he has built up a large practice and is regarded as one of the ablest physicians and surgeons in this part of the state.

Dr. Horton has membership in the County and State Medical Society, and is health officer for Quanah. He has also given perfect service in the office of school trustee. In politics he is a Democrat, and is a member of the Christian church.

At Elmo, in Kaufman county, February 13, 1881. Dr. Horton married Calistia Emenida Polk, a daughter of Rev. Kendrick Ford and Sarah (Vickery) Polk, her father having been a well known Baptist minister of East Texas. Both her parents are now deceased. The children of the doctor and wife are: Mrs. Lovey Carl Tullis, who graduated from the Benton Normal School with the Bachelor of Science Degree, and now resides in Quanah, Texas. She was born in Kaufman county, and is the mother of three children: Helen, Eugene, and J. L. Tullis, Jr. Mrs. Lilly Carroll Sallier, born in Kaufman county, graduated from the University of Texas, was especially strong in mathematics and was head of the mathematic department in Amarillo high school. Miss Goldie Horton, born in Kaufman county, graduated from the University of Texas, took one year at Smith College in Northampton, Massachusetts, taught in the Amarillo schools and now has a fellowship in the Bryn Mawr College.

JUDGE TOM C. DAVIS. For nearly forty years one of the ablest lawyers of east Texas has been Tom C. Davis, whose reputation has been spread pretty well throughout Texas through his career not only as a lawyer, but as a legislator and judge. Judge Davis belongs to a family which has been identified with eastern Texas and western Arkansas for nearly ninety years, and few Texans have a more liberal heritage of pioneer historical prominence than Judge Davis of Center.

Tom C. Davis was born in 1850 at Terrapin Neck, Shelby county, Texas. His parents were Captain C. L. and Elizabeth (Carroll) Davis. The founder of the family in the southwest, and a notable and commanding figure in early Texas affairs, was the great grandfather Nathan Davis, a native of South Carolina. Early in the last century he moved to the territory of Illinois, taking his slaves with him. He was a prominent man in the southern section of that state, and was allied with the pro-slavery forces. His career recalls the fact now little known that Illinois escaped by only a few votes of being made a slave state. Mr. Davis was a member of the First Constitutional Convention of Illinois, and when the organic law was framed so that slavery was forbidden, he moved with his slaves from the north side of the Ohio river, and after spending a short time in Saline county, Arkansas, in 1824 came to Texas. His home was established on Ay-Ish Bayou, near what is now San Augustine, in the county of that name. In 1831 or 1832 the government of the province of Coahuila, under whose jurisdiction Texas was then embraced, established what was known as the municipality of Teneha, including a considerable portion of east Texas, including all of the territories of Shelby, Panola, Harrison and the counties north to the Red River. Nathan Davis became the first and only Alcalde of that municipality. Aside from his prominence in early affairs of Texas, previous to the Revolution, Nathan Davis also performed one other notable service to Texas. It was he who persuaded O. M. Roberts, who later became governor and judge of the supreme court of Texas, to come out from South Carolina and locate in east Texas. As an inducement, Mr. Davis, who was an uncle of young Roberts, gave the latter one hundred and sixty acres of land from his own headright in Shelby county. After Roberts had come to Texas he was assisted in many ways in his start to prominence by his uncle, Nathan Davis. Mr. Davis moved from San Augustine to Shelby county, where he lived seven years, and then went to Panola county, where he died in 1858.

Abijah Davis, grandfather of Judge Davis, spent his early career in Saline county, Arkansas, and in 1854, located in Panola county Texas, where he spent the rest of his life. He had married into the well known Lindsey family of Saline county, Arkansas, where his home was for several years before the removal of the family to Texas. Captain C. L. Davis, father of the judge, was born in Saline county, Arkansas, first came to Texas in 1845, and located on a farm in Shelby county, at what is known as Terrapin Neck. Before the war he moved to Panola county, the adjoining county on the north, and at the breaking out of the war between the states, organized and was elected captain of the first company of infantry enlisted in Panola county. This was attached to the regiment commanded by Governor O. M. Roberts. Captain Davis unfortunately died during the early part of the war, while in camp at Navasota, and thus interrupted what otherwise might have been a brilliant career as a soldier.

Tom C. Davis grew up in Shelby and Panola counties. His study in law was pursued under Governor Roberts at Tyler, and he was admitted to the bar in 1875. In the same year he opened his office at Center, the county seat of Shelby county, and has been a resident there ever since. Aside from his successful career in private practice, Judge Davis has done much notable work in public affairs. In 1876 he was elected county attorney and also served as a member of the Twentieth Legislature. In Shelby county he was chosen county judge, and in 1895 was appointed by Governor C. A. Culbertson to the district bench, and by two elections to the same office served continuously as district judge for ten years. Since leaving the bench Judge Davis has been engaged in private practice as a member of the firm of Davis & Davis, consisting of himself, and W. I. and T. O. Davis, who, although of the same name, are not related. This firm acts as general attorneys for the Pickering Lumber Company, the Sabine Valley Timber & Lumber Company, and the Waterman Lumber & Supply Company, all of which are among the largest lumber corporations in east Texas. They also have an extended general practice in civil and criminal law.

Judge Davis married Miss Addie Hayden, who is a native of Alabama. They have no children, but have reared several in their home.

WYATT J. GARRETT. An old Texas family which has had its share in the sterling activities which marked the establishment of the Texas Republic, and which has always born substantial relations with the community in which its members have lived and worked, is represented by Wyatt J. Garrett, a prominent and well known planter and farmer in San Augustine.

Mr. Garrett was born near San Augustine in 1863. Both his parents, William and Lucetta (Teel) Garrett are now deceased. His father, a native of Tennessee, came to what is now San Augustine, Texas, about 1826. The town of San Augustine had not yet been organized, and he with other pioneer settlers of the northern or red-land portion of the county, laid off and established said town. There was only a meager sprinkling of Americans at the time. He located about a mile and a half west of where the town of San Augustine was later established, and soon afterward his father, Jacob Garrett also came to San Augustine county, where he lived until his death. William Garrett was only a boy in years when he moved to Texas and spent a part of his first years as clerk in a store at Nacogdoches, but later was a farmer and planter on his place near San Augustine. His death occurred in 1883. During the period of 1835-36 he joined the Texas army in the winning of independence, and was in several fights with Mexicans and Indians, at and about Nacogdoches. That he was a permanent resident is evidenced by the fact that he lived on the same farm near San Augustine for more than half a century. His wife was born in San Augustine county, and was a daughter of George Teel, who was one of the earliest settlers.

Wyatt J. Garrett was born on a farm a mile and a half west of San Augustine, which was long the property of his father, and at the present time he owns a fine farm nearby the old George Teel place. Reared on a farm he has always been more or less actively engaged in farming and planting. For many years his home has been in San Augustine. Mr. Garrett received his early education in local schools, and his father then sent him east to Tennessee, and he was a student in the old Culleoka Academy taught by the Webb brothers, famous educators in Tennessee some thirty years ago. Mr. Garrett besides his successful activity as a farmer and planter has been active in public affairs. For nearly fifteen years he served as county and district clerk of San Augustine county. When the Commercial Guaranty State Bank of San Augustine was formed recently Mr. Garrett was among its organizers, and was elected vice president, a place which he still holds.

He has taken the Commandery degrees in Masonry and he and his wife are communicants of the Episcopal church. Mr. Garrett married Miss Lulu Harrison, who was born in Upshur county, Texas. They are the parents of twelve children: Mrs. Lulu May Tucker, Lillian, Daisy Garrett, Mrs. Lucetta Teel Oliver, John Edward, Wyatt J., Jr., Bernice H., William H., Hallie J., Frank Sharp, Maud Jewell, Mildred R., and Mabel. The son, John E. Garrett, was elected county attorney of San Augustine county in 1912, but resigned in September, 1913, and is now (1914) residing and practicing law at Houston.

JAMES J. BEWLEY. A notable service in early Texas education in eastern part of the state was performed by the late Col. S. B. Bewley, father of James J. Bewley, who is one of the prominent residents of San Augustine, and a large land owner in that vicinity.

The late Col. S. B. Bewley, who died at his home in San Augustine in 1877, was born in Greene county, Tennessee, in 1825. In early life he fitted himself for educational work, taught a private school in Henderson in Rusk county, Texas, for about a year, and his high qualifications as an educator caused him to be solicited by citizens at San Augustine to locate there. He moved to San Augustine in 1854, and established a school which for excellence in all its standards was probably not surpassed by any similar institution in that section of the state. He was prominent as an educator, up to about the beginning of the war. At San Augustine, soon after the commencement of hostilities, he enlisted in the Confederate service, and served in the coast defense in the vicinity of Galveston and was afterward a soldier east of the Mississippi River. In later years he was always known by the familiar title of Col. Bewley. In the battle of Corinth, Mississippi, he commanded a battery. When the war was over he returned to San Augustine, took up the study of law, was admitted to the bar, and in after years became one of the leading members of the east Texas bar. He was elected district attorney, and in 1872 was sent to the state legislature. He devoted his time to a large practice up to the time of his death. Col. Bewley married Mary E. Johnson, who was born in northern Alabama, and who died in 1891.

A son of these parents, James J. Bewley, was born in San Augustine in 1861. Reared and educated in his native town, he has made farming his chief occupation, and has been successful to an unusual degree. He now resides upon a beautiful estate of two hundred and forty-four acres, adjoining San Augustine on the south. On this place he has a beautiful residence located on a high elevation, the highest in San Augustine, commanding a splendid view of the surrounding country. This location was the site of the old home place of his father, who continued to live there until his death.

James J. Bewley married Miss Mary Cartwright, daughter of the late Columbus C. Cartwright, granddaughter of Matthews Cartwright, and great-granddaughter of John Cartwright, who settled at what is now San Augustine in 1819. The Cartwright family was from that year forward one of the most prominent in San Augustine and east Texas, and further particulars concerning the family annals will be found under the proper name elsewhere in this history.

DR. SAMUEL RAYMOND BURROUGHS, who has lived in Buffalo since 1896, is all but a native of Texas. He came to the state first in the winter of 1845-6, in company with his father, Benjamin F. Burroughs, who brought his family out of the state of Alabama. Dr. Burroughs was born in Tuscaloosa county, that state, on October 3, 1842, and his father was born in Augusta, Georgia, on March 1, 1819, though he was practically reared in Tuscaloosa county, Alabama.

Benjamin F. Burroughs was educated in Nashville for the medical profession, but his natural bent was in another direction, and he diverted his studies into the engineering department of the university and was graduated with a degree in civil engineering. This profession he followed all his life, and his work comprised land surveys, which he carried on in every county in which he ever lived, as well as many others.

Mr. Burroughs was married in Tuscaloosa county, Alabama, to Miss Louisa Fair Burton, a daughter of Samuel Burton, a merchant in Tuscaloosa, but of a South Carolina family. In 1845, as has already been stated, he brought his family and slaves with him and became a planter in Sabine county. There he lived and pursued his profession, as well as giving a deal of attention to his farm, so that he achieved a distinct success in two separate lines of enterprise. He continued with his farm until 1853, when he moved to Palestine, Texas, and there he became county surveyor of Anderson county, an office he had held in Sabine county while there resident, and he later held the same post in Leon county, being 'finally forced to discontinue his public work along that line by his family. He was never a candidate for any office, it should be stated, but he was always urged to accept the surveyorship because of his well known efficiency in his work.

Before the war came on Mr. Burroughs was a Union man, and he was one of the only two such in Anderson county, the other being John S. Martin. When Texas seceded from the Union both he and Mr. Martin seceded with it. Mr. Burroughs was a friend and follower of Sam Houston and when the Governor was deposed because of his Union stand the circumstances grieved Mr. Burroughs beyond description. Mr. Burroughs was an ordained Baptist minister, and he filled many appointments in the different counties where he lived. His children were as follows: Harriett E., who married Charles S. Burton, and died in Leon county; Dr. Burroughs, whose name heads this family review; and Andrew D., who was a practicing physician of Houston when he died there, leaving three children.

Benjamin F. Burroughs died on February 26, 1904, when he was eighty-five years of age, and his wife died on January 7, 1901.

Samuel Raymond Burroughs was reared in Palestine, Texas, and he had his education along preliminary lines in the high school of that place and the Mount Prairie Institute, where he was a student when the war broke out. He was in the graduating class for the approaching June, but entered the army with one of the teachers in March, 1861. He joined Company G, First Texas Regiment, of General Hood's Brigade, with Captain John R. Woodward and Colonel A. T. Rainey. The regiment was ordered to Richmond, Virginia, reaching there in April, 1861, and his first fight was at Eltham's landing. They were in action at Second Manassas, Seven Days Fight, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, back to Richmond, on to Suffolk, and thence back to Richmond at the conclusion of the Battle of the Wilderness, then Chickamauga, where the subject was taken prisoner while serving on picket duty, to which he had been placed personally by General Hood and was captured within a quarter of an hour by General McCook's body guard of cavalry. After an interview with General McCook and the exchange of a haversack with that officer for the haversack of his prisoner, containing some biscuits and fresh bacon that appealed to the jaded appetite of the general, the prisoners were disposed of and seated under guard for further disposition. Soon a third prisoner was added to the camp, this one proving to be "Steve," the colored servant of the Confederate Quartermaster of the First Texas, to which Dr. Burroughs belonged. The old darkey had been presented by his master with the new Captain's uniform of the latter; also his money, watch and other jewelry, the same to be disposed of by him in case of the death of the Captain, who had joined his comrades in the fight at Chickamauga. The old darkey was questioned by the two Yankee soldiers about being an officer in the Confederate army, but he refused at first to make a reply. Dr. Burroughs explained the situation to the Federals, but still the old negro was pestered about being a Confederate officer. He finally arose in his dignity and demanded of his captors: "Can't you tell an officer by his uniform?"

Dr. Burroughs was sent to Camp Douglas at Chicago and there he languished during the remainder of the war. Before going there, however, he was in a concentration camp at Chattanooga, and while there the old negro servant was hired against his will to become a cook for the Federal colonel. This he did chiefly at the encouragement of Dr. Burroughs, who saw in it a chance for Steve to escape back to the Confederate lines. Accordingly the darkey went to his duties as chef and the first day out, during the fight at Knoxville, he passed across into the very brigade he belonged to and joined his old friends.

After being permanently housed in the Camp Douglas barracks young Burroughs turned his attention to jewelry and trinket making, both as a means to occupy his mind and to turn his genius to a commercial account. He made rings of fine gold and had them engraved by a Chicago "underground artist"; made ornamental jewelry and disposed of his wares to officers and men of the Federal camp at prices that made a money belt around his waist a necessity, and when he was discharged from prison three hundred dollars of this accumulation was a part of his hidden regalia.

Notwithstanding the close guard that was kept upon the army of Confederate prisoners at Camp Douglas after the addition of the Chickamauga contingent, a movement was conceived for a brigade escape under the very eyes of the post-commandant. The whole official line of the brigade from corporal to general was sworn to secrecy by an oath that invoked corruption of the blood past the "third and fourth generations" for its violation, and orders from "headquarters" controlled the work without a hitch right up to the night of the scheduled escape. Three tunnels were planned and completed, one to the north, one to the south and another to the west, and the men were ordered to crawl through these underground passages at one o'clock in the morning, seize the arms deposited in a barn by the "Copperheads" of the North and take the artillery horses of the camp and escape to General Price's army in Missouri. Young Burroughs executed an important part in the completion of the west tunnel, planning the disposition of the dirt and scouring the box in which it was hauled out of the tunnel. When all was ready for the "delivery" a small Federal army surrounded the conspirators and sympathizers, and the plot collapsed as the result of the treason of a captain of the camp.

Some time following the frustration of the escape conspiracy, smallpox broke out in the camp and Confederates died a score a day. Dr. Burroughs was ordered to the pest house contingent in a livery stable stall and there battled with the disease. His curiosity as to the treatment being used by the hospital doctor led him to look at the prescription written on the slate of No. 8, before the doctor had passed from view. This led the physician to investigate his patient's purpose. Asked if he could read it, Burroughs responded in the affirmative, but the doctor was incredulous and wanted to be sure. Burroughs obliged him by reading the scientific terms for him, and when asked if many young men in Texas could do as much he replied that there were a thousand men in the army from that state who could read it.

The morning after this incident a package was delivered to cot No. 8 and upon examination of its contents Dr. Burroughs found a new suit of Confederate clothes, boots and underclothing—a present coming from the hand of the doctor, and for which the young Confederate convalescent was most grateful. The discovery that he was a druggist led early to his requisition by the camp authorities for service in the prison apothecary. The prison druggist being a bibulous and altogether unreliable man, Dr. Whitehill, chief medical adviser of the camp, summoned him to appear, and it was there arranged that young Burroughs should have charge of the prison drugstore, and with plenty of aids he should become responsible for the work of his department. He remained there until the last captive left the prison under special arrangement with Dr. Whitehill, and during the closing weeks of his confinement he witnessed the funeral train of President Lincoln as it passed through Chicago to the final resting place of the great man at Springfield.

On June 23, 1865, he took some of the prisoners to Chicago, got transportation for them to their homes, put them on their proper trains and then returned to his old post, parted with Dr. Whitehill, Post Surgeon in Chief, and was handed his transportation home to Texas. He walked from Shreveport to Palestine, and reached home in July. Thus ended his war experience, and it will not be denied that his military career was unique in its character.

Dr. Burroughs had been dead to his family since the battle of Chickamauga, having been so reported by a comrade, and he found his parents gone from the Palestine home. He soon joined them at Raymond in Leon county, and there he visited with his mother some little time before she recognized him.

Having been a student of medicine before the war, Dr. Burroughs entered the old Galveston Medical College and there continued until he was graduated in 1866, when he took up practice at Raymond. In addition to his medical practice, he occupied the chair of Chemistry and Medical Jurisprudence in his Alma Mater, continuing with that work for four years. He then moved to Houston, where he remained for some time, and then, in 1878, moved back to his farm home in Leon, giving up his work because of ill health, and, in fact, preparing for the end. His return to the farm and a cessation of his labors, however, proved beneficial to his health and in time he regained his former vigor, so that he resumed practice there and was one of the busiest and most successful physicians in the district. He aided in the organization of the Leon County Medical Society, becoming its first secretary, and he was later its president. He was a member of the Texas State Medical Association from its inception and was its president in 1888. He organized the Eleventh Medical District under the present organization, and was for six years a member of the state board of medical examiners, serving as president of the body during his last two years of service.

In June, 1896, Dr. Burroughs established himself in practice in Buffalo, and in addition to his widespread practice he became interested in the land business, and has taken a hand in certain financial organizations, among them the State Bank of Buffalo, which he assisted in the organization of, and of which he has since been president. The press of outside duties gradually drew him from his medical practice, and he retired definitely therefrom in 1913.

Dr. Burroughs has long been an active Democrat in the state, and has manifested a wholesome interest in party affairs wherever he has been located. He was a member of the State Executive Committee during the Hogg-Clark rupture of the Hogg party, and was present at the Dallas meeting when the factions harmonized later on.

The Doctor is a Mason since 1873, with Blue Lodge and Chapter affiliations. He has been a church man all his life, as an adherent of the Baptist faith, and he was superintendent of the Sunday school in Leon county, and is serving in the same office here.

On May 9, 1867, Dr. Burroughs married Miss Rebecca Antoinette Henry, a daughter of John Henry, of Alabama. To them were born the following children: Eva May, the wife of Joseph C. Hill, of Buffalo, Texas, with two children,—Mrs. Evan Sheffield and Braxton Burroughs Hill; Robert Edgar, a merchant of Buffalo, married Rebecca Holleman, and their children are Harry, Alma, Lottie, Lucile, Sterling, Robert, Sam and Fred; Cora Lee Burroughs married George Baker, and she is postmistress of Buffalo, with three children,—Hattie May, Pauline and Orion; Louella married Clarence Glenn, of Buffalo, and has one son—Burton Glenn. The Doctor has three great-grand-children—Antoinette Glenn, Wilber Lee and Eva Kate Sheffield.

LEE SEAMSTER, M. D. Among the professions the one making the most demands upon time, experience and study, is probably that of medicine, and to successfully practice this vocation its followers must at all times be willing to sacrifice everything for it. Through long and faithful application to his profession, Dr. Lee Seamster has become one of the foremost practitioners of Mineral Wells, and his well-directed efforts have been rewarded by a satisfactory measure of success. He was born July 4, 1852, in Hancock county, Illinois, and is a son of W. M. and Susan (Rigsby) Seamster. His father, a minister of the Missionary Baptist faith, was born in Georgia, moved to Missouri in young manhood, subsequently located in Illinois, and after the close of the Civil war returned to Missouri, where he died in 1884, the mother having passed away in 1875. Rev. W. M. Seamster was the father of eleven sons and eight daughters, by two marriages, and of these children all survive except four.

The ninth of his parents' children, Lee Seamster received his early education in the public schools of Illinois, following which he attended the State University, then located at Springfield, where he was graduated in 1871. Subsequently he went to a medical college in Chicago, and later attended the Eclectic Medical College, Philadelphia, and in 1873 received from that institution the degree of Doctor of Medicine. He first practiced in Hancock county, Illinois, for eight years, then removing to Louisville, Kentucky, and in 1890 came to Texas and located at Emory, in Rains county. There he continued until 1906, at which time he opened his offices in Mineral Wells, this city having since been his field of endeavor and the scene of his well-earned success. During 1910 and 1911 Dr. Seamster was in charge of the Mineral Wells Sanitarium. He is the only physician here that specializes in the treatment of pellegra, and one of the few in the United States, and his skill in this connection may be inferred from the fact that in eighty-seven cases handled during the past six years he has lost but three. His practice is large and representative, and he is widely known in the profession. A Democrat in politics, he at all times strives to elect the men whom he deems best fitted for the needs of the community, and as a member of the Commercial Club he has aided other earnest and public-spirited citizens to advance the interests of Mineral Wells.

On April 19, 1893, Doctor Seamster was married to Miss Virgie Terry, at Emory, Texas, daughter of John Terry, her father being a prominent farmer and treasurer of Rains county for a period of four years. Five children have been born to this union, aged as follows: Grace Lee, eighteen; Ross, sixteen; Norman, thirteen; Paul, ten, and Ethel, the baby, aged seven. All are attending school and being fitted for honorable positions in life. With his family, Dr. Seamster attends the Christian church, and is serving as a member of its directing board.

ARTHUR J. HUMPHRIS. Although one of the younger business men of western Texas, Arthur J. Humphris is well known throughout this section of the state. He makes his home in Sierra Blanca, where he is engaged in the mercantile business and he is also a large ranch owner in El Paso county. Mr. Humphris is a native of the state and has spent practically all of his life within her borders, so he has a very natural pride and ambition for her welfare. He has played a leading part in the local affairs of the various localities in which he has lived and wherever he has been he has proved himself to be a valuable citizen.

Arthur J. Humphris was born on the 10th of March, 1873, at Corpus Christi, Texas. His father was John Humphris, a native of England, and his mother, Mary Humphris, was also born in England. John Humphris came from his native country in 1869 and settled in the state of Maryland. He came from one of the oldest and best families in England, men of his race having been prominent in English history for generations. Shortly after coming to America he came to Corpus Christi, Texas and there entered the stock raising business. He was thus engaged for about three years and at the end of this time moved further west and located in Eagle Pass. Here on the Rio Grande he had a sheep, horse and cattle ranch, and in the town he was for a time engaged in the mercantile business. His ranch proved to be a very successful proposition and was widely known as the "Indio Ranch." He remained here until 1884 when he went to Marfa, Texas and there engaged in the general merchandise business. He did not give up stock raising, however, but continued with much success in his new location. He was the owner of quite a range at this time and owing to the increase in the number of cattle raisers in this district, he after a time abandoned sheep raising and devoted himself exclusively to raising horses and cattle. He continued in this business up to the time of his death in 1906. His widow survived him and is living at the old home in Marfa, Texas. There were five children born to Mr. and Mrs. Humphris, three boys and two girls, all of whom are living.

Of these children Arthur J. Humphris was the third. He received his elementary education in the public schools of Marfa and then went to the Academy of San Marcos, Texas. He later took a business course in San Antonio and then returned home where he entered his father's employ as bookkeeper. He continued in this way for some time and then went into the cattle business in Presidio county, Texas. He made a success of this business as had his father before him and continued thus until 1908 when he came to Sierra Blanca, Texas, and here entered the general mercantile business. He has continued in this business up to the present time and has built up a reputation for being a keen and able business man. He expects to give up this business soon and devote himself entirely to his ranch and stock business.

Mr. Humphris is a member of the Republican party, but like most of the wide-awake men of today he prefers to vote according to the candidate and not the party. He was justice of the peace in Brewster county, Texas, when he lived at Terlingua. He only served one term and this is the only office that he has held, for he does not care for public life.

Mr. Humphris was married on the 10th of November, 1906, to Miss Bessie Study, a daughter of William and Minnie Study, of Pennsylvania. William Study was a merchant at Tyrone, Pennsylvania, for a number of years and is now living in the old home in the above mentioned town. Mr. and Mrs. Humphris have two children, Elizabeth and Eleanor, aged seven and five respectively.

JOHN H. TAFF. For the past ten years county and district clerk of Presidio county, Mr. Taff is a man of most versatile ability and accomplishments. He has been a teacher, is a lawyer, bank director and county officer, and has also been successfully identified with the ranching of this section of Texas, where he has been an honored resident for a quarter of a century.

John H. Taff, a son of Albert G. and Tirzah A. Taff, was born in Meigs county, Tennessee, December 3, 1860. When he was eight years of age his parents removed to Arkansas, where they remained three years and then returned to Tennessee, and when he was seventeen years of age another migration was made to Arkansas, where Mr. John H. Taff lived until 1887. His early education was obtained in the public schools of Tennessee and Arkansas, and he entered the State University of Arkansas and was graduated in 1887. He subsequently took a special course to equip himself for the duties of teacher at the National Normal University in Lebanon, Ohio. One of his most prized possessions is a life certificate as teacher issued by the State of Arkansas for efficiency in normal work at both Normal School and University. On leaving the Normal at Lebanon he went to Florida, and was engaged in teaching there for about one year, at the end of which time the yellow fever plague drove him out and he then came to Texas.

Thus becoming a resident in Presidio county he has been actively identified with this region ever since. During the first fourteen years he taught school and spent more than ten years in the office of the United States Commissioner. In 1903 he was appointed to the office of county and district clerk and he has been elected to and filled that place to the complete satisfaction of all concerned down to the present time. He has prospered well in all his undertakings and at the present time owns a ranch near Marfa stocked with fine cattle. He is also a director in the Marfa National Bank, having been connected with this institution for six years. Since coming to Texas he has studied law, and was admitted to the Texas bar, but has never followed the profession in practice though he finds his knowledge of great use in a business way, and in the conduct of his office.

Mr. Taff was married at Paris, Texas, July 5, 1899, to Addy M. Leverett, a daughter of Charles Leverett, who for many years was professor of ancient languages in the University of Arkansas. The three sons and three daughters who compose their home circle are named Catherine E., John L. Maybell, Whitham B., Carroll M. and Blanche A. Mrs. Taff is an active member of the Episcopal church, and her husband favors all the churches without any special affiliation with any one. He is a Mason and has his membership in the Blue Lodge, the Chapter and the Council. In local affairs he is one of the leaders of the Presidio county Democracy. His diversions are hunting and fishing and literature and music, and the general social fellowship which he and his family enjoy in this community.

JESSE MCKEE. Until recently one of the energetic newspaper men of Texas, connected with his profession in different localities of the state, and well known in the newspaper field, Jesse McKee until 1913 was editor and publisher of the Sanderson Times, and a vigorous booster for the interests of that town and for west Texas in general. He spent several years in building up a journal of large influence and circulation at Sanderson, and the Times became one of the best papers along the Rio Grande valley and the route of the Southern Pacific railroad, and to a large degree it represented the journalistic ideals and standards of Mr. McKee. Since retiring from his newspaper work in Sanderson in July, 1913, Mr. McKee has been engaged in sawmilling near his native city of Seguin.

Jesse McKee was born in Seguin, Texas, August 15, 1882. His father was James F. McKee, a native of Kentucky, who came to Texas during the early forties, and spent virtually all his active career in public service. He filled various offices of trust and responsibility, was county judge of Guadalupe county for about eighteen years, was for two terms in the Texas state legislature, and for eight years was a United States custom officer. He was a very active member of the Presbyterian church. His death occurred in 1908 when he was past eighty years of age, and he was buried in Schleicher county. The maiden name of his wife was Lou Brill, who was born in Texas in 1845, the year in which the Republic of Texas became the state of Texas and entered the union of states. She is still living and resides at Seguin her native town. There were eight children in the family and Jesse was the seventh in order of birth.

John H. Taff

W. C. Buford

Judge 4th Judicial Dist Texas

Wm W. C. Buford.

Mr. McKee as a boy attended both public and private schools and was only thirteen years of age when he left school and began making his own way. The first regular position which he filled marked out for him his destiny in life, and from the day he first entered a printing office and began learning the manifold duties of the printer's trade he has never long been separated from some branch of the art. During his career he has traveled extensively all over Texas and the southwest, and has for different times done reportorial and other work for many newspapers in the state. In June 1909 he arrived in Sanderson and after one year of employment in the Times office bought the entire plant and became sole proprietor.

Mr. McKee was married at Sanderson on May 4, 1911, to Mrs. Callie Taylor, who was born in Trinity county, Texas. They are the parents of one son, Shirley McKee. The family worship in the Presbyterian church and fraternally Mr. McKee is a Mason, an Odd Fellow and a member of the Woodmen of the World and the Pretorians. He has held offices in both the Masons and Odd Fellows Lodges, and was the first vice grand in the Odd Fellows Lodge in Sanderson. Until recently he was secretary of the Sanderson Commercial Club, and through his wide information about all the resources of that section and his official connection with the principal commercial publicity bureau of the town did an important service in answering letters of inquiry concerning the business and agricultural conditions. In political affairs Mr. McKee is independent and progressive, and has always followed political questions and activities closely though not a very strong party man himself. He served two times in the office of justice of the peace and was also president of the Sanderson School Board. Among the general amusements of life Mr. McKee is fond of hunting, fishing, the theater and good reading, and likes to attend a good public speech or lecture.

EDWARD G. PIPER. In the variety and interests of his experiences few citizens of El Paso have enjoyed so notable a career as Edward G. Piper. Mr. Piper has spent nearly all his life in El Paso, his family having been pioneers of the southwest. He has the distinction of being a Rough Rider, and after his service in the Cuban war with that noted cavalry regiment, he also spent two years in the Philippines. On returning from the island possessions of the United States he equipped himself for the civil engineering profession, and was for a number of years connected with that line of work and railway and other enterprises. Mr. Piper is now proprietor of a large blue-print and general drafting supply establishment, with office at 602 San Antonio street. He is also proprietor of all the official maps of El Paso.

Mr. Piper was born in San Francisco, California, February 6, 1879, a son of John E. and N. L. Piper. His father was a locomotive engineer in the employ of the Santa Fe Railway, having begun work for that road at Las Vegas, New Mexico, in 1879 in the capacity of a fireman, and having first come to Texas as an engineer with the road in 1881. Las Vegas was at the time he began his connection with the Santa Fe the western terminus of the Santa Fe System. He has continued one of the old and reliable employes of the road up to the present time and now has his home at 1020 Upson avenue in El Paso, where he and his wife reside. There were but two children in their family, and the daughter is now Mrs. C. B. Eifort, her husband being train-master of the El Paso & Southwestern Railway, and a resident at Douglas, Arizona.

Mr. Piper received his early education in the public schools of El Paso, and after his military career took a course in civil engineering at the New Mexico College at Mesilla Park. In 1898, when nineteen years of age, he enlisted as a volunteer with the Rough Riders'

Organization, the commander of which was Theodore Roosevelt, this regiment being mustered in as the First United States Volunteer Cavalry for the war with Spain. He accompanied the Rough Riders to Cuba and went through the campaign until along in the month of July, 1898, when on account of sun-stroke and yellow fever he was invalided and sent to the government hospital at Governors Island, New York. Subsequently he was sent home on sick leave and was among the last of his command to be discharged. In 1899, on his recovery, he again enlisted, this time in the Eleventh United States Volunteer Cavalry, for service in the Philippines. In these Islands he spent two years and saw much hard and severe fighting and general duty during the subjugation of the insurgent islanders. After his return to the state he entered the college in New Mexico, and completing his course in civil engineering became connected with surveying corps and several railroads in different states of the west. In 1907, Mr. Piper located in El Paso and entered the service of the International Boundary Commission. Leaving this service in 1909 he engaged in his present business, his first office being at 415 East Overland street, from which location on account of the large increase in his business he moved to his present location at 602 San Antonio street.

Mr. Piper is in politics an Independent, and has taken little part in party affairs. His preference among the churches is for the Presbyterian. On October 25, 1905, he married Miss Theodolinda Carrera of Las Cruces, New Mexico. Her parents were Professor Julius C. and Felicia Carrera. Professor Carrera, her father, attained his education in the Christian Brothers' College at St. Louis, and for many years was recognized as one of the most expert mineralogists of the entire southwest. At the present time he is retired from his profession and he and his wife makes their home in El Paso. Mr. and Mrs. Piper are the parents of one daughter, Miss Adeline Lair, who was born September 13, 1912, on her grandfather Piper's sixtieth birthday anniversary.

Mr. Piper is a descendent from one of the oldest American families. On his father's side his grandfather was a Revolutionary soldier and a colonel in the army, and on his mother's side his grandfather was an English captain, and his family settled at an early date in Pennsylvania. On the maternal side a number of the family became early settlers in Illinois.

JUDGE WILLIAM CLARK BUFORD. There is no better example of the modern judge, the jurist who combines all the old-time qualities of impartiality and sound learning with that systematic efficiency, which dispenses justice with a minimum of delays, and to the advantage of all parties concerned, than the present district judge of the Fourth Judicial district, composed of the counties of Gregg, Rusk, Panola, and Shelby. Judge William Clark Buford, though for many years a lawyer, and with a distinguished record in public affairs, is more of a farmer from personal inclination at least than a lawyer. His home has been in Texas since 1874, and he comes of one of the old and distinguished families of the south.

William Clark Buford was born in DeSoto county, Mississippi, March 7, 1854, a son of Abram Buford, who was born in Giles county, Tennessee, in 1829, and a grandson of James Buford, who settled in Tennessee in the early years of the nineteenth century and became possessed of a magnificent landed estate near Pulaski. This numerous and pioneer American family was introduced into this country from Gravesend, England, by Richard Buford, who settled in Virginia, and whose posterity is very numerous. Henry Buford belonged to the fifth generation from Richard, and married Mary Osborn. The line from this couple to Judge Buford runs through, James, James, and James, the last James being the grandfather of the judge. That the family were patriots is evident from the numerous members who were soldiers in the Revolutionary war, and that they were fighting people is shown by the men who were either Confederate or Federal soldiers, in the war between the states. However, the prevailing vocation since the days of first settlement has been agriculture.

Grandfather James Buford was a young man when he left Amelia county, Virginia, his native place. He had several brothers, but there was only one sister, Eliza, who married a young Virginia lawyer who came out to Tennessee, where the Bufords then lived, and took away the belle of the family. The name of this young Virginian lawyer was W. W. Wingfield, who in 1838 brought his bride to Texas, settling in Nacogdoches, where he was a large planter and slave owner, and displayed strikingly his aristocratic tendencies in his dress and bearing and acquired the title of "Judge Wingfield." His only child was Mary Eliza, who married R. W. Hall, and spent her life at Henderson, Texas. Grandfather James Buford maintained many of the best traditions of his family. His career was one not only of financial but of social success. His acres in Tennessee were broad, his slaves numerous, and his name was always spoken with a peculiar degree of respect in his home county. For a long time he did a large business at Pulaski with Tom Martin, a Virginia friend, who came out to Tennessee with him, but his principal achievement rested in his accomplishments as a planter and breeder of fine stock. He produced everything consumed on the plantation, except the iron and salt, and his life was typical of the ideal country gentleman of that generation. It was given him among political honors, a distinction to be elected the first sheriff of Giles county, and later he was sent to the lower house of the Tennessee legislature. He was a Democrat and a Primitive Baptist, and believed so ardently in both his political and religious views, that he had very little to do with his brother Spencer, who was a Whig and an Episcopalian. James Buford married Mary Giddings, and his brothers Charles and Spencer married her sisters. James and wife had ten children, and of these Abraham Buford was one of the younger. One of them, Dr. John Buford, died near LaGrange, Texas, unmarried, and another, Edward, died in Van-Zandt county, leaving a family.

Abraham Buford, father of Judge Buford, began life with a practical education, and a splendid training as a farmer. As he approached his majority he became dissatisfied with his native locality, and moved into the cotton regions of Mississippi. In 1850 his father provided him and two of his brothers with teams, negroes, and a general farming equipment, and bought for each of them a large tract of land in Yalla Busha county, Mississippi. Abram lived near Oakland a short time and then moved to DeSoto county, Mississippi, which was his home until after the war. His next move took him to Lincoln county, Arkansas, where he bought a large plantation in the valley of the Arkansas River, and continued as a planter there until 1883. He then moved to Texas and died in Rusk county, January 6, 1889.

During the war between the states Abram Buford was color bearer of the Twenty-ninth Mississippi Infantry, a regiment which fought with the Tennessee army. He took part in the various operations of his regiment, around Shiloh, Corinth, Murfreesboro, Chickamanga, Jonesboro (where he was seriously wounded), Chattanooga, and during the Georgian campaign. An impediment in his speech prevented his acceptance of a promotion to the rank of a commissioned officer. After four years of war, he accepted its results, and went back to his farm. Abram Buford married Elvira Bryan, a daughter of William A. Bryan, a Cumberland Presbyterian minister of Kentucky, and of Irish descent. The children of their marriage were: William Clark; and Ida, wife of Dr. J. E. Dodson, of Vernon, Texas. Five of their children died before marriage.

William Clark Buford was a fixture on his father's cotton plantation in DeSoto county, Mississippi, until he was sixteen years old. His preparatory training in book learning was received under the tuition of members of the Stewart family, who were conspicuous not only as soldiers but as scholars. In 1869 Judge Buford entered the Mississippi University at Oxford, graduating Bachelor of Science in 1872. His father having in the meantime moved to Arkansas, he followed him and for two years assisted in clearing up the business details and introducing system to his father's clerical matters. When Judge Buford came to Texas in 1874, he was on his way to southern California to take a position with a civil engineering party, headed by Thomas Topp, a relative of the Bufords in Tennessee, and whom he had met on his first visit to his father's old home after his graduation. Coming through Texas, at the request of his father, Judge Buford stopped for a time to look after the family interests in large tracts of lands in Texas, which had been purchased by Grandfather James Buford. While in Texas Judge Buford was directed by his father to call upon R. W. Hall, whose wife was a Buford, as already stated, and who had previously kept in touch with the Texas land owned in the family. In Mr. Hall's household William C. Buford, then a young man in his twenties, found a young lady whose attractions he could not resist, and who was responsible for his decision not to proceed to California, but to stay in Texas. His first year in Texas was spent as a teacher. In 1875, came his admission to the bar at Carthage, by Judge George Lane, and the examining committee were Judges Booty, Hazlewood, Thomas F. Hull, and Drury Field, the last being one of the leading lawyers of Henderson, and subsequently a law partner of Judge Buford. Judge Buford practiced law all over his district, and was never out of harness, as a lawyer, until appointed district judge. One of his interesting cases came up while he was mayor of the city of Henderson. A movement was under way for the issue of bonds to pay for a new school house in the city. Mr. Buford at that time raised the question of the ability of the city to issue marketable bonds, because of its faulty and illegal incorporation. Mayor Buford in order to clear the city corporation of these defects in its municipal powers, prepared both the pleadings and the answers, sued himself as mayor of the city, and both prosecuted and defended the case before the local courts.

Judge Buford's first active participation in politics occurred when he became a candidate for the office of county judge of Rusk county. That was soon after his admission to the bar. He got an instructed delegation for his nomination by the convention, but the regular politicians were against him, and sufficient instructions were violated to nominate another man. Judge Buford submitted to the outrage, but the experience led to later trouble in the Democratic family. In 1880 came his next important political experience, when he participated in the judicial scramble. His law partner, Drury Field, was a candidate for district judge in the convention. The "old guard" again showed its power and defeated Mr. Field by the use of methods that a large faction of the Democratic party could not sanction, and Mr. Field was induced to become an independent candidate. For several years Judge Buford was a member of the board of managers, and examiners of schools for Rusk county, along with Dr. Cooper and Mr. J. C. Hickey. In that capacity he made speeches and addresses and adjusted difficulties all over the county, and the experience gave him a strong attachment to the cause of free education, an affection which has not grown less with the subsequent years. In August, 1907, Governor Campbell appointed Mr. Buford district judge to fill out the unexpired term of Judge Levy. In 1908 he was elected his own successor, and in 1912 again was endorsed by a large vote of the people. Through his system and energy Judge Buford has cleared up the court's docket of this district, and has maintained a standard of judicial efficiency seldom found in any district of the state.

On October 26, 1879, Judge Buford married Miss Susan Christian Hall, daughter of R. W. Hall. Their children are: Robert Abram, a former pension commissioner of Texas, and now a lawyer at Austin; he married Miss Christine Littlefield, and they have a son, Robert Littlefield; Mary Gladys, second child of Judge Buford, is the wife of Earl C. Douglas, of Houston, and their son is Earl C., Jr. Miss Elva is the third of the family; and W. W. Buford is the farmer and stockman of the household. Misses Donna and Susan C. are the youngest members of the family circle.

Judge Buford has spent his life on a farm, notwithstanding his activities as a lawyer and in public affairs. This inclination was inherited from the Bufords in previous generations, and the disposition for the law was acquired from his mother's side. These two tendencies have been in constant conflict in the career of Judge Buford, and even to this day he hardly knows whether to call himself a farmer or a professional man. In the meantime he has given much thought and time to both horticultural and general agricultural matters, and owns one of the model suburban farms at Henderson, in which wholesome environment he has reared his family.

J. MART MOUNGER. The present county collector of Kaufman county, is now serving in his second term, and is one of the vigorous business men and enterprising citizens whose residence in the county has been continuous for the past twenty-five years. For many years Mr. Mounger was identified with the town of Forney, moving to Kaufman city when elected to his present office. His home has been in Texas since 1883, having come out from Calhoun county, Mississippi, to Holland, in Bell county, Texas, in January of that year.

Mr. Mounger was born in Calhoun county, Mississippi, June 1, 1859. His parents died when he was an infant. His father, Henry Mounger, a native of Mississippi and the son of a planter, went into the Confederate army in 1861. During the following year he returned home at the time of his wife's death, and after going back to the army was never again heard from. His wife's maiden name was Nancy J. Cooper, and their children were: George H., a blacksmith, and ex-Confederate soldier, living at Lellsworth, Louisiana; John R., a farmer of Comanche, Texas; Henry, of Eupora, Mississippi; Roderick O., who died in Big Creek, in 1888, unmarried; Kenneth Cooper, who died in Forney, Texas, in 1896; and J. Mart. J. Mart Mounger lived with his oldest brother after the death of his parents, but at the age of sixteen declared his personal independence by running away from his brother's home. He worked about the community of Big Creek for two years, and made his headquarters with R. S. Shipp, whose home came to be recognized as his own before he left the state of Mississippi. His education was supplied entirely by the country schools, and his youth was spent on a farm. His vocation was changed to a merchant's clerk, when he came to Texas. His home continued to be at Holland in Bell county until 1887, when it was moved to Forney. There his career continued as a salesman, later he became a cotton buyer, and subsequently conducted a breeding barn for a period of twenty-three years. These several vocations were followed somewhat in the order mentioned, and formed his chief calling as a business man.

A number of years ago Mr. Mounger began taking considerable interest in local politics, and was occasionally sent with other delegates to local and other Democratic conventions. He was in the state convention that nominated Governor Ross the second time, and was one of the delegates participating in the Democratic convention which named Governor Campbell to succeed himself. Outside of the state his political service consisted as a delegate at the Kansas City Democratic National Convention, and also the St. Louis Convention which nominated Judge Parker for President. His own political aspirations for office took form in 1910, when against four competitors he won the nomination in the primaries for tax collector. His election followed as a matter of course, and in 1912 he was given the second nomination without opposition. Mr. Mounger's predecessor in office was Ole M. Jaaland. His second term will close in 1914, and it is Mr. Mounger's belief that no public official should serve more than two terms consecutively. During his residence in Forney, Mr. Mounger was vice-president of Lily Lake Building & Investment Company, and was a property owner in the thrifty country town at the west entrance to Kaufman county.

On July 8, 1886, Mr. Mounger married Miss Alice T. Traylor, daughter of Jordan and Mary A. (Dye) Traylor, substantial farming people of the state of Georgia. Mrs. Mounger was the youngest of nine children, and the only one now living. The young couple after their marriage made their way to Texas by railroad, and their careers began in humble circumstances as was well possible, and their industry has long since made them comfortable in their material circumstances, and both are held in high esteem in their home county. Mr. Mounger is a past chancellor of the Knights of Pythias, and has sat in the grand lodge of Texas. He and his wife are members of the Christian church.

FRANK RABB. Distinguished as one of the large land holders of southwestern Texas and as a successful capitalist, Frank Rabb, of Brownsville, although in the early prime of a vigorous manhood, is a commanding figure in the financial, agricultural and political circles of Cameron and adjoining counties, and takes an abiding interest in all that goes to conserve the city of his home. A son of John Rabb, he was born in Nueces county, Texas. His grandfather, Andrew Rabb, was one of the very early settlers of Texas, coming here with Stephen F. Austin's colony during the twenties.

John Rabb was born in LaGrange, Fayette county, Texas, and was reared to agricultural pursuits, during his early life performing much pioneer labor. He was very successful in his undertakings, becoming the owner of extensive tracts of land and acquired much wealth. After his marriage he established a home in Nueces county, and on the ranch that he improved, spent the remainder of his life, dying in 1870.

Frank Rabb obtained a good education in his youthful days, attending school at Maysville, Kentucky, and in Dayton, Ohio. He is a large land owner, having title to two valuable ranches, Las Palmas, his country home, which is located eight miles from Brownsville, and where he has resided since 1891, and another ranch adjoining the town of Santa Maria in Cameron county.

Las Palmas has a wonderfully picturesque location on the banks of the Rio Grande, contiguous to the Indiana Canal, in the heart of an immense sugar producing region. Among its many charming attractions is a large grove of that rare variety of palms known as the Sabal Mexicana, it being the only grove of the kind in the entire United States, and gives to this beautiful estate a distinction enjoyed by no other part of Texas. Las Palmas contains ten thousand acres of land, its productive soil responding readily to the hand of the skilled agriculturist, the three hundred acres which Mr. Rabb has put under cultivation yielding abundantly of the crops to which this valley is adapted. The driveways through this plantation are shaded on either side by stately palms and lead one past jungles of heavy undergrowth, fields of waving corn, snowy cotton or luxurious vegetable gardens, all of which are surrounded by beautiful palm trees rather than unsightly fences, giving an unwonted charm to the landscape and a never-to-be-forgotten joy to the eye of the beholder.

The country residence of Mr. Rabb, located on one edge of the palm grove, is an ideal home in every respect, being fanned by the cool breezes which constantly blow from the Gulf during the summer season, while the view from the verandas or the handsome two-story brick structure, in which the friends of the family are so hospitably entertained, is one of great charm.

The Santa Maria tract, the other ranch of Mr. Rabb, lies twenty-eight miles above Brownsville, on the Rio Grande, and is the highest point on the river for many miles in either direction. Its seven thousand acres of land are irrigable, and possesses very rich alluvial soil, susceptible to the highest culture. It is crossed not only by the "Spiderweb" Interurban Railway, but also by the Hidalgo branch of the St. Louis, B. & M. Railroad, making it a suitable location for a town site.

An earnest supporter of the principles of the Democratic party, Mr. Rabb attended the Wilson state mass meeting held at Waco in 1912, at which time he and Dr. A. H. Evans, of Eagle Pass, were made joint chairman of the Wilson forces for the Fifteenth Congressional District. Subsequently an attendant at the Democratic state convention in Houston, Mr. Rabb was named as an alternate delegate to the Baltimore convention, where he took the seat of an absent Texas delegate and proved himself one of the most active and energetic participants in the brilliant work of the "immortal forty," which did such effective work in securing Wilson's nomination as a presidential candidate. Now, in January, 1913, Mr. Rabb is himself a candidate for collector of customs at the port of Brownsville.

Mr. Rabb married Miss Lillian M. Stark, who was born in Brownsville.

BARTHOLOMEW HELM BLANKENSHIP. For many years and up to the time of his death in May, 1911, the late Bartholomew Helm Blankenship was one of the most vigorous business men and public spirited citizens of Dallas. He was never an office seeker, or a politician, but worked with great energy and disinterested spirit for the advancement of his home city. He was untiring in his efforts to make the Dallas Fair Association, of which he was one of the organizers, a success, and his efforts must be credited with a large share of the prosperity and influence which for so many years have attended that great organization.

The late Mr. Blankenship was born in Russell county, Kentucky, on March 18, 1847, a son of Hudson and Nancy (Helm) Blankenship. His great grandfather, who lived to be one hundred and fourteen years of age, fought in the war of 1812. His name was Jesse Blankenship, a native of Virginia, who came out to Kentucky during the pioneer days, and was a personal friend of Daniel Boone, and made settlement on the Cumberland River in Tennessee. Hudson Blankenship, the father of the Dallas business man, was a planter, and died in Kentucky. The late Mr. Blankenship was the oldest of five children, the others being: Ann, deceased; Sarah, wife of James McClure, who lives on the great-grandfather's farm, in Kentucky; Martha, wife of Benjamin Wooldridge, a farmer of Oklahoma, and Mary, wife of E. L. McFarland, who lives on the old Blankenship place in Kentucky. The two youngest daughters were twins.

Bartholomew H. Blankenship grew up in Kentucky, had his education in that state, and when a young man moved out to Texas. His first location in this state was at Lockhart, where he became identified with merchandising, and was married while living there. He continued in the mercantile business at Lockhart for nine years, and in 1880 moved to Dallas, and here founded the wholesale mercantile house of Blankenship & Blake. In 1890 he went into banking, and in 1893, founded a brokerage office, which he conducted until his death. The late Mr. Blankenship was a Democrat in his political affiliations. In Masonry he was well known, had taken all the degrees of the York Rite, and a prominent member of Lodge, Chapter and Commandery, holding all the offices in the local lodge.

In 1874, Mr. Blankenship married Miss Emily Collins, who was born in Louisiana, a daughter of Thomas F. and Mary (Norwood) Collins, the mother a native of Louisiana, and the father of South Carolina. Both parents are now deceased. Her father was an attorney and a planter, and first practiced law in Jackson, Mississippi, afterwards moving to Louisiana, where he took up farming and planting. Mrs. Blankenship was one of nine children, and the only one now living. Of her brothers, one was a successful attorney. The four children born to Mr. and Mrs. Blankenship are mentioned as follows: Frank is assistant cashier of the American Exchange National Bank of Dallas, is married and has one child, Margaret; Norwood is a jeweler in Dallas, and has one child, Norwood, Jr.; Florence is the wife of R. H. Shuttles, at the head of the well known wholesale firm of Shuttles Brothers & Lewis, jewelers and importers, of Dallas, and they have two children, Robert and Dorothy. The youngest son, Robert E. L., is also a member of the last named jewelry firm in Dallas. The home of Mrs. Blankenship in Dallas is at 1802 Park Row.

JOHN T. FITZSIMON, M. D. Since 1896 engaged in practice at Castroville and previously at San Antonio, Dr. FitzSimon is a man of many talents and has been prominent in his profession, in politics, church and social affairs and during more than twenty years residence in Texas he has stood for the better things of life, is a gentleman of the highest type and a social leader in the best sense of the term. He is a former president of the Catholic Knights of America for Texas.

Born in Dublin, Ireland, in 1862, John T. FitzSimon is a son of Nicholas and Mary A. A. (Plunkett) FitzSimon, both of whom were natives of Ireland. Reared in his native city, he had most of his education in St. Lawrence O'Toole's Seminary of that city. On emigrating to America in 1881 and locating in Chicago, he became a student in the Chicago College of pharmacy until graduating, and was then employed at his profession in Chicago. Moving from Chicago to Texas, he took up the study of medicine in the Memphis Hospital Medical College of Memphis, Tennessee, and received his M. D. from that institution in 1892.

Dr. FitzSimon has been identified with Texas since the year of his graduation, 1892, and spent four years in active practice in San Antonio. During part of that time he was physician in charge of the city hospital, and enjoyed a high place in the medical fraternity of the Alamo city. Dr. FitzSimon moved to Castroville, Medina county, in 1896, and in the years which have followed, his reputation and practice as a physician and surgeon have extended over a large section of territory, to the northeast, north and northwest of Castroville. He has made himself extremely popular in the historical town of Castroville, not only as a professional man but as a civic leader. The politics of that county has known him as a factor for a number of years, and while never seeking office for himself, he has organized and taken a leading part in several campaigns, has served times as chairman of the Democratic executive committee and is still a member of that body.

In his religious relations a Catholic, Dr. FitzSimon has taken all the degrees and is well known in the Knights of Columbus. In the Catholic Knights of America, a much older organization under the auspices of the church, he is easily one of the most prominent in the state, and in 1911 was honored by the order with election as president for the state, serving three years.

Dr. FitzSimon was married in Chicago to Miss Theodora Ockelmann, who was born in Hamburg, Germany. They are the parents of ten children, named as follows: Louis N., Mary A., Theodora A., Laurence J., Thomas, Bernard, James G., John P., Patricia and Anthony J.

EDWIN E. BEWLEY is the son of the late M. P. Bewley, who spent many years of his life in building up the business of which his son is now the head. He came to Texas in 1876 and located in Fort Worth where he entered the grain business. He continued in this way until 1882 when he established what are now known as the Bewley Mills. He made a decided success of this venture and when he died in 1906 he left a good sized fortune. He was a very public spirited man and in the ranks of the leaders in Fort Worth, being always ready to give his services in the effort to advance the interests of the city. He married Miss Hallie C. Samuel.

E. E. Bewley was born in Fort Worth, on the 2nd of October, 1881. Graduating from the city schools, he matriculated at the University of Texas and there he received his B. L. degree in 1902, and in 1903 took his M. A. degree. Upon his return to Fort Worth he went in to the milling business with his father and under his guidance learned the business thoroughly.

In 1906 Mr. Bewley, senior, died and the reins fell to the hands of the son. He has administered the business with success. The Bewley Mills have an output of fifteen hundred barrels of flour a day. They make as a specialty a flour that is known as Bewley's Best, The Blue Ribbon Brand. They also manufacture all standard high grade flour, meal and feed. In 1910 the mill was incorporated under the laws of the state of Texas with a capital stock of one hundred thousand dollars. The plant itself is full electric driven, modern in every detail, with all the improved machinery used in grain handling and flour milling. In addition to the fire proof storage elevator at Fort Worth, elevators are operated at Keller, Krum and Roanoke, Texas.

Mr. Bewley is president of the Justin Mill and Elevator Company of Justin, Texas, and is president of the Anderson Brothers Roller Mill of Cleburne, Texas. He is active in a number of the most important financial enterprises in Fort Worth, being a director in the Farmers and Mechanics National Bank of Fort Worth, and also of the Fort Worth Life Insurance Company. He is president of the Texas National Fire Insurance Company and treasurer of Miller's Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Texas.

EDWARD LEVIS BIRMINGHAM, M. D. For many years, following the Civil war and until his death in 1866, Dr. Edward Levis Birmingham was a successful practitioner of medicine in Uvalde county, and gave his services and skill to the residents of a large section in southwest Texas. He was esteemed both as a physician and as a citizen, and his name is spoken with respect among a great many people still living in Uvalde county.

Edward Levis Birmingham was born in Tennessee in 1836, a son of E. L. Sr., and Matilda (Halsey) Birmingham. The father was a native of England, coming to America when a boy. The mother was born in Tennessee. They were the parents of ten children, as follows: John, Elvira, Melvina, Pauline, Mary, Annie, Dr. Edward L., and Thomas, all of whom are deceased; Josephine Bagley, a widow of San Marcos, Texas, and Halsey, also deceased.

Dr. Birmingham was reared on his father's farm in Tennessee, and while growing up, assisted in the labors of the homestead, and in the meantime attended the district schools of that community. He was chiefly engaged in farming up to the time of the Civil war, and then enlisted under General Macrae in Arkansas, and saw a good deal of active service. He was never wounded, and when the war was over he returned home and took up the study of medicine. Several years after his graduation at Louisville, Kentucky, he began practice in Uvalde, Texas, and continued in the active work of his profession in that vicinity until his death in 1866. The late Doctor Birmingham stood high in his profession and in addition was interested in business affairs. After his death his widow moved to Wilev, Texas, where her home was for ten years, and in 1911 she came to Dallas, where she now lives with her children at 833

West Eighth street. At Uvalde in addition to his other interests, Dr. Birmingham owned a drug store. He was a Democrat in politics, but was never a seeker for office. Fraternally he was affiliated with Masonry. He was a broadminded and public spirited citizen, and took special interest in the upbuilding of schools in his vicinity. In 1866 Dr. Birmingham married Miss Luredtia Thomas, a native of Tennessee, and a daughter of John F. and Nancy (Davis) Thomas. Her mother was born in Tennessee, while her father came from North Carolina to Tennessee, when a young man, and in 1844 moved to Mississippi. He was a farmer by occupation. To the marriage of Dr. Birmingham and wife there were born five children: Emma, wife of E. L. Pulliam, an oil man of Temple, Oklahoma, and has two children; Thomas F., is an oil man at Houston, Texas, and has two children; Otho died at the age of twenty-six unmarried; Bessie is unmarried, and lives at Dallas with her mother; however spending much of her time as a traveling saleswoman; Pearl is single and at home and teaches in the city schools of Dallas.

JOHN M. BARRON. It has been said that the career of the men engaged in mercantile lines is less conspicuous before the world than that of a member of a learned profession, or of one who mingles in affairs of a public nature; but it is none the less one of arduous labor, thorough engrossment, and requiring a high order of organizing talent, watchfulness of the trend of affairs and financial skill. Scattered all along the reefs which border business waters are found the wrecks of trading barks which embarked upon their voyages with favoring winds and brilliant prospects, proving how uncertain and capricious is mercantile life. The characteristics possessed by John M. Barron that have enabled him to guide his business craft through the treacherous currents and to weather the financial storms of his career have been the utmost watchfulness, the strictest fidelity and the most persistent application. Through these and well-directed industry, he has placed himself at the head of a sound mercantile business at Iola, and has also successfully entered into other lines of endeavor which have made him one of the substantial men of his community.

Mr. Barron was born December 9, 1858, in Loundes county, Alabama, came to Bryan, Texas, in 1869, and in 1870 located in Brazos county, where he resided until 1889, that year marking his advent in Grimes county. His father, Erwin Barron, was a farmer of Alabama, who died there in 1868. He married Amelia Soles, a daughter of Joseph Soles, a planter of Loundes county, and she died in Texas, near Bryan, in 1904. The following children were in the family: Annie, who died in Brazos county as Mrs. Gray; Eliza, who is the wife of D. M. Dansby, of Bryan; James W., who is district clerk of Brazos county; Fannie, who died young; Elmina, who married John McCulloch and died in Brazos county; John M., of this review; and Pinkney L., of Welborn, Texas.

Mr. Barron's mother led the family to Texas, coming by train the year after the father's death. During the first year she conducted a hotel at Bryan, and then moved to a farm in the Harvey community of Brazos county, whence John M. Barron moved to Grimes county. Here Mr. Barron bought the Dr. J. M. Soles farm near Iola, which he conducted for three years, and which is still his home. He is cultivating 125 acres and a part of the farm has become by sale a part of the new townsite of Iola. Mr. Barron took up merchandise in Iola for himself in 1901, taking an interest in the firm of Davis & Wilcox, at the old town, and when that firm dissolved he came to the new town of Iola and became a partner in the firm of Barron & Ferguson. The same year the Iola Hardware and Furniture Company was organized and Mr. Barron was elected manager of it and has been so since. He is also the owner of a gin here, that of Barron & Nation, and was one of the organizers of the Iola State Bank, in which he holds a directorship. Few men have contributed in greater degree to the business importance of this section, and his interests have been of a magnitude to demand his constant attention, yet he still has found time to devote to the advancement and welfare of his adopted county. His connection with the educational progress of the county was as a trustee during the time the new school building was erected at Iola. In his political activity he is a Democrat. He was elected justice of the peace first, and in 1902 was made county commissioner by the White Man's Union, an organization which he helped to found. He was urged to become a candidate for district clerk instead of commissioner at that time, but declined the former for the latter. He was also a member of the county court for one term and during his regime the indebtedness of Grimes county was materially reduced, this being a signal service rendered to the public. Fraternally he is a Blue Lodge Mason and a member of the Woodmen of the World. With his family, he attends the Baptist church, of which he is a consistent and liberal member.

Mr. Barron was married (first) in Grimes county, in September, 1882, to Miss Lizzie Chaney, a daughter of Hiram Chaney. Mrs. Barron died in 1884, leaving no issue. The second marriage of Mr. Barron occurred in Brazos county, in December, 1886, when he was united with Miss Jonnie Gilbert, a daughter of John Gilbert, who came from Alabama. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Barron are as follows: Amy, the wife of Edgar Neely, representative of Grimes county in the legislature, ex-county attorney, and a prominent lawyer; Wingate Stuart, county superintendent of Grimes county, who married Miss Ethel Sanders; George P., a teacher of Grimes county; William E., who is engaged in agricultural pursuits here; and Mary, Artie, Pelham and Malcolm.

H. J. BRADFISH. Now well established in the business community of Weatherford and Parker counties, as a grain dealer and elevator man, Mr. Bradfish's career presents many interesting points in a life of strenuous endeavor and self-attainment. Left an orphan at an early age, he had to work and endure the stern realities of life, from childhood, and had no schooling until nearly grown. With a thorough apprenticeship in hard work, which developed his alert intelligence and made him quick to perceive and accept every opportunity for advancement he long since reached a position of independence as a business man, and is now steadily prospering.

H. J. Bradfish was born July 16, 1864, in Saxony, Germany, a son of Henry and Margaret Bradfish. When he was two years old his parents came to America and located at Alton, Illinois. When he was seven years old, both parents died, and after that he lived chiefly among strangers. As soon as his strength permitted he began making his own living. His first regular schooling was during the years 1883-1884, at St. Paul, Kansas. For about eight years Mr. Bradfish was connected with a railroad commissary, and worked in that capacity in the states of Illinois, Tennessee, Arkansas, Alabama and Georgia. On leaving railroading he went into the life insurance business for three years at Memphis, Tennessee. In the fall of 1894 he became a resident of Texas and his home has been at Weatherford ever since that time. His first experience in Weatherford was as book-keeper for a grocery company, and he worked for nine years in that capacity. In 1903 was established his present grain and elevator business, and it has been continued to the present time. Mr. Bradfish handles on an average of about a million bushel of grain every year, and for the accommodation of his customers in this vicinity operates a corn mill for chopping feed stuffs and does both a wholesale and retail business in the shipping of grain to various points in the state.

His relations with public and social interests of Weatherford are those of a popular and public spirited citizen. For four years he was a member of the school board; is a Republican in national affairs, but votes for the man in local concerns; is affiliated with the Knights of Columbus, Knights of the Maccabees and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, is active in the Weatherford Commercial Club and the Weatherford Boosters Club, and his religion is the Catholic faith.

At St. Paul, Kansas, September 21, 1893, Mr. Bradfish married Miss Jessie M. Neighbors, a daughter of George and M. E. Neighbors. Her father, who was a contractor, died about 1896, while her mother is now seventy-two years of age, and lives in the Bradfish home at Weatherford. Five children, two sons and three daughters, have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Bradfish, namely: Thelma, aged seventeen; Lucile, aged eleven, Martha, aged seven; Henry, six years old, and Chandler Augustus, aged four. All except the youngest are now attending the schools of Weatherford. Mr. Bradfish is well pleased with Weatherford and Parker county, both as to climate and business opportunities, and having established himself in the confidence of the people, whose patronage he appreciates thoroughly, it is his expectation to continue a permanent factor in local business affairs, and do all he can to promote the welfare of the community, while advancing his own prosperity.

DR. JULIUS ZULCH, after whose father the station at Zulch, Texas, was named, is a native of Madison county, where he has been long engaged in the practice of his profession and is known as one of the leading members of the medical fraternity. He was born at Zulch, December 24, 1868, a son of Julius Zulch, a merchant and farmer of this locality, who came hither in 1850 from Hesse Castle, Germany, alone and without relatives here ahead of him. He had been brought up in the old country, where he received a liberal education, and throughout his life manifested a marked literary turn of mind. He was exceptionally well posted on history and events of international importance, and was likewise known as a talented linguist, speaking fluently German, English, Bohemian, Spanish and French, languages which he acquired largely from association after reaching the United States.

Julius Zulch, Sr., landed from the steamship at Galveston, and came out from there to the Zulch community, then known as Willow Hole, at once began merchandising in this locality and maintained a store all his life. He built up a considerable business through industry and honorable dealing, and his establishment was the center of a wide territory of trade. Mr. Zulch acquired an interest in stockraising and accumulated a great deal of real estate, which he secured as cheap as fifty cents an acre. During the time of his activity he cleared up as much as 2,000 acres, made this into several farms, and erected houses all over it for his small army of tenants. He was a cotton and corn raiser and hauled his products out of here to Bryan, where he made connections with railroad facilities. He passed away prior to the advent of the "iron horse," dying February 24, 1900. Mr. Zulch belonged to the Lutheran faith. He was friendly to the cause of public education, and himself performed an important part in the building up and maintaining of the community schools. While he was not interested in politics except as a voter, he always supported Democratic principles. During the Civil War he served the Confederate government in the capacity of wagoner.

Mr. Zulch was married in Walker county, Texas, to Miss Martha Martin, a daughter of William R. Martin, a pioneer Texan from Georgia, and to this union there were born the following children: Della, who married G. W. Keefer and died at Zulch, was educated at Tehuacana College, and taught in the public schools here; Lena, who acquired her education in the same school, married J. E. Webb and died here also; William L., educated at the Agricultural and Mechanical College, at Bryan, and became a farmer and merchant at Zulch, and died in 1910, leaving a family by Virginia Keefer; Minnie, educated at the same school as her sisters and at Bryan, taught school two years, and married J. B. Zimmerman, now being a resident of Bryan, Texas; Mattie, educated at Bryan, and now the wife of T. A. Searcy, a resident there; Dr. Julius, of this review; Jo McIver, who met an accidental death in 1888 at Zulch, in young manhood; Pearl, educated in the Bryan public schools, married P. L. Winner, and is a resident of Bryan; Davy Crystal, educated in Bryan, became the wife of O. Sanders and resides at Bryan; Cora Lucile, who attended school at Bryan, and was there married to Eugene Edge, and resides there now.

Dr. Julius Zulch acquired his preliminary education in the public schools, following which he became a student in Georgetown Southwestern University. Following his graduation therefrom he entered the medical department of Tulane University, New Orleans, Louisiana, where he was graduated in 1890, next supplementing his studies by attendance at the Post Graduate School of Medicine, New York City. There he completed in 1892, and at once returned to Zulch to practice, being engaged vigorously in his calling until he was crippled by the kick of a vicious horse, in December, 1896, this resulting in the withering of his left arm, and since then he has gradually drifted away from his medical work. He has had farming interests all the years and this claims his attention largely now. He also has brought under cultivation much wild land and his holdings are principally in the vicinity of Zulch. Doctor Zulch has erected some sixteen homes for tenants, and through his activities have come the means of furnishing labor to many people who form the industrial population hereabout. Like his father, he has been extensively engaged in the raising of cotton and corn, and finds a ready and steady market for his product.

In the promotion of the railroads here he was inactive save as he could exert his influence with neighbors and friends to compromise their differences with the companies and secure early and ready transportation for the locality. Doctor Zulch, like his father, has abstained from political activities. He is a Methodist and was brought up under church and religious influence, and at all times has given his assistance to movements making for morality and good citizenship. He has also shown some interest in fraternal work, and is a popular member of the North Zulch Masonic Blue Lodge and the Madison Chapter of Masons, and of the Knights of Pythias Lodge at Normangee.

Doctor Zulch was united in marriage at Rogers Prairie, Texas, December 22, 1895, to Miss Cora Bell, daughter of Frank and Jane (Dotson) Bell, old citizens of Leon county, Texas, where they were engaged in agricultural pursuits. There were eight children in the Bell family, as follows: Andrew Jackson; Frank; Mary; Mrs. Zulch; Sallie, who is the wife of G. H. Franklin; Luke; Alda, and Ada, the wife of H. C. Zulch. Doctor and Mrs. Zulch have four children: Cora Belle, Mildred, Julius, Jr., and Jack. The pleasant family home is located at Zulch.

JOSEPH W. ESPY. A degree of success in business such as most men attain only at the high tide of their career has been vouchsafed to Joseph W. Espy at the age of thirty-six. Mr. Espy began his career as a cattleman by riding the range as a cowboy when sixteen years of age, and by an unusual skill in the business, and by persistent application to the business principles involved in the cattle industry has advanced to a place among the leading stockmen of Western Texas, and is one of the successful and influential citizens of Jeff Davis county. Joseph W. Espy was born in Lampasas county, Texas, August 1, 1877, and has spent all his career in this state. His early education was in the public schools, and the death of his father when he was sixteen years of age in 1893 threw him upon his own responsibility so that he began the battle of life with the world at that time. His first job was on the cattle range, and he was a cow-puncher on a salary up to the time he was twenty years of age. At that time the accumulations of experience and a very meagre saving enabled him, with borrowed capital, to start upon his own account. He had soon paid back all that he had borrowed, and from that time to the present has been progressing and building each year a larger enterprise, so that he is now owner of two large ranches near Fort Davis, and sends out to the market every year a large bunch of cattle and other live stock.

Mr. Espy was married at Fort Davis, September 5, 1900, to Miss Lola Pruett, daughter of P. H. Pruett of Fort Davis. To their marriage has been born two sons and four daughters named as follows: Katherine L., Sargie M., Henry Clay, Ruth, James P. and Lola. Mr. Espy's father was Henry Clay Espy, a native of Tennessee, who came to Texas when a young man and was engaged in stock farming in this state up to the time of his death. He took much interest in politics, and held several local offices. Their church was the Presbyterian, and he died a devout Christian. His death occurred on January 28, 1903, at the age of forty-seven. The maiden name of his wife was Rowena Marley, who was born in Tennessee, and they were married in Texas and she now makes her home in Van Horn. There were six children in the family, all of whom live in this state, and the other five are named as follows: James A., Robert H., Mrs. W. S. Miller, Mrs. O. Z. Sinley and Mrs. Leigh Prude.

Mr. Espy worships in the Presbyterian faith, and he is an active member of the Odd Fellows Lodge at Fort Davis, while Mrs. Espy is a member of the Rebekahs. In politics he is independent, and takes no active part except as a voter. However, he was for one term honored with the office of county commissioner of Fort Davis county, and showed his fidelity to his fellow citizens by his excellent administration. His diversions are hunting and fishing and he enjoys the lighter amusements of the theatre and good books. Mr. Espy is of the opinion that no state in the Union offers better opportunities for investment than Texas, and he is especially loud in his praise of the ideal climate, and has never spent a dollar for doctor bills for his children during his residence in the western part of the state.

MAURY KEMP. An enthusiastic citizen and one of the able members of the El Paso bar, Maury Kemp is legal representative for several large corporations, also for the Mexican government, and is a son of the late Judge Wyndham Kemp, one of the early and long prominent lawyers and jurists of El Paso.

Maury Kemp was born at Calvert, Texas, February 8, 1878. Judge Wyndham Kemp, his father, was born in Gloucester county, Virginia, January 30, 1845, a son of Wyndham and Ann Louisa (Perrin) Kemp. Three successive generations of the family have been identified with the profession of law.

Wyndham Kemp, Jr., gained his early education in his native state, and was a student in the Virginia Military Institute until going into the field as a soldier. He was one of the five youngest cadets, who entered the army from that institute, and was sixteen years old when he became a soldier. For a time he was attached to Wise's Brigade, in the Twenty-sixth Virginia Regiment, and later was with the Richmond Howitzers, participating in the battle of Newmarket, and served until captured at Sailors Creek, April 6, 1865, three days before the surrender of Lee's army. His name is inscribed on the memorial monument erected on the campus of the Virginia Military Institute, and he had the distinction of being one of the soldiers sent back from the front to assist in the military ceremony conducted at the burial of General Stonewall Jackson.

The late Judge Kemp studied law in the office of his father in Virginia, was admitted to the bar of that state in 1867, and soon afterwards came to Texas, being admitted to the Texas bar in 1869. He practiced law at Calvert, until his removal to El Paso in 1885. He was a successful lawyer, and also an influential citizen in Western Texas. During a long number of years, Judge Kemp practiced in association with Captain Thomas J. Beall. That association began in 1875, when Judge Kemp represented the firm of Davis, Beall & Tolliver at Calvert, the firm having its main offices at Bryan. The older members of the firm were among the first lawyers to locate in El Paso, at the beginning of the Railroad era, and were joined in 1885 by Judge Kemp. Judge Kemp was an active Democrat, served on the county bench and as sub-district judge, and represented El Paso in the state legislature. He belonged to the United Confederate Veterans Association, and was conspicuous in the citizenship of west Texas at the time of his death, which occurred at El Paso February 9, 1908. Judge Wyndham Kemp married at Concord, North Carolina, in 1876, Mary Lewis Maury, who was born in Virginia. Mrs. Kemp died in January, 1886. There were two children, Maury and Anne Perrin Kemp. Judge Kemp married for his second wife Mary F. Heindron, who became the mother of four children.

Maury Kemp was educated in the common schools of Texas, had a preparatory training for college in the Woodbine Academy at Spring Hills, Tennessee, and also studied in the University of Texas. His study for the law was conducted chiefly in his father's office, under the direction of Captain Beal and Judge Kemp. Admitted to the bar at El Paso in May, 1901, he then became actively associated in practice with the firm of Beal and Kemp, and since the death of his father has continued to be associated with Captain Beal, so that the firm title is undisturbed a legal association that has long represented some of the best technical ability and resources in the west Texas bar. Mr. Kemp is attorney for the State National Bank of El Paso, for the Southern Pacific Railway Company, for the Western Union Telegraph Company, for the Mexican Government, and for a large amount of business and private interest. He is a member of the El Paso County Bar Association, and the Texas State Bar Association.

In politics he is a Democrat, who has interested himself especially in public affairs at El Paso and in the county. He has filled the office of county attorney. Mr. Kemp belongs to the Chi Phi College fraternity, and is a member of the Presbyterian church. He owns much El Paso real estate, and has many interests to identify him with the metropolis of west Texas.

THOMAS CALDWELL YANTIS. For the reason that financial stability must be the foundation stone upon which all great enterprises are erected, the banking interests of a community are necessarily among the most important, and the men who control and conserve the money of corporation, individual or country must possess numerous qualities not requisite in the ordinary citizen. High commercial integrity, exceptional financial ability, poise, judgment and foresight must be theirs, public confidence must be with them, and this fact has been demonstrated on numerous occasions in this country when panics that even threatened the stability of the government have been averted by the wisdom, sagacity and acumen of the men whose whole training has been along the line of finance. A citizen who has been prominently connected with the banking interests of Brownwood for more than twenty years, and who has done much in the effective upbuilding of this city along educational and civic lines, is Thomas Caldwell Yantis, president of the Brownwood National Bank. Mr. Yantis was born in Collin county, Texas, August 20, 1854, and is a son of George R. and Nancy Yantis, who came to Texas from Kentucky in 1852 and settled in Collin county, where George R. Yantis was collector of taxes for a number of years.

Thomas C. Yantis received a liberal education, attending private schools in Collin county, the McKinney High school and Buckner Institute, Paris, Texas. He embarked upon his business career in early manhood, and was in the milling, ginning and mercantile business at Sipe Springs, Comanche county, Texas, until becoming associated with the Brownwood National Bank, February 1, 1893. The training he had enjoyed and the ability he possessed enabled him to attend to the duties of his new position as president of this institution with the same marked capacity he had already shown, and under his wise direction the bank's capital was increased in 1902 from $60,000 to $100,000. Later the bank built up a surplus equal to its capital, and at the time of this writing has an undivided profit account of $137,000. The bank is located in a five-story and basement fire-proof office building, one of the handsome structures of Brownwood. Besides his interest in the above institution, Mr. Yantis owns stock in three other banks in Texas, as well as compress stock, and handles considerable vendors' lien or land paper.

On July 22, 1875, Mr. Yantis was married to Miss E. E. Mallow, daughter of L. C. Mallow, whose grandfather, John Fitzhugh, was an early settler of Collin county, locating at Peters Colony. Several of her uncles held places of responsibility in the Confederate army during the war between the North and the South. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Yantis; Vida, who is the widow of James P. Robnett; Bess, the wife of A. H. Bell; Lola, the wife of William Bunyon Cross; John T., who is assistant cashier of the Brownwood National Bank, and Manon, who is completing her education at Columbia University, New York. Mr. Yantis has ever been a firm believer in the advantages to be secured through liberal schooling. His son is a graduate of Yale University and Baylor University, and his daughters are graduates of the local university and Vassar College, and while attending the latter institution made a trip to Europe with their teacher especially to study English literature. At this time Mr. Yantis is installing in his office a free circulating library for young people living in Brown county outside of the city of Brownwood, and now has on hand 600 books, and will add 400 more soon, and to this number 1,000 next year, provided the experiment is a success. He now has in circulation about 300 volumes. His work among country people impressed upon him the importance of a free circulating library, as but few of the homes had any literature in them all, while those that had were chiefly confined to Sunday school helps and works of a like nature. Mr. Yantis has been president of the board of trustees of Howard Payne College for over twenty years and has given a great deal of his time and means to the support of this institution. In the State Bankers' Association he has been president, first and second vice president and treasurer at various times, and few men have a wider acquaintance in banking circles in the state.

In Masonry, Mr. Yantis is also widely known. A member of this order for many years, he has had official connection therewith since 1906 when he was elected Grand Junior Warden of the Grand Lodge of Texas. In 1907 he became Grand Senior Warden, Deputy Grand Master in 1908 and Grand Master in 1909, a position which he held until December, 1910. In 1913 he was elected Grand Captain of the Guard of the Grand Commandery of Texas, and still occupies that position. He is a member of the Brownwood Lake Club and the local golf club, and his family has long been prominent in social circles. Since 1900, Mr. Yantis has followed the custom of spending eleven months in work and one month in recreation, these four weeks being generally spent in travel. In 1910, accompanied by his wife and two children, he made an extended trip of Europe, visiting places of note in England, Belgium and Holland, spending some time at Rome, Naples and Pompeii, and also going to various points in Switzerland, France and Germany. An especially interesting feature of this trip was a visit to the "Passion Play" at Ober-Ammergau. Mr. Yantis is a Democrat in his political views, but has confined his activities in public matters to the support of men and measures which he believes will advance his city and state. With his family, he attends the First Baptist church of Brownwood, in which he holds an official position.

JAMES JONES TIMMONS. In the making of Brownwood one of the best business and jobbing centers of west Texas, one of the important factors has been James Jones Timmons, who is president of the Brownwood Commercial Club, an organization of live and enterprising local business men, and head of the largest hardware, both retail and wholesale, establishments in this flourishing city of Brown county.

James Jones Timmons was born May 20, 1878, at Rusk, in Cherokee county, Texas, a son of Robert Lewis and Molly Belle (Jones) Timmons. His parents were born in Cherokee county, and Grandfather Timmons in the early days brought his family to this state in ox-wagons and across the country. He surveyed the boundaries and much of the land in Cherokee county, and was one of the very influential pioneer citizens of that locality. Robert L. Timmons, the father, was a soldier of the Confederate army, participated in many engagements, was four times wounded and also spent some time in Federal prison. He had enlisted at the age of seventeen years, and was a soldier for the south until the close of the war. After the war he returned to his father's plantation and assisted in its management for a number of years. He then engaged as a planter on his own account, and in 1879 moved to Waxahachie where he went into the hardware business. He conducted that line of trade successfully until his death in 1898. His wife had passed away in 1883. Both parents were active members of the Baptist church, and the father was always an interested worker in behalf of the Democratic party. He was affiliated with the Masonic Order and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Of their four children the Brownwood merchant was the oldest; Walter Franklin Timmons is a farmer and stockman at Zephyr, Texas; Mollie Belle Timmons is now the wife of C. E. Schuster of Waxahachie; and Robert Lewis Timmons is a successful lumberman owning and operating large timber concessions in Guatemala.

James J. Timmons was reared chiefly in Waxahachie, where he attended the public schools, and was well equipped with a business course in the schools of Sherman. During a considerable part of his youth, he attended school only during the summer months, and the remaining nine months of the year were spent in assisting his father in the hardware store at Waxahachie. In this way he attained a good training in the business which he later adopted as his own vocation, and his success has largely been the result of a persistent following of one line and a concentration of his resources to one direction. During the Spanish American war of 1898, Mr. Timmons enlisted in Company E of the Second Texas Infantry, and continued in service with this regiment until mustered out at Dallas in 1899. After a brief visit to his home he then went to Paris, Texas, where he became a traveling salesman for the Allen-Willis Hardware Company. A year later he resigned and went on the road for the Simmons Hardware Company of St. Louis. For this company he represented the trade throughout the entire state of Texas, and sold their goods successfully, until 1904. He acquired a large acquaintance with business men all over the state and is today familiar with hundreds of his old customers, in different sections of Texas. On resigning his place with the Timmons Company, he located in Brownwood, and organized the Weakly Hardware Company, of which he was secretary and manager. Later this organization became the Weakly-Clingman Company, and by another organization its capital was increased from twenty-five thousand dollars to one hundred thousand dollars, and the name changed to Baker-Timmons Hardware Company. Since this last reorganization, Mr. Timmons has been president and it has been his ability and experience which have increased and developed the business of this concern until it is a big factor in the hardware trade of west Texas. The store and warehouse at Brownwood comprise a very large establishment, and some twenty to thirty clerks and assistants are employed in the different departments of the business. The Baker-Timmons Hardware Company supply a number of the local merchants over the radius covered by the Brownwood commercial facilities, and does a large business both in wholesale and retail. Mr. Timmons has prospered as a business man, is the owner of much valuable city real estate, and enjoys the ownership of a fine home in Brownwood, built at a cost of fifteen thousand dollars.

Faternally he is affiliated with the Masonic Order, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Woodmen of the World. He and his family are communicants of the Episcopal church. On June 7, 1904, he was married to Miss Pearl Parks, a native of Brownwood and a daughter of W. C. Parks of this city. Of their two children, one is deceased and the other is James Claiborne Timmons. Mr. Timmons in politics is a Democrat.

For nearly fifteen years Mr. Timmons has had his eye upon Brownwood. Throughout the time he was traveling over the state he had his own future prospects in mind, and gave close attention to the eligibility of the different points he visited while selling goods. In this way Brownwood was selected as what seemed to him the best commercial point in the western part of the state, a clean and ideal city both for business and residence. Since locating in the city he has been ready to give his time, attention and support to every good cause for the welfare and development, and is a member of the group of business men and citizens upon whom rests the destiny of this center of trade and commerce.

LEWIS GOODMAN. The successive steps in the career of a prosperous and substantial business man are always interesting. For many years Lewis Goodman has held a distinctive place in commercial affairs in El Paso. When nineteen years of age he landed in the United States on the day after Christmas in 1891. He had a capital of eight hundred dollars when he arrived. For his first means of earning a living he sold the goods of a medicine house. He then went into a grocery establishment as a salesman in New York City, and from there moved to Syracuse, New York, and for several years was in the jewelry business. In 1895 he came to El Paso. He organized and established the American Grocery Company, wholesale grocers. At the same time he moved to New Mexico and at Earham organized a similar wholesale grocery house. In 1896 he moved his business enterprise to LaMesa, in the same territory, and there also established a broom factory. He conducted both lines until 1901, at which time he sold out and engaged in the cattle ranching industry. In 1903 he returned to El Paso, and in the previous year had established the Rio Grande Fuel Company at the corner of Santa Fe and First streets, and had also purchased property at the corner of El Paso and Seventh. In 1903 he consolidated his business with the American Grocery Company, and established the wholesale grocery firm of Joseph H. and Lewis Goodman. Selling out in 1910 to the American Grocery Company he then started business at the corner of Sixth and El Paso, under the name of the Western Grocery Company. In October, 1911, this firm was incorporated and he has since been its vice president. Mr. C. E. Miller is general manager, J. Kauffman is treasurer, and Joseph Rhein is secretary. Mr. Goodman owns a large amount of El Paso real estate, ranch lands and other property, and has enjoyed a very generous prosperity.

Lewis Goodman was born on the twelfth of May, 1874, on the boundary line between Poland and Germany. His father was Moses Goodman, a merchant of Poland. Lewis Goodman attained his education in the schools of his native country up to the time he was thirteen years of age and then left his books and with an older brother engaged in the tea and coffee business in Russia. He continued in this line of enterprise, until he came to America, having sold out his interests and bringing with him the small amount of capital which has been mentioned, and which has served him to make his start in this new world.

Mr. Goodman is a Republican in national politics, but otherwise supports good government and the man and party which will best conserve the interests of such a cause. He has gone through all the chairs in the Lodge of Odd Fellows, and is also affiliated with the Woodmen of the World and the Fraternal Order of Eagles. He likewise belongs to the Sons of Hermann, and is a member of the Cactus Club. He has taken an active part in the religious affairs of his Hebrew church and belongs to a number of the Jewish Societies of El Paso. At Albuquerque, New Mexico, on November 29, 1889, he was married and is the father of four children, one son and three daughters. He has built an attractive home at 611 Prospect avenue.

WILLIAM EWING MYRES. Few men get into the battle of life so early as William E. Myres the well known young lawyer of Cleburne, who was admitted to the bar and was elected to one of the important offices of Johnson county before he had reached his majority. Mr. Myres is not alone distinguished by his precocity, but his later years have fortified the achievements anticipated by his earlier attainments.

William Ewing Myres was born in Johnson county, Texas, July 7, 1884. His father, David R. Myres, born in Washington county, Pennsylvania, April 24, 1839, came to Texas and settled in Washington county in 1860, and three years later moved to Johnson county. Farming was his vocation through his active years. Soon after becoming a resident of Texas, he went out as a Confederate soldier, a member of Company E of the Tenth Texas Infantry, under General Joseph E. Johnston, in Cleburne's Division and Hardee's Corps. His service lasted for four full years, and he was once wounded, but otherwise came through the struggle and returned to take up the active duties of citizenship and as a Texas farmer. He is still living in Johnson county, and an honored member of the Confederate veterans at Cleburne. This old soldier married Mary J. Dale, who was born in Montgomery county, Kentucky, in 1849, and died in 1908. Their six children were: Samuel D., Carlos M., Fannie R., Annie E., Charles C., and William E.

district schools, studied law at home, and with unusual mental powers made such rapid progress that he was admitted to the bar at the age of nineteen in 1903. In 1904 at the age of twenty, he was elected city attorney of Cleburne, for a term of two years. He has since been elected three different times as assistant prosecuting attorney of Johnson county, and as a lawyer has a very fine record, especially in the criminal branch of his profession.

Mr. Myres was married September 23, 1903 to Miss Zora Shook, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. I. B. Shook of Somerville county. Her father was a substantial farmer. Three children have been born to their union, Mary B., David G., and Francis. Mr. Myres affiliates with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Woodmen of the World, and is an influential member of the Democratic party in Johnson county. His church is the Baptist. He owns his own home in Cleburne, and outside of the law, to which he devotes his best energies, he finds his chief diversion in his home or in an occasional hunting trip.

JOHN MARSHALL CUMMINS. The older residents of Dallas will readily recall the late John Marshall Cummins, who for several years prior to his death resided in this city, but who, perhaps, was better known as a cattle dealer in Sherman, Grayson county. Although he died in the prime of life, with his best years before him, he had achieved a notable success during his career and was rapidly gaining a place among the foremost men of his day and locality. Mr. Cummins was born near the town of Starkville, Oktibbeha county, Mississippi, in 1850, and was the only son in a family of five children born to John O. Cummins, the others being Mary, who still resides at Starkville, Mississippi; Menacia, a resident of Oklahoma; and two girls who died in childhood.

Mr. Cummins was reared to agricultural work, and as a youth attended the district schools of his native locality, but the outbreak of the war between the North and the South interrupted his studies. Although to enlist as a soldier he was too young, he managed to enter the Confederate ranks in the role of drummer boy, subsequently was allowed to carry a gun in the ranks as one of the youngest privates in his brigade, and finally became a purchasing agent, a position which he held at the cessation of hostilities. At the close of the struggle, seeking a field in which he might win financial independence, he came to Sherman, Texas, and for several years was engaged in the general merchandise business. Thus he came into contact with the cattle interests, and eventually disposed of his store property and became a dealer in live stock, following this vocation until the close of his life. His death occurred suddenly in 1892, at Kansas City, Missouri, whence he had gone to purchase cattle. He was essentially a business man and did not enter public life at any time, and, being a lover of home, never affiliated himself with any social or fraternal order.

In 1867 Mr. Cummins was married to Mrs. Josephine Alexander, the widow of Col. A. Marshall Alexander, and daughter of Milton and Susan (Wiles) King, the former born in Kentucky and the latter in Virginia. Mrs. Cummins' grandfather King went with Daniel Boone to Kentucky, and fought in the American army during the War of 1812. Mrs. Cummins' first husband was a colonel in the Confederate army during the Civil war, and at the time of the death of General Steele was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general. He married Miss Josephine King in 1848, and they became the parents of three children: John M., who is deceased; Sophia, who became the wife of M. J. Morphy, of Buffalo, New York; and Victoria, who is the widow of W. W. Walker, of Dallas, Texas. To the union of John Marshall and Josephine (King) Cummins there was born one son, Arthur Joseph, who is now department manager for a large hardware concern in Dallas, and he married Lillie May Conklin, of Louisiana.

Since the death of her husband, Mrs. Cummins has resided in her handsome modern home at No. 2823 LaCleve avenue, Dallas. She is widely known in social circles of the city and has been active in charitable and benevolent work.

JOHN OTTFRIED MEUSEBACH. History must credit the late John Ottfried Meusebach as the most useful if not the most conspicuous figure in the German colonization movement during the decade of the forties and fifties in Southwest Texas. As the successor to Prince Solms-Braunfels, it was his splendid executive ability, his financial management and utmost devotion to the ideals and plans which had originated the plan of German colonization in Texas, that eventually turned the tide of rapid disintegration and saved to Texas one of the most virile and important elements of its pioneer population.

Baron Hans Ottfried von Meusebach was born in Dillenburg, Nassau, Germany, May 26, 1812. Though his parents resided temporarily at Dillenburg at the time of his birth, his ancestors were from Saxony. After becoming a citizen of Texas this young nobleman renounced his title, and with a fine spirit of democracy called himself simply John O. Meusebach. Some facts concerning his conspicuous work in the colonization venture inaugurated by the German Adels-Verein have been told elsewhere in this publication. The towns of New Braunfels in Comal county and Fredericksburg in Gillespie county owe a great deal to his untiring energy and financial management. He was conspicuous both as a scholar and patriot. In his youth he had studied natural sciences in Klausthal, completing his education in the Universities of Bonn and Halle. By profession he was a jurist, and a great career would probably have awaited him in Europe, since he was a contemporary and schoolmate of Bismarck and had many other distinguished associations in the Fatherland. But he preferred to follow the call of the Adels-Verein to succeed Prince Solms as commissioner-general of the association, and thus moved his field of action to the young Republic of Texas.

During his administration as executive head of the Adels-Verein he founded the town of Fredericksburg, and lived to see that flourishing German community celebrate its fiftieth anniversary. Another action for which he deserves special credit was a treaty made by him with the Comanche Indians, who were considered the worst scourge of the settlers in Southwest Texas. The Indians remained faithful to the terms of their covenant until government agents took to robbing and cheating them, when they resumed hostilities in disregard of their treaty. The Indians showed great confidence in Meusebach and called him "El Sol Colorado," meaning "The Red Sun."

After resigning his position as commissioner-general of the Adels-Verein, Mr. Meusebach was elected a member of the state senate of Texas, but the greater part of his active career was spent quietly in the community which he had founded and at the time of his death on May 27, 1897, he was living with his family in Loyal Valley, a small town laid out by him on his estate twenty-five miles northwest of Fredericksburg. He was married in 1852 to Miss Agnes Coreth, daughter of an Austrian Count who also renounced his title when he became a citizen of the United States. Mr. Meusebach was survived by his wife and seven children.

John O. Meusebach was a Democrat of the Tolstoy type, and devoted his life principally to agriculture and horticulture. That it had been his firm determination to link his future with the fate of the country of his choice is shown by the fact that he had engraved in his seal the words "Texas Forever." Dying at the age of eighty-five years and one day, among the many other distinctions that are associated with his name, it was characteristic of him that he always dealt out full measure and demanded the same in return, and as in his life so in his death he gave and received full measure.

JAMES H. READ. Among the younger men of Deport who are visibly prosperous and making steady progress in their business activities, James H. Read, leading merchant of Deport, may be mentioned among the more prominent. He stepped into business relations with this community as a youth fresh from the farm, and his advance has been consistent and steady. For a number of years the drug business engrossed his attention, but in 1909 he withdrew from those interests and associated himself with a Mr. Nobles in the dry goods business. Since that time the Nobles-Read Dry Goods Company has taken a front rank with the business activities of Deport. The death of Mr. Nobles recently has placed Mr. Read in full charge of the concern, which is still continued under the old name. Other local enterprises of some importance claim the attention of Mr. Read, and he is undeniably one of the busiest men in the city.

Thirty-five years of residence in the district has given the Read family a prestige in local circles that is undeniable. The family name was established here by Lewis C. Read, the father of the subject, a prosperous farmer who came to Texas from Tennessee in 1877. He spent a few years in Lamar county, then moved to Red River county, where he yet resides. He was born in Tennessee, in 1851, and is a son of William Read, who located in Tennessee from South Carolina, where he was born in 1817. William Read married Jane Teague and died in 1887, his wife dying in 1881. Their children were Lewis C., Lizzie, the wife of J. K. Martin, of Henderson county, Texas, and Mollie, who married Thomas White, of Arkansas.

Of these children, Lewis C., the first born, became the father of James H. Read, the Deport merchant. He received his early training in the rural schools of his native community, and from that went directly to the toil of the farm, and his industry in this field of enterprise may well be said to have been a credit to himself and to his state. He has acquired and paid for six hundred acres of land in the black soil belt of Texas, and there he maintained his home, as well as providing labor and home facilities and comforts for nine families who find their support and sustenance in the work of his well directed farm. He has always taken a hearty interest in the lives of his tenants and their families, and made possible their independence in later years. He married Miss Josephine Hearn, whose father was a native of Henderson county, Tennessee, and was killed during the war. The other children were: James, who died in Tennessee; Mack, of Lamar county, Texas; Ellen, who died in Texas as the wife of Mr. C. M. Lawler. Lewis C. and Josephine (Hearn) Read became the parents of the following children: William, who died at the age of twenty years; Isaac L., a farmer of Deport, married to Maggie Woodard; Dona is the wife of W. H. Thompson of Deport; Beattie married R. N. Brown of this locality; Lou, who is the wife of J. J. Gray, of Deport; James H., of this review; J. Mack, of Deport; Samuel, a farmer well known in Red River county, who married Ruth Harris; Nannie died in childhood; Ollie is the wife of Mr. James Davidson of Red River county.

James H. Read, like his father, was reared to farm work, and in addition to his common school training, had the advantage of attendance at Grayson College at Whiteright, Texas, in preparation for the duties of business life. He began his career after his detachment from farm duties as a clerk in the postoffice at Deport, under a relative, one Mr. Lawler, and at the end of a year engaged in the drug business with Efford O. Thompson, another of the stanch and sturdy young business men of Deport, and who is found mentioned on other pages of this work. After nine years the drug firm of Thompson & Read was dissolved by mutual consent, Mr. Read selling his interest in the business to his partner, and immediately thereafter associating himself with Mr. Nobles in the dry goods business. They formed their association in January, 1909, and continued thus until the death of the senior partner in 1911, since which time Mr. Read has been in full charge of the concern. The Nobles-Read Dry Goods Company is appropriately housed in a one story brick building, fifty by sixty feet square, and since its establishment has been regarded as one of the more important commercial enterprises of the city.

Mr. Read was married at Deport, on January 14, 1903, when he was twenty-three years old, to Miss Lennie Morgan, a daughter of Mrs. Bettie Morgan, one of the more recent settlers from Henderson county, Tennessee, whose family comprised Anna, the wife of Wm. Jeffus, of Plainview, Texas; Mrs. Read, and her twin sister, Minnie, who died in childhood; Andy, who became the wife of J. W. Joiner, a Presbyterian minister of Windom, Texas. Mrs. Read was born January 14, 1882, and to her marriage with Mr. Read has been born two sons, Ralph M. and James Herman.

Mr. Read is one of the more popular and socially prominent young men of the city of Deport. He is of commanding figure and a fine physique, and carries with him a spirit of haleness that is most pleasing. He is not politically active, although he is a stanch Democrat, his family having long been aligned with that party. He has served as alderman of Deport, and does not withhold himself from reasonable public service, being willing at all times to maintain his share of the civic burden, but he finds no time in his scheme of life for the field of politics in all its ramifications. He is a stockholder in the Deport Cotton Oil Company, an industry that has made this thriving town a fine market and a busy community. Mr. Read is a Mason of the Knights Templar degree, and an Odd Fellow. He is a member of the Presbyterian church and has been a representative of his church to the presbytery. He is also superintendent of the Sunday school, and most efficient in his service there.

HON. THOMAS S. REESE. One of the oldest members of the Texas bar, Judge Reese is likewise one of the most prominent, and his splendid record on the Texas bench is familiar to every lawyer in the state. He is now in his second term as associate justice of the court of civil appeals, in the first supreme judicial district, and while he holds court in Galveston, his residence has been at Hempstead ever since coming to Texas forty-five years ago. Judge Reese has exemplified in his individual career the high qualities of an ancestry which for generations has been conspicuous in professional, military and public affairs. He belongs to the old Scotch Clan of MaGregors, and the Reeses are originally Scotch.

Thomas Sidney Reese was born in Chambers county, Alabama, in 1844, a son of Thomas Sidney and Susan (Laurens) (McGregor) Reese. Great-grandfather David A. Reese was one of the signers of the Mecklinburg declaration of independence and thus gained a fame which properly should be equivalent to that attaching to the signers of the declaration of 1776.

Judge Reese's father was an Alabama planter, and thus the circumstances of the home and the traditions of the family were all favorable to a career of usefulness and prominence for the son.

Educated at Davidson College, in Mecklinburg, North Carolina, Judge Reese's studies were interrupted by the great civil conflict between the states, and had completed only his junior year when the call to arms became too insistent to resist. In 1862 he went into the Sixth Alabama Cavalry, and saw service until the end of the struggle. With the close of hostilities, he went home and took up the study of law, and was admitted to the bar in Alabama in 1866. After a year or so of practice there, he came to Texas in 1868, located at Hempstead, where he at once became a factor as a lawyer, and in the public affairs which made that city a center of interest for many years, and is now one of the oldest and most highly honored residents of Hempstead.

From 1892 to 1898 Judge Reese served as judge of the Twenty-third Judicial District Court. In the middle of his second term he resigned to take up the practice of law at Houston, and looked after the interests of a large clientele in that city until 1900. In that year came his appointment to the office of assistant attorney general of Texas, the duties of which position he performed until 1905. Governor Lanham then appointed him associate justice of the court of civil appeals in the first supreme judicial district to fill the unexpired term of Associate Justice W. H. Gill, who had in the meantime been advanced to chief justice of the court. In 1906 Judge Reese was elected for the regular term of six years as associate justice and in 1912 was reelected for another full term.

Judge Reese has been honored with the presidency of the Texas State Bar Association. He was married in 1869 to Miss Mary Virginia Lester, a daughter of John C. Lester of Alabama. Mrs. Reese died in 1904. To their marriage were born four children as follows: Lucy, who married D. W. Spence, dean of the civil engineering department of the Texas Agricultural and Mechanical College; Anna, wife of W. E. Heslep of Austin; James Vincent; and Laurens Reese, also of Houston.

JAMES H. BUMPAS. An honored citizen and for many years successful business man of Dallas, James H. Bumpas was a resident in Dallas and Dallas county from about 1878 until his death on February 21, 1904.

He was born in Tennessee, December 30, 1856, one of the five children born to Madison and Hannah E. (Nash) Bumpas, both of whom were natives of Tennessee. The father was a Confederate soldier, was taken prisoner, and died while in prison while at Rock Island, Illinois. The mother, who reared her children largely by her own efforts, is now living with her daughter Mattie in Dallas. There were five children in the family, and the others are mentioned as follows: R. W., deceased; Bettie, widow of Jess Roberts, of Bryant, Texas; Mattie, the wife of J. H. Yeargan, of Dallas; and one that died in infancy.

In February, 1880, James H. Bumpas married Miss Ella C. Stephenson, a native of Alabama, who came to Texas with her parents in 1878. Her father was a contractor and builder, and died in 1885, his wife passing away about the same time. Mrs. Bumpas is one of nine children and the five still living, including herself, are: Sallie B. Tunnell, of New Mexico; Lela E., the widow of R. F. Duncan, who is associated in business with Mrs. Bumpas; Priscilla, the wife of B. Wilson, of Dallas. Mr. and Mrs. Bumpas had one child, Robert Madison Bumpas, who died at the age of six years and eight months.

The late Mr. Bumpas was ten years old when he came with his mother to Texas, and was reared and received most of his education at Bryan, Texas. At the age of twenty he moved to Dallas county, and located at what is known as Jimtown, a little trading center which was named in his honor as the principal business man there. He operated a store at that point, and also engaged in farming. In his store was established a post office, and up to a few years ago Jimtown was still among the list of Texas post offices. In 1884 Mr. Bumpas moved to Dallas, and engaged in the drug business, a line which he followed successfully until his death in 1904. Mrs. Bumpas sold out the business to her brother-in-law, but still owns the property at the corner of Ross avenue and Haskell street. She has replaced the old store building with a modern brick structure and her comfortable home is on the adjoining lot which she likewise owns. The late Mr. Bumpas was a trustee of the school board in Fairland, now incorporated in the city of Dallas, for a number of years, and was an active member and a deacon in the Christian church.

Jos S. Bumpus

L. H. Earnest

JOSEPH W. L. HALL, of New Boston, Bowie county, Texas, is a prominent farmer and ex-county official, and belongs to one of the pioneer families in this section of the Lone Star state.

Mr. Hall was born on his father's plantation, in the Sand Hill community, in Bowie county, Texas, in the year 1872, son of Levi H. and Louisa E. (Tidwell) Hall, both deceased.

Levi H. Hall was a frontier settler of Bowie county. He was born in Choctaw county, Alabama, and there spent the first twelve years of his life. Then he accompanied his parents on their removal to Mississippi, where he lived until he was fifteen. Early in the fifties he came to Texas and settled in the Sand Hill Community, ten miles southwest of the present town of New Boston, where he made his home until 1878. That year he removed with his family to a farm six and a half miles south of De Kalb, where he spent the rest of his life. He died December 9, 1911. Levi H. Hall was one of the county's most respected early citizens. He served in the Confederate army throughout the war, in Gould's Regiment, which he joined at Clarksville in Red River county. His wife, Louisa E. (Tidwell) Hall, died in 1878. She was a native of Mississippi and a member of the well-known Tidwell family which pioneered in Bowie county.

And thus it was on his father's frontier farm that Joseph W. L. Hall was reared. His education was received in the near-by schools. Although having served eight years in public capacity—having been County Tax Assessor from 1904 to 1908, and State and County Tax Collector from 1908 to 1912,—Mr. Hall has always been a farmer, and he now devotes all his time to that industry. He is strictly a modern and progressive farmer. He adopts the most approved methods, those advocated by the government agricultural agents, and as a result he has made splendid records in the staple crops—cotton and corn. His main farm is at New Boston, where he has lived since 1904. This farm adjoins the town on the west and consists of 405 acres. In addition to carrying on general farming, he is paying considerable attention to the breeding of horses, mules and Jersey cows, in which he has had excellent success.

Fraternally, Mr. Hall is identified with both the Odd Fellows and the Masons. He is High Priest of the Wm. C. Young Chapter, Royal Arch Masons, at New Boston; also he is a Knights Templar Mason, having membership in the Commandery at Clarksville. His religious faith is that set out in the creed of the Missionary Baptist church, and in both church and Sunday school he is an active worker, having been superintendent of the Sunday school at New Boston since 1908.

Mr. Hall has been twice married. For his first wife he wedded Miss Havana Medford, who was born in Red River county, Texas. She was the mother of his two eldest children: Mona E. and Mamie Alien. Subsequent to her death he married her sister, his present wife, who was Miss Nora E. Medford, and by her he has two children, Clovis H. and Ida Lucile.

CHARLES HOUSTON EARNEST. Diligent study and long and tedious attention to elementary principles, combined with inherent ability and persevering application, have brought Charles Houston Earnest, of Colorado, Texas, to a position of pre-eminence at the Mitchell county bar. His has been no chance success, no adventitious circumstances have combined to push him forward. The prestige he enjoys has been gained through the grasping of opportunities as they have appeared before him and the maintaining, at all times, of a strict adherence to the best ethics of his calling. A resident of Colorado for the past thirty years, he has not only distinguished himself here as a legist, but has given of his best in the service of the public, and on various occasions has been called to positions of high responsibility and trust, where he has ably and conscientiously performed every duty imposed upon him.

Charles Houston Earnest was born April 9, 1859, at San Marcos, Hays county, Texas, and is a son of William and Martha (Williamson) Earnest, the former of German and the latter of Scotch-Irish descent, and both parents members of old and honored slaveholding families of Tennessee. William Earnest was for some years a well-known merchant at Lebanon, Tennessee, but in 1854 came to Texas, where he established himself in the mercantile business at San Marcos. At the outbreak of hostilities between the Southern and Northern States, he enlisted in the Confederate army, but was stationed during the entire war period at Brownsville, Texas, and therefore saw no active service at the front. When peace was declared he returned to merchandising at San Marcos, but in 1871 moved to Austin, and there continued to be connected with commercial affairs until his retirement in 1889. His death occurred in November, 1911, while his wife passed away in August, 1909.

Charles H. Earnest received the benefit of excellent educational advantages, attending first the public schools of San Marcos, subsequently the Military Institute at Austin, and finally Vanderbilt University, at Nashville, Tennessee, where he received his degree in law. He did not at once enter upon the practice of his calling, however, but spent some time in teaching in the Military Academy at Austin, finally opening law offices at Rannels, Rannels county, in 1881. After spending three years at that place and Austin, in March, 1884, he came to Colorado, and this city has since been the scene of his endeavors. In 1890 he became the candidate of the Democratic party for the office of county judge of Mitchell county, serving in that office with ability and dignity for two years. Later he was elected mayor of Colorado, and gave the city a clean and business-like administration, winning friends among all parties. His high attainments as a lawyer have attracted to him a large and representative clientele, and among his colleagues he is recognized as a valuable associate and a formidable adversary. His business connections are not numerous, as his practice has been of such an extensive nature as to preclude the idea of his entering actively into other lines of endeavor, but as a director of the Colorado National Bank, his counsel is appreciated by the other officials of that institution. He believes implicitly in the future development of his native state and particularly of the section in which he resides, and has shown this confidence in various ways when opportunity has offered. Fraternally, he is connected with the local lodges of the Elks and the Knights of Pythias, and in the latter is serving as past chancellor.

Mr. Earnest was married April 27, 1887, when he was united with Miss Fannie Craig, of Colorado, Texas, daughter of Mrs. L. Delling, formerly of Pennsylvania. To this union there have been born six children: Charles R., who is engaged in the abstract business and insurance at Colorado; Martha A. and Jeanette, who reside with their parents; and Mabel Wright, Joseph and Fannie Bess, who are attending school.

ABE H. GOLDSTEIN. The firm of Goldstein & Miller, attorneys, established in El Paso in 1911, represents a combination of some of the best legal talent in the bar of this county. As one of its principals, Mr. Goldstein is especially prominent and popular and has been particularly successful in civil practice, to which he has devoted his activities since he engaged in professional work in 1899. He came to El Paso in 1903, and the years have brought him a pleasing degree of success in his chosen field of work. He is a man of conservative and quiet instincts, with no political ambitions and no desire to shine in the high places, but his citizenship is of a high order and in every way consistent with a useful and well-balanced life.

Born in Austin, Texas, on December 24, 1878, Abe H. Goldstein is the son of Lewis H. and Fannie (Biberstein) Goldstein, natives of Russia and France, respectively. The father came to America with his parents as a boy still young in years, and settled with them at San Marcus station, in Texas. He still lives, and is a retired merchant of Waco, Texas, where he enjoyed a successful business career and a position of prominence in his home community. The mother came from France to America with her parents at the age of six years, and was reared and educated in Texas, where the family located. She too is living, though of the three children born to these parents, Abe H. of this review is the sole survivor.

The town of Taylor, Texas, gave to young Goldstein his early educational training, after which he pursued an academic and law course in the State University of Texas, taking his B. S. degree in 1899 and his LL. B. in 1901. Soon after he received his degree of law, he was admitted to the Texas bar and began the practice of his profession in Taylor, and for eighteen months he continued there, where he enjoyed a success in advance of that accorded to the novice in law. He removed to El Paso on April 23, 1903, immediately entering upon civil practice, and his experience here has been one of the most pleasing order. Never a man to make any unusual demonstration of ability, he has carried on an ever increasing practice, exhibiting a quiet skill and a sureness of purpose that has gained him clients wherever he is known. Since October, 1911, he has been associated with W. E. Miller, under the firm name of Goldstein & Miller, and the combination has proven itself a successful and mutually agreeable one thus far.

A Democrat, Mr. Goldstein is not a politician in the remotest sense of the word, and he has held himself aloof from political entanglements at all times, never seeking favors at the hands of the public. His fraternal relations are confined to his membership in the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks in El Paso. Mr. Goldstein is particularly impressed with the possibilities offered in the southwestern part of the state and looks for greater developments here than in any other state in the Union within the next decade.

On May 24, 1905, Mr. Goldstein was married to Miss Emma Ullmann, the daughter of Maurice Ullmann, of San Francisco. They have a fine home on Hawthorne street at No. 1415, where their friends and acquaintances are warmly received, and the offices of the firm are located in the American Bank building.

SAMUEL B. HANWAY. The skillful handling of the chisel has at all times commanded a liberal share of the wonder and admiration of the world; it has preserved to us the beauty of antiquity, has marked the resting place of those dear to us, and has made the home of their mortal remains a garden of art and loveliness; it has also contributed largely to the beautifying of our cities, the adornment of our public parks, and to the perpetuating of the memory of the great and good. In this connection it is not inappropriate to briefly sketch the career of the late Samuel B. Hanway, of Dallas, whose death, December 3, 1910, removed one who was generally recognized as one of the most dexterous workers in marble in the Lone Star state. Mr. Hanway was a native of Ohio, born at Castine, Darke county, in 1840, a son of Judge James and Rebecca (Stitt) Hanway. His father, a noted writer and historian, whose history of Kansas is still considered a masterpiece in its line, served as county judge and as a member of the Ohio Legislature, and died when seventy-four years of age, widely known and universally esteemed. There were three sons in the family: John S., Samuel B. and Henry B., all of whom are deceased.

The early education of Samuel B. Hanway was secured in the public schools of the vicinity of his home in the Buckeye State, but as a lad he was taken to Kansas, and there completed his schooling. He had not yet attained his majority when he volunteered for service in the Federal army during the Civil war, and fought with the blue for four years. Enlisting as a private, he won steady promotion through his bravery and faithful service, and when he received his honorable discharge at the close of hostilities, bore the rank of lieutenant. On his return to private life, Mr. Hanway embarked in mercantile lines in Indian Territory, where he remained for four years, and at the end of that period installed himself in the marble business at Denison, Grayson county, Texas. Four years later he came to Dallas, and this city continued to be his home until his death. Essentially a business man, his entire life was devoted to building up his enterprise, which was one of the leaders in its line in the city, and which under his able management returned handsome profits to its owner. Among his associates he was known as a capable, industrious and thoroughly reliable man of business, whose word was better than any printed parchment, and whose loyalty to his friends was proverbial. He never had any inclination for the public life in which his father had become noted, and never sought public office, although he was a staunch supporter of good government, and cast his vote for the candidates of the Republican party. His public spirit led him to take a pride in his adopted city's growth and development, and anything tending to advance its interests was sure to find in him a true friend. A great lover of family and home, his fireside held out the greatest attraction to him, although he did not forego the pleasure of association with his fellows, and was popular as a member of the local lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

Mr. Hanway was married to Miss Edith Taylor, who was also a native of Ohio, but was reared in Iowa, whence she was taken by her parents when she was a small child. Her father was a farmer for many years in Iowa and there both he and his wife died. They were the parents of six children: Edith, who became Mrs. Hanway; Joseph, identified with the mines of Jasper, Nevada; Mary, who is the wife of H. O. Rice, of Mansfield, Washington; Emma, who is the wife of John B. Earlywine, of Oregon; Jay W., who is deceased; and Scott, a resident of MacAllen, Texas. One child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hanway: Leota, who is now the wife of Elmer R. Watkins and has two children,—Cloman H. and Evelyn E. After the death of her husband, Mrs. Hanway carried on the business for some time in partnership with her son-in-law, Mr. Watkins, but in 1913 sold out to him, her interest bringing $50,000. She devotes a great deal of her time to travel, especially in the Northwest, where she resides during the summer months, while her winter home is at No. 919 South Harwood street, in Dallas. She is widely known in social circles of the city, and has many warm friends.

HON. EDWARD E. SOLOMON. There are few professions where the struggle for success is more difficult or more bitter than the law. Success, however, when achieved, brings with it unusual reward. The really successful legist not only acquires a fortune, but com ands in the community a place of honor and conspicuous influence. It is probable that the law has been the main highway by which more men of merit have advanced to position and prominence, at least in this country, than any other road, and it is not unusual therefore to find among the leading citizens of a community men who have engaged in this calling. The roster of members of the legal profession in Erath county contains the names of numerous citizens who have risen to distinction, and prominent among these is found that of the Hon. Edward E. Solomon, ex-county judge and now city attorney of Dublin, Texas, in which state he has been engaged in active practice for more than twenty years. Judge Solomon is a native of Georgia, having been born in the city of Macon, September 8, 1860, a son of J. L. and Elizabeth Solomon, the former a native of Virginia and the latter of South Carolina.

As a young man J. L. Solomon left his boyhood home in the Old Dominion State and journeyed to South Carolina, where he met and married his wife. Settling in the city of Macon, Georgia, he engaged in the grocery and confectionery business for several years, but subsequently moved to Atlanta, and there was engaged in business until the time of his death in 1898, his widow surviving until 1900. Mr. Solomon was a man of industry, energy and business ability, and through good management and foresight made a success of his various ventures. At the outbreak of the war between the South and the North, he cast his fortunes with the Confederacy, and offered his services as a soldier, subsequently becoming a member of Company H, in Eller's Artillery. He participated in a number of hard-fought engagements, and on one occasion narrowly escaped death, a rifle ball passing through the crown of his hat. He was known as a man of strict integrity in all of his dealings, and when he died left a wide circle of friends to mourn his loss. He and his wife were the parents of three sons and three daughters, and four children are now living, Edward E. being the oldest son.

The early education of Edward E. Solomon was secured in the public schools of Atlanta, following which he became a student in the North Georgia Agricultural College, at Dahlonega, Lumpkin county, Georgia. Subsequently, he was appointed as cadet midshipman at the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Maryland, but after three years resigned his appointment and in 1881 came to Texas. Here Judge Solomon adopted the profession of educator, accepting a position as teacher in the public schools of Chambers county, and in the meantime assiduously devoted himself to study, having determined to enter upon a legal career. He was appointed county judge of Chambers county, and was admitted to the bar there in 1882, and at the expiration of his term removed to Callahan county, where he entered upon the practice of his profession. There he was elected county judge in 1884, and served in that capacity for eight years, then coming to Dublin, Erath county, where he has continued to follow his chosen vocation. His record was such as to draw the townspeople's attention to his sterling qualities, and he was soon enjoying a liberal practice. He is known as a lawyer of pronounced character, whether considered from the standpoint of his professional attainments or from the viewpoint of progressive citizenship; his practice is general, which, with a love of legal study, makes him one of the most widely-read legists at the bar. A staunch and uncompromising Democrat, he has worked faithfully in the interests of his party, on the ticket of which he was elected city attorney of Dublin in 1910. In his official capacity he is serving the people of his community in an able and conscientious manner, winning their confidence by his high ideals of the duties and responsibilities of public office. The Judge has for many years been prominent in Masonry, in which he has attained to the Scottish Rite degree, and in the local lodge has many friends. Among his professional brethren he is recognized as one who respects the ethics of the profession, and his reputation is that of a lawyer who proves a valuable associate or a worthy opponent. Judge Solomon is also a member of the local lodge of the Knights of Pythias.

In 1891 Judge Solomon was united in marriage at Baird, Texas, to Mrs. Sarah E. Bible, a widow, daughter of Benjamin Long, of Callahan county, Texas, a prominent farmer and stock raiser for many years. While a resident of Illinois, Mr. Long enlisted for service in the Federal army during the Civil war, and fought throughout that struggle, taking part in a number of sanguine engagements. His death occurred about the year 1905, and that of his wife about one year later. Mrs. Solomon died March 25, 1909, having been the mother of two sons and two daughters: Walter S., born May 5, 1892, employed at the Old Corner Drug Store, at Waco, who is married; Miss Ruth, a young lady of many attainments, born December 24, 1893, who has been well educated in the public schools, graduating from the Dublin High School in 1911, and who now makes her home with her father; Miss Sarah, born January 10, 1901, a student in the public schools, also at home; and Edward E., Jr., born November 27, 1904, attending the graded schools.

Judge Solomon takes a pride in the achievements of his adopted state, and has never had cause to regret having chosen this section as his field of endeavor. He believes in its continued prosperity, and considers one of its greatest inducements its healthful climate. An enthusiastic fisherman, he spends his vacations with his rod in hand, and rarely returns without some handsome trophy lured from river or lake. The record of his long and useful career is an open book to the citizens of his locality, who have full confidence in him as a worthy type of loyal Texas citizenship.

WILLIAM YOUNG GARRISON. In considering those among the citizens of Nacogdoches county whose activities have been directed toward developing this section's interests, and whose foresight has been rewarded in a most substantial manner, one's mind instinctively turns to those who have born the name of Garrison, men of energy, industry, acumen and public-spirit, who have attained high places in commercial, manufacturing and financial life. In this connection it is not inappropriate to review the salient points in the career of William Young Garrison, who has wide connections in business at Garrison, a town named in honor of his father, the late Capt. James H. Garrison, on whose property it was laid out.

The paternal grandfather of William Y. Garrison was George M. Garrison, who died near Caledonia, Texas, about the year 1883. He was born in 1816, near Cedar-town, Carroll county, Georgia, a son of Pierce Garrison, was educated in the country schools and followed farming for some time in Carroll county. In 1858 he came to Texas and engaged in farming in the vicinity of Caledonia, and subsequently engaged in carrying the mail under contract, his route being from Henderson to Mount Enterprise and thence to Center, Texas. His connection was active with the community of Mount Enterprise, where he moved from Caledonia and served as justice of the peace of that place. He was a southern man in sentiment, and although opposed to secession provided sons for the Confederate army, and did what he could to aid the South, although he had been the owner of only a few negroes. He was always a Democrat, and his religious connection was with the Methodist church. By all of his neighbors, who revered and respected him, he was known as "Uncle George," and when he died they knew they had lost a true friend. He kept himself well posted in politics, was a wide reader on political events, and was ever a great admirer of Henry Watterson. George M. Garrison married Mary Ann Cosper, daughter of Hamp Cosper, a Methodist minister of Georgia. The grandmother died in 1900, having been the mother of the following children: Capt. James H.; Caleb Warner, who died in the Confederate ranks; Elizabeth, who married E. M. Barrett and resides at Concord, Rusk county, Texas; Sarah, who married F. M. Rainbolt, of the same settlement; George H., who died near Garrison, in September, 1913, married Pattie Alexander and left eleven children; Robert F., of Garrison, who married Sallie Watts and has ten children; Emily, who married A. S. Ellis and died at Henderson, Texas, in 1879; Catherine, who married S. W. Strong and resides at Carthage, Texas; Nannie, who married J. T. Lacy of the Concord community; William P., of Garrison, who married Mary Lacy and has four children; Carrie, who married J. W. King, and has three children and resides at Nacogdoches, Texas; and Zadoc Devereaux ("Rho"), of Garrison, a sketch of whose career will be found on another page of this work.

Capt. James H. Garrison was born in Carroll county, Georgia, and left that state in 1860 as a single man. In 1865 he was married in Rusk county, Texas, whence he had made the journey overland by way of wagon. He had gone into the Confederate service as captain of Company G, of the Fourteenth Regiment, Texas Volunteer Infantry, Ector's Brigade, and served east of the Mississippi river. He belonged to the Tennessee army, fought gallantly at Chickamauga and other bloody battles, and during the Atlanta campaign was wounded and captured by the Federals, but afterwards escaped from a Northern prison. Immediately upon his return he was married and settled down to farming near Caledonia, which he followed until 1883 somewhat extensively. He was one of the developers of his community, clearing up lands and erecting homes for his tenants, and well managed his land in corn and cotton. When he left the farm he removed to Garrison and began his connection here with its urban life. He first sold goods here under the firm style of Garrison & Garrison, his partner being Capt. Z. B. Garrison, a cousin. He took up the tie and timber business as a contractor on a small scale and when he left merchandise went into that business exclusively and concentrated his entire energies therein. He furnished ties to the Southern Pacific Railway Company, and during his last year on earth handled a million and a half of ties. He did some exporting of walnut timber. In reality, Mr. Garrison was a builder, and erected a number of the stores in Garrison, a property which he laid off on his own land, and with which he continued as one of its most prominent business figures until his death, July 6, 1909.

In politics, Captain Garrison was a Democrat in state matters. He was a gold standard man and left William J. Bryan in 1896. He had no political ambitions and served in no public offices. Mr. Garrison was a man of few words, and devoted himself to business rather than to other subjects, yet he enjoyed the companionship of his fellows and was prominently connected with the Royal Arch Masons until the time of his death. Although he belonged to no church he was a very moral man, and his life was one characterized by the strictest business integrity and personal probity. Capt. James H. Garrison married Mary Young, a daughter of Capt. William Young, who came from Georgia, a farmer and livestock man, who made a specialty of breeding racing and saddle horses. He married Miss Bettie Strong, and they had three children: Mary; Laura, the wife of Jesse Bell; and John, who spent his life in and about Caledonia. Mrs. Garrison still survives her husband and makes her home in Garrison. She has been the mother of two sons: George H., who is a resident of Garrison; and William Young.

William Young Garrison was born at Caledonia, Texas, May 23, 1866, and after attending the public schools entered the Agricultural and Mechanical College. When he had graduated from that excellent institution, he entered the employ of his father, remaining with the elder man about six years and then purchasing a drug business. This latter venture did not prove satisfactory and he sold out, once more associating himself in business with his father, this time as a tie and timber contractor. This has been his field of activity to the present time. It may be said that Mr. Garrison and his brother, George H., are the main cogs in the business wheel at that place, and both have shown rare business ability at every point in their careers. The same business name, J. H. Garrison & Sons, appears on the firm's letter-head, and the same railroad continues to be furnished by this concern, but numerous improvements have been introduced since the death of the father, including the building of a modern sawmill. The brothers are also at this time furnishing the ties for the construction of the Pickering Lumber Company Railroad, which is now building. William Y. Garrison is one of the official board of the First State Bank of Garrison, of which he was one of the promoters in 1909. In politics a Democrat, he was a delegate to the last state convention, as well as the one held at San Antonio in 1912. Fraternally, he is connected with the Masons, the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World, the Elks and the Hoo Hoos. A tall man, of fine physique, he is genial and approachable in manner and has gained a wide circle of friends in business, political and fraternal circles.

Mr. Garrison was married at Timpson, Texas, May 15, 1888, to Miss Ada Todd, a daughter of Capt. T. J. Todd. The children born to this union are as follows: Bessie, who is the wife of Richard Walthall, of Garrison; J. B., who married Pauline Treadway; and Lela, who is the wife of S. W. Wommack.

CHARLES T. COOPER, M. D. In thirty years of practice in medicine in Texas, Dr. Cooper has won a place among the able and thoroughly experienced members of the profession. For the past fifteen years he has been located at San Angelo, where he has enjoyed as large and as select a practice as any other local physician, and outside of his profession has identified himself closely with the welfare of the city and county.

Charles T. Cooper was born in Mississippi, November 5, 1853, a son of William T. and Mary A. (Moore) Cooper. The father's family is Scotch in origin, and the mother's is English. The Moore family in particular has been well known in the south for generations as prominent planters and slave holders and people of social pretensions and high standing. William T. Cooper, the father, was a farmer and before the war owned a number of slaves who worked his plantation in Mississippi. Few sons of the south made a more persistently loyal record as a soldier than William T. Cooper. He went in about the beginning of the war and was honorably discharged four times on account of ill health. Each time, after recovering, he returned and again enlisted, and in this way continued until the final surrender. His death occurred in Mississippi in 1876, but the mother still lives on the old homestead in that state. She is eighty-five years old, very bright and active for one of her years, and an interesting fact about her relations with her son, the doctor, is that she maintains a daily correspondence with him. There were four children in the family, of whom the doctor was the second.

Dr. Cooper attended the public schools in Mississippi, and later was a student in the University of Mississippi, where he graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Science in 1876. His educational advantages were liberal, and he had exceptional training for his profession. From the University of Mississippi he entered Vanderbilt University at Nashville, and was graduated in the medical department M. D. in 1880. For the first three years he practiced medicine in his native state, and then came to Texas, first locating in Milam county. From there he moved to Taylor, in 1890, and in 1898 located at San Angelo. The doctor has a large general practice of medicine.

He has for many years been a loyal supporter of the Democratic party. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World and the Knights of the Maccabees.

On December 15, 1885, Dr. Cooper married Miss Katie C. Olsen, who was born in Norway. The doctor has four children living, namely: Mrs. Mary F. Hixon, wife of Dr. Hixon, of San Angelo; Mrs. Annie Laurie Hodges, wife of Samuel Hodges, who is connected with the general merchandise firm of Baker & Hemphill, of San Angelo; Miss Bettie Cooper, who is a musician, and a teacher of instrumental music; Charles T., Jr., who is in the automobile business; and Harvey C. died at the age of one year.

JAMES F. ROCHELLE, a former sheriff of Bowie county, Texas, was born at Myrtle Springs, this county, in 1864, son of H. P. and Cordelia (Fort) Rochelle, and on the paternal side is descended from French Huguenot ancestry, his great-grandfather Rochelle having been among those who left France following the edict of Nantes, and on their arrival in this country settled in South Carolina. H. P. Rochelle was born in South Carolina. In the early forties, soon after the death of his father, which occurred in that state, he came with his maternal grandfather, Charles Moores, to Bowie county, Texas, where he was subsequently married to Miss Cordelia Fort. Here he passed the rest of his life, and died in January, 1883. His widow is still living. She is a native of Mississippi and a daughter of J. B. Fort, with whom she came to Texas. J. B. Fort was the first permanent settler at Myrtle Springs, Bowie county, which later, on account of its healthfulness and many other advantages, became the home of a number of wealthy planters whose landed estates were in the Red River valley. Charles Moores on coming to Bowie county, first settled at what is now known as Redwater, near Sulphur River. In 1876, H. P. Rochelle and his family moved from Myrtle Springs to Texarkana and were among the pioneers of the town. A large portion of the old Rochelle plantation is still owned by James F. Rochelle and other members of the family.

While Mr. Rochelle has been engaged in agricultural pursuits nearly all his life, he has given several years to public service and as Sheriff of Bowie county has made a record. He was first elected to this office in 1906, and twice since then he has been re-elected, his long service being indicative of his popularity and efficiency. In July, 1913, he was elected assessor and collector of the city of Texarkana, Texas.

James F. Rochelle married Miss Ella McMickel, like himself, a native of Bowie county, and they are the parents of six children, namely: Arley, Murriel, James, Edward, Ruth and Rollin.

JOSEPH MCLEAN, of Valentine, Texas, has spent most of his life within the boundaries of the state of Texas. He is one of the many who, although they are not natives of the state, yet believe that it is about the finest state in the Union and he is well satisfied with the fortune it has brought to himself and his family.

Joseph McLean was born in Raleigh, North Carolina, in September, 1855, the son of Levi and Mary McLean, who later made their home in San Antonio, Texas. There were three children in the McLean family, of whom Joseph McLean was the youngest. The family is of Scotch descent, the founder of the family in this country having settled in Virginia in the early days of the colony.

The public schools of San Antonio furnished Joseph McLean with his education and after he completed his education he went into the stock raising business. He remained in this business for a number of years, being located near San Saba, at Colorado River. After giving up stock raising he went to Valentine, Texas, and is now working there in a general department store.

Mr. McLean has always been a Democrat in his political beliefs, but he votes according to the men and not the party, preferring to cast his vote for the man whom he thinks most capable of filling office.

On the 23rd of January, 1855, Mr. McLean was married to Miss Mattie Friscoe, of Lampassas, Texas. Mrs. McLean is a daughter of Colonel C. B. Friscoe and Kate E. Friscoe. The Friscoe family is one of the old southern families and before the Civil war were settled in Virginia, where they were large planters and owned many slaves. Colonel Friscoe was educated at West Point, and after being graduated from the military academy entered the army. At the time of the outbreak of the Civil war he was a colonel in the Federal army, but when Virginia seceded he immediately handed in his resignation and came to Texas, where he took an active part in the fight for the Confederacy. He was placed in charge of the sutlers store at Fordeens, Texas, and served bravely throughout the war, dying in 1865. He was an able officer and a brave man, being very popular among his brother officers and among his men. He belonged to the Masons, being a thirty-second degree Mason.

Mr. and Mrs. McLean have had seven children born to them, four boys and three girls. All of these children are at home except the eldest son, W. W. McLean, who is married and is in the employ of the El Paso & Southwestern Railway Company, as an engineer. He lived in Corriso, New Mexico. D. F. McLean is also an engineer in the employ of the El Paso & Southwestern Company, and another brother, R. L. McLean, is in the train service.

JAMES L. WOHLFORD. A lawyer by profession and identified with active practice since 1900, Mr. Wohlford occupies a prominent position in the public life of Fort Davis, where besides his high standing as a high class lawyer, he fills the office of county attorney and is superintendent of the city schools. His chief attention is now directed to local education, and during his term of service as superintendent of the schools, he has done much to place them upon a high plane of efficiency and is a thoroughly capable educator.

James L. Wohlford is a native of Texas, born in Granbury, January 1, 1875, and has spent all his life in this state. His early education was attained in the public schools, with a special course in the high school and then four years at the Granbury Methodist College. On leaving college he took up the reading of law in the office of Heiner & Keith, and was admitted to the bar in June, 1900. His first location was at Glen Rose, where he obtained his first fee as a lawyer, and subsequently was engaged in practice at Coleman, and at Albany and in June, 1912 came to Fort Davis to begin his work as superintendent of the city schools, and has since been appointed county attorney.

Mr. Wohlford was married at Glen Rose, Texas, January 17, 1904, to Miss Lillie Kinder, daughter of Herman Kinder of Glen Rose. Their two sons are Preston Herman and Joseph Bailey Wohlford. Mr. Wohlford is a man of versatile ability and interest, and takes a prominent part in all local affairs. He is one of the leaders in the membership of the local Methodist church, and his wife is equally interested in this organization. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Masons, the Odd Fellows, the Woodmen of the World, the Pretorians and the Knights of Pythias, having served in several of the offices. He is actively interested in the Democratic party organizations. For four years before coming to Fort Davis, he served as county attorney at Albany. Mr. Wohlford is very fond of hunting and all other outdoor sports, and in town his favorite recreation is probably music, and being an accomplished singer himself he takes a special pleasure in this one of the fine arts. It is the opinion of Mr. Wohlford that Jeff Davis county in unsurpassed for its climatic conditions, and as a fine stock country it offers unusual inducements to the business man. The father of Mr. Wohlford was Dallard Wohlford, a native of Virginia, who came to Texas when a young man and was a substantial farmer, at the same time taking much interest in local politics, and filling several public offices. He was a devout member of the Methodist church, and his death occurred at the age of sixty-two. His wife was Margaret (Hiner) Wohlford, who was born in Texas, in which state they were married and she now makes her home at Granbury. She is also an active member of the Methodist church. Seven children in the family, and the Fort Davis lawyer is the second in order.

JUDGE B. F. BROWN. The present county judge of Sterling county is one of the most efficient and popular officials at the county seat. He began his career as a farm laborer in Texas, when a boy, was a hard and ambitious worker, and in time developed a large and successful business as a farmer and stockman in the north Concho country, and continued to be actively identified in that line until his election to his present office.

Judge B. F. Brown was born September 15, 1853, in Marion county, Tennessee. The family were old residents of North Carolina, whence they moved to Tennessee, and one of the early ancestors of Judge Brown was a General Brown, a distinguished man in his state. The paternal ancestry is Scotch and English, and the mother was a descendant of Scotch ancestors. The parents were Benjamin A. and Elizabeth (Real) Brown, and they had six children, four sons and two daughters, among whom Benjamin F. was the fourth. The father was a Tennessee farmer, and arrived in Texas, locating in Denton county, October 10, 1857. He was one of the early farmers of that region, and after the war, in 1866 moved to Arkansas, where he continued as a farmer until 1904. In that year he returned to Texas, and located in Collin county, near Farmersville, where he died in 1905. The mother died in 1858. Benjamin A. Brown, during the Civil war served in the ranger service under Col. Barry, and fought Indians on the frontier. He was in the Dave Creek fight, one of the last engagements with the Red Men on the Texas frontier.

Judge Brown as a boy had the advantages of such public schools as existed in North Texas, during the fifties and sixties. He graduated from high school at Grand View, in Johnson county, in 1872. At the close of the war, in 1865, when twelve years old, he went to live with S. J. Chapman, of Denton county, a well-known stockman of that vicinity. In 1867 Mr. Chapman moved to Johnson county, and young Brown continued to make his home with him for a number of years, working at the labors of the farm and stock ranch without wages, and attending school as opportunity offered until he was twenty-one years old. After that he was employed at twenty dollars a month with F. M. Files, of Hill county, and after the expiration of their contract for the first four months he continued working about four years without any contract, both having complete confidence in the other's integrity, and their relations being exceptionally harmonious and beneficial. Mr. Brown then engaged in farming on his own account in Johnson county, in 1882, and continued there until 1905, when he sold out and moved to Sterling county, buying a ranch, and building up a large industry as a stockman in this part of the state. In 1910, on his election to the office of county judge, he moved his home to Sterling City.

Judge Brown has always been a worker for the interests of the Democratic party. He is prominent in Masonry, being a Royal Arch Mason and present district deputy grand master. He is also affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. His church is the Methodist church south.

On August 30, 1880, Judge Brown married Miss Sally J. Smith, of Hill county, a daughter of James K. and Carry Smith. Her father was a Confederate soldier, a stock raiser, and died while in the service of the south. The mother is still living, and her present husband, the third, is J. R. Lane. Judge Brown and wife became the parents of six children, of whom five are living, and all married but one. Ruel P. Brown was born May 27, 1881. Jerry F. Brown was born February 14, 1884. Mrs. Bertha McCabe was born October 10, 1887. Mrs. Anna Brown Pierce was born September 18, 1890. Miss Sudie E. Brown was born January 7, 1893, and died March 2, 1907. Miss Leora was born January 17, 1901.

ROBERT A. MOTLEY. Identified with the flourishing little city of Overton since 1893, Robert A. Motley may be considered the foremost citizen, being mayor, postmaster, banker, and for a number of years a merchant. His activities in earlier years also include an experience as an editor and publisher.

Robert A. Motley was born in the community of Rusk county, April 20, 1869. His father, Dr. James W. Motley, who during the seventies represented Rusk county in the Texas State Senate, came from North Carolina, and when a youth of eighteen settled in Rusk county. He was born in North Carolina in 1839, was educated in the common schools, studied medicine in the University of Kentucky at Louisville, graduated about the beginning of the Civil war, came to Texas, and soon afterwards entered a Texas regiment, and served as surgeon until the close of the conflict. After the war he opened an office at Millville, the name of which was subsequently changed to Motley in his honor, and in the Rusk county community he spent the rest of his lifetime, until his death June 7, 1887. He was a Democrat, always took an active part in local affairs, but his only office was that of state senator. His church was the Methodist, and he was buried under the auspices of the Overton Masonic Lodge, in which he was an honored member. In Rusk county, soon after the war, Dr. Motley married Miss Annie Henderson, whose father was a minister of the Christian church, and spent all his life in that profession. He came to Texas before the war, and of his children, besides Mrs. Dr. Motley, there were: Mrs. Dr. Hood of Marshall; Mrs. Laura Soape, of Carthage; and another. Dr. Motley had the following children: Dr. John G., of Overton; Mrs. W. H. Florey, who died at Overton; Robert A.; James W. of Wolf City; Luke, of Teneha, Texas; Mrs. Hall Wood of Henderson; and Gooch H., of Teneha.

Robert A. Motley grew up in his native community, and finished his education in Hubbard College at Overton. Five years of his career was spent in farming, after which he took the editorship of the Overton Herald, and conducted that paper in the interests of good government, of public welfare, and as a first-class medium for news and advertising. In 1886 Mr. Motley was appointed postmaster under President Cleveland's administration succeeding T. H. Still. His term of office ran for four years, and that was followed by a period in the drug business at Overton, a line which he followed up to 1901. After his marriage in the latter year, Mr. Motley went on the road for the Industrial Cotton Oil Company of Houston, and represented that concern for five years throughout Texas. On leaving the road, Mr. Motley bought the drug business of his brother, Dr. Motley at Overton, and that has since been one of his several business enterprises. In 1911 Mr. Motley organized the First Guaranty State Bank of Overton, and has since been its president. This bank is capitalized at ten thousand dollars, and its vice president is W. J. Coolidge, and its cashier V. E. Minor.

For the past ten years the citizens of Overton have kept Mr. Motley in the office of mayor. In August, 1913, under the present Democratic administration, he was appointed postmaster to succeed W. E. Neal, who, it is interesting to note, was the successor of Mr. Motley on the latter's retirement from the same office fifteen years ago. Mr. Motley has long been a leader in local democracy, and in the early nineties was a delegate to the famous "Car-Shed Convention" at which he supported James Hogg for governor. While publishing a newspaper he was the first man to mention Hon. R. C. Degraffenried for congressman of the third district. Mr. Motley is president of the Overton school board, and at the present time a fine school house is under construction at a cost of seven thousand dollars. Among other interests beside considerable residence property in Overton, he owns a good deal of farming land, and has bought and improved ten good rural properties in Rusk county, and is one of the largest producers of cotton and corn in this section. His fraternal associations are with the Knights of Pythias, in which he is a past chancellor, and with the Masonic Order. His church is the Baptist.

In Crockett, on April 21, 1901, Mr. Motley married Miss Ora Barksdale. Her father A. C. Barksdale, now of Overton, was a Confederate soldier, and located in Texas before the war. Mr. and Mrs. Motley have three children, Hortense, Nell and Ruth.

DR. GEORGE H. GARRETT. We are beginning to realize at the present day that ill health and poor sanitation and improper food are enemies of Christianity and right living and that the fight against disease means more to the world than the fight for greater empire. To anyone, therefore, who is aiding in this new battle of civilization, the thanks of all people are due. In Del Rio, Texas, Dr. George H. Garrett is making a fight for better conditions along these lines and the success which he is meeting makes him a prominent figure in this part of Texas. He has established a hospital which is the only one between El Paso and San Antonio, and has a large practice in Del Rio and the surrounding country, being one of the most successful physicians in this part of Texas.

Dr. George H. Garrett was born in Sulphur Springs, Texas, on the 3rd of August, 1876. His father, Levi J. Garrett was also born in Texas and is now living in Hopkins county, where he has a large ranch and is in the stock raising business. He is a prominent member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, being one of the oldest members of the order in the state. He married in Texas, his wife being Miss Sarah Jones, who was born in Illinois. Mrs. Garrett is a very active member of the Presbyterian church.

Of the six children in his father's family, George H. Garrett was the eldest. He was sent to school at an early date, attending the grammar and high schools of Sulphur Springs. He later entered Henry College in Campbell, Texas, and after three years spent in this institution he was graduated. After leaving Henry College he entered the medical department of the University of Arkansas, where he took a special course. Then matriculating at the University of Louisville he studied there in the medical department for some time, being graduated from that institution in 1898.

After completing his student life he returned to Texas and began to practice in Hopkins county. Miller's Grove was the scene of his first three years' work and he went from there to Hunt county where he practiced for two years. Leaving Texas at the end of the two years he went to Sapulpa, Oklahoma, where he was engaged in practicing his profession for four years at the end of which time he went to Old Mexico, remaining there for about four years. He then came to Del Rio, and entered into partnership with Dr. W. H. Doty. They established offices and a complete and up-to-date hospital. Since the beginning of their work here the partners have been most successful and in their hospital, in particular, have they accomplished a great work. This hospital, while general in its nature, was really established for surgical work and much of the latter is done herein. Dr. Garrett is especially well known for the fine surgical work he has done and since he spends his leisure attending clinics and lectures in the big city hospitals, there is no danger of the people of Del Rio getting anything but the most modern surgical knowledge from Dr. Garrett.

Dr. Garrett is a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, belonging to the blue lodge, the commandery and the shrine. He is also a member of the Knights of Pythias. Politically the doctor is independent and he takes a very active interest in local politics. The greatest recreation which the doctor finds, however, is in study, in post-graduate and research work in the medical centers of the country. His large private library also affords him much pleasure and is an especially well selected one.

Dr. Garrett was married at Sapulpa, Oklahoma, in July, 1906, to Miss Lookah Ross, who was formerly from Tahlequah, Oklahoma. They have become the parents of two children, a boy and a girl, Elbert and Maxine. Mrs. Garrett is an active member of the Methodist Episcopal church, but Dr. Garrett affiliates with no special church.

The hospital of which Dr. Garrett was the founder has now grown too small to accommodate the number of patients, and so a new and larger one is to be built in the near future, one of the best proofs of the usefulness of the institution.

Dr. Garrett is a firm believer in the greatness of the state of Texas. He says, "I can say this much for Texas. No matter what a man's business or vocation may be, he can find in Texas locations where he can carry on his work profitably."

MAJOR JOHN YOUNG RANKIN. Hubert Howe Bancroft in his history of Texas, calls Major Rankin the "father of Brownwood." After a distinguished record as a soldier, both as an Indian fighter and as a Confederate private and officer and with a long experience as a business man and as a lawyer, Major Rankin moved out to West Texas in 1869, and came to Brownwood in 1872. At that time Brownwood was a stopping place for the herds of cattle raised in that section and driven from the remote western parts of the state to market, and the only houses at that time were twelve log cabins, each of which was built with a view to protection against the Indians, who frequently raided this section. Some ten or fifteen years passed before the first railroad reached Brownwood, and it was a typical frontier community when Major Rankin first became identified with it. After a short time he bought some land adjoining Brownwood, which he divided into blocks and sold as residence lots, and from 1872 down to the present time a period of more than forty years, Major Rankin has been behind nearly every movement and undertaking for the upbuilding of his home city, and more properly than any other resident of Brownwood deserves the title which the historian bestowed upon him.

John Young Rankin was born in Lexington, Kentucky, November 3, 1833, and at this writing is in his eighty-first year. He was a son of Thomas and Sarah (Robb) Rankin, and comes of a noted ancestry, a portion of his interesting family record being briefly sketched as an introduction to his personal career. During the latter part of the seventeenth century, seven Rankin brothers, devoted Presbyterians, left Scotland, their native land and settled in the north of Ireland. Two of these brothers were assassinated for preaching the Presbyterian doctrine. The others left Ireland and came to America, their first location being in Pennsylvania, after which the different branches of the family spread to many parts of the Union. The first ancestor to be mentioned was William Rankin who moved from Ireland to Scotland in 1700. His sons Adam, Hugh and John, immigrated to America in 1720. Adams was the great-great-grandfather of Major Rankin. Jeremiah, the son of Adam and his wife Elizabeth May, was the great-grandfather, and was born in 1733, married Rhoda Craig, and among their children was Thomas Rankin, grandfather of Major Rankin. Thomas Rankin moved to Woodford county, Kentucky, where he married a Miss Young, and he lived and died on his farm in Woodford county. Of the children of Thomas, Sr., was Thomas, Jr., who was the father of John Young Rankin. The Rankin family in Kentucky included Adam Rankin, grand-uncle of Major Rankin, and noted as a pioneer Presbyterian minister, who moved to Kentucky with a colony of old school Presbyterians and founded the church where the city of Lexington now stands.

Thomas Rankin, Jr., father of Major Rankin was born September 1, 1799, in Whitford county, Kentucky, and afterwards moved to Lexington. He married Sarah Thom Robb, a daughter of Major Joseph Robb, who had gained his title in the Revolutionary war. Thomas Rankin was a merchant in Lexington for a number of years. In 1840 he moved to Boonville, Missouri, where he continued as a merchant until his death on August 8, 1851. Of his seven children, only two are now living. One of these, the sister of Major Rankin is Julia, the wife of Patten Houx, of Ennis, Texas.

John Young Rankin was reared in Boonville, Missouri, where he was educated in the Kemper Institute, and was a schoolmate of Joseph and Alexander Terrell, both of whom were later prominent in Texas history, the former of Fort Worth and the latter of Austin. After the death of his father he left school, and in 1853, the family moved to Texas, settling for a time in San Augustine county, where John Y. Rankin studied law for a time under Governor J. P. Henderson and James Audry. In making the removal to Texas, Henry L. Rankin the oldest son, now deceased, had taken charge of the family, and in a short time took the family to Waller county, where they were all established on a plantation and remained until the mother's death in 1865. Henry L. Rankin was a veteran of the Mexican and Civil wars, and died some years later and is buried beside his mother in Waller county.

Major Rankin located at Henderson, Texas, in February, 1854, and in the same year became a lieutenant in Captain Giles Poggess' Company A of the Texas Rangers. He took part in two campaigns against Chief Seneca on the western frontier and assisted in driving Seneca from Texas. After serving in the State Rangers for three months, he was mustered into the United States service and his company was one of six companies of Texas mounted volunteers, and these with two or three companies of the noted Second United States Dragoons formed a battalion commanded by Captain Pat Calhoun, son of Jno. C. Calhoun, and for several months they were engaged in frontier duty. After being discharged from the frontier service Major Rankin became the pioneer cotton and commission man of the Houston & Texas Central Railroad. That Railroad was being slowly constructed northward from Houston, and its northern terminus was a concentration point for the cotton and other products from over a great range of counties including practically all the area of the settled state northward as far as Dallas. He continued in this line of business until the outbreak of the Civil war at which time he closed his warehouses at Navesota early in 1861.

He then became lieutenant in Captain B. Donley's company in the regiment commanded by Col. John S. Ford, (Old Rip). The first service was on the Rio Grande River, at Ringold Barracks and at Brownsville. After six months he returned to Hempstead, and joined the twenty-fifth Texas Cavalry. His colonel was C. C.

Gillespie. At the battle of Arkansas Post, he was captured after a three day's fight, and sent to Camp Chase, in Ohio, where he was held a prisoner for four months, then sent to Fort Delaware in Pennsylvania and exchanged at City Point, Virginia, in May, 1863. On January 11, 1863, Lieutenant Rankin had been raised to the rank of Captain. After his exchange he was ordered to report to Brigadier General Deshler in General Pat Cleburne's division of the army of Tennessee at Dalton, Georgia. He was promoted to Major and assigned to the staff of General Deshler, who fell at Chickamauga. He was then transferred to the Staff of Brigadier General H. B. Granbury, who fell with Cleburne at Franklin. At the siege of Atlanta, Major Rankin in the last day of battle was again captured, by Schofield's Corps, was allowed a parole of honor, and remained in camp until started to Johnson's Island prison. On reaching Nashville he was kept in the old penitentiary for some time and was then ordered to Palmetto station in Georgia, where he was exchanged. By this time the twenty-fifth Texas Cavalry had suffered such losses in battle and prisoners that it had lost its identity as a regiment and Major Rankin was thereafter on continuous staff duty until the close of the war. He was after his second exchange assigned to the staff of Major General W. B. Bates, and afterwards placed on the staff of Lieutenant B. F. Cheatham, the corps commander, under whom he served until the close of the war. He was with the troops surrendered by General Jos. E. Johnston to Sherman at Durham Station in North Carolina in May 1865. At the battle of Chickamauga, Major Rankin was severely wounded but otherwise went through the service in active duty except while in prisons from 1861 to 1865.

After the war Major Rankin returned to Millican, Texas, where he reopened his warehouses, and once more engaged in cotton buying. Then followed the era of reconstruction, and Major Rankin was among those devoted Southerners who refused to take the oath of allegiance, known as the iron-clad oath, and rather than accept such humiliation he moved out west, and thus became identified with western Texas in 1869. He first located in Comanche county, where he was in the land business until April, 1872. Having a license to practice law, he then came to Brownwood, and combined the business of land buying and brokerage and the law, and has continued to prosper and to render a large service to his community in those lines to the present time. When war was declared with Spain Major Rankin was a volunteer of his services, to the governor, but there were so many applications that he could not be assigned to any duty.

Major Rankin served as county judge of Brown county from 1874 to 1876. For five years he was district clerk, and performed the functions of that office over three counties, Brown, Coleman and Runnels. In 1876 he was a candidate for the state senate losing by twenty-three votes. He has always been a loyal adherent of Democracy, but voted for McKinley and the gold standards twice. In 1878 he was candidate for state comptroller. Major Rankin was elected elder in the First Presbyterian church, south, at Brownwood in 1885, and has been prominent in his church for many years. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Of all the various honors paid to him during his long career Major Rankin is perhaps proudest of his present position as commander of the Martin Walt Camp of the United Confederate Veterans at Brownwood. He is also on the staff of Major General Van Zandt in the Texas Division and Trans-Mississippi Department of United Confederate veterans, with the rank of colonel.

On December 20, 1866, at Henderson, Texas, Major Rankin married Miss Sarah Shedd, of Hardensburg, Kentucky. Her death occurred in Brownwood October

7, 1878, leaving two daughters and two sons, namely; Sarah Letitia, Jane Robb, John Y., Jr., and Royal Robb, Sarah, now the wife of J. P. McCarthy was born at Henderson, Texas, October 15, 1867 and she and her family live on a farm at Henderson. Jane Robb, who was born at Comanche, May 4, 1871, married Edward Andrew Parks, and they live at Brownwood, where her husband was a railroad contractor and their family consists of three sons and three daughters. John Young Rankin, Jr., who is general manager of the Interurban Freight and Express Company at Fort Worth was born at Brownwood, February 26, 1874, and married Miss Zora Comer, by whom he has two children. Royal Robb Rankin, who is proprietor of a gin and sheet-iron manufacturing plant in Brownwood, was born February 2, 1877. Major Rankin married for his second wife Mrs. Josephine A. Wiggins, whose maiden name was Vinson, the widow of Captain James Wiggins of Sybley's command in the Confederate army. By her first marriage she had two sons and one daughter, J. Vinson, John H. and Lillian, who reside now in San Antonio, Texas.

JACOB A. WHITTEN. Owner and director of a large and prosperous business in ranching and in financial affairs at Eldorado, Mr. Whitten is one of the men of progress in this county. He has deservedly prospered and along with material prosperity has always carried the esteem of his fellow citizens who admire him as a man of splendid integrity, a worker for the public good, and a valuable factor in the community's life.

Jacob A. Whitten was born in Callahan county, Texas, June 19, 1865, a son of Jacob A. and Sarah (Young) Whitten, the father a native of Tennessee and the mother of Texas. The father came to Texas when a young man, and spent all his life as a rancher. He was a member of the Methodist church, while his wife belonged to the Baptist denomination. His death occurred in 1863 and his wife passed away in 1909. She is buried in Schleicher county. She was sixty-nine years of age at the time of her death. There were five children in the family, and Jacob A. and his sister, Mrs. Mary Ray, of Oklahoma, are the only survivors at the present time.

Jacob A. Whitten is a Texas rancher and cattleman, who has experienced nearly all the ups and downs and fortunes and misfortunes of the live stock industry during the last thirty years. After getting his education in the public schools he began his practical career at the age of seventeen, taking a place on a ranch, and spending several years in the employ of others. During a part of the time he was assistant to his mother on her ranch, after the father's death. In 1898 he became an independent operator as a rancher, and his success is probably as great as any who started at that time and with no more capital than he had at the beginning. He now owns one of the largest and best equipped ranches in Schleicher county, located about five miles from Eldorado, and raises large numbers of cattle and sheep. Mr. Whitten organized the Eldorado State Bank, and served as its cashier and one of its directors until its consolidation with the First National Bank of Eldorado, of which well-known institution he is vice president. He is also a stockholder and director in the Wool Growers' Central Storage Company.

Mr. Whitten was married in Stephens county, Texas, December 20, 1889, to Miss Mollie Morris, daughter of Walker Morris and wife, of Stephens county, where Mrs. Whitten was reared, though she is a native of Indiana. Eight children, five sons and three daughters, have been born to the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Whitten. Johnnie Jettie, and Jaros are now deceased, while the survivors are: Willie, who is married and a resident of Schleicher county; Mattie, Burren, Lewis, and Chandler. All except the two youngest have completed their education and are now at the beginning of life's practical duties and responsibilities. The family are active members of the Baptist church, and Mr. Whitten is one of the leading workers in that denomination, and for nine consecutive years has served as superintendent of the local Sunday school. Fraternally he is equally popular, being affiliated with the Masonic order, the Woodmen of the World, the Knights of the Maccabees, and in his Masonic lodge was master for six years and has served in some office ever since joining the order. In politics he is a Democrat and his interest in public affairs and the confidence reposed in him by his fellow citizens have led to his election in several important local offices. For eight years he served as county judge of Schleicher county, and was ex-officio county superintendent of schools at the same time. He is now state sheep inspector for Texas. In his business and in unremitting industry he has found his chief pleasure in life, though he has never failed to apply himself vigorously to every movement for social and civic betterment in his home community.

PROFESSOR JOHN T. ROBERTS. In the training of young men and women for efficient parts in the world of trade, a school which has done successful work in northwest Texas is the Roberts Business College of Weatherford. Professor J. T. Roberts, president and proprietor, has had a long experience in both general and special lines of education, and understanding the needs of the time in vocational training has developed the means for furnishing his pupils with the best possible advantages.

John T. Roberts was born in Minden, Louisiana, August 9, 1861, has lived in Texas nearly all his life. His ancestry is Scotch-Irish, and not many of the immediate relationship is still living. His parents were Captain W. F. and Sarah (Griffith) Roberts of Louisiana. Captain Roberts came to Texas in November, 1861, and located at Jasper. His record as a soldier identifies his name conspicuously with Texas history. Soon after coming to this state he raised a company and equipped it from his own means. From captain of the company he was later promoted to colonel of the regiment which served in Walker's Division, and he was one of the aids of Walker during the raid through Arkansas. In the latter part of the war Captain Roberts superintended construction of forts in south Texas. His service continued from the beginning to the end of the struggle, and at the close of hostilities he settled in Fayette county, and took up a career as a farmer. That was his occupation until his death in 1898. His wife passed away in 1868. There were nine children in the family, four of whom are still living, Professor Roberts being the youngest. The oldest is W. F. Roberts, now on the old homestead in Fayette county. Amanda J. is the wife of G. W. Lewis, a merchant at Uvalde. Nola is the wife of Robert F. Sellers, a stockman in Bee county.

Professor Roberts was reared chiefly in Fayette county, Texas. His education was acquired in the local schools there, and was continued in the Agricultural and Mechanical college at Bryan. In 1880 he took a law course at Oxford, Mississippi, and in 1884 returned to South Texas. For the past thirty years his career has been that of an educator, and his record has been one of exceptional success. The public schools were the principal field of his services until he engaged in the special line of business training. For a time he served as city superintendent of the schools of Bowie, and in 1892 accepted the appointment of President of the Decatur Baptist College at Decatur. A little later he was recalled to the superintendency of the Bowie public schools in 1893, and continued there several years. In 1900 Professor Roberts organized the Roberts Business College in Bowie, and in 1905 moved the institution to Weatherford, where it has since filled an important place in the work of training young men and women for successful careers. The chief branches taught at the school are bookkeeping, banking, corporation accounting, shorthand and typewriting, and also the fundamental English studies. The Roberts Business College has been more than a training school, since it has successfully endeavored to place its graduates in positions for which their special aptitude and training best fits them. Professor Roberts has always been a Democrat in politics, has taken the degrees of York Rite Masonry, is a past high priest of the Royal Arch Chapter, and is a member of the Mystic Shrine. He is also a Past Recorder of the Weatherford Commandery of the Knights Templar, and is Venerable Counsel of the Modern Woodmen of America. His other associations are with the Brotherhood of American Yeomen. He belongs to the Weatherford Chamber of Commerce, and is a member of the Baptist church.

Professor Roberts was married March 17, 1886, near Bowie, in Montague county, to Miss Medie C. McDonald, a daughter of Cash and Maria McDonald, of Montague county. Mrs. Roberts' father is remembered as one of the pioneer settlers of north Texas. His participation in the many struggles with the Indians on the frontier during the early days brought him a variety of experience such as fell to the lot of few Texans. He was four times wounded, and a number of times narrowly escaped death at the hands of the Red Men. The old Indian fort in Montague county was situated on his ranch, near Victory Peak, and Mrs. Roberts was born in that fort. Victory Peak took its name from a young lady who had been kidnapped by the Indians, and who finally made her escape and reached the peak, and by waving a handkerchief attracted the attention of some cowboys who rescued her.

Professor Roberts and wife have eight children, two sons and six daughters. Two of the daughters are married: Mrs. Minnie L. Parnell, whose husband is a merchant at Merkel, and Mrs. Gana E. McCall, wife of Leslie McCall, who is in the moving picture business at Dallas. The other children are: Cash, aged twenty-five, on the ranch with his grandfather, near Bowie; Grover C., aged about nineteen, and a bookkeeper with the firm of Butler Brothers in Dallas; Lucile, aged seventeen; Lula, aged fourteen; Nellie, nine years old, and Clyde, a daughter, aged seven.

JOHN R. NASWORTHY. Among the men who have taken an active part in the life and history of Tom Green county is John R. Nasworthy, of San Angelo, Texas. He has lived in this part of Texas for forty years and has seen the tremendous growth of the western section of Texas. He has been engaged in the cattle business ever since coming to the section and he is one of the best known stock raisers in this part of the state. His financial success is not, however, the reason of his many friends, for he is very popular, as is shown by the fact that he has held every office in Tom Green county, save that of county judge, but his popularity comes from his own personal characteristics and the strength and kindness of his character.

John R. Nasworthy was born in Midville, Burke county, Georgia, on the 25th of September, 1849. His father, Uriah H. Nasworthy, was a planter of Georgia and before the Civil war he was the owner of a goodly number of slaves. He married Mary Schonyess and continued as a planter up to the time of his death in 1865. His widow died in 1890. There were ten children born to Uriah Nasworthy and his wife, six sons and four daughters. Although he himself was too old to enter the service on the breaking forth of the Civil war he sent all of his sons to the front. They enlisted in General Cobb's Legion and in Steward's Cavalry. These sons in the order of their age are: George, Thomas, Mitchell, Charles, Knute, and John R. Nas-worthy. They all served through the entire war with the exception of John R., who was captured and during his captivity contracted measles. Through this simple disease congestion of the lungs came upon him and he became a physical wreck. He returned home, where he remained for about a year.

In 1867 he came to Texas and located at Brenham, where he became engaged in farming and stock raising. He remained there until 1871 when he came further west and settled on the Concho river, where he continued in the stock raising business. When he came into this section most of the citizens of the county were Mexican and the whole population of the county numbered only about three hundred people at this time. Cattle were worth about three dollars a head and horses sold for from five to ten dollars per head. The land was all owned by the government and could be located at ten cents per acre, but the first settlers in this region were poor people and could not locate land even at this astonishingly low price. Now cattle in this section is worth from forty to seventy-five dollars per head, and horses are worth from fifty to two hundred dollars apiece. The land sells anywhere from five dollars to fifty dollars an acre. Such is the practical evidence of the development in which Mr. Nasworthy has had a hand. He is still engaged in the cattle business near San Angelo, but much of his time is given to his interest in public work. As has been mentioned, he has held every public office in the gift of the citizens of the county, except that of county judge, and he is even now filling the office of county commissioner, to which he was elected in 1910.

Mr. Nasworthy is proud of three things: his politics, his fraternal relations and his religion. He is a member of the Democratic party and belongs to the Baptist church, having been a trustee of the church for a number of years. It is in his record as a Mason that he takes particular pride, being a member of the Commandery and the Shrine. He also belongs to the Knights of Pythias, and to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

Mr. Nasworthy was married on the 2nd of February, 1880, to Miss Dessa Fisher, a daughter of Ralph Fisher, a native of Germany. He was an architect and came to this country early in life, pursuing his vocation until his death several years ago. Mr. and Mrs. Nasworthy have four children living, three sons and one daughter. The daughter married Riley S. Johnson of Sherman, Texas, and they now reside in San Angelo. The sons are all in the ranch and stock raising business.

Mr. Nasworthy is enthusiastic, not only over the business opportunities of western Texas but also over its climate for he came to Texas what we would call a "lunger," and he is now a robust man of sixty-four weighing one hundred and eighty-seven pounds.

W. B. BIZZELL. As an institution there is none in Texas with a more definite influence in the training of women for the serious responsibilities of life than the College of Industrial Arts at Denton. The position of this school is well understood and much of its usefulness and its creditable standing among the higher schools of the state are due to the wise and able management of its president, W. B. Bizzell. The following paragraphs offer a brief sketch of this well known educator.

William Bennett Bizzell is a native of Texas, born near the old town of Independence October 14, 1876. His parents were G. M. and Sarah Elizabeth Bizzell, his father a merchant and farmer. Professor Bizzell was liberally educated in academic and professional schools of Texas and in the North. After the common schools he entered the Baylor-Crane College at Independence and was a student there during portions of the years from 1892 to 1894. On January 1, 1893, Mr. Bizzell took his first work in Baylor University at

John R Saworthy

Waco, and was graduated bachelor of science in 1898 and bachelor of philosophy in 1899. In the intervals of his teaching Mr. Bizzell subsequently pursued post-graduate work in the University of Chicago, and won his master of arts degree from that institution in 1912. In 1910 the Illinois College of Law at Chicago conferred upon him the degree of D. C. L.

His career as an educator began at Plantersville in September, 1898, and he taught and held successively the following positions: Principal of the Montgomery high school, 1899-01; principal of the Navasota high school, 1901-02; superintendent of Navasota high school, 1902-10; and was elected president of the College of Industrial Arts at Denton in 1910.

Mr. Bizzell has made of educational work a career, and his advancement from individual teacher to president of a college has been well merited. Professor Bizzell in 1911 was made a member of the American Association for the advancement of science, and in the same year became a member of the Association for the Promotion of Industrial Education. From 1898 to 1903 he served as first lieutenant in the Texas National Guards. He is a Democrat in politics, has been a Knights Templar Mason since 1910, and a member of the Knights of Pythias since 1901, and belongs to the Baptist church.

On July 18, 1899, at Navasota, Mr. Bizzell married Carrie Wray Sangster. Their children are William Sangster Bizzell, aged thirteen years; and Elaine Bizzell, aged ten. Professor Bizzell and family reside in the handsome president's residence on the college campus at Denton.

WILL S. PAYNE. One of the native sons of Texas who has attained merited success in the profession of law and who is now a citizen of Abilene, is Will S. Payne. He became a resident of this city in 1914, coming here from Snyder, where he established himself in the confidence of the public and in building up a representative professional business. His advancement in the ranks of his chosen calling has been steady and commensurate with his activities.

Mr. Payne was born July 7, 1873, at Independence, Kaufman county, Texas, and is a son of Gordon and Fannie (Richardson) Payne. On the paternal side of the family Mr. Payne is descended from Lord Fox of England, and on the maternal side is a descendant of Robert Burns, the great lyric poet of Scotland. The family was a numerous one in Texas, where Gordon Payne was engaged in farming and stock raising, and at the time of the war between the states he enlisted in Colonel Wortham's regiment, General Hood's Brigade, in the Confederate service. He took an active part in numerous engagements during the first three years of the war, but his eyesight failed and he was granted his honorable discharge on account of disability. At the close of the war he settled at Independence, where he was married to Miss Fannie Richardson, of Cedar Grove, Texas. They settled down to housekeeping on a farm, and for forty-three years Mr. Payne continued to till the soil and raise stock in that county. In 1900 he made removal to Hood county, Texas, and there continued to follow the same occupation up to the time of his death, which occurred April 15, 1908. His widow still survives and is living with her son, H. P. Payne, an attorney of Fort Worth, Texas, being still in the best of health and mind, although seventy-one years of age.

The primary educational training of Will S. Payne was secured in the public schools of Kaufman county, Texas, and following this he engaged in the study of law at Terrell. He began his law studies under the preceptorship of W. B. Wynne of Wills Point, Van Zandt county, in 1895, and later was with "Bill" Allen, of Terrell, and first entered practice on his own account at Elmo, Texas, in 1898. He continued at that point until 1900, when he went to Dublin, Erath county; 1905 moved to Stephenville, in the same county, and in 1908, on account of the ill health of several members of his family, went to a health resort at Gordon, Palo Pinto county, Texas. After remaining there about two years the family moved to Snyder, the county seat of Scurry county, and there Mr. Payne continued in the successful practice of law until 1914. Aside from his professional business, which has attracted most of his energies, Mr. Payne has interested himself in public matters as an advocate of the principles of the Democratic party. On various occasions he has written articles for campaign use, has at times lent his fine oratorical power to the cause of his party, and has been successful in a number of debates with adherents of socialism. He is a valued member of the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and in the latter has attained to the Grand Lodge. His religious connection is with the Baptist church.

On October 20, 1897, Mr. Payne was married to Miss Mattie Bass, a daughter of R. N. and Laura Bass of College Mound, Texas. Mrs. Bass died in July, 1884, and Mr. Bass, who was for years engaged in farming and stock raising, now makes his home with Mr. and Mrs. Payne. He had four sons and three daughters, Mrs. Payne being the youngest of the family. To Mr. and Mrs. Payne there have been born six children, of whom four are still living: Henry Gordon; Howard; Maurine, and Larmon.

WILLIAM J. HARRIS. A representative of a patrician and distinguished old southern family, Mr. Harris came to Texas as a youth and here he has maintained his home for nearly forty years, within which he has endured the hardships and privations incidental to frontier life in the pioneer days and has witnessed and aided in the civic and material development of one of the greatest of the commonwealths of the Union. He was one of the first white men to establish a home in El Paso after the line of the Southern Pacific Railroad was extended to that point, and thus he may consistently be termed one of the pioneer citizens of this now thriving and attractive metropolis of western Texas. He has been prominently identified with railroad building in the southwest and also with the industrial development of his home state, the while the passing years have brought to him well earned prosperity, giving him prestige as one of the substantial capitalists of Texas, even as he has long been one of the honored and valued citizens of the state. He is a man of broad and liberal views and utmost civic loyalty, and in his character and services he has well upheld the prestige of the honored name which he bears, his ancestral history being one of which he may well feel proud.

William John Harris was born in the city of Memphis, Tennessee, on Christmas day of the year 1858, and is a son of Judge John W. and Martha (Wilborn) Harris, both of whom were born and reared in Tennessee, where the respective families were founded in the pioneer epoch of its history. At the inception of the Civil war Judge Harris tendered his aid in defense of the cause of the Confederacy, and he was made captain of his company in a Tennessee regiment. He was a gallant and able commanding officer and participated in many engagements, including the battle of Perryville, in which he was severely wounded. He was a man of high professional attainments and became one of the representative members of the bar of his native state. He was engaged in active practice at Paris, the capital of Henry county, Tennessee, until he was called to serve on the bench of the district court. He proved a most able, faithful and discriminating jurist, with broad and accurate knowledge of the law and high conception of the principles of equity and justice. He continued the honored incumbent of this judicial office until the time of his death, which occurred at Paris in 1878, his loved and devoted wife having been summoned to the life eternal in 1861. The remains of both rest in the family cemetery at Paris and the name of both are held in lasting honor in their native state. Judge Harris was a brother of Hon. William R. Harris, one of the distinguished men of Tennessee, of which state he served as governor for three terms, including the climacteric period of the Civil war. Of the two children of Judge John W. and Martha (Wilborn) Harris the subject of this review alone survives, his sister, Mary E., having died at the age of twenty-one years, and her remains having been interred by the side of those of her father and mother.

The boyhood days of William J. Harris were compassed by the clamour and severe tension of the Civil war, and incidents of the great struggle were firmly impressed upon his plastic mind. He received proper educational discipline of a preliminary order, and thereafter continued his studies in the University of Tennessee until he had attained to the age of seventeen years, when, about three years prior to the death of his honored father, he set forth to make his own way in the world. At the age noted, in 1875, he came to Texas and identified himself intimately with frontier activities, his first employment being that of stage driver on the route between Fort Worth and Fort Concha. In this occupation he endured great hardships and perils, as on more than one occasion he was compelled to pass an entire day without water and was often deprived of food, besides which he had many narrow escapes from the Indians. The timbre of the young man was shown in his determination and fortitude under such unpropitious and trying circumstances, and these early experiences foreshadowed the advancement and success which he was destined to gain through the same sterling attributes of character. Mr. Harris continued his work in connection with staging operations until 1882, when he established his home in El Paso, where he arrived almost simultaneously with the completion of the Southern Pacific Railroad to this point, the present attractive city having been represented by a meager settlement of Mexicans, he having been one of the first five Americans to locate in the frontier town. Here he procured a position in connection with the United States customs service, and he continued to be identified with the same for the ensuing decade, as a customs official on the border between Texas and Mexico.

In 1892 Mr. Harris turned his attention to railroad contracting and in this field of enterprise he found ample scope for successful effort, both in the matter of executing important contracts and in gaining to himself due compensation. He assisted in construction work as a contractor on the Southern Pacific, the Texas Pacific, the El Paso & Northeastern, and the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroads, and through his progressive policies and able handling of large contracts he gained financial independence.

Mr. Harris purchased the equipment and business of the Pomeroy Transfer Company, of El Paso, and thereafter he continued the enterprise with marked success for several years, at the expiration of which he sold the business. He was at one time the owner of El Paso Iron and Brass Works, and he otherwise gave his influence and capitalistic support to the up-building of local industrial and business enterprises. He became associated with William E. Davis in the purchase of fourteen hundred acres of land in Las Cruces county, and he is also the owner of six thousand, five hundred acres of land in Callahan county, the latter property now constituting one of the finest ranches in western Texas. In the improvement of his extensive landed estate he has shown the same aggressive policies and advanced ideas that have otherwise conserved his pronounced success, and his efforts have been of distinctive value also in the furthering of general development and progress in this section of the state. In El Paso Mr. Harris has recently purchased the magnificent residence erected as a home by Charles Davis, former mayor of the city, and with Mrs. Harris as its gracious chatelaine this handsome home is one of the leading centers of social activity in the community—a favorite rendezvous for the host of family friends. In the midst of the manifold cares and exacting of a signally active and successful business career Mr. Harris has not subordinated the sentiments and ideals which represent the higher values of life, and this is shown in his regaining, by purchase, the old family homestead in the city of Memphis, Tennessee, this ancestral place having been his boyhood home and being endeared to him by many gracious memories and associations. He is also the owner of other valuable realty in Memphis and makes somewhat frequent visits to that interesting old city. He also has an attractive modern bungalow at Long Beach, California, and in this beautiful seaside home he and his family pass many pleasant hours during each winter season. In El Paso Mr. Harris is a stockholder of the American National Bank, of which he formerly served as vice president, and he served for sixteen years as a valued and progressive member of the board of county commissioners of El Paso county. He is a devotee of the motor car and he and his wife find recreation and pleasure in their automobile tours and drives. His political allegiance is given without reservation to the Democratic party and he has been an active worker in behalf of its cause, though never ambitious for political preferment.

In the year 1885 was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Harris to Miss Amelia Schultz, who was born in Germany and who was an infant at the time of her parents' immigration to the United States. The only child of this union is Eugene L., who was graduated in the University of Texas as a member of the class of 1911, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and who had the distinction of being elected in the autumn of the same year to the state legislature, in which he served as a member of the general assembly of 1912. He proved an active working member during this session and had the distinction of introducing and ably championing the fraternity bill, action on which is still pending. He is one of the royal and popular young men of El Paso and is an enthusiast in his loyalty to his native state.

WILLIAM FRANKLIN KELLIS. A resident of west Texas for nearly thirty years, Mr. Kellis has been very closely identified with the official and professional life of Sterling county. At the present time he is serving as county surveyor, and is also publisher of the News-Record of Sterling City. For many years he has been an active member of the Texas bar, and has practiced law in connection with his other work.

William Franklin Kellis was born at Mount Vernon, Texas, March 15, 1855, the third among four sons and four daughters born to J. N. and Elizabeth Kellis, now of Sterling City. The paternal ancestry is French and the maternal is Scotch. J. N. Kellis, the father, came to Texas from Dadeville, Alabama, in 1849, settling in Shelby county, where he was a farmer and school teacher. In 1855 he went to Titus county where he continued his industry as a farmer. When the war came one he volunteered and became captain of Company B in Quales Division frontier reserve, and served throughout the time of the war, most of his service being on the frontier, and in fighting Indians. His home during the war period was in Wise county, and after the war he moved to Trinity county, and later to McLennan county. In 1886 he moved out to what was then the western frontier in Sterling county, and became one of the early farmers and stockmen of that section. He is still owner of a ranch on the north Concho River, most of his land being under irrigation, and managed by a foreman and several other employes. The father now lives in town and is eighty-seven years of age, but still able to give close attention to business affairs. His wife is eighty-three years old. William Franklin Kellis was educated in the public schools of McLennan county, and for one term in 1874 attended the Baylor University. His first occupation was teaching school, and he presided over a number of school rooms during the twelve years of his activity in that profession. At the same time he carried on his studies in law, and was admitted to the bar in 1891 at Sterling City, since which time he has given as much attention to his practice, as other duties as an editor and surveyor would permit. For ten years he held the office of county attorney of Sterling county, for four years was postmaster at Sterling City, and has been county surveyor at different times previous to his recent election in 1912 to that office. He was county surveyor at the time the county lines were established, and his careful work in that office has contributed much to the permanence and correctness of land boundaries in this county.

Mr. Kellis for many years has been a worker in the Democratic ranks. He is a Royal Arch Mason, and in civic affairs has always been a willing worker for every movement to promote the welfare of his home county and city.

On January 8, 1880, he married Miss Nannie B. Martin, of McLennan county, a daughter of Patrick Martin, of that county, a farmer, who lived there until his death about 1897. Mrs. Kellis' mother died several years ago. Mr. and Mrs. Kellis have three children. Pat Kellis is now serving as county attorney of Sterling county; one daughter is Mrs. B. B. Huckell, of Kansas City, Missouri, where her husband is engaged in the real estate business. Miss Vera is a graduate of Baylor University, and is now teaching music in the high school at Sterling City.

JOHN E. MORRISS. One of the oldest and most prominent families in East Texas is represented by Mr. John E. Morriss, a well known citizen of Texarkana. During a residence of more than twenty years in Texarkana Mr. Morriss has been known as a successful farmer, a gin operator and a citizen whose public spirit and a loyal cooperation have been instrumental in forwarding a number of enterprises for the betterment of the city.

John E. Morriss was born in Talladega county, Alabama, a son of B. F. Morriss. The father of the family came from Alabama to Texas in 1868, locating in Cass county. He had been a Confederate soldier under General Joe Wheeler and was for many years one of the well known and enterprising citizens of Cass county. One of the sons, a brother of John E., was the late Dr. S. J. Morriss, who was a soldier of the south under General Lee during many of the Virginia Campaigns and rose from the ranks to Major of his regiment. After the war he entered the profession of medicine where he gained distinction and was widely known throughout East Texas. He was one of the prominent members of Masonry in this part of the state and served as grand high priest of the Royal Arch Chapter for Texas.

Mr. John E. Morriss has for a long number of years been engaged in the lumber business, being one of the important operators in that industry in East Texas. Farming has, however, occupied a large share of his attention. His home and business headquarters were in Cass county until 1890, in which year he came to Texarkana and this has since been his home. He is the owner of a fine farm situated two and a half miles northwest of Texarkana. Mr. Morriss is president and manager of the Watts Gin Company, which owns and operates what is probably the finest cotton gin in east Texas. The plant was built complete and began ginning cotton within a period of sixty days from July 10 to September 10, 1912. All of the work of installation of machinery was under the supervision of Mr. Morriss who is a practical gin operator. A brief description of the gin, taken from a local publication, may be of interest. There are two separate pipes which take the cotton from the wagon by suction. The two sets of four gin stands of the most approved pattern, each containing seventy saws, and two of these stands were made especially to clean and gin staple cotton. After the cotton has been thoroughly cleaned and ginned in the stand it is drawn by suction to the two presses and the bale is formed and the entire process of ginning is completed at the rate of about one bale every seven minutes, the plant being guaranteed to gin ninety bales in a day of ten hours.

For several years Mr. Morriss has served as a member of the Texarkana school board, and it will long remain to his credit that during his service, he has undertaken the building of the city's noted high school, a structure that cost $125,000 and is one of the handsomest and best equipped school buildings in the state of Texas. Mr. Morriss is a Royal Arch Mason and he and his family are members* of the First Baptist church of Texarkana. He was married to Miss Janie G. Moores, a daughter of Reuben Moores, who was a pioneer of East Texas and was for many years considered the largest land owner in Cass county. The eight children of Mr. and Mrs. Morris are named Reuben M., John E., Jr., W. J., J. R., H. A., Janie G., Ruth A. and Margaret P.

ED TOM RANDLE. Both as a member of the bar and in business affairs, Mr. Randle is one of the prominent citizens of Dallas, among the generation of progressive young business men. From his earliest experiences he has been identified and familiar with business and industrial affairs of large importance, and now conducts a large law and real estate business, being president of the Randle Investment Company whose offices are in the Wilson Building at Dallas.

Ed Tom Randle is a native Texan, having been born in Washington county in 1878. His parents Jules A. and Laura M. (Brewer) Randle are both deceased, the mother having passed away in 1883, and the father in 1899 at Eagle Lake, Texas. His father, who was a native of Georgia, and came to Texas before the Civil war, subsequently in 1888 moved to Monterey, Mexico, which was his home for several years. While there he engaged in mining, and became one of the leading American developers of this city and vicinity. He was the builder of its street railway system, and constructed other municipal improvements.

Mr. Randle, the Dallas attorney, received his early education in St. Edwards College at Austin, Texas, later was a student in the Bingham College of Asheville, North Carolina and then entered Georgetown University at Washington, D. C. where he pursued his studies in law, and was admitted to the bar in Washington, D. C. and also in the state of Texas, in 1903. Already for some years previous to his admission to the bar, he had been actively connected with business. In Monterey, he was associated with his father and others in the promotion of the street railway system of that city. Returning to Dallas in 1900, he spent some time in this city before taking up his law studies at Washington, and immediately after his admission to the bar he returned to this city, and has a generous share of the law business in the office and courts of this locality. He organized the Randle Investment Company, of which he is president, and the company does a large business in real estate, though confining its operations mainly to business properties and large tracts of land in Mexico, and the state of Texas. He speaks Spanish fluently.

Mr. Randle is one of the prominent Masons of Dallas.

He is affiliated with Dallas Lodge No. 760 A. F. & A. M. Dallas Chapter No. 47 R. A. M., Dallas Commandery No. 6 K. T. and has attained the thirty-second degree in Scottish Rites, and is a member of Hella Temple of the Mystic Shrine. He is also connected with other fraternal orders, and is a member of the Dallas Club, and the Dallas Country Club. Mr. Randle was married in 1902 to Miss Anna Quinlan. Her father was the late Captain G. A. Quinlan, formerly general manager of the Houston & Texas Central Railroad, and whose residence was at Houston, Texas.

RANDOLPH S. TILLOTSON. Now in the tenth year of his service as county and district clerk of Stonewall county, Randolph S. Tillotson has been a resident of western Texas for many years, was a successful rancher, until he got into politics, and now besides his office he is a member of the firm of Pierce-Tillotson Company, in the general land, loan and insurance business, and they also do considerable work in abstracting.

Randolph S. Tillotson is a native of the state of Mississippi, born at Jackson, March 19, 1868. His father was Lewis Tillotson, a native of Rochester, New York, whence he moved to Mississippi, and later to Texas in 1871. He was a carpenter and builder, and followed that occupation for many years. During his later life, however, he took up farming. His death occurred at the advanced age of eighty-five in 1901, and he spent his last years in Fisher county, Texas, where he is buried. His wife was Virginia E. Stratton, a native of Mississippi where they were married. Both she and her husband were active members of the Providence church. Her death occurred in 1896 at the age of fifty, and she also rests in Fisher county. There were three children, of whom the county and district clerk of Stonewall county was the youngest.

Mr. Tillotson when about three years of age moved to Texas, and has lived in this state ever since. His early education was attained from the public schools, and afterwards he completed a course in a business college at Corsicana. Up to the age of twenty-one he lived at home on the farm, and then started out for himself. His choice of country was western Texas, and he has never regretted that he identified himself early in life with a region whose development is yet only in infancy. He has done his share of making this a better place to live in, and has been more than ordinarily prosperous in his business affairs. For a number of years he followed cattle ranching and farming, up to 1903. He was then drawn into politics, and in 1904 was elected to his present office as county and district clerk, being now in his fifth term.

Mr. Tillotson has been twice married, both ceremonies having been performed in Aspermont. On October 1, 1899, he married Sallie Bulloch, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. V. Bulloch. Her death occurred in 1907 at about the age of thirty. The three children, two sons and a daughter, are Bulloch, Jo, and Sallie. In 1909 Mr. Tillotson married Etta Hill, a native of Texas. Their one child is Dolores. The family are members of the Baptist church, and Mr. Tillotson has taken a prominent part in fraternal matters. He is a Mason through the Blue Lodge and Commandery, and also belongs to the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Woodmen of the World. He is treasurer of the Blue Lodge of Masonry, and also in the Odd Fellows Lodge at Aspermont. He has filled all the chairs in the Lodge of Odd Fellows, and belongs to the Grand Lodge of Texas. His interest in politics has always been with the dominant party, in Texas, and has extended not only to local politics but to state and national matters. On the side of recreation it may be said that Mr. Tillotson is one of the real baseball fans in Aspermont, and in not only the games of the local and Texas league, but also the club records of the major organizations. He enjoys outdoor life in all its forms, and often spends a vacation in hunting and fishing.

HILLIARY Q. LYLES. Since 1900 Mr. Lyles has been well known and prominently connected with business affairs in Sterling City. His residence in west Texas extends over a period of more than thirty years, and he was in the cattle business in Tom Green and adjacent counties before the first railroad was ever built to this part of the state.

Hilliary Q. Lyles was born September 24, 1861, at Prairie Lea in Caldwell county, Texas, a son of John Hilliary and Nancy (Frost) Lyles, who were formerly from Kentucky, having settled in Texas about 1854, and their home having been in Caldwell county for a number of years, where the father followed farming, although by trade he was a cabinet maker. The ancestors for three generations have been prominently connected with the ministry of the gospel. There is a large relationship living in Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama and Illinois. Great-grandfather Rev. Manassah Lyles was prominent in the ministry of the Methodist church, as was also his son Grandfather Thomas H. Lyles. William H. Lyles, a brother of Thomas H. was also a minister, and a half-brother of these two was Rev. U. F. Wilson, a relative of the late Governor Wilson of Kentucky. There were twelve children in the great-grandfather's family, and several of them moved into Alabama, others to Tennessee, and in Alabama the members of the family were prominent as planters and slave holders before the war. Several members fought on the Confederate side during the war, and one of the family was Dr. Harrison Welch, a surgeon in the army. John Hilliary Lyles, the father of Mr. Lyles, of Sterling City, was a minister of the Baptist church, and combined that vocation with farming, from which he chiefly supported his family. He was one of the early preachers of Texas, and as was the custom in that time did his work for little money and for the good of humanity. He continued to make his home in Caldwell county, where he was well known and greatly loved for his work, until his death in 1877. He was the father of ten children, of whom Hilliary Q. was the third. The latter has three sisters and four brothers living, all of them in Texas. C. M. Lyles is in the furniture and undertaking business in Sterling City. N. G. Lyles lives at Brady, and is a justice of the peace and city recorder. John and his brother Christopher are engaged in farming in Gonzales county. Mrs. Sallie Lyles lives in Brown county, on Indian Creek, where her husband is a farmer. Mrs. Dora Kaye lives in Gonzales county where her husband operates a cotton gin. The youngest sister is living in Gonzales county, the wife of a farmer there.

Hilliary Q. Lyles was reared in a time and in a country where schools were scarce, and the conditions of his family circumstances did not permit of his obtaining much education. In spite of the facilities and advantages that surrounded him as a youth, he has always been a close observer and student, and is a practical man of affairs, and well informed on every essential matter. His first regular business was in the cattle industry in Kimble county, where he worked at wages of fifteen dollars per month for about two years. Then in November, 1881, he arrived in Tom Green county, and was connected with the cattle business there, and afterwards bought and enclosed a ranch of his own in Coke county. He stocked the place and was progressively connected with cattle raising up to 1900. In that year he sold out his interest in Coke county and established a general mercantile business at Sterling City. He is doing well as a business man, has a large trade all over this section of Texas, is a man who has always been noted for his square dealing. He has been a director and stockholder in the First National Bank of Sterling City since its organization.

In politics Mr. Lyles is a Democrat as to general pol-ca, but has always been a strong Prohibitionist, and votes and works for the good of that cause wherever possible. For sixteen years he has served as a deacon of the Baptist church. On December 20, 1887, he married Miss Helen Canon, of Sterling county, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Canon, of this county. Her father is a rancher but now lives retired, and her mother died several years ago. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Lyles are all at home with their parents and the three youngest are still in school. After residence in different sections of Texas, Mr. Lyles is convinced that the North Concho country is the place for him, and considers it one of the most healthful climates and best localities for its natural resources in the entire state.

MILFORD M. HAMLIN. The manager of the Southwestern Printing Company at El Paso, the largest general printing house in western Texas, and with a business which extends far beyond the limits of this home city, Mr. Hamlin began life a poor boy and in the necessity of earning a livelihood and earning the profitable trade he followed his inclinations to perfect himself as a printer. It was in a small town in North Central Texas, and from that time to the present he has been regularly identified with some branch of the typographical business.

Milford M. Hamlin was born August 20, 1882 near Burrtown, Kansas, in Harvey county. His parents were James F. and Rachel Hamlin. The father, who was for a number of years a farmer in Kansas, finally sold out and engaged in the hardware business at Burrtown in partnership with a brother. This was in the year, 1884, and he continued there until 1890, when he moved the business to Hutchinson, Kansas, where he continued for about two years longer. Then selling out he removed to Coleman county, Texas, this removal being on account of his wife's health. During his residence in that Texas county he served as deputy organizer for the Woodmen of the World throughout the state of Texas. His mother died at Santa Anna, in Coleman county, and after her death the father returned to his old home in Kansas, where he lived with his relatives for some time and subsequently settled in Wichita, where he is now living at the age of sixty-five, retired from business activities.

Milford M. Hamlin attained his early education in the public schools of Kansas and Texas, and after his mother's death was really without a home and entirely dependent upon his own exertions for support. As a boy he worked in the cotton fields, and was paid according to the number of pounds which he could pick per day.

During the summer months he spent many weary weeks chopping and carrying cotton at a salary of from $10.00 to $15.00 per month and board. Even at this low wage was his ambition to get along in the world that he managed to save something from his wages. Thus he was enabled to enter a printing office at Santa Anna, Texas, as an apprentice when fifteen years of age. His salary as an apprentice was $8.00 per month and board, an amount that just enabled him to provide himself with home and food while acquiring his trade. After learning all that the limited facilities of a country newspaper could offer, he took a place in a newspaper and job printing establishment at McPherson, Kansas, and after being with the firm for three months was promoted to foreman of the job department. From that time to the present he has always been identified with the mechanical department of newspaper and job printing offices. In 1905 he came to Dallas, and took a place as stock-keeper for the American Type Foundry Company in that city. In 1906 he was promoted from the stock-room to traveling salesman, and represented that firm on the road until the panic of 1907 when business conditions were such that all the salesmen were called in. Mr. Hamlin then returned to his old trade as printer, which he followed for about two years, and was then offered another place with the American Type Foundry Company, this time as salesmanager. He remained as manager of sales until April, 1912, at which date he came to El Paso to take the management of the Southwestern Printing Company. This establishment is located at 103 Chihuahua street, where a large business houses a complete establishment for all kinds of commercial printing and the kindred arts.

Mr. Hamlin is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows, and is a member of the Presbyterian church. His chief avocation has been the study of music, and he has not only cultivated taste but excellent talent as a vocalist and general musician. At the present time he occupies the place of musical director for the choir of the First Baptist church of El Paso, and for a year and a half, during his residence at Dallas, was tenor soloist in Matthews' Cathedral.

RICHARD M. SWEARINGEN, M. D. With all those attributes that make for the true greatness of the individual person Dr. Swearingen was most fully endowed, and his life record falls as benediction of inspiration and incentive. He was in the truest sense the friend of humanity, and he made his life count for good in its every relation. He attained to marked distinction in his chosen profession, through the medium of which he worked long and effectively, and with loving kindness, for the alleviation of human suffering and distress, and he ordered his life upon the loftiest plane of integrity and honor. He served with signal ability as state health officer and surgeon general of Texas, was honored by his professional confreres by his election to the presidency of the Texas State Medical Association, and was one of the most loved and distinguished citizens of the Lone Star commonwealth at the time when he was summoned from the stage of life's mortal endeavors, his death having occurred in the city of Austin, on the 7th of August, 1898. The Doctor passed virtually his entire life in Texas, was a scion of one of the honored pioneer families of this state, which he himself represented as a gallant soldier of the Confederacy in the Civil war, and by his character and his noble achievement he lent dignity and honor to the state of which he became a resident when a mere boy and in which he maintained his home to the close of a signally noble and useful life.

As preliminary to other subject-matter to be incorporated in this review of the life history of Dr. Swearingen there is a distinct consistency in reproducing the following quotations from the memorial address delivered by F. E. Daniel, M. D., of Austin, on the occasion of the thirty-second annual meeting of the Texas State Medical Association, at Waco, on the 26th of April, 1900:

"By courtesy of an invitation embodied in a resolution adopted at the last meeting of this association, it is my privilege, as it is an honor, to pay tribute to the memory of one of our brightest and best, whose soul has been translated to the realms of eternal rest,—Dr. Richard Montgomery Swearingen. The State Medical Association, the people of Texas, the medical profession of America, need no eulogy upon his life, character and services,—his talents, his successes in that sphere of life to which he was called. They need not be told of his virtues in private life. No recapitulation of his soldierly deeds in defense of the South in her unequal struggle for independence, or his service to Texas as her chief sanitary officer; no allusion to his wide reputation as a skilled physician and learned sanitarian are necessary. All this is familiar to them, and he will live in their memory, and the influence of his example will be felt as a star, blotted from the firmament, will still pour its light upon us.

"But that those who come after us,—some to guide the destinies of this great state; others to guard its portals with a sanitary cordon; some to preside over, others to sit in the councils of this association, may learn of his beautiful life, his rare qualities of head and heart, and know the warm place he occupied in the affections of the present generation, the measure of usefulness he filled in his busy life,—it is due that we attempt to formulate it into words for record in the archives of the State Association of Physicians, that, inspired with his illustrious example, our successors may labor to emulate it.

"I knew Dr. Swearingen well. In his public and private life, in the intimacy of his happy home, associated with him officially many years, my opportunities for properly estimating his worth were exceptional. I have seen him under almost every conceivable circumstance, and I can sincerely say that never in my life have I known so perfectly rounded out and complete a manhood. In every relation of life he was simply grand. He exemplified the loftiest ideal of splendid manhood. Yet he was gentle as a child, and as free from guile. His generous heart was a stranger to anything approaching selfishness, and no unworthy motive or sordid interest ever actuated him. He was the calm, dignified, courteous, courageous man, the peerless gentleman whose knightly crest was never lowered in the presence of any man, any danger or trial, or under any circumstance. He had the heart of a lion, but it was actuated by the sentiment and emotion of a gentle woman. Its every throb was for humanity. I have seen him approached by the high, the powerful, the lowly. His manner was the same to all,—gentle, considerate, patient. The humblest of God's creatures could enter his presence with the assurance of kindly sympathy, and the needy never departed empty-handed. * * * If to live right and do right; if to walk upright in the eyes of God and man, to be pure in heart, just and gentle, brave and generous and useful; to love humanity; to do good for righteousness' sake; to do one's whole duty as he sees it, fearlessly and fully, is to be great, Swearingen was a great man. In his limited sphere of action he utilized to the fullest his God-given 'talent,' nor let it rust. With him the practice of medicine was largely a mission of mercy. He refused his services to none; compelled none to pay him. He ever persuaded the erring, uplifted the weary and comforted the distressed. He was a successful physician, whose very presence carried hope and healing to the afflicted, equally in the home of prosperity and in the hut of poverty. * * *

"As president of this association his administration was characterized by firmness and gentleness; by success and harmony. He was president at a critical period of the association's usefulness. When dissensions arose, his temperate words, his calm, rational arguments, his persuasive eloquence were like 'oil upon the waters cast.' Where discord entered peace remained to rule. As state health officer he was popular and had the confidence of the whole state. He held that position more than fifteen years, consecutively except during Ross' administration as governor. He remodeled the quarantine laws and formulated and secured the passage of the existing act. In the execution of this law he was signally successful, for no foreign pestilence found foothold in Texas, and the extensive epidemic of smallpox which had gained headway in some forty localities during Governor Ross' term of office was quickly suppressed when, reappointed by Governor Hogg, Swearingen again assumed management. The state remained remarkably free from smallpox to the date of his death. As a writer he was forceful, clear, concise, logical,—not ornate. His sentences were stripped of those dazzling flashes of rhetoric with which his speeches glowed, and carried conviction to the minds of all readers. As an orator he was brilliant, persuasive,—widely known as one of our most gifted extempore speakers. He had a sublime faith in an all-wise and beneficent Creator, and clearly portrayed it, and revealed his hope of immortality, in glowing eloquence in his chaste and scholarly address to the literary societies of the Texas University, the subject being, 'The Conservation and Correlation of Forces as a Basis of Belief in Immortality.' It was a masterpiece of oratory and sparkled with gems of rhetoric. At times the thoughts touched the sublime and were flashed forth in language of living light. Deeply versed in the resources of the English language, he was a master of the art of diction, and swayed the hearts and swept along the thoughts of all hearers.

"He was widely known as a yellow-fever expert, and after the great epidemic of 1878 was appointed on a congressional committee to investigate and report on its origin, mode of development, etc. The result of the report made by this commission was the creation by Congress of a national board of health, now merged into the marine hospital bureau. When pestilence stalked the land; when the 'saffron demon' blew his blighting breath over the fair Southland and the destroying angel hovered over peaceful homes, and snatched away the fairest and best, it was then that this gallant soldier of sanitary science shone with conspicuous splendor. There he was great. * * * When his native State, Mississippi, was in the throes of the great yellow-fever epidemic of 1878 and the peaceful and happy little town of Holly Springs, under the impulse of generous sympathy and that hospitality every characteristic of the South, threw open her doors to the terror-stricken refugees from the beleaguered towns and became herself the storm center of the pestilence,—Swearingen and Manning—the brave, the gallant, the lovable Manning,—were prompt to go to her relief. Manning fell. Many noble volunteer physicians and nurses fell, laying down their lives cheerfully in the cause of humanity,—in obedience to that power that impels a heroic soul to self-immolation in the discharge of duty. Swearingen held the hand of the dying Manning, and later, before this association, paid a tribute to his memory in an oration of love-inspired eloquence which today illumines the pages of the association's archives and lives in the memory of the present. He said of Manning: 'He walked serenely into the valley of death, to surpass all others in doing good. * * * It was called rash, because he had never had yellow fever. * * * If his going to beautiful flower-crowned Holly Springs to battle and die with her brave men and women was a rash act,—in all reverence, I say it was rash in the Savior we adore to leave the courts of Heaven to redeem a fallen race. The one came at the bidding of the Father; the other went impelled by the same spirit that gave splendor to the Hill of Calvary, when temples and stars and heaven and earth reeled and rocked to the martyrdom of a God.'

"The present is not the time nor the occasion to speak of Dr. Swearingen's splendid record as a soldier in the service of the South; that is history, and presents an unbroken story of dauntless courage and deeds of daring. Yet it may not be amiss to say that, at the age of twenty-four, he was at the head of a splendid troop of cavalry,—always at the front,—and passed through scenes and events that rival the most thrilling episodes of feudal times. In the privacy of our intercourse, with the modesty characteristic of the man, he would tell of some of his experiences, giving credit, always, to his 'men.' There was one event, however, of which he could make no other than himself the hero. Left sick at the house of a Tennessee gentleman in the territory into which his troops had made a raid, he was soon in the enemy's lines. Nursed back to health by the pretty daughter of the house, he fell a victim to her beauty and graces. They were married, and he rejoined his command. He ventured back alone, at night, to visit his bride; the house was surrounded and he was captured,—not by the enemy proper but by a gang of those lawless men known as guerrillas. He was bound, gagged, and thrown in a fence corner to await his doom. At daylight he was led out to be shot. One of the band whom the bride's father had befriended in some emergency had sufficient influence to secure his release, and he was put through the lines. Upon such slim threads sometimes hang important events. The unknown young cavalrman became the illustrious physician and sanitarian, admired for his virtues and abilities, esteemed for his worth, and famous for his services alike in war and in the less tempestuous walks of life. In the field of romance, fact or fiction we scarcely find a parallel. The reckless daring, the romance of the times and environment; the union of these two heroic young souls, in the mountain fastnesses of a rugged country, the home of outlawry and the den of guerrillas,—a section of country swept by the storm of war, whose waves ebbed and flowed across it, back and forth with the advance or retreat of either army,—their separation, and final reunion in our own country; their subsequent trials and hardships, and final triumphs in attaining wealth and distinction, and an evening of life crowned with happiness and serene content, furnish a theme for the troubadour, worthy of the days when knighthood was in flower,—unexcelled in song or story."

Well may the foregoing tribute find place in this publication, for it is the noble and gracious personal estimate of one who knew Dr. Swearingen long and well, and in one of the later paragraphs of his memorial Dr. Daniel spoke of the death of Dr. Swearingen in the following words: "When all-conquering death came to the bosom of his home he met his end with that calm courage and unruffled front with which he had met all trials in life. It was peaceful,—beautiful. The last thought that crossed his mind was one of 'good will toward man.' His last act, when the tongue refused its office, was laboriously to write, with a lead pencil, these words: 'I go out upon the great Unknown without an unkind thought or feeling toward any living creature.'"

At this juncture is initiated a brief and somewhat more prosaic record concerning the life and services of the great and honored Texan to whom this memoir is dedicated, with a full sense of the impossibility of doing full justice to his memory within the circumscribed limitations of a publication of this order.

Richard Montgomery Swearingen was born in Noxubee county, Mississippi, on the 26th of September, 1838, and he was thus sixty years of age at the time of his death. He was a lineal descendant of Garrett Van Swearingen, who immigrated from Holland to American in 1645 and who established his home in Maryland. The family name has been in each generation most worthily identified with American history, and the subject of this memoir was a son of Dr. Richard J. and Margaret M. Swearingen, who settled in Washington county, Texas, in 1848, the father having been one of the pioneer physicians and surgeons of the Lone Star state and having been a man of fine intellectuality as well as professional ability. Dr. Richard J. Swearingen was one of the first and foremost in furthering the cause of popular education in Texas, and it may be specially noted in this connection that he was the projector and virtual organizer of the splendid schools that, prior to the Civil war, made Chapel Hill, Washington county, a famous educational center of the state. The wife of this influential pioneer was a daughter of Major Boley Conner, who was of staunch Irish lineage and who served under General Jackson as an officer in the war of 1812. Mrs. Swearingen was a woman of gracious and gentle personality, marked individuality and deep piety. In the new home in Texas, Dr. and Mrs. Richard J. Swearingen, with the co-operation of a few congenial friends, made the pioneer community one notable as a center of wealth, culture and refinement. Of the children of this venerated pioneer couple those who were reared to maturity were: Sarah Frances, Patrick Henry, Helen Marr, Richard Montgomery, John Thomas, and Mary Gertrude.

Richard Montgomery Swearingen was afforded the advantages of a home of distinctive culture and was a lad of about ten years at the time of the family removal from Mississippi to Texas, and he was just approaching man's estate when the political excitement that culminated in the Civil war began to shake the foundation of the government. Fiery denunciation of Northern aggression, and stormy oratory were the order of the day in the South. Reason gave way to passion in both sections of the country and men were driven by inexorable forces to inevitable destiny. The voice of Sam Houston rang through the land like that of an inspired prophet, but it was obscured in the whirlwind that heralded impending war. Dr. Swearingen was one of the few gallant young men who stood with the immortal Houston in opposing and voting against the ordinance of secession in Texas. When, however, the State, by an overwhelming majority, went out of the Union, he felt in duty bound to give his allegiance to Texas and the cause of the Confederacy, with the result that he responded to the first call for troops.

On the 28th of February, 1861, Dr. Swearingen embarked, at Galveston, in the command of General McLeod, which set forth for the lower Rio Grande. After a six months' campaign on the part of the regiment commanded by Colonel John S. Ford, the well known and gallant old frontiersman, young Swearingen returned to his home at Chapel Hill. After resting a few days he learned that his younger brother, John T., was lying ill at Cumberland Gap, Tennessee, and he at once set forth to the relief of his brother, who had left Texas a few months previously, with troops bound for Virginia, but who had been refused enrollment on account of extreme youth; he left his Texas companions at Knoxville, Tennessee, and volunteered in Brazelton's battalion of Tennessee cavalry. The brave boy had served under the ill-fated Zollicoffer, in Kentucky, and had won the admiration of his comrades, but the rough campaign had overtaxed his physical powers, with the result that it became imperative for him to indulge in rest and recuperation. The ordinary methods of securing a discharge having failed in his case, the older brother, Richard M., soon after his arrival in Tennessee, made the best adjustment of the matter by the expedient of offering to take the younger brother's place in the ranks, and he thus assumed for the second time the uniform of the Confederate soldier.

The company of which Dr. Swearingen thus became a member was commanded by Captain A. M. Gofarth, who was promoted major of the regiment a few months later and who sacrificed his life when leading his command in a desperate charge. About two months after Dr. Swearingen had assumed the place of his brother the company was reorganized and the generous Tennesseans elected him, the only Texan in the company, to the office of first lieutenant. In less than six weeks thereafter his gallantry, ability and popularity brought to him promotion to the captaincy of the company. For nearly three years he continued in command of this valiant and celebrated company, noted not only for its faithful and arduous service during the war, but also for the brilliant successes won by some of its members after the close of the great conflict between the North and the South.

During the occupation of Cumberland Gap, while on a scouting expedition in the mountains of eastern Tennessee, Dr. Swearingen, who was then a private, was prostrated with pneumonia and was left at the home of Lee Jesse, in Sneedville. This brought about the result noted in a preceding paragraph of this article, for it was here that young Swearingen won the heart and hand of the accomplished daughter of his host, but his marriage to Miss Jennie Jesse was not solemnized until three years later. During the subsequent years of the war neither danger nor distance deterred the young soldier from visiting the congenial and happy family of his fiancée as often as possible. On the 12th of September, 1864, at Jonesville, Virginia, was solemnized the marriage of Dr. Swearingen to Miss Jennie Jesse, the ceremony being performed in the presence of the bride's loved and devoted sister, Sallie, and both of the young women having made the rough and perilous journey over the mountains from Sneedville, then within the enemy's lines, to Jonesville, that the marriage might be performed before the gallant young soldier-lover was again called into battle. Several days after the wedding Captain Swearingen ventured into Sneedville, on a dark night, for the purpose of bidding his bride and other members of the family good-bye, and it was at this time that he was captured by the mountain "bushwhackers," as indicated in the foregoing article by Dr. Daniel. Joab Buttry, the man who saved the life of the captive, was chief of the band of guerrillas and his hands were stained by the blood of many Confederate soldiers, as he had seen his brother shot down in cold blood by a Confederate scouting party, and had forthwith sought retaliation and revenge by heading his band of guerrillas, his release of Dr. Swearingen having been prompted, as before stated, on account of some kindness or favor shown to him by Mr. Jesse.

During the days of the imprisonment of Dr. Swearingen his young wife and her friends were not idle. They obtained from General John C. Breckenridge a written proposition to the bushmen that he would give to them any three men that they might name and that were in Confederate prisons in exchange for their captive, Dr. Swearingen. This overture was accepted and on the same day the chief of the band took his captive to the north bank of the Clinch river, where he released him, with expressions of good will. Dr. and Mrs. Swearingen, in reverting to this incident, have said that Joab Buttry seemed to be a man of iron but that through the dark metal would shine forth the gold of a noble manhood that desperate deeds and a desperate life had not altogether obliterated.

After his fortunate escape from death Captain Swearingen set forth on a long and weary search for his lost company, which he finally joined at Raleigh, North Carolina. The limitations of this article will not permit even a casual review of the incidents and experiences of these eventful years in the life of Dr. Swearingen. The company of which he had command participated in many engagements,—was with Bragg in Tennessee; with Kirby Smith in Kentucky; with Joseph E. Johnston in the retreat through Georgia; with John H. Morgan when that famous raider was killed; with Hood in the Atlanta campaign; and again with Joseph E. Johnston, in the Carolinas. Notwithstanding the terrible privations suffered by the Confederate forces in the last years of the war, Captain Swearingen and his men wept like children when, among the tall pines of Carolina, their flag went down forever. In obedience to the cartel of surrender Captain Swearingen marched his company back to Tennessee before disbanding it. That last roll-call and that parting scene on the banks of the French Brood river constituted one of those clearly defined memory-pictures that possibly live with our souls in higher realms of existence.

Within a few weeks after the close of the war Captain Swearingen, assisted by his devoted young wife, was found engaged in teaching school in Lee county, Virginia. In the autumn of 1865, owing to an unwarranted political exigency that threatened to cause him trouble, he abruptly closed his prosperous school. He was confronted with an indictment for some unknown offense, and at that time the trial of former Confederate soldiers in eastern Tennessee was but a travesty on justice, with the verdicts prepared in advance. To remain and face such a trial were foolish in the extreme, but for Captain Swearingen to go elsewhere for safety, and leave his wife without a protector and without money, presented the other horn of the dilemma. On the first night after the closing of the school, while the husband and wife were discussing the grave situation, there came a rap on the door, which was opened to receive an unexpected but welcome visitor in the person of the Doctor's younger brother, John T., to whose rescue he had previously come, as already noted. John had heard of his brother's plight and had sacrificed practically all of his earthly possession to come to the latter's relief. The next morning the Doctor left his wife in the kindly charge of his brother and set forth for Texas. At Huntsville, Alabama, in harmony with formulated plans, he awaited the arrival of his wife and brother, and upon their arrival the party journeyed forward to Alta Vista, where they were received with open arms by the Doctor's devoted sister, Mrs. Helen M. Kirby.

The state of Texas was then passing through the agonies of so-called "reconstruction," and in such a reign of unrest, and even anarchy, as existed, the profession of medicine was the only one of the higher vocations that offered promise of immediate success. Thus Captain Swearingen was prompted to select this profession as the field for his life work, and fortunate it was for humanity that he made such a decision. He at once began the study of medicine and finally he entered the New Orleans School of Medicine, in which he was graduated in March, 1867, receiving his degree of Doctor of Medicine and delivering the class valedictory. He forthwith engaged in the practice of his profession in his old home town of Chapel Hill, Washington county. The friends of his parents and of his youth received him with great kindness and consideration, and when the yellow-fever epidemic of that year desolated the town Dr. Swearingen was conspicuous as a tireless worker among all classes, the eventual reward for this unselfish service being that he received a patronage both gratifying and remunerative. His wife, as courageous as when she had been tried in the furnace of war, would not leave him during the period when he was working hard to save the victims of the yellow-fever scourge, and insisted on aiding him in the care of those in affliction and distress, though he himself urged her to seek safety elsewhere. The two devoted humanitarians survived the epidemic, but their only child, beautiful little Helen, was taken from them.

In 1875 Dr. Swearingen removed to the city of Austin, and there he continued in the active work of his profession until his own impaired health made it impossible for him to go forth to the relief of others. He succumbed to Bright's disease, and his death occurred August 7, 1898, as previously stated. His passing away was viewed with a sense of personal loss and bereavement on the part of the people of Texas, and none has ever been more worthy of such love and veneration as came to this noble and self-abnegating physician, this gentle and kindly man who ever seemed to "remember those who were forgotten" and whose entire life was a beatitude.

Dr. Swearingen is survived by his widow, the wife of his youth, the cherished and devoted companion and helpmeet with whom he passed serenely down the pathway of life and to whom remains a full measure of consolation and compensation through the hallowed memories of their long and loving association. Mrs. Swearingen is a loved and honored factor in the representative social life of Austin, and her home, at 702 Rio Grande street, is a center of gracious hospitality. The honored husband and wife had one daughter, Bird, who was the wife of E. B. Robinson, of Austin, and who passed away in 1906. Mrs. Helen M. Kirby, sister of Dr. Swearingen, is dean of the woman's department in the University of Texas, at Austin, and resides at 307 West Fifteenth street, a talented and popular representative of one of the old and honored families of the Lone Star State.

CASTULA R. MOLINA. A native of Laredo, who has won a position of prominence in his native city, and who is widely known for the efficiency with which he conducts the affairs of his public office, is Castula R. Molina, of Laredo, Texas, the present chief deputy county clerk. Mr. Molina has been connected with the political affairs of Webb county since his very young manhood, and although he is still a young man he is one of the most experienced and best informed public men in the county, and one whose advice on political questions is asked on many occasions.

Castula R. Molina was born in Laredo, Texas, in 1876. His father, Secundino Molina, was also born in Laredo, his birth having occurred in 1845. The latter is a son of one of the earliest settlers of this region, or rather natives, for he, too, was born near Laredo. This early pioneer, Eduviges Molina, was captured by the Indians when he was a child of ten and was kept in captivity until he was thirty years of age. He afterward became the leader of the settlers in this section in making their defense against the Indians, for he was familiar not only with the Indian mode of warfare, but also with the Indian method of reasoning, and was able many times to anticipate their moves. He carried the mail between Brownsville and Laredo, which in those days was an extremely dangerous undertaking. He was one of the strong spirits of his day, dominating by sheer force of character. His father had a grant of land from the King of Spain at Ventaniss, about twenty miles below Laredo, in what is now the state of Tamaulipas, Mexico, and the Molina family today retains an interest in this land. Eduviges Molina died many years ago, but Secundino Molina is still living. He is a farmer and ranchman, owning a ranch in Webb county about eighteen miles below Laredo. This representative of what is perhaps the oldest family in this section is a highly respected and successful man, and carries on the traditions which his family have always maintained. His mother was Maria de Jesus (Flores) Molina. Secundino Molina married Juana Rodriguez, who is the daughter of Francisco and Juana (Cana) Rodriguez and a descendant of the Sanchez family, who were the founders of Laredo. She also is still living. Castula R. Molina was reared and educated in Laredo, and was one of seven children. Of these, one sister and three brothers are living, these being: Delina, who is the wife of P. Castillo, and Pedro, Secundino, Jr., and Francisco Molina. Another sister, Josefa, who married S. C. Hale, died in August, 1910, and Cele Molina, another sister, died at the age of eighteen years. Both of these young women were highly educated and greatly beloved in their native city. A brother, Juan Molina, is also deceased. Castula Molina received a good education in the public and private schools of Laredo. When he was only fourteen years of age he taught school, continuing in that occupation until he was twenty-one. He has always been interested in education, and has done all in his power to forward the cause in Laredo. Other members of his family have also been interested in the progress of education in this section.

Upon giving up a pedagogical career he entered the political affairs of Webb county, and was elected justice of the peace of Laredo, serving in this office for two years. He next became a deputy in the county clerk's office, and was later promoted to his present position, that of chief deputy county clerk, in which capacity he practically has charge of the office. He has been extremely successful in carrying on the work of this office, and his work has won the admiration of both business men and politicians. He is also a member of the school board of Laredo.

CORNELIUS T. HERRING. One of the best known men in the entire state of Texas is Cornelius T. Herring, of Amarillo. He is one of the wealthiest men in the state and having spent his entire life within the bounds of Texas he is known to men of every profession and vocation throughout the state. Mr. Herring started in life for himself as a boy with not a dollar and his success has been due not to phenomenal luck or influential friends, but to his own determination to succeed and to his capacity for hard work. He made the greater share of his fortune in the stock raising business, but he is as widely known today as a capitalist and financier as in the field in which he first became prominent. In spite of the taxing nature of the many business interests of Mr. Herring, he always finds time for his many friends and his personal popularity proves that he has not attained success at the expense of others.

Cornelius T. Herring was born in Grayson county, Texas, in November, 1849, the son of Jesse L. and Sarah (Friend) Herring. His father came to Texas as a young man, being a native of Illinois. It was in 1847 that he settled in this state and he was one of the early pioneers of Grayson county. He became a farmer and stock raiser and in time a man of wealth and influence in the community. During the Civil war he took up arms in the cause of the Confederacy and fought throughout the Civil war. At the end of this struggle he returned to his home and again took up the life of a farmer. He died in 1886 at the age of sixty-six years. His wife was a native of Alabama but as a child went with her parents to Illinois where she met and married Mr. Herring. Her death occurred in Hill county, Texas, in 1859, when she was thirty-four years of age. Six children were born to Jesse and Sarah Herring and of these Cornelius T. Herring was next to the eldest.

He attended the country schools of Hill county, during his youth, but he was a mere child when he left school. At the age of fourteen his independence asserted itself and he told his father that he wished to start out for himself. His father thought he was much too young and inexperienced, but the lad felt that he could learn and that he must begin an independent career. He, therefore, engaged in farming for one year, at which time he had saved enough money to begin in a small way the buying and shipping of cattle. He made many trips with herds of cattle to Shreveport, Louisiana, which was the shipping point in those days. It was a life of many exciting experiences and he was many times brought face to face with death, but it was a life which made of the immature boy a man, physically and mentally. He continued in the business for five years. At the age of nineteen he married and a year or so later bought a farm and he and his wife settled down to a life of farming. He continued as a farmer until 1878 when he again branched out into the stock business and with each year his business grew and became more extensive. From time to time he purchased additional tracts of land in Castro and Oldham counties and now is the owner of over 200,000 acres in Texas; also in Oklahoma and Colorado he has acquired large holdings of land. In the latter state his ranch is devoted to the raising of sheep. He cultivates more land than anyone in Texas, cultivating on the various ranches in Texas, Oklahoma and Colorado over 5,000 acres, about half of it being under irrigation and the other dry farming. Mr. Herring is also the leader in many of the most important commercial and financial interests in this section of the state.

In 1908 Mr. Herring came to Amarillo to reside and in 1910 he organized the Amarillo National Life Insurance Company, of which he is the president. This company is now recognized as one of the leading insurance companies in Texas. The mere fact that almost ninety per cent. of their assets is invested in first mortgage loans or is in banks is a proof that the company is on a splendid financial basis. The officers of the company, in addition to Mr. Herring are, C. B. Johnson, vice-president; Lee Bivins, vice-president; W. H. Fuqua, treasurer, and G. J. Brothers, secretary.

Mr. Herring is president and principal stockholder in the Herring National Bank in Vernal, Texas. He is a director and large stockholder in the Harold Bank and Mercantile Company of Harold, Texas, and the Elmer Bank, of Elmer, Oklahoma. He is also president of the

C. T. Herring Lumber Company, of Texas and Oklahoma, being the largest stockholder in the concern. This company has a number of branches in the principal cities and does an immense volume of business. He has been president of the Pan Handle and Southwestern Cattle-men's Association for two years and also served as president of the Amarillo Chamber of Commerce for two terms.

Mr. Herring is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, the Redmen, the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and in all of these societies, he takes a keen interest. In politics he is a member of the Democratic party.

Mr. Herring was married to Miss Sarah Lawrence in Smith county, Texas, in 1869. Two children were born during this marriage, W. E. Herring, who was born in Smith county, Texas, in 1873, and who is now married, with one child, and lives in Amarillo, Texas, and a daughter, Mrs. Jesse E. Johnson, who was born in Smith county, and now lives in Vernon, Texas, having one child. In September, 1889, Mr. Herring married a second time, his wife being Miss Birdie Elizabeth Smithie, of Fort Worth, Texas.

LOUIS FRIES. Louis Fries, manager of the Pierce Fordyce Oil Association in West Texas, is the representative of one of the oldest families of San Antonio, where he was born in 1852. He is the son of John and Salome (Enderle) Fries, both of whom are now deceased. The father came to San Antonio in 1846, a pioneer citizen of the city. He was born in Bavaria, Prussia, where he received a good education, and in the early forties came with his parents to America, settling with them in Dayton, Ohio, where his parents passed their remaining days.

John Fries was still a youth when he left his Ohio home and came to Texas, entering the state by way of Galveston, near which port he was shipwrecked, and locating in San Francisco in 1846. He had studied the profession of an architect and builder, and it was in those early years that he carried out his most important contract in San Antonio, from a historic standpoint,—that is, the rebuilding of the old Alamo, which had been partly destroyed in the siege of 1836. The stone work that Mr. Fries put into this famous old mission building is still in the best possible condition, and stands a credit to his skill and workmanship. He also designed and built the old Nat Lewis and Tunstall homesteads, and was the contractor and builder who erected the old State House at Austin that was destroyed by fire a few years previous to the building of the present capitol. Many other buildings in San Antonio and vicinity were constructed by him. John Fries was an active and public spirited citizen. He was known to be a man of the most generous impulses, and some of his old workmen who are still living recall that he was always liberal with his employees. In fact, his memory is recalled by old timers as a man who was the soul of honor and a fine character in every respect.

John Fries was the first one in the male line of his family for several generations who was not a priest or a soldier. His father, John Moritz Fries, was with Napoleon's army in the retreat from Moscow. After coming to his new home in America following the downfall of Napoleon, he organized the first military company in Ohio. When the war with Mexico broke out he organized a crack company, of which he was the captain, and commanded it in Mexico, being attached to Lane's Brigade in General Taylor's army. He died at Dayton shortly after the war with Mexico closed.

The mother of Louis Fries was born in Baden, Germany, but came when a girl with her parents to Castroville, Medina county, Texas, where she was reared, and where she met and married her husband, John Fries.

Louis Fries was educated in the old German-English school in San Antonio and in a college in Monterey, Mexico, where he perfected himself in the Spanish language, of which he is a fluent speaker. In early life he went into the sheep business with his father on the Texas frontier, in which business he was successful and prosperous. Following this he spent three years in business in New York City, this experience giving him a good knowledge of commercial affairs, which made possible his present efficiency in his work. On August 15, 1887, he became connected with the Waters-Pierce Oil Company's interests in San Antonio, and has remained with that company continuously since that time, the name of the company now being the Pierce-Fordyce Oil Association. Mr. Fries is the manager of the West Texas division of this Association, which division embraces the extensive territory lying between El Paso and Brownsville.

Mr. Fries was married in San Antonio to Miss Johanna Schunke, who was born in this city, and they have two sons—John and Louis Fries.

SAMUEL POYNTZ COCHRAN. The prosperity and advancement of a community depend upon the social character and the public spirit of its members, and in every prosperous town or city will be found citizens who take the lead and give their energies, not alone to their own well being and their private business, but to the things that mean better and fuller life for all. Such a citizen at Dallas has Sam P. Cochran been recognized for many years. For more than thirty years Mr. Cochran has been connected with one line of business in this city, that of insurance, and he is now the head of the largest general insurance agency in the southwest, and one of the very largest anywhere in America.

Samuel Poyntz Cochran was born in Lexington, Kentucky, September 11, 1855, a son of John Carr and Ella (Deweese) Cochran. His father was Col. John C. Cochran, of the Fourteenth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and he too was prominent in the fire insurance for many years. A brother of Col. John C., Mr. James W. Cochran, was an even more notable figure in insurance circles. The father had thirty-five years' experience in Kentucky and Cincinnati, Ohio, in that business, while his brother was for fifty-five consecutive years in active work as a representative of the Franklin Fire Insurance Company of Philadelphia, at Lexington, Ky., and it is doubtful if that company, or in fact any other company in the country, ever had a record of longer or more effective service than that of the Cochran brothers. James W. Cochran had two sons who served in the Civil war, John, Jr., being in the Fourteenth Kentucky Regiment, on the Union side, while Nathan P. served as a confederate soldier. Both of these boys were raised in the insurance business by their father, James W. Cochran, and were associated with him during their lives. Nathan, who survived the father, succeeded him in the business at Lexington, continuing same until his death in September, 1910. James W. Cochran has a grandson, James W. Cochran, who is now engaged in the insurance business here in Texas with headquarters in Dallas.

Mr. Sam P. Cochran has two brothers, both of whom have also been raised in the insurance business. They are: James W. Cochran, who lived many years in Texas, is now located at Chicago as manager of the western department of the Fire Association of Philadelphia, the company with which the Dallas firm began. The other, Farmer Dewees Cochran, is junior partner of the Dallas firm of Trezevant & Cochran, and has one son who is also employed with the same firm.

Sam P. Cochran received his education in the public schools of Cincinnati and in the high school at Covington, Kentucky. On his graduation, June 20, 1873, from high school he was valedictorian of his class and a few weeks later in the same year began his career as an insurance man. The first connection with that work was as a member of a surveying corps employed by the National Board of Fire Underwriters to rate the city of Cincinnati on the schedule plan. This was the first introduction of this plan of rating in the middle west. Subsequently he was employed in a similar capacity at Columbus, Dayton and Toledo, Ohio.

In 1874 he entered the general agency of J. W. Cochran & Son, at Lexington, Kentucky, and subsequently became connected with the local agency work at Covington in that State. For three years, 1878-79-80, he was deputy United States Marshal for the eastern district of Kentucky. Then in 1881 he came to the city of Dallas, and this city has since claimed him as one of its most progressive and public spirited citizens. Mr. Cochran came to Dallas as special agent for the Phoenix of Hartford, his territory being the states of Texas, Arkansas and Mississippi. For a short time he also acted as special agent for the Springfield Fire & Marine Company in this state.

Mr. Cochran, on July 1, 1883 became associated with J. T. Dargan and J. T. Trezevant in the firm of Dargan, and Trezevant, who were southwestern department managers for a large number of standard fire insurance companies. On January 1, 1884, he was accepted as a full partner in this business, and when Mr. Dargan retired on July 1, 1889, the firm name became Trezevant & Cochran, a title which has now been in continuous use for twenty-five years and which represents one of the most substantial and reliable firm names in the commercial record of Dallas and the entire state of Texas. Messrs. C. C. Kinney, H. C. Dunn and F. D. Cochran were admitted as junior partners on January 1, 1907. On June 1, 1909, Mr. Kinney withdrew and removed to California, at which time T. L. Lauve was admitted as a junior partner. When the original firm was formed in Dallas in March, 1876, it represented only the Fire Association of Philadelphia, a staid and reliable old company in the insurance field, which is still represented by the Trezevant and Cochran Agency. Since that original beginning of the business, the agency has expanded until it is now representative in this territory for ten standard companies, and is second to no other general agency in the United States for amount of business transacted through its offices and the number of high-class companies represented.

Mr. Cochran has served as president of the Mutual Building Association of Dallas since October 14, 1889, another record of nearly a quarter-century duration, which is notable in the personal business annals of this city. He is also a director in the following companies: American Exchange National Bank of Dallas, Dallas Trust and Savings Bank, Title & Guaranty Company at Dallas, United States Bond & Mortgage Company of Dallas, and Dallas Chamber of Commerce, of which he is a director. Mr. Cochran was for a number of years a director of the State Fair of Texas and one of the most active supporters and workers for that notable Dallas organization. He has also served as a member of the National Citizens' League.

In Masonry Sam P. Cochran's name is probably the most prominent in Texas. He has performed all the services in official capacity, and has received most of the honors and distinctions which can be attained in the various higher branches of this ancient craft. He is Past Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Texas A. F. & A. M.; Past Grand High Priest of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of Texas; Past Grand Commander of the Grand Commandery of the Knights Templar of Texas; Past Potentate of Hella Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. In the thirty-third degree of Ancient & Accepted Scottish Rite, he is Sovereign Grand Inspector General in Texas, and is an active member of the Supreme Council of that Rite for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States. He is also Past Grand Patron of the Grand Chapter of the Order of the Eastern Star, and is Past Grand Sovereign of the Grand Imperial Council of the Red Cross of Constantine. Mr. Cochran at this writing is president of the Dallas Scottish Rite Cathedral Association. The edifice which is being erected under the auspices of this association is considered the finest structure of its kind in the United States and has been in process of building since 1907. It was finished and completely furnished in April, 1913, and the cost, including furniture and pipe organ, was about $350,000. The pipe organ, which alone cost $25,000, is one of the largest and finest in the United States.

Sam P. Cochran on July 3, 1883, married Miss Sue Webb Higgins, a daughter of John Allen and Bettie (Webb) Higgins, of Lexington, Kentucky. Both Mr. and Mrs. Cochran are members of the Christian Science church of Dallas, of which they were charter members. For many years Mr. Cochran has been a member of the Board of Trustees of same and president of the board a number of times. They have no children. Mr. and Mrs. Cochran, whose names are among the foremost in Dallas social circles, have their residence at 909 South Ervay street.

JOHN CLOSNER. Linking the wild, lawless days of the Texas border of thirty years ago, when the Rio Grande country was the stamping ground of the worst desperadoes that the Southwest has ever known, with prosperous conditions of today that have been brought about by a civilized regard for the law and all that it stands for, the career of John Closner, of Edinburg, has been one of the most remarkable in the history of Hidalgo county. Successively sheriff, county treasurer, big business man and land owner, and promoter of irrigation and other large projects, his life has been so interwoven with that of the county since 1884 that the history of one is comparatively the resume of the principal events of the other. It is doubtful if any other one citizen has accomplished more for this section of the country and no history of Texas or its people would be complete that did not present a review of the circumstances which have made him one of the most dominant characters of the lower Rio Grande Valley.

John Closner was born at Monroe, Wisconsin, in 1849, and in early life took up the vocation of railroad contractor, his connection with that calling taking him to Mexico in 1870. Not long thereafter he crossed the Rio Grande into Texas, and in 1884 came to Hidalgo county, which has since been his home. While Mr. Closner's greatest fame, probably on account of its spectacular features, has come from his accomplishments as a peace officer, he is also known as a man of large business affairs. His first activities made the county a desirable place in which to live, and his subsequent efforts were concentrated in developing the agricultural and other resources of the country. When Mr. Closner first came to Hidalgo county a chaotic condition of affairs prevailed throughout the border region. There was scarcely any semblance of law observance on the part of a certain element of "free booters," who preyed upon the people of both sides of the Rio Grande; crime ran rampant, and robberies, murders and nearly all criminal offenses on the calendar were of almost daily occurrence. Smuggling was carried on on a gigantic scale, but the greatest nuisance to which the ranchers were subjected was in the form of the bands of cattle thieves who operated with a boldness that evidenced their utter disregard for the peace officers.

During these, the worst days of border brigandage, Mr. Closner was elected sheriff of Hidalgo county, and with a promptness that was to become known later as one of his dominating characteristics he entered upon the task of freeing the district of this lawless element, a task which would have disheartened the ordinary individual, but which for him held out no terrors. The new sheriff was jeered at and threatened; intimidation was attempted and then bribery, but through all he stood steadfast to what he considered the sacred duties of his office, and he soon became the recognized nemesis of evil-doers. The stories of his pursuit and capture of some of these desperadoes, of his bravery and utter fearlessness in the face of the most pressing danger, of the desperate chances he took with his own life in the performance of duty, would be almost unbelievable did not the testimony of eye-witnesses bear them out, and the results wholly substantiate them. His continued activities, his untiring perseverance in tracking his quarry to earth, eventually gained the wholesome respect of those who had never shown any respect for the law before, and finally the criminals who remained left for other parts, where so dogged and persevering officer did not rule. Throughout the twenty-two years that Mr. Closner served in his official capacity, he proved himself amply capable of adapting himself to whatever conditions confronted him, and won a wide-spread reputation for being faithful to every trust imposed in him. Fair and honest to all with whom he came into contact, he won the utmost confidence of his fellow-citizens in Hidalgo county, and when he voluntarily turned over the duties of his office in December, 1912, to the hands of a younger man those among whom he had lived so long gave evidence of their trust in him by electing him county treasurer for a term of two years.

Mr. Closner was a pioneer developer of the present great irrigation systems of the lower Rio Grande valley, and has continued to be the leading spirit in the agricultural development of Hidalgo county. To him, more than to any one other man, is due the prosperous condition of the county at this day. He built the first irrigation ditch and started the first sugar plantation in Hidalgo county; was one of the founders of Edinburg in 1908, and was the builder of the railroad to this town, reaching to the St. L., B. & M. Railroad at San Juan, to which road it was subsequently sold. He owns a half interest in 27,000 acres of land surrounding the town, is president of the Edinburg Townsite Company, vice president of the Valley Reservoir and Canal Company, which has brought thousands of acres of land under the ditch in the Edinburg country, and owns financial interests in various banks and commercial and industrial concerns throughout the valley. To his great business ventures he has brought the same courage that characterized his activities in the office of sheriff. He has not hesitated in backing his judgment, and his business associates rely on him absolutely for counsel, advice and leadership.

Mr. Closner was married to Miss Alice Dougherty, who was born and reared in Brownsville, Texas, and they have three children: John J., Frederick and Mary Elizabeth. Mr. Closner is a thirty-second degree Mason and a Shriner.

JOHN B. MAYFIELD. An unflinching index to the life of any community is its commercial and industrial activity. So widely accepted is this statement that it has come to be recognized as one of the axioms of business, and trade centers are judged as "live or dead" according as they measure by the rule. But business centers are made, not born, as business men are, and where large enterprises are found doing a flourishing business in domestic commerce, vigorous and active brains are the propelling forces and vigorous bodies are the dynamos which generate the spark necessary to bring into complete and harmonious operation the machinery which maintains the equilibrium between supply and demand—business. In no business center of a rural community is this situation more strikingly exemplified than in Tyler, one of the cities of East Texas.

Tyler is entering the field as a competitor for the wholesale business of East Texas and among her enterprises which is receiving a generous portion of that trade is the system of wholesale grocery houses whose headquarters is centered here and whose guiding spirits abide in this city. Chief among these in point of extent is the Starr-Mayfield Company, whose influence is felt all over a region of territory as large as New England and whose growth is encouraged from a half dozen anchor points radiating from a common center. The very name by which this young commercial giant is known is a challenge for business and it is the purpose of this article to account for this name and for the vigorous example of American manhood which bears it.

John B. Mayfield, president of and leading factor in the Starr-Mayfield Company, threw his personality into the commercial life of Tyler in 1899, when he became a wholesaler and added his name to the Moore-Starr Grocery Company and gave it the name of Moore-Starr-Mayfield Grocery Co. He had several years of experience in the retail business in Overton, Texas, and the capital he invested in his new venture in Tyler was of less importance to the concern than the energy and foresight and personality of John B. Mayfield himself. His association with Mr. Moore continued till January, 1903, when he withdrew from the Moore-Mayfield concern and organized the Mayfield Grocery Company, which occupied the field as such until May, 1908, when Mr. Starr entered the firm and the Starr-Mayfield Company became its successor. This company was chartered with a capital stock of $150,000, and is now increased to $300,000. Mr. Starr has since retired, and the present official family is John B. Mayfield, president; C. A. Caldwell, John M. Burke and M. G. Mayfield, vice presidents; C. L. Porter, secretary, and W. G. Human, treasurer. As already indicated, the main office of the company is in Tyler. Its branch houses are at Terrell, Jacksonville, Henderson, Gilmer, Athens and Mineola. This system of business houses is the result of a rapid growth during an era of unprecedented rural and urban development and its significance is not fully realized until the volume of its business, running into the millions, is brought to the attention of the reader; until its thirty-five office and warehouse men and its twenty-five traveling salesmen are shown to earn a livelihood from this source alone.

John B. Mayfield as a native of Texas. His birth occurred in Rusk county, January 26, 1857, whither his father moved from McMinn county, Tennessee, in 1854. His father was Thomas B. Mayfield, who was both a farmer and a merchant, and who spent many years of his life in Overton, Texas, in a retail store. The latter was born in 1820, and was only sparingly educated, although he was competent to teach country school in Texas upon his arrival here. He was one of a family of nine sons, namely: James, who was the father of Allison Mayfield, and who has for sixteen years been a member of the Texas Railroad Commission and is chairman of the railroad commission; John, who died in Tennessee; William, who died in South Carolina; Stanwick, who spent his life in Arkansas; Jesse, at Mt. Enterprise, Texas; Judge P. B., of Cleveland, Tennessee; Thomas B., father of John B., and Samuel, who died before reaching manhood. Thomas B. Mayfield was a Confederate soldier for a short time during the Rebellion. He was a Democrat, without political aspirations; fraternally, a Mason; religiously, a Methodist. He married Miss Melissa Blythe, a daughter of David Blythe, a pioneer Baptist minister. The Blythes came to Texas from Greenville District, South Carolina. Mr. Mayfield died at Overton in 1874. His widow is still living, aged seventy-six years, and is a resident of Tyler.

John B. Mayfield is the only living child of his parents. He spent his minority on his father's farm and in the village of Overton. His final work in school was done at the University of the South, Sewanee, Tennessee.

A. B. Mayfield

see, where he was graduated, and was the recipient of the degree of B. S. After returning home he studied law under Judge Ewing at Trinity University, until warned of a break-down of his health, when he abandoned the idea of a professional career and engaged in merchandising at Overton. He was in the general merchandise business there until 1897, when he came to Tyler, where he subsequently embarked on his wholesale career.

Mr. Mayfield was first married at Overton, Texas, April 1, 1879, to Miss Mary Guerin, a daughter of Nathaniel Guerin, who came to Texas from South Carolina. Mrs. Mayfield passed away in 1886. She was the mother of M. G. and Horace, twin brothers, the former of whom is one of the vice presidents of the Starr-Mayfield Company; the latter is a ranchman of Camp Crook, S. D. Hon. Earl B. is a member of the board of railroad commissioners of Texas and is favorably known as a legislator of the commonwealth. He was born in Overton, Texas, in 1882, was graduated from the Southwestern University at Georgetown, where his brothers were also educated; prepared himself for the practice of law at the State University; early manifested a disposition toward politics, and was elected to the state senate from the Bosque county district in 1907 on the Democratic ticket. His course in the legislature was marked by a strong desire to serve the whole people of his state and he championed such measures, particularly, as gave to the common people rights which had not before been written into law. He took his seat in the senate in his twenty-seventh year and had the distinction of being one of the "boy members." At the same time he displayed the courage and the ability of a legislator of years and experience. His service in Austin gave him a wide popularity over Texas and when he announced his candidacy for railroad commissioner eager support came to him from all sections, and he won the nomination in the primary of 1912 and the election of November following. He is married and has three sons. John P. Mayfield, the fourth son, is a grocer in Mineral Wells, Texas, and the fifth and youngest child of the first marriage is Thomas B., a traveling salesman for the Terrell house of the Starr-Mayfield Co.

John B. Mayfield married his present wife, June 20, 1900, at Tyler. She was formerly Miss Hattie Belle Patterson and is a daughter of J. P. Patterson. The children of this union are Jack Hastings Mayfield and Lela Isabel.

Mr. Mayfield has gone deeply into Masonry. He belongs to the Chapter and Commandery at Tyler and to the Consistory and Shrine at Dallas. In the Scottish Rite, he has taken all the degrees except the thirty-third. His religious creed is that of the Episcopal church and his political affiliations are with the Democratic party. In his personality he is peculiarly equipped for a successful merchant and man of affairs. His outward demeanor places him among the optimists and his mental and physical makeup mark him as a typical genus homo. He is an engine of bodily vigor and a dynamo of mental energy and power, and he has the faculty of transmitting these forces to those about him and to his affairs. At the head of a mammoth enterprise, he drives as well as guides and under such a pressure a great business has been centered about Tyler. He is as approachable as the ordinary clerk; is as affable and courteous as the typical southern gentleman and puts the same earnestness into his social intercourse that he does into his business affairs.

A. B. ROBERT, M. D. A physician who has made his home in El Paso since 1911, and is well known throughout this section of Texas and in Mexico, in which country he has spent the greater portion of his career as a physician, Dr. Robert is the son of a physician, one who was a surgeon of the Confederate army during the Civil war, and the father and son together have conferred honor and credit upon the profession during a period of fully half a century.

A. B. Robert was born at Troy, Alabama, September 2, 1863, the youngest in a family of ten children, six of whom are living, born to W. H. and Barbara Melda (Skinner) Robert, both parents having been born in Georgia. The father came to Alabama as a young man and gained prominence as a physician of Troy. Subsequently he moved to Texas. During the war he was surgeon of a regiment in the southern army, and he continued his practice at Greenville, Texas, for many years, until death in 1901, at the age of eighty-four years. He and his wife were married in Alabama and the mother passed away in January, 1907, at the age of eighty-six.

Dr. A. B. Robert attended school at Whiterock, Texas, and at Mexia, took a college course, and then entered the Missouri Medical College at St. Louis, where he was graduated M.D. in 1885. He subsequently took a special course of lectures in the New York Optical Institute. Returning to Greenville, he practiced there for one year, then removed to El Paso, where he was in practice for one year, and subsequently transferred his residence and professional activities to Casa Grande, Mexico, which was his home for seventeen years. Since 1911 he has returned to El Paso and has built up a fine practice in this city. During his residence at Casa Grande he served as city physician for ten years, and was examiner for the New York Life Insurance Company, and for twelve years was railway surgeon for the Mexican Northwestern Railway. In politics the doctor is independent. He has membership in the eastern Texas Medical Association. His church is the Presbyterian.

On August 13, 1900, Dr. Robert married Miss Osepha Dourse, of El Paso, a daughter of Guan and Carolina (Older) Dourse, her mother still being a resident of El Paso. Three children were born to their union, namely: Barbara, born at Casa Grande, Mexico, in 1901, now attending school in El Paso; Augustus B., born at Casa Grande, in 1902, and also a student in the El Paso schools; Josephine, born in 1904 at Casa Grande, a young school girl. Dr. Robert owns a large ranch in Mexico, and has acquired valuable real estate in El Paso, including his beautiful home at 1702 Montana street. He is fond of all manner of outdoor life, delights in the sports afield, and enjoys a thoroughly successful position in his profession and citizenship.

AUGUSTINE CELAYA. One of the foremost attorneys of Brownsville, Augustine Celaya, a gentleman of talent and culture, has a great natural aptitude for his profession, being industrious, zealous and persistent in the advocacy of his client's cause, while his record gives evidence of his wide research and learning, and of his broad powers of reasoning. He was for several years president of the Rio Grande Railroad, and is a large property owner in the city of Brownsville, where his birth occurred in 1860.

Simon Celaya, Mr. Celaya's father, was born, in 1824, in the province of Vizcaya, Spain, where he received educational advantages of much value. In 1846, desirous of advancing his business opportunities, he migrated to Havana, Cuba, and about a year later, in 1847, came to Brownsville, Texas. Subsequently going to Bardstown, Kentucky, he remained there until he had perfected himself in the English language, and on his return to Brownsville became connected with the large and prosperous wholesale house of Jose San Ramon. When a few years later, Mr. San Ramon retired from active pursuits, and returned to Spain, Mr. Simon Celaya became sole proprietor of the business, which he subsequently sold in order to enter into a railway enterprise, which, if successfully carried out, should greatly facilitate the development and upbuilding of this section of the state. With that object in view he built the Rio Grande Railroad, extending from Brownsville to Point Isabel, a distance of twenty-two miles, beginning the work in 1870, and completing its construction in 1872. He was afterward general manager, and had charge of the operation of the road until his retirement from active business, when he was succeeded in the management of the road by his son, Augustine Celaya, the special subject of this brief personal record.

The Rio Grande was one of the famous railways of Texas until 1904, when the Saint Louis, Brownsville and Mexico Railway was completed, it having been the only railroad connecting Brownsville with the outer world. During its most flourishing period it did an immense business, and, unlike other Texas railroads, paid regular dividends. It connected with several lines of steamships at Point Isabel, and did a large freight carrying business through Brownsville to various points in Mexico.

For a number of years Simon Celaya, who was a man of the highest type of character, was the Spanish vice consul at Brownsville, and was here a resident until his death, November 25, 1908. He married Adelaide Danache, who was born in Matamoras, Mexico, of French ancestry, and died in 1860.

Brought up in Brownsville, Augustine Celaya acquired the rudiments of his fine education in the public schools of this city, and in 1883 was graduated from the Law Department of the University of Virginia, which conferred upon him the degrees of Master of Arts and of Bachelor of Laws. Immediately opening an office in San Antonio, Texas, he was there successfully engaged in the practice of his profession for ten years. Returning to Brownsville in 1893, Mr. Celaya succeeded his father as general manager of the Rio Grande Railroad, of which he later became general manager and president, while his brother, Jose Celaya, was made secretary and treasurer, positions held by the brothers until they sold the road to the Frisco system.

Mr. Celaya then resumed the practice of law, and in 1912 was made city recorder of Brownsville. He has been prominent in public affairs for eleven years, having served as prosecuting attorney of Cameron county, and for six years was county treasurer. Successful in business, he has acquired extensive and valuable property interests in Brownsville, and is numbered among its most esteemed and valued citizens.

Mr. Celaya married, in Brownsville, Miss Laura Scanlan, who was born in Victoria, Texas, and into their happy household five children have been born, namely: Laura, Laura Adelaide, Augustine, Joe, and Clarence.

HENRY EDWARD BYRNE. As the president of the Tyler Commercial College and an advocate of practical business education for young men and women of today, Henry Edward Byrne has had no small part in the educational activities of this county, and much credit is due him for the class of work his institution stands for and the quality and calibre of the products of his school, as business men and women. The institution he heads is his own conception and the product of his own ingenuity, in which he has been aided by a faculty which represents the very acme of practical methods in the achievement of practical results. Graduates of his school find no difficulty in stepping into the highest paid positions in the commercial and financial world, and they are to be found in many of the biggest offices and institutions in the United States today, while some are in the government service on the Panama canal, and others have entered the foreign diplomatic service in their capacities as private secretaries. In short, there is no field calling for the services of properly trained business youths where representatives of the Tyler Commercial College may not be found.

Henry Edward Byrne was born in Knox county, Missouri, December 14, 1870, and like many of the leaders of affairs in the present day, he had his early training on a farm. He is the son of John Byrne, now of Tyler, a man who spent his active business life as a farmer. He was born in Illinois in 1844 and in young manhood married Miss Mary Myers, and their children are Henry Edward, of this review, and John T., of Dallas, Texas. When he finished the common schools of his native community Henry E. Byrne entered the Normal School at Chillicothe, Missouri, and there spent two years of close and careful study in the rounding out of a general business education. He put his knowledge into actual practice as a teacher in the graded schools of Brunswick, Missouri, where he remained for two years, and then came to Texas in 1896, locating at Hillsboro, where he became a member of the faculty of the Patterson Institute, taking charge of the Commercial Department of the school. It was in January, 1900, that Mr. Byrne came to Tyler as head of the commercial department of the Tyler Normal and Commercial College, taking a one-fourth interest in the College, with the Adair brothers and Frank A. Glenn as his business partners. The normal feature of the school proved to be an unprofitable one and the Adair brothers disposed of their interest to Messrs. Byrne and Glenn, who were not slow to see, in response to their own efforts, a future for a live commercial school at this place.

In 1904 the school was incorporated as the Tyler Commercial College with a capital of $40,000 paid in. The enrollment of the college had by this time increased very materially from the thirteen original students who faced Mr. Byrne when he began his work at Tyler, and it has made wonderful strides each year since then toward an annual enrollment of two thousand students, the status of the school at the end of 1912. Fifteen hundred of that number have already sought instruction here and represent thirty-nine different states and six foreign countries, namely, Ireland, Germany, Spain, France, Japan, Cuba and Mexico, besides highly educated Indians from some of the tribes of Oklahoma. Their graduates fill responsible positions with business concerns, railroads, lumber companies, banks, with the government service on the Panama canal, and some have entered the diplomatic service as private secretaries to our foreign representatives. A conspicuous example of the help of this school to an unpromising youth is that of Ward Ireland, who was picked up on a New Mexico farm and graduated from Tyler, subsequently reported the proceedings of the International Land Commission between Spain and the United States, and is now the president of a stenotype company in Owens borough Kentucky.

The Tyler Commercial College embraces the most thorough curriculum, and is in every way prepared to meet the fullest demand for a thorough and practical business education. Its course embraces the study of the following subjects, with many others: Money and Credit; Corporation Finance; Taxation and Public Finance; Private Secretaryship; Salesmanship; Advertising; Commercial History; Commercial Geography; Higher Accounting; Economics; Parliamentary Law; and Managerialship, the latter embracing a knowledge of all the foregoing subjects, together with lectures and the study of special reference works on the general managing of a large business establishment. In Mr. Byrne the college has a man who is in every way fitted to conduct such an establishment. The subject of business training has long been one close to his heart, and when he was but twenty-seven years of age he prepared and published the Byrne Simplified Shorthand, a system so simple and so practical that its author has been termed the Edison of the Shorthand World. The publication of this work has run through seven editions, and several other text books of which he is the author are in use by the best commercial schools in the land. In 1909 Mr. Byrne established the printing plant in Tyler known as the Byrne Publishing Company, in which he prints all his text books, blanks used in the colleges, and carries on a general job printing business with representatives on the road throughout the country in competition with other blank book firms for the commercial printing of East Texas, as well as for the sale of high class advertising novelties.

In addition to his interests mentioned above, Mr. Byrne is one of the organizers of the Guaranty State Bank of Tyler, and he is financially interested in the Citizens' National Bank at this place. The practical judgment that made his college the unmistakable success it has proved itself found a place for him in the business life of his home town, and in 1910 he was called to the presidency of the Tyler Commercial Club, which under his direction has put new life into the town. It secured the contract for the street railway, as well as the location for the East Texas Fair, and has added many new and valuable people to the city by its skillful exploiting of the advantages of the place. Mr. Byrne is also interested in a very material manner in the banking activities of the towns of Dallas, Houston and Waco and is a stockholder in the Southland Insurance Company. In addition to all the above, he is a heavy property holder in Tyler.

Mr. Byrne was married in Hillsboro, Texas, in June, 1896, to Miss Ora Hunt, a daughter of George H. Hunt, of Hillsboro. They have one child—Ora Lee Byrne.

ED CROSS. No man is better known in Kingsville and Kleberg county, Texas, than is Ed Cross. Not only is this due to the fact that he was one of the first settlers of this little city, but also because he has the personality which always wins popularity and the public spirit which has caused him to give generously of his time and influence to the upbuilding of this section. Mr. Cross comes of a family, well known in Southern history, the blood of pioneers running through his veins.

A native of Texas, Ed Cross was born at Paris, Lamar county, Texas, on the 11th of July, 1864. His father was Dr. Edward Cross, who was born in Little Rock, Arkansas, a son of Judge Edward Cross, whose name is a famous one in the annals of the state of Arkansas. Judge Cross was born in Kentucky and came to Arkansas when it was a territory, having been sent there as a territorial judge. He became one of the most distinguished men in the state and had a large share in the founding of the state. He was made a member of the supreme bench of the state of Arkansas and was sent to Congress where he served for a number of years. He later became president of the Iron Mountain Railroad Company and was as successful in the business world as he had been on the bench. In every place which he occupied he never lost sight of his ambition to see Arkansas a prosperous state and his efforts were always directed toward her upbuilding.

Dr. Edward Cross, who was born in 1838, grew up in Little Rock and received his education in Jefferson Medical College. He became a surgeon during the Civil war, serving in the Confederacy. He was placed in charge of the Medical Department for the Indian Territory, with headquarters at Paris, Texas, and in this position he served until the end of the war. After the surrender he resumed his medical practice in Arkansas, living for a few years at his father's old home in Hempstead county and then moving to Little Rock. He spent the remainder of his years in his native state in the capital city, becoming one of the most distinguished physicians of the state. He built up an extensive practice, one that gave him a large income, but on account of failing health he was forced to leave Arkansas in search of a more favorable climate. He made several trips to the Southwest in search of a location and finally in 1895 removed to San Antonio, Texas. Here he continued to practice and for a time was surgeon in charge of the Santa Rosa Hospital. He was also associated in practice here with the late Dr. Amos Graves. Not being entirely satisfied with the climate of San Antonio, Dr. Cross removed in 1909 to Kingsville, Texas and here he has lived ever since. Dr. Cross married Miss Kate Cloud, who is also living in Kingsville.

Ed Cross was reared in Little Rock and there received his education. He learned the trade of a machinist and as such worked in the shops of the Iron Mountain Railroad for some years. In 1880 he came to Texas and located at Gainesville, which was at that time in the heart of the cattle country. Here he followed his natural inclinations toward the freedom of life on the open plains and became a cow boy and trail herder. He worked with some of the largest outfits of Texas and made a number of trips over the cattle trails to the North, one of them taking him as far as Miles City, Montana. In 1892 he came to San Antonio and for the next four years he was engaged in his first occupation of machinist, being employed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. He subsequently went to Mexico on a mining expedition, being connected with the San Juan mining project in the state of Coahuila. He remained in Mexico for three years and then returned to Texas.

It was in the fall of 1904 that Mr. Cross came to Kingsville, which had just been established. He was thus one of the town's first settlers and from the first took a leading part in its various activities. He was at first in charge of the city water supply, laying the pipes for the town site owners and throughout the town, and remaining in charge of the water system for some time. He later engaged in the horse dealing business. He was a fine judge of horses and made much money in this business, in connection with which he also ran a livery stable. Upon retiring from this business he bought a farm of ninety-five acres a mile and a half southwest of Kingsville whither he removed in June, 1912. Here he carries on general farming, but the attraction of this property as a favorite resort for Kingsville people has made it more valuable than its agricultural merit. The cause of this is a beautiful sheet of water, known as Cross' Lake, where the people of this section flock to take advantage of its bathing and boating facilities. Mr. Cross has three brothers, all of whom are living in Texas, namely, J. L. Cross, Ben Cross and Theodore H. Cross.

Ed Cross was married at Goliad, Texas, to Miss Ida Albrecht, a daughter of Ferdinand Albrecht, whose father, Fritz Albrecht, came to Texas from Germany in the same ship with the Kleberg family. Fritz Albrecht located in Goliad county, together with his four brothers, and they were among the early pioneers. Some of their sons have become very wealthy and prominent men, their wealth having been mainly gained in the cattle business. The Albrecht family name is one closely bound up with the history of Goliad county. Ferdinand Albrecht married Helen Willms, whose father was a civil engineer in Germany and their daughter, Ida, was born in Goliad county.

WILLIAM H. VANCE. A very enterprising and successful real estate man of El Paso, Mr. Vance spent his youth in what was almost the frontier region of northwest Texas, and from his earliest experiences was acquainted with the ranch and the range and cattle and bronchos. Training in riding horses and roping cattle was more readily supplied him than the liberal advantages of school, and from an early age he was trained to self-reliance and has actually made his own way in life, and now enjoys a position of esteem and influence in the metropolis of west Texas.

William H. Vance was born in Calhoun county, Mississippi, January 1, 1874, and was the third in a family of nine children born to George M. and Mary Elizabeth (Fox) Vance. The father, a native of Mississippi, came to Texas in July, 1874, locating in Denton county, where he became a cattle raiser. After about thirty years of residence in Denton county, he moved into Oklahoma or into what was formerly Gregg county, Texas, being a resident in that disputed portion of territory along the Red River between Texas and Oklahoma.

He was county commissioner of Jack county, Texas, for twelve years. He was sixteen years of age when he enlisted in the Civil war, and went through all the campaigns until the close as a Confederate soldier. His wife, Mary Elizabeth Fox also born in Mississippi, was a sister of Fuller and Henry Fox, who took a very prominent part in Mississippi politics, both serving in the Mississippi House of Representatives and Senate for a number of years. The Fox family, during the ante-Bellum days, owned a large number of slaves, had large plantations and were among the leading and aristocratic people of Mississippi. The mother is still living, and with her husband resides in Greer county, Oklahoma.

During youth spent on the range and in the farm labors, William H. Vance attended school as regularly as was permitted, and when nineteen years of age left school and started life on his own account. His first position in the business world was as clerk in a mercantile house at Jacksboro in Jack county.

From clerk he was promoted to manager, and remained in the service of that one firm for a period of thirteen years, during which he demonstrated his ability as a business man and his capacity for thorough and efficient service. Resigning this position he then went into the insurance business as one of the Texas representatives of the New York Life Insurance Company, a business which he followed with a fine record of success for four years. In 1904 he located at El Paso, and continued with the New York Life until that company was disbarred from doing business within the borders of the state in 1907. He then turned all his attention to real estate, and in 1911 found a partnership with Mr. M. H. Peterson, with offices in the Sheldon Block. This firm has developed a large clientage and has made a specialty of dealing in city property, and also large farming tracts. The partners have a large amount of real estate under their own name, and deal in their own property as well as carrying on a brokerage business.

In politics Mr. Vance is a loyal Democrat. He is affiliated with Fort Richardson Lodge No. 320, A. F. & A. M. and has taken the degrees of York Rite Masonry up to the Commandery and the Mystic Shrine. He is also a member of the Baptist church.

On March 9, 1899 at Jacksboro, Texas, Mr. Vance married Miss Mary Lindsey, daughter of J. C. Lindsey, a native of Texas, and for many years a prosperous cattleman and now living retired at the age of seventy-four years on his ranch in Jack county. The father of this old cattleman was among the early American colonists in Texas, and took part as a soldier in the war of liberation of Texas from Mexican dominion in the thirties. The two children of Mr. and Mrs. Vance are James and Harriet.

ANDERSON M. WALTHALL. A resident of the Lone Star state for forty years, Judge Walthall has long held prestige as one of the representative members of the Texas bar, and is now presiding on the bench of the Forty-first judicial district of the state. He is a man of fine intellectual and professional attainments, and his high ideals, fairness and broad conceptions have made his administration of judicial office significantly potent in the conservation of equity and justice. He is one of the loyal and liberal citizens of El Paso, is well known in this section of the state, and here has a host of friends who have "been tried in the balance and not found wanting."

of the state of Missouri, and the date of his nativity was November, 1852. He was the fifth in order of birth of a family of eight children born to William B. and Matilda (Vaughan) Walthall, both of whom were born in Virginia, where the respective families were founded in the colonial epoch of our national history, and where both became influential in civic and industrial development and progress. John Walthall, a brother of Anderson M., was a valiant soldier of the Confederacy in the Civil war, as a member of the command of General Price and he was killed in the battle of Wilson's Creek, Missouri, in August, 1861, thus early sacrificing his life in the cause. Besides Judge Walthall two sons and one daughter are still living. The parents continued to reside in Missouri until their death, and there the father devoted the greater part of his active career to farming.

The boyhood days of Judge Walthall were passed amidst the alarms and clamor of the war between the states, and he retains vivid recollections concerning that climacteric period of the nation's history. His early educational discipline was acquired in the schools of his native county, and was effectively supplemented by a course in Westminster College, at Fulton, Missouri. He continued to reside in his native state until 1873, when he came to Texas and established his home in Parker county, where he became a successful and popular teacher in the public schools and where he also read law under effective private preceptorship. In the Centennial year, 1876, he received his license to practice law, and his initial work in his profession after his admission to the Texas bar was at Breckenridge, the judicial center of Stephens county, where he soon gained a substantial practice and where he continued his labors until 1885, having in the meantime served several years as county attorney. In the year last mentioned, desiring to find a broader field of professional endeavor, Judge Walthall removed to Pecos and later to the progressive city of El Paso, the capital and metropolis of the county of the same name and an important commercial and industrial center on the border between Texas and Mexico. He soon gained a place of leadership at the bar of El Paso county, with a practice of extensive and representative order, and he continued to devote his attention closely to the work of his profession until 1898, when Governor Charles A. Culberson appointed him to the bench of the Thirty-fourth judicial district of the state to fill out the unexpired term of Judge C. N. Buckler. He has continued the able and valuable incumbent of this important judicial office by election to the present time, with the exception of one term, from 1904 to 1908, his term of office covering the years 1898, 1900, 1908, 1912. His decisions have invariably been marked by wise interpretation of the law involved, by due cognizance of the facts presented and by true judicial acumen, with the result that very few of his rulings on the bench have met with reversal by courts of higher jurisdiction.

In politics Judge Walthall is found aligned as a stalwart and able advocate of the principles and policies of the Democratic party. He and his wife hold membership in the Baptist church, and he is an honored member of the El Paso County Bar Association and the Texas Bar Association. The Judge is the owner of one of the attractive homes of El Paso, besides other city realty, and he is one of those vital and appreciative citizens who are ever ready to lend encouragement and co-operation in the furtherance of measures and enterprises projected for the general good of the community. He is devoted to his home, the relations of which are ideal, and there he finds great satisfaction in his "close communion" with his large and select library.

On the 3d of October, 1877, was solemnized the marriage of Judge Walthall to Miss Sallie Tyre Harris, who was born and reared in Missouri, a daughter of the late Hon. Thomas B. Harris, of Fulton, that state, a prominent figure in public affairs in Missouri and also in the development and upbuilding of important business enterprises. Of the four children of Judge and Mrs. Walt-hall one, William, died at the age of two years. The son Harris is well upholding the professional prestige of the family; Mary Miller is the wife of James Lee Dunn, of El Paso; and Sally Tom is the wife of William Graves, of this city.

BENJAMIN B. JONES. Of recent years El Paso has lost a number of her prominent citizens and among those none have been more sincerely mourned than Benjamin B. Jones. He had been in the drug business all of his active life and although El Paso was his business location for only a few years he had built up a large trade and had won a place of importance in the life of the city. Fortunately his widow is as well endowed with a faculty for successful management of business affairs as was Mr. Jones himself, and the business which he founded was for a time, or until she sold out, ably carried on by Mrs. Jones.

Benjamin B. Jones was born in Leonard, Texas, on the 20th of March, 1876, the son of Dr. and Mrs. Jones of that place. He grew up in the town of his birth and there received his education in the public schools. Upon leaving school he entered the drug business, which he continued to follow during his entire life. He was located at different times in various towns in the state, coming to El Paso in 1906. Here he established a store and built it up until at the time of his death in 1912, it was in a flourishing condition. He died on the 14th of February, at the age of thirty-six.

He was a member of the Methodist church and a devout Christian whose loss was severely felt in church work. Politically, Mr. Jones was a member of the Democratic party but he took no active part in politics. He was especially fond of chickens and all kinds of fowls and devoted much of his leisure to caring for his birds.

Mr. Jones was married on the 3rd of October, 1905, at Seguin, Texas, to Mrs. Emma Gerlach, of that place. They became the parents of one son, Jerome, now aged thirteen. After the death of her husband, Mrs. Jones took active charge of the drug store and by her competent management won the admiration and respect of the business men of El Paso.

Mrs. Jones was born and reared in Texas and has a keen desire to aid in the advancement of her native state and of El Paso. Prominent socially as well as influential in a business way, she is in a position to do much for the benefit of the city. She is a member of the German Lutheran church and takes great interest in church work, where her executive ability makes her a valuable worker.

The son, Jerome, seems to have inherited the ability possessed by both his parents, for he has made a fine record in school. When he completes the high school course he will go to a college or university and later devote himself to professional studies. Along what line these will be is not yet decided although the lad himself is inclined to the law.

HON. DAN M. JACKSON. The present judge of the thirty-fourth judicial district, of which El Paso is the metropolis, is one of the younger members of the Texas bar and yet he has only few superiors, as a lawyer and is admitted to be one of the ablest representatives of the bar anywhere in this state. Judge Jackson has been a resident of El Paso for ten years, and his thorough popularity, his oft-demonstrated ability in the court as an attorney, won him appointment from the governor to fill a vacancy in the district court, and at the recent election of 1912, he was given a handsome popular majority for the same office.

Dan M. Jackson was born in Falls county, Texas, May 10, 1876, and has spent all his career in his native state. His father, Terrell Jackson, a native of Tennessee, came to Texas in 1869 after having given loyal service in the Confederate army during the Civil war. He was a druggist by trade and was engaged in that business for many years. A member of the Methodist church, he was one of the most devout adherents of his church and his religion, and was also an active figure in local politics. His death occurred in 1903 at the age of seventy-four, and his last resting place is at Eddy, Texas. The maiden name of his wife was Ann H. Stewart, and she now resides at Eddy. She is a native of Alabama and they were married in that state. She was a member of the Baptist church and as devout a Christian as was her husband. They were the parents of seven children, and the judge is the youngest.

Judge Jackson attained his early education in the public schools, subsequently had a high school course, and then entered the law department of the University of Texas, where he completed his professional preparation. In 1899 he was admitted to the bar and then located at Marlin where he was engaged in practice for three years and during that time served as city attorney. From Marlin he went to Houston, where he was located for about two years and was connected with the legal department of the Texas and New Orleans Railroad. From Houston in 1903 he moved to El Paso, which city has been his home ever since.

On returning to this city he was appointed assistant city attorney, was soon afterwards made assistant district attorney and then received appointment from the governor as district judge. His administration in the duties of judge was marked by a thorough impartiality and judicial ability, so that his record as judge was completely acceptable both to the members of the bar and to the public. So it was that his candidacy in 1912 was confirmed by a large vote at the election in November, and he is now filling the office for the regular term.

Judge Jackson was married in San Antonio November 14, 1900 to Miss Hannah Lessing, a daughter of Rudolph Lessing of Waco. Their two children are Rudolph and Marion, the latter being a daughter. Judge Jackson gives his preference to the Methodist church among the various denominations, and fraternally is a member of the Elks, the Beavers and the Moose. He is one of the active and influential men in Democratic part of West Texas. His diversions, aside from his judicial duties, consist chiefly in an occasional fishing trip, and the more regular home amusements of theatres, music and the books of his own private library. Among his friends and associates Judge Jackson is regarded as a man of big heart and genial nature and yet on serious subjects, and when the question is one of conviction as to right or wrong, he stands as firm as a rock. A young man, he has already won a creditable record in public and professional affairs, and his future political career promises to be of great importance to the entire state.

MATTHEW CARTWRIGHT. The Cartwright name is well known throughout the entire state of Texas, and especially in the eastern portion, where for three generations the representatives of the family have been large land owners and prominent business men. One of the best known of the living and active generation is Matthew Cartwright of Terrell. For many years he has been a rancher and a dealer in lands throughout the state, interested in various other lines of endeavor, and has not only gained a large fortune for himself but has also, it is certain, done as much as any other individual citizen for the upbuilding of permanent agriculture in this state. Matthew Cartwright, who was born at San Augustine, Texas, August 11, 1855, is the son of Matthew and Amanda (Holman) Cartwright. His father, whose career receives greater attention in the sketch of Leonidas Cartwright, elsewhere in this publication, was one of the foremost men of his day in the state, a man of wealth and influence, and in many ways a benefactor to Texas. In addition to what is published elsewhere in connection with the family name, some items of family history will be of interest in this connection. The family was founded at Norfolk, Virginia, about 1700, by three brothers, Matthew, John and Peter Cartwright, who came from England. A son of one of these brothers was Matthew Cartwright, whose home was established on the west side of the Alleghanies near Lebanon, Tennessee, where he owned a large and beautiful estate. A son of this Matthew was John Cartwright, who became the father of Matthew Cartwright, Sr., and grandfather of the Texas business man first named in this sketch.

With these relationships of the family in mind, some important facts of early Texas history may be gleaned from memoranda made by R. L. Cartwright of Waco after visiting the old John Cartwright homestead, six miles east of San Augustine, a few years ago in company with H. W. Sublett. On the testimony of Mr. Sublett, John Cartwright was living at his old Apologotcho homestead, when P. A. Sublett (father of H. W.) Elisha Roberts and Col. Horton settled at the old Sublett homestead in 1824. The Cartwright homestead was designated as a place of beginning for the survey of both the Sublett and Roberts tracts, another fact which proves the very early settlement of John Cartwright in that part of the state. Matthew Cartwright, Sr., was born in Tennessee in 1807, and came to Texas at the age of fourteen, which places the date of the family settlement in 1821, though John Cartwright had come perhaps a year earlier and built a cabin. It was reported that Col. Horton stated that the old Cartwright place was settled by John Cartwright in 1819. Texas was at that time claimed by the United States as a part of the Louisiana Purchase, but in that year the United States gave up its claims to Texas to Spain, and the Sabine River was established as the boundary. These circumstances point to the fact that the Cartwright settlement was one of the oldest if not the oldest prominent American settlement of Texas. Along with the other interests of the Cartwrights in that section was a store, which was moved to San Augustine about 1831, when that town was platted, and was conducted there under the firm name of John. Cartwright & Son, the latter being Matthew Cartwright, Sr.

Another interesting fact of family history is brought out in a recent year book of the Texas department of agriculture. According to this authority the first cotton planter in Texas was Jared E. Groce. He came to the state with his family in 1821, bringing with him one hundred negro slaves. In 1822 he planted the first cotton and began its culture on a limited scale. In 1825 he began to ship cotton to New Orleans. While the distinction of the pioneer planter belongs to Col. Groce, the first cotton gin in Texas was owned by John Cartwright in the Red Lands of East Texas. Col. Groce established a second gin in 1825 on the Brazos River at the plantation opposite which the army of General Sam Houston camped for some time previous to its march to the San Jacinto battle grounds in 1836.

Matthew Cartwright, Jr., grew up in his native town where his father was engaged in mercantile business, in continuation of the establishment already noted, and from which place the senior Cartwright traveled all over the country in the buying, locating and selling of land. Matthew was the youngest son of the senior Cartwright, and the latter determined that he should have a good education. He consequently attended the schools in San Augustine and the Huntington school at Shelbyville, Texas, and was then sent to the Morgan Looney school at Gilmer, Texas, after which he entered Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tennessee, where he graduated with the degree Bachelor of Science. For a while after his return to San Augustine he read law, not with any intention of practicing but to become familiar with the essentials of law and to put himself in a position to understand the law and lawyers.

The Cartwright estate was scattered through various counties of Texas, but part of it lay in Kaufman county, and it was in that county that Matthew Cartwright established himself during the '70s. While cattle ranching was his main business at first, it was his ambition to help change the country from a region supporting only comparatively few men to one which would give many people their livelihood. Consequently he began an era of farm development. Not hundreds, but thousands of acres of ranching land was turned under and fields of cotton and corn took the place of the pastures, to a large extent. In addition to this agricultural process, ranching still occupied a large share of Mr. Cartwright's attention. Thousands of beeves were sent off to market from the range which was adjacent to and a part of the ranch which he owned in Kaufman county. Another ranch was started in Stonewall county when that county was the home of the buffalo and wild horses but that passed into other hands when the country was settled up and Mr. Cartwright later transferred his ranching operations to LaSalle county. He is still engaged in raising cattle in these counties and is a large dealer in stock. A part of his Kaufman county ranch is devoted to the raising and breeding of mules. His farming interests are extensive in several parts of the state. He owns some five thousand acres of land planted in cotton and corn and a thousand acres of meadow land. This great farm supports a small colony of tenants, and in itself is an important factor in the commercial life of Kaufman county. He has also developed another farm consisting of about two thousand acres of land, and in various parts of the state owns property which has been brought to a high state of cultivation. During his long business career he has bought and sold land in large and small tracts, and is a recognized authority on Texas land values.

Cattle and land have not been the only interest of Mr. Cartwright. In Terrell when financial investments other than land and cattle were looked upon with disfavor, Mr. Cartwright was one of the daring spirits who took the lead in banking and kindred interests. He became a large stockholder in the First National Bank, was its president for about twenty years, and has had as successful record as a banker as in other fields. He is the owner of a beautiful home on Griffith avenue in Terrell.

Mr. Cartwright has always been interested in politics, and though an exceedingly busy man has found time to serve the people in many ways. He was a member of the state Democratic executive committee under the chairmanship of Webb Finley, and has been a lifelong adherent of the Democratic interests. He was mayor of Terrell for two years, and served a term on the board of managers of the North Texas Insane Hospital, being appointed by Governor Ross. His membership has never been identified with any of the secret societies, but he belongs to one of the best known college fraternities in the country, being a Sigma Chi of Cumberland University chapter.

On the 24th of July, 1876, Mr. Cartwright married Miss Mary Davenport in Pittsburg, Texas. She is a daughter of Dr. Davenport, and her mother was a member of the Polk family, noted in Tennessee and Southern history. Dr. Davenport came from Tennessee to Texas, and his family consisted of two daughters, Mrs. Cartwright and Mrs. Gladney, the wife of Dr. Gladney of Terrell. Mr. and Mrs. Cartwright are the parents of ten children, the oldest, Leonidas, was a student in the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas at Bryan, then attended Washington and Lee University, and later Vanderbilt University, and is now a ranchman and real estate dealer with his home in San Antonio; he married Miss Justa Joiner, and they have two sons, Joiner and Lon D., Jr., and two daughters, Justa and Jerome. Amanda H., the eldest daughter, is the wife of J. L. Taylor, of San Antonio, and has three children, Eugenia, Maria Louise and J. L., Jr. Eugenia P., the third child, married James I. Cartwright of Terrell, and they have one son, Matthew, the third. Estelle became the wife of W. B. Lupe of San Antonio, and their children are Mary D. and W. B., Jr. Jerome B. is now Mrs. W. P. Head of Abilene, Texas. Mary D. is the wife of C. S. Pickrell of El Paso. John Reagan married Miss Isabel Branson and lives in Alpine, Texas. Holman, who spent four years in the academic and law department of the University of Texas, is the active manager of the North Texas interests of his father's vast estate. Matthew, Jr., who spent two years in the Agricultural department of the Missouri State University, is associated with his brother Holman in looking after the North Texas interests for their father. Bourke, the youngest of the family, is a student in the University of Texas.

It is impossible to do more than touch on the salient points in the career of a man like Mr. Cartwright, whose activities have covered more than a third of a century. From the beginning of his business life up to the present time, many events have threatened him with ruin; two disastrous money panics swept the country, adverse conditions of every variety had to be met; grazing interests suffered severely, but Mr. Cartwright was equal to the demands made upon him, although some of his hardest battles came when he was a young man just starting in life. His position has become more and more secure, with the passing years, and he is now recognized as one of the men whose judgment is to be trusted, and whose influence is to be felt in most of the important business enterprises of this state.

FELIX R. MANN. One of the best known of the old-time cattlemen of west Texas is Felix R. Mann of San Angelo, now engaged in the real estate and general live stock business at that city. He started in the business as a contemporary of many of the notable men who made history in west Texas in the decade following the Civil war, and while his herd and ranches were not so extensive as some who might be mentioned, yet Mr. Mann in all essential respects was well to the front and was recognized as one of the strongest and ablest men in the business.

Felix R. Mann was born in Smith county, Tennessee, October 23, 1846, a son of T. W. and Elizabeth (Glover) Mann, both of Tennessee. On the father's side the ancestry is Irish, and on the mother's side is Welsh. There were large numbers of the Mann family in Tennessee, and all were slaveholders and planters. Mr. Mann's grandfather owned about seventy darkies about his plantation and household before the war, and was a noted tobacco raiser. Mr. T. W. Mann, whose death occurred on the 12th of December, 1905, was a stockman and miller and farmer, also owned a number of slaves, and in 1855 moved to Texas and settled in Tarrant county. He was one of the useful factors in the Confederacy during the war. His business was that of milling and distilling. During the war he operated four flouring mills and furnished great quantities of flour to the Confederate government. He also operated a distillery whose product was likewise furnished to the Confederacy. On account of this important contribution to the cause, he was exempt from military duties. Two of the flour mills were located in Tarrant county, one in Dallas county, and another in Parker county, and the distillery was in Tarrant county, not far from Fort Worth. About 1870 the senior Mr. Mann sold out his business and moved to Grayson county, where he engaged in farming and stock raising for some years. In 1878, having disposed of his interests in that locality, he moved to west Texas, in Menard county, then on the Texas frontier. In 1903 he sold this farm there and came to San Angelo, where he continued to conduct extensive farming and stock raising enterprises until his death in 1905. The mother passed away February 18, 1907. Of their five children, two sons and three daughters, Felix was the oldest.

His boyhood was spent from the age of nine in north Texas, and he was just reaching the character-forming period of youth when the war came on. In consequence of the disturbance of normal existence, he received only limited educational advantages, and his broad information and ability in the business field had been acquired by self-training, rather than through his acquaintance with books and schools. Mr. Mann in 1864 went out to New Mexico, and joined the United States army to fight the Indians along the border in New Mexico, Arizona and Colorado. He served for three years in the regular army, and at the end of that time received his honorable discharge. Returning to Texas, he located in his old home county of Tarrant, where for two years he was an employe of the great cattle industry, and during the season helped take stock over the famous trails that led north from Texas into Kansas, a distance of seven hundred miles. He usually was a member of the party which handled from fifteen hundred to two thousand head in each drove, and his wages were sixty dollars a month with board, although he furnished his own horse and equipment. After a few years of this life in 1870 he moved out to Coleman county, which was then on the extreme frontier of civilization, and with John Chisholm, one of the most famous of the old-time cattlemen, broke into the practical business of cattle raising. The Indians and buffalo were the chief competitors on the vast ranges of the cattle in those days. From Coleman county he went on to Menard county, and engaged in the stock business for himself. He continued as one of the leading stockmen in that part of the state for thirty years. He witnessed remarkable changes in all conditions of the live stock business during that time. When he began the free range extended from the Red River to Rio Grande River, 900 miles east and west. There was not a fence over the entire area of west Texas, and hardly an acre of ground under plow. The price of cattle would average about five dollars a head, when similar cattle, if they could be found now, would bring about thirty dollars each. Mr. Mann started out in the cattle business with a capital of one hundred and thirty dollars, a horse, bridle, and saddle, with sufficient clothing and blankets to equip him for the rough work involved. The first stock he ever bought was chiefly on credit. He selected out from the drove the fattest animals and then drove those northward and sold them for enough to pay for the entire herd. With that start he began buying more stock and with a fairly continuous and regular success in time built up his herd until each year he branded from two thousand to five thousand calves. In the early days his outfit consisted of about twenty men, all of them armed to protect themselves and cattle from the raiding Indians, and each man in those days was a fitful cowboy as known in literature in the many stories of the west. Mr. Mann continued actively in the cattle business up to 1900, when he sold out his interests in Menard county and came to San Angelo. In the vicinity of this city he has engaged in ranching and more recently has established an office in real estate in which general line of business he is engaged at the present time.

Mr. Mann from the time of casting his first vote has been a supporter of the Republican party, and aside from other features of the party life he is a thorough believer in the protective tariff for all home industry. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Masonic Order, and belongs to the Baptist church. On June 23, 1873, Mr. Mann married Miss Fannie Steen of Menard county, a daughter of John and Mary Steen, who came from England in the early days. Her father was a farmer and stockman of Menard county, and continued that industry until his death. Her mother died a few years ago at the old Steen home. Mr. and Mrs. Mann are the parents of six children, three sons and three daughters, all living and mentioned as follows: Mrs. G. F. Killman, of Fort Worth, is the wife of the general live stock agent at Fort Worth for the Frisco Railroad Company. Clay Mann married a Miss Snell of Sweetwater, and is a traveling man, with residence in El Paso. Walter Mann married Miss Guenther of Grayson county, and is also a traveling man, his home being in Houston. Arthur Mann, married Miss Roads, of Hot Springs, Arkansas, and is a traveling salesman, with headquarters at Fort Worth. Miss May Mann married George Mann, and lives in San Angelo, her husband being in the real estate and live stock business. The youngest of the family, Miss Ang. Mann, is living with her parents in San Angelo.

JAMES A. PATE. Milam county has been ably represented in the treasurer's office since 1910 by James A. Pate, to whose efficient and public-spirited services the community owes much for its present prosperous condition. He has spent his entire career in the county, is well known to its citizens, and for some years has been identified with agricultural interests, and his career is one which illustrates the ability of determination and perseverance in the overcoming of obstacles and misfortunes. Mr. Pate was born in Milam county, October 11, 1871, and is a son of Gilbert Pate, a native of Autauga county, Alabama, who died when James A. was three years of age. The mother, Catherine (Stewart) Pate, had passed away several years before. There were six children in the family: Newall W., John W., Artie G., William T., Joseph W., and James A.

James A. Pate received somewhat limited educational advantages in the schools of Milam county, which he attended until reaching the age of twelve years, at that time facing the world on his own account and working on farms until he was twenty-three years old. Realizing the need of further education, he attended the public school at Cleburne, Johnson county, for twelve months, and at that time went into the Indian Territory and New Mexico as a representative of a cotton gin firm, continuing to sell and install machinery until 1900. He was meeting with excellent success and his future seemed assured, when, in the year mentioned, he met with an accident in which he lost his right arm in an explosion, and after his recuperation returned to Milam county and took up his residence at Rockdale. There he was appointed rural mail carrier on Star Route, a position which he held for four years, when he announced himself as a candidate for the office of assessor of Milam county, being elected thereto in 1904. He received the re-election in 1906, and at the end of his second term resigned and returned to his farm for two years, but in 1910 again entered public life when his fellow-citizens chose him as county treasurer. The able manner in which he discharged the duties of the office during the first term secured him the re-election in 1912, and his service has continued to be characterized by the utmost fidelity to duty.

Mr. Pate was married July 18, 1896, at Rockdale, to Miss Olga Tribble, daughter of Gipp Tribble, of Milam county, and to this union there have been born four children: Venus C. and Artie Lee, who are both deceased; and Jimmie Olga and Dorsett Wilson, living at home. Mr. Pate has a comfortable residence at Cameron, and is also the owner of 250 acres of highly improved land in Milam county. He has taken much interest in agricultural work, and has made a success of his operations, in which he uses the most approved methods. In politics a Democrat, he has shown himself one of the influential men of his party in this section, and has done much to advance its interests and insure its success. With his family he attends the Methodist church. Mr. Pate has long been interested in fraternal work, and is popular among his fellow-members in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World, and the Pretorians.

JAMES C. WHITE. The senior member of the White-Paden Realty Company, with offices in the Morgan building at El Paso, is an aggressive young business man of that city, a native son of El Paso, and his father was the late lamented Captain James H. White, who belonged to that small group of leading citizens whose names and influence were closely identified with El Paso from the very beginning of its importance as a town and business center.

The late Captain James H. White, who died at San Diego, California, in 1908, at the age of sixty, was born in Portsmouth, Virginia, February 15, 1847, of an old colonial and Revolutionary family. Captain White when less than fifteen years of age entered the signal corps service in the Confederate army, and in that interesting and hazardous department of military activity he rendered important service throughout many of the Virginia campaigns, and continued in the army until the surrender of Lee in April, 1865. He was only eighteen years of age when the war ended, and in April, 1866, went out to Missouri and from there to Texas. From Austin he started overland to California with a company of men and a herd of cattle, but the hostility of the Indians drove the company back, so that the trip had to be abandoned. Captain White served for a time as scout in western Kansas under General Sheridan, and early in 1869 became agent for one of the noted stage companies operating through west Texas. He first arrived in El Paso on May 10, 1869, but spent only a year or so in this locality, and permanently returned to the city in 1880, about the time it became a terminus of two railroads. He was on hand when the first trains arrived over the rails of steel, and took a prominent part in the subsequent development and improvement that followed that event. He was elected and served as tax collector and sheriff of El Paso county, and continued to discharge the dual responsibilities of those offices until 1892, when a separate office was created for the sheriff and for the tax collector. For some years he continued as collector, and was also for two years chief of police in El Paso. He was an active supporter of the Democratic interests, and fraternally was affiliated with the Masonic order. His body now rests in Concordia cemetery, in the same neighborhood where the old fort stood when he first came to the city. Captain White married at Las Cruces, New Mexico, Miss Barbara M. Dupper, who was a native of Las Cruces and of an old New Mexico family.

James C. White, the only son of the late Captain White, was born in El Paso, June 20, 1885, and obtained his early education in the public schools of this city. He subsequently completed his education in San Antonio, and at the age of eighteen was ready to take up the serious responsibilities of life. He was first connected with J. P. Paulson, manufacturer of bank fixtures, being salesman and assistant bookkeeper in that firm for three years. His next venture was in the real estate and insurance business on his own account, which he has since continued, with the exception of two years. For one year he served as treasurer and manager of the El Paso Brick Company, and one year was spent in the tax collector's office of El Paso county. Since establishing the White-Paden Realty Company he has been in the way of large and independent success. The company handle many important deals in local realty, and do a great deal of building and improvement before sales, and also operate as a rental agency. Mr. White has done much for his home city through the erection of many private residences and the improvement of vacant lands, especially during the last two years. Recently he took the chief part in organizing the White Building Improvement Company, with paid-up capital of sixty-five thousand dollars, of which he is president and manager and Henry Jerrell secretary and treasurer. This company has already built over sixty homes in El Paso. Mr. White is also secretary of the Orion Mining Company of New Mexico.

In politics he is an active worker in behalf of the Democratic party. His fraternal affiliations are with the benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Masonic lodge, and he is a member of the El Paso Country Club. On December 10, 1912, he married Miss Lela Mueller. Her mother is Mrs. J. T. McCullough of El Paso. Mr. White's beautiful home is at 2915 Bliss street.

JUDGE MICAJAH HUBBARD BONNER. Sixty-six years have passed away since the late Judge Bonner, eminent lawyer and jurist, and citizen of the highest order, came to make the state of Texas his home, and the last eleven years of his life were passed in the city of Tyler. Few men, if indeed any, in this section of the state, left a more brilliant or useful record than did Judge Micajah Hubbard Bonner, and few there have been who so fully enjoyed the absolute confidence and esteem, as well as the hearty good will of the people as did he. Simple, honest and straightforward, his life was an open book in the district and state where he was so long and intimately known, and it is to men of his stanch and dependable type that any community is most indebted for its best growth and advancement.

Born in Greenville, Butler county, Alabama, on January 25, 1828, Micajah Hubbard Bonner was the son of Rev. William Nevel Bonner, a well-known Methodist minister of his time, and Martha (Wade) Bonner, both of them of Georgian birth. The Bonner family is an old and honored one, and concerning the ancestry of the Judge the following brief data are here incorporated: William Nevel Bonner was one of the three sons of Hubbard and Rachel (McGhee) Bonner, the other sons being Henry Hubbard and Reuben McGhee Bonner. The father of these three sons was born in Maryland about the year 1776, and his wife was a daughter of one David McGhee, being born October 2, 1789, and died April 11, 1821, in Jones county, Georgia. These three brothers, one of whom was the father of the immediate subject of this review, as it will be remembered, were the grandsons of William Bonner, who had two brothers—Joseph and James—William being the youngest of the trio. All were farmers. Joseph died in Jones county, Georgia, leaving a large family, and James died in Putnam county, Georgia. The date and place of William's death is not known. William Nevel Bonner, the eldest son of Hubbard and Rachel (McGhee) Bonner, was born at Fort Hawkins, in Hancock county, Georgia, October 1, 1806, and died in Tyler, Texas, on March 28, 1897. He was married in Jones county, Georgia, January 27, 1825, to Martha Ellen Wade, the daughter of Micajah Wade. She was born April 28, 1808, and died February 11, 1853. Her father, Micajah Wade, was born February 8, 1777, in North Carolina. His mother's maiden name was Sarah McCormick, the daughter of James McCormick, who was a soldier of the revolution and fought gallantly for the liberty of the colonies throughout the seven years' struggle. William N. Bonner and Martha Ellen Wade Bonner became the parents of nine children, whose names with date of birth, and the names of those to whom they were married, are given below: Susan Elizabeth, born January 20, 1826; married to James C. Holmes July 14, 1841; died August 7, 1904. Micajah Hubbard, of this review, born at Greenville, Butler county, Alabama, January 25, 1828; married to Elizabeth Patience Taylor at Marshall, Texas, July 15, 1849; died November 28, 1883. Virgil Luther, born January 1, 1831; he never married; he died in Cherokee county, Texas, January 22, 1854. Fitz William, born March 4, 1833; married to Georgie Ann Boaz, January 8, 1861; died at Rusk, Texas, September 17, 1888. Martha Rebecca, born August 20, 1836; married to Judge T. C. Walker January 28, 1858; died at Fairfield, Texas, November 3, 1866. Thomas Rueben, born in Holmes county, Mississippi, September 11, 1838; married to Cynthia A. Madden, November 20, 1855; he died at Tyler, Texas, August 30, 1891, and his wife, Cynthia Ann Bonner, died without issue on February 10, 1884. Thomas R. Bonner contracted a second marriage, marrying Mary Davenport, daughter of Dr. W. J. Davenport, on February 26, 1885. Mary Ann, born October 31, 1839; married to M. G. Pierson, May 22, 1855, and died at Mansfield, Louisiana, July 26, 1856. John Henry, born at Benton, Yazoo county, Mississippi, February 12, 1842; married Lucretia Rebecca Grambling at Vernon, Louisiana, February 8, 1865, and they are the only surviving members of the family. Nancy Augusta, born May 5, 1845; died August 12, 1847. This brief recital of family records will serve in some measure to give an idea of the extent and scope of the Bonner family and fix its status among the older southern houses.

Hubbard Bonner, as the judge was long known to his relatives and friends, accompanied his father's family to Holmes county, Mississippi, in 1836, and his youth, like that of many another who has gained name and fame in the professions, was spent upon the farm. His early education was obtained in the common schools of the country, though his aspiration for further learning prompted him to take full advantage of these limited opportunities to learn, and not only that, but to utilize his spare time from the mixed and arduous labors of the farm to pursue his studies beyond the scope of the country schools. His pronounced ambition was to study law, and his father, recognizing the possibilities within the boy and determined to give him his chance, sent the future judge to LaGrange College, Kentucky, where he took a mixed course in law and literature as a preparation for the legal profession. He was admitted to the bar in 1848 at Lexington, Mississippi, and almost immediately thereafter came into the great and undeveloped West. Early in the year 1849 he literally "hung out his shingle" at Marshall, Texas, over the door of an office that he himself had built of pine logs. The building was a rough and uncouth one, as might be expected, but it served his purpose admirably, and there he did his pioneer work as a lawyer. Although the young man remained as a resident of Marshall but a brief time, it was there that the most memorable incident or event of his whole life occurred—the same being his marriage to Elizabeth Patience Taylor, on July 15, 1849. She was a daughter of that bold pioneer of East Texas, Dr. Job Taylor, who in 1848 added his citizenship to the Lone Star state from Yazoo City, Mississippi.

Soon after their marriage the young couple determined upon a new location, and without a dollar of surplus capital, but rich in energy, hope and love, they enjoyed as a bridal tour a horseback ride from Marshall to Rusk, in Cherokee county, where they located, and where young Bonner applied himself earnestly to the accomplishment of his plans and the achievement of his life's ambition. Again the log cabin became his office, and not alone his office, but his home, and with untiring zeal in his chosen profession, aided by the encouragement and counsel of his heroic young wife, he gave every energy to his work, and soon success began to crown his efforts.

The studious habits and marked ability of the struggling young lawyer attracted the interest of that soldier and statesman, Gov. J. Pinckney Henderson, the first governor of Texas, and who was then regarded as the head of the Texas bar. A partnership was formed between the two which lasted until 1857, the year of Governor Henderson's election to the United States senate. It will not be denied that the kindness shown to young Bonner in those early days of his struggles for place in the profession had a marked effect upon his entire after life, and not alone upon his life, but upon the lives of many a young lawyer, who found himself facing just such a struggle as he had known; for Judge Bonner never forgot the generosity and wholeheartedness that Governor Henderson displayed in his treatment of him in those early days, and afterward, when he was elevated to the bench, he endeavored to show his appreciation to his friend by emulating that trait of consideration for young members of the bar, as a result of which he won for himself the name of "the friend of the young lawyers of Texas." This fact alone is a most eloquent commentary upon the noble nature of Judge Bonner, and further comment thereupon is unnecessary.

His association with Governor Henderson afforded Judge Bonner the opportunity for which his abilities were best adapted, and which his ambition had long aspired to, and he now entered upon the brilliant and successful career which ultimately raised him to the supreme bench of Texas. He practiced his profession alone for some time following the dissolution of his partnership with Gov. Henderson, and then associated himself with his brother, F. W. Bonner, under the firm name of Bonner & Bonner. After the Civil war, Col. T. R. Bonner, another brother, became a member of the firm, which by this time was ranked among the leading law firms in the state.

A brief resume of Judge Bonner's war record would not be amiss at this point. The fact that he was physically incapacitated for service did not appear until he was examined for field service, and, unwilling to have no part in the activities of the times, he devoted his time, his energy and his means to the cause of the South. He equipped and mounted at his own expense several soldiers, some of whom attained distinction in the service. He himself was commissioned Ordnance Officer with the rank of Colonel and placed in command of the gun factory of Whitescarver, Campbell & Company at Rusk, Texas. Later the duties of enrolling officer were added to his department and he was also appointed special counsel of the Confederacy for his congressional district. From the foregoing it will be seen that though Col. Bonner was not in active field service he filled creditably high positions of trust and honor under both the military and civil branches of the Confederate government.

After the war, in which he, with many others of his class, suffered in fortunes to a considerable extent, he resumed his practice and continued his residence in Rusk until 1873 when the bar of the old Seventh Judicial District petitioned for his appointment to the judgeship of the district, although he had not at that time resided therein. He was, accordingly, appointed by the governor, and upon assuming the duties of his office he removed to Tyler, where he passed the remaining years of his life. Governor Coke reappointed him to the same judgeship in 1874, and, upon the judiciary being made elective by the new constitution of 1876, he was elected to the office by the people. In 1878 he was appointed by Governor Hubbard an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Chief Justice Roberts, who had been nominated for governor of Texas. But before he entered upon his duties the Democratic State Convention was held especially to name a candidate for this office, and he was the choice of the body and was elected the following November, upon the same ticket that named his life-long friend, Judge O. M. Roberts, as governor of the state.

Judge Bonner served his state with all faithfulness in this exalted position for four years, earning the love and confidence of the people and the unstinted praise of the bar of Texas for the eminent capacity he displayed as a judge. The greatest and most enduring monument that has been reared to his ability as a judge and to his memory as a citizen was builded by himself in the able and honest opinions rendered by him while he served upon the supreme bench. At the expiration of his term in 1882, owing to failing health and a long cherished purpose to prepare a compendium of the decisions of the court of which he had been a distinguished justice, he declined re-election. The strain upon his physical powers caused by his arduous service upon the bench, however, had sapped his strength to an unsuspected extent, and he lived less than a year after his retirement from the bench, dying after a brief illness on the 28th of November, 1883. His widow and six children survived him and their grief for his untimely end was shared not only by his friends and relatives in Tyler and in Smith county but by the entire populace of Texas. The bar of Texas, especially, who knew well his merits, missed his kindly face and felt beyond expression the loss of his benignant presence.

Judge Bonner was all his life a believer of the stanchest order in the precepts of Democracy, and while his unassuming modesty caused him to rarely appear upon the platform, he was known to be a pleasing orator, though the most effective work he rendered his party was in the wide disseminating of his influence in his own quiet and unmistakable way. It was upon the bench that he ever won his brightest laurels. He was gifted with the power of methodical and accurate dispatch of business and as a district judge the business of his court was ever conducted with the smoothness and uniformity of a well-regulated bit of machinery. His court was the sanctum of dignity and decorum, but he was never a man of austere manners and appearance, his official demeanor, like his social intercourse, being clothed with the graces of Christian culture, rather than those of official dignity and superiority. As a justice of the supreme court Judge Bonner showed in a marked degree the diligence and capacity for patient and laborious research, and his decisions gave evidence of a thorough legal scholar, sparkling with the impress of a clear mind, and upright heart and a pure conscience.

In his private life Judge Bonner was amiable and refined. He regarded politeness and kindly courtesy to be the best implements with which to smooth the pathway of those with whom he came in contact in his daily life, and regarded the practice of these virtues as among his duties to his fellow man. His consideration for others and his services in behalf of those who sought the goal of success endeared him to all, and, as has already been mentioned, he especially became the friend and adviser of young lawyers who were admitted to the bar in his court. He was a fond husband, an indulgent father and a devoted friend. From his youth on he was a devout member of the Methodist Episcopal church and identified himself with the seceding branch of the church from the opening of the Civil war. He not only attained distinction in his profession, but upon his death he bequeathed to his family an ample estate for the comforts and maintenance of those who were dependent upon him. Besides his faithful wife, to whose aid and counsel he ever ascribed whatever of success had crowned his efforts, he left six children, though four others had preceded him in death. One of these, William Hubbard Bonner, had reached man's estate, full of promise and usefulness, when death claimed him. His eldest daughter, Mattie M., married Judge H. M. Whittaker, of Tyler, and died here. Charles T., once a practicing attorney, is now engaged in other pursuits at Tyler. John Thomas, the youngest son, remained a citizen of Tyler until September, 1914, removing then to Waco, and he has taken an active part in the affairs of his town and state. Annie R. is the wife of S. S. McCleendon, now Postmaster of Tyler. Elizabeth married Dr. Charles Adna Smith, formerly of Tyler, but now of Texarkana, and Sunshine is the wife of Dr. Irvin Pope, of Tyler, Texas. Mrs. Bonner passed away January 1, 1904, her death occurring at Tyler.

William D. Haden

John Thomas Bonner was born in Rusk, Texas, on July 12, 1863, and since the age of ten years has been a resident of Tyler until his recent removal to Waco, the year 1873 having marked the removal of the family from Rusk to Tyler. His education came from the public schools and from the University of Virginia. The death of his father prevented a thorough college training such as he had anticipated, and caused him to enter the business field rather than the profession of law. He entered the fire insurance business first, and after a time drifted wholly into the life insurance business, in behalf of the Knights of Pythias fraternity. He has long been a member of that order and is the General Superintendent of the Insurance Department of it for the state of Texas. He is a Past Grand Chancellor and a Past Supreme Representative of the order. In 1891 he became connected with the National Guard of Texas, and retired from it in December, 1910, with the rank of Lieutenant-colonel. He was appointed a member of the Board of Regents of the State University in 1910 by Governor Campbell, and served thus until the end of Campbell's term.

Col. Bonner was married in Victoria, Texas, on April 27, 1887, to Miss Norma Stayton, a daughter of Chief Justice John W. Stayton of the Texas Supreme court. Justice Stayton was a pioneer to Texas from the state of Kentucky, and he married Miss Jennie Weldon, of Paducah, Kentucky. The issue of Colonel and Mrs. Bonner are Norma and John Hubbard Stayton Bonner.

WILLIAM D. HADEN, the largest general contractor of Galveston, was born at Cedar Bayou, Harris County, Texas, August 31, 1866. Mr. Haden's mother, Annie Eliza Haden (Woodall) is a native of Alabama. His father, Richard Haden, was born in Mississippi, but came to Texas prior to the Civil war and began the practice of medicine. He enlisted in the Confederate army, was made captain of the first Texas regiment and later saw much service until he was wounded at the Battle of Shiloh. After the war he again took up the practice of medicine at Cedar Bayou.

Mr. Haden received his early education in the public schools of Cedar Bayou. The necessity of helping in supporting the family cut short his school work. In 1895 he was married to Miss Lucy Lawrence, daughter of S. F. Lawrence of Cedar Bayou. Mr. Lawrence is a stock raiser, one of the oldest settlers of that place, also a veteran of the Civil War. Mr. and Mrs. Haden, with their seven children, Edgar, Edna, Cecil, Lila, Violet, Lucy Deane and Joe Willy, make their home now at 3815 Avenue P. in Galveston, Texas.

Mr. Haden's present splendid business stands in his name alone, the just reward of personal industry and foresight. Earning his first wages as a day laborer in a brickyard, he has won his way up by a persevering devotion to hard work such as is not often seen. With the savings from several years of work as brickyard laborer and boatman, he bought a half interest in the small tug G. S. Rosamond. The purchase of his partner's interest soon made this small tug the first unit in a fleet of vessels now including four tugs, five dredges, more than a score of barges, besides a number of shore derricks.

Despite the sharp contrast between the size of the present fleet and its small beginning, there has been nothing spectacular in its growth. A dredge has been added here, and a tug or barge there, as the needs of an increasing business have demanded.

For a number of years after the purchase of the tug Rosamond, Mr. Haden's chief business consisted of the manufacture and sale of brick made at Cedar Bayou and transported to Galveston by barge. In connection with this he did a general towing business. In 1892 he took up contracting, but it was several years before this line of work began to overshadow all of his other activities.

Among his first large contracts was the furnishing of seventy thousand cubic yards of sand used in the construction of the Galveston sea wall.

Capt. Haden early foresaw the immense possibilities, as a road building and ballasting material, in the almost limitless deposits of oyster shell, commonly called "mudshell," present in the bays and lakes along the Gulf Coast. He was the first to realize that it would be necessary to market this material in large quantities in order to make it attractive for railroad ballast or extensive public road building. During the last few years a great deal of thought has been given to and thousands of dollars invested in the building up and perfecting of a plant adequate to meet the growing demands for a satisfactory material at an attractive price and in large quantities. This plant is now fully equipped to handle from 100,000 to 150,000 cargoes per month. Deliveries can be made from Galveston, Texas City, Seadrift, Port Arthur and Sabine.

How well Capt. Haden has succeeded in developing this industry and in meeting the demands is evidenced by the fact that he has furnished fully seventy-five per cent of the shell used by Galveston, Harris and adjoining counties in building their magnificent systems of roads; also by the fact that he has delivered shell for the ballasting of hundreds of miles of roadbed for the Galveston-Houston Interurban, Beaumont-Port Arthur Interurban, St. L. B. & M., N. O. T. & M., B. S. L. & W., K. C. S., and I. & G. N. Railroads. Looking forward to extensive improvement of rivers and harbors along the Gulf Coast by the Federal Government and by private corporations, Capt. Haden has made recent preparations to handle some of this work. Haden Dredge No. 3, an up-to-date fifteen-inch hydraulic dredge, was constructed in 1912 at a cost of $60,000. Since completion this vessel has been engaged on a government contract which calls for the removal of 3,355,000 cu. yds. of material in securing a twenty-five foot depth of water in the Orange section of the Sabine-Neches Canal.

Faithfulness in the performance of contracts and fair dealing in all relations have characterized Mr. Haden's business transactions, securing for him an enviable reputation and a liberal patronage. Capt. Haden is identified either as member or supporter of several organizations of his home city whose aim is the upbuilding of the city or the development of the highest type of citizenship. Always loyal to his city and justly proud of her growth, he finds great cause for gratification in the fact that through his efforts, largely, the "mudshell" industry has developed to such an extent that it has not only added to his own fortunes but has been of material benefit to his home city, surrounding counties, and, in fact, the entire Gulf Coast country.

WILLIAM S. TODD. Among many distinguished names found in the bench and bar of Texas, none is recalled with more sincere esteem or profound respect than that of Judge William S. Todd, who was one of the early district judges in the state of Texas, and from 1840 until his death during war times one of the most conspicuous figures in public affairs in northeastern Texas. His long judicial activities were marked by unusual learning, exceeding dignity and impartial decisions. When he passed away he left descendants who may justly take pride in finding his life and services worthy to be honored in the history of the state many years after his life was closed.

Of an old and distinguished Virginia family, William Smith Todd was born in a colonial mansion known as "Bowling Green," Caroline county, Virginia, in 1808. The name of his birthplace was subsequently transferred to that of the little village, which is situated about midway between the city of Richmond and that of Washington, D. C. Judge Todd's father was George T. Todd, a leading citizen of Caroline county and owner of a large landed estate and a prominent figure in public affairs. His brother, Judge Thomas Todd, was distinguished as an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, having been appointed by President Thomas Jefferson.

Judge William S. Todd grew up in a home and in an environment typical of the Virginian plantation and aristocratic activities and culture. Private tutors directed the training of his youthful mind, and at the age of twenty in 1828 he became a student in the historic University of Virginia at Charlottesville, an institution founded by President Jefferson. Judge Todd graduated in 1832 as Bachelor of Arts. Among his classmates was Hon. R. M. T. Hunter, and both young men were elected members of the Virginia legislature soon after their graduation, each served two terms, and their friendship continued to be the closest throughout their lives.

In young manhood Judge Todd married Miss Eliza Ann Hudgins, daughter of Thomas Hudgins, a prominent Virginian. Mrs. Todd, who died at Clarksville, Texas, in 1854, at the age of forty-six, was one of four charming sisters who had been prominent as social leaders in Virginia, and she brought to her pioneer home in Texas the social experience and arts which made the Todd household a center of prized hospitality. Of the children born to Judge Todd and wife the two now surviving are Charles S., of Texarkana, and Henry R. of Birmingham, Alabama. George T., also of Texarkana, died January 27, 1913.

In 1840 Judge Todd brought his wife and two children to the Republic of Texas, of which Sam Houston was then president. The little family made its way by a familiar route of emigration in those days up Red river to Bowie county, and located at Boston, the county seat. The two children were George T. and Mary Virginia, and after they established their home in Boston the second son, James C., was born, who subsequently served as a soldier of the Confederacy and died from wounds received in battle.

Judge Todd practiced with rising reputation in Bowie county, and in 1850 was chosen judge of the Eighth Judicial District, which then comprised all of northeastern Texas. The duties of his office were unusually exacting. It was a period when jurisprudence was in its formative state in Texas, it required courage and determination of the highest order to meet impartially the conditions which arose in a court room, and the travel from court to court, usually on horseback, was in itself exceedingly trying to the physical endurance of both judge and lawyer. None but a man of physical strength and integrity of mind and purpose could have given so admirable an administration as did Judge Todd, who was twice re-elected and served on the bench for twelve consecutive years. He finally retired in 1862 on account of impaired health. Soon after his first election he had moved his home to Clarksville, the county seat of Red River county, and in 1856 to Jefferson, the county seat of Marion county, and his death occurred in that city May 20, 1864.

During his active career Judge Todd was regarded as one of the intellectual giants of the Texas bar. His gifts were of no common variety, a man of aristocratic bearing and culture, was genial and kindly in his personal relations, and one of the best examples of the Southern gentleman of the old school. As a jurist he made an unusual record in that few of his decisions were reversed by courts of higher jurisdiction, although reversals were very common in that period of early Texas jurisprudence. In the Twelfth Volume of Texas Reports are found twenty-six cases appealed from his decision to the supreme court, and of these one was dismissed for informality, one was reversed, while the remaining twenty-four were all affirmed. After the Twelfth Volume of Reports the instances in which Judd Todd's decisions were reversed are exceedingly rare.

In view of his achievements and influence in other fields, it was only natural that Judge Todd should manifest a splendid loyalty to both party and state. His best ideal of southern statesmanship was represented in John C. Calhoun. Personally he regretted the conditions that brought about the Civil war, but had the convictions of the true southerner, and was a member of the secession convention in Texas, and after the war began did all he could to further the cause of the Confederacy.

CHARLES S. TODD. In a profession that has been dignified by the character and services of his distinguished father, Charles S. Todd represents a later generation and is regarded as one of the leading lawyers of northeast Texas. His home for a number of years has been in the city of Texarkana.

Charles Smith Todd was born at Clarksville, Red River county, in 1851, and when about five years of age the family moved to Jefferson in Marion county. He attended the school conducted at Jefferson by Professors Draper and Rucker, and in 1867 became a student in Marshall University at Marshall. He was graduated in the class of 1871, had already studied law in the firm of Penn & Todd at Jefferson, the members of which were Major William E. Penn and George S. Todd, the latter another son of the late Judge Todd. In 1872, before he was twenty-one years of age, Mr. Todd was admitted to the bar at Jefferson, his disabilities by reason of his minority having been removed by special act of the legislature. His examination was conducted by Judge David B. Culberson, J. H. Rogers and Major Penn.

Mr. Todd began practice at Jefferson, and was soon marked as one of the rising lawyers of the East Texas bar. In 1878 came his appointment by Gov. O. M. Roberts as district attorney, followed by re-election in 1880 when his opponent was John L. Sheppard. In 1881 Mr. Todd moved to the city of Texarkana and is now one of the oldest attorneys in practice in that city. For a number of years he represented in legal affairs the Cotton Belt Railroad and is now attorney for the Western Union Telegraph Company with jurisdiction over an extensive territory. As a citizen he has been public spirited, but has kept away from official life since the early years of his practice, and votes with the Democratic party and works wholeheartedly for the best interests of Texarkana and Texas. Mr. Todd married Miss Mamie Burke, who was born and reared in Texas, a daughter of Dr. Christopher C. Burke, a physician and surgeon of Texarkana.

EDWARD G. PERRY. Even in a community noted for its successful business men of the younger generation, it is doubtful if many instances can be found of individuals who by their own unaided efforts have risen to such prominence in the business world at such an early period in their career as that which has been attained by Edward G. Perry, member of the leading real estate firm of Perry & Kirkpatrick, of El Paso, president of the Tri-State Motor Company and of the American Lumber and Investment Company, and recognized factor in various large city interests. Although a resident of El Paso only since 1907, he has directed his efforts in such an able manner that he has made his influence felt along various lines of commercial and industrial endeavor, while his standing in public and social circles is equally high.

Mr. Perry was born in Haywood county, Tennessee, April 28, 1885, and is a son of William T. and Alice (McAlpin) Perry. His father, a native of North Carolina, migrated to Tennessee at an early day, locating in the mercantile business at Woodville, but in 1907 came to El Paso, where he passed away in 1911, at the age of sixty-four years, universally respected and esteemed. Mrs. Perry was born in Tennessee, where she was reared, educated and married, and still survives her husband, being a resident of El Paso and fifty-six years of age.

The fourth of his parents' seven children, Edward G. Perry attended the public and high schools of his native place, and on graduating from the latter, in 1903, received his introduction to business life in his father's mercantile establishment. He continued in business with him at Woodville, Tennessee, until 1907, in which year he came West to Texas, locating in El Paso. At that time Mr. Perry established the present real estate business, and in 1912 Mr. J. W. Kirkpatrick was admitted into partnership, since which time the firm style has been Perry & Kirkpatrick. It is known as one of the most progressive real estate enterprises of the Southwest, making a specialty of additions and home building, and its business has enjoyed a healthy and continuous growth. Mr. Perry has for some time been president of the Tri-State Motor Company, agents for the Ford and Lozier automobiles and Wichita trucks and of the American Lumber & Investment Company, which handles all manner of building supplies. While enterprising in projecting his business plans, he has been prudent and conservative in conducting them, and his associates have learned to have the utmost confidence in his judgment. The greater part of his time has been devoted to his large interests, yet he has not been indifferent to the social amenities, and belongs to the Country and Automobile Clubs, the Masonic Blue Lodge and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He is also a thirty-second degree Scottish Rite Mason and a member of Maidai Shrine at El Paso. Fond of out-of-door life, when time can be spared from his arduous business duties, he takes trips to the country, enjoying the beauties of the country which he believes will some day be one of the leading sections of the Union. He is a Democrat in politics, but not a politician, and his religious connection is with the Methodist Episcopal church. His numerous friends in all walks of life testify to his general popularity.

On December 29, 1910, Mr. Perry was united in marriage with Miss Vandelia Kirkpatrick, of Ripley, Tennessee, daughter of J. W. and Virginia Kirkpatrick, the latter deceased. To this union there has come one son: Edward Gordon, Jr., born at El Paso, September 29, 1912.

EDWIN A. ATLEE. The subject of this sketch is the senior member of the law firm of Atlee & Smith, one of the leading law firms of Laredo, Texas. He is a native of the Lone Star state, having been born at Corpus Christi, Texas, in 1878, a son of the late Edwin Augustus Atlee and his wife, who before her marriage was Miss Bettie Foster, daughter of Captain Sam T. Foster, mention of whom is made elsewhere in this work. Edwin Augustus Atlee was born at Athens, McMinn county, Tennessee, in 1846. He received a classical education in his home town and for several years taught his favorite branches, Latin and Greek. In 1873 he removed to Texas and located at Corpus Christi, where he completed his legal studies and was admitted the bar in 1874. During the next five years he held the office of county attorney for Nueces county. In 1879 he became a resident of Laredo, where the following year he formed a partnership with Hon. Albert L. McLane, who later was elected district judge, who is now president of the Laredo Water Works Company. This association lasted for about sixteen years. Mr. Atlee served as mayor of Laredo for about seven years, but his most important public services were as a member of the Texas legislature, both in the lower house and the senate. He was first elected a member of the house in the Nineteenth session of the general assembly and was reelected to the Twentieth. In the Twenty-first session he represented his district in the state senate, and was reelected to the following legislature, his term expiring in 1892. While in the senate he was chairman of the committee on frontier protection, and took an active part in the discussion of important measures which came before that body. Independent in thought and action, never in any way courted public favor or personal popularity, he was a man of commanding influence among his colleagues and left the impress of his character upon the legislation of Texas. He was a strong advocate of the agricultural and industrial development of the state, and as a means to that end he favored a liberal policy to encourage the building of railroads. Mr. Atlee was recognized as one of the prominent lawyers of Texas. Much of his practice was in connection with land titles in southwest Texas, on which subject he was regarded as an authority, especially in the matter of adjusting and explaining some of the old Spanish land grants. Among the most important claims of this character that he established in the courts was that relating to the old Borrego grant, involving the validity of the title to the land upon which the city of Laredo is situated. He was a convincing and forceful speaker, and every case entrusted to his care was made the subject of painstaking study and investigation. He died at Rochester, Minnesota, January 5, 1910, following a surgical operation that was performed upon him there, and was buried at Chattanooga, Tennessee. His widow and two sons survive him. The sons are Edwin A., who succeeded his father in the practice of law, and Tom G., a civil engineer, located at Alice, Texas.

vol. V—23

Edwin A. Atlee, the son, was educated in the local schools at the University of Texas, where he graduated as a member of the class of 1896. In 1902 he was admitted to the bar in Laredo and was in partnership with his father until the latter's death as above noted. In 1911 the firm of Atlee & Smith was formed, Asher R. Smith at that time becoming the junior member. Mr. Atlee inherited from his illustrious father much of his taste and talent for the law, and under his careful guidance has firmly established himself in the fundamental principles of that noble profession. When the Spanish-American war was declared in the spring of 1898, he enlisted in the United States volunteer service and was made sergeant of Troop K, First Texas Cavalry. He is a member of Laredo Lodge, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and manifests his interest in the material welfare of his city by membership in the Laredo Board of Trade.

COL. WILLIAM PENDLETON GAINES. There are few families in Texas that are more widely and favorably known than that of Gaines. Its members have been men of prominence in civic and military life, in the professions and in business, brave, public-spirited and upright men and courageous, cultured and refined women, who have borne nobly their part in the upbuilding and advancement of the Great Lone Star State. It is the purpose of this article to sketch the careers of two of this family's worthiest representatives, the late Col. W. B. P. Gaines, well known throughout the South as a large and successful ante-bellum planter, a Mexican War veteran and a soldier of the Lost Cause; and his only surviving son, Col. William Pendleton Gaines, lawyer, newspaper man and successful land dealer, than whom there is no more highly respected resident in Austin.

Col. William Baxter Pendleton Gaines was a native of Abbeville district, South Carolina, and was born September 17, 1808. He was the son of Benjamin Pendleton Gaines, a native of Virginia, who distinguished himself in the War of 1812 as a surgeon and physician and died while in the service and whose high attainments in medical and surgical science gave him a wide celebrity. The mother of Colonel Gaines was Elizabeth Ware, also a native of Abbeville district, South Carolina, and a sister of Major N. A. Ware, of Mississippi, at one time an owner of extensive tracts of Texas land and well known in this state during the earlier days. Colonel Gaines was reared in Abbeville district and Lawrence until his sixteenth year and was trained to habits of industry and morality by a careful and loving mother. In 1826 he accompanied his mother and brother, Edmund Pollard Gaines, to Marengo county, Alabama, where he taught a private school for several years. In 1832 he embarked in business as a merchant at Demop-olia, Alabama. This he conducted successfully until 1835, when he went to Texas in the interest of himself and several Baltimore and Mobile associates who had invested with him in Texas lands. He left Alabama in July, 1835, and arrived at Nacogdoches, Texas, on the 6th of August following, making the trip in a private conveyance. At Nacogdoches he met Gens. Rusk, Logan, Houston and others to whom he had letters of introduction. Nacogdoches was made his headquarters during his operations in the interests which took him to Texas. In October, 1835, Texas was invaded by the Mexicans under Gen. Cos, and active preparations were at once begun to meet and repel the invaders. Accordingly, General Thos. J. Rusk, whose talent and ability were well known and who was recognized as the leading man of the time; was empowered to raise a company of 100 men; for the purpose of equipping this command, Colonel Gaines and others furnished him liberally with money. The destination of the troops was San Antonio, which place had already fallen into the hands of the Mexican invaders under General Cos. Of this company Colonel Gaines was appointed commissary and quartermaster. They arrived in San Antonio on the morning after the battle of Concepcion, which occurred on the 28th of October, 1835.

Stephen F. Austin was present in command of a goodly number of men, but there was dissatisfaction pervading the ranks, for Austin, being a civilian and inexperienced in war, failed to inspire confidence in his ability as a commander. He at once offered to resign and it was determined to reorganize the army. Pending the choice of a successor to Austin many of the men returned to their homes and the army was well nigh broken up. On the 28th of November, Colonel Austin sent in his resignation and the volunteers who had remained faithful at once elected Edward Burleson to succeed him as the commander. In the meantime, Colonel Gaines had been appointed Deputy Paymaster General under General Logan and at the suggestion of General Rusk, returned with General Logan to Nacogdoches to prepare further for the campaign as a long struggle with Mexico was anticipated. He accompanied General Logan from Nacogdoches to New Orleans and after transacting important public business started on the return trip to Texas, but General Logan falling sick en route stopped at Natchitoches, Louisiana, where he died. At this point Colonel Gaines fell in with Gen. John A. Quitman, an old friend from Natchez, Mississippi, then on his way to Texas in command of Mississippi troops and joining him, conducted the expedition to Nacogdoches. Here they found General Mason stationed with power from General Houston, commander-in-chief, to stop troops enough to protect families who were fleeing from the Mexicans and Indians. After a few days detention they marched on and joined General Houston after the battle of San Jacinto had been fought, April 21st, 1836. Colonel Gaines was then promoted by appointment to the rank of Paymaster General of the Texas army. This position he held from the 3rd of May to the 3rd of August, 1836, about the close of hostilities, under Gen. T. J. Rusk, who was commander-in-chief of the Texas army while General Houston was under treatment in New Orleans for wounds received in the battle of San Jacinto.

Upon leaving the army Colonel Gaines settled in Galveston and read law under the instruction of John B. Jones and Judge Waters, and in 1840 was admitted to the bar. In 1842 having acquired a large number of negroes, he settled in Brazoria county, and engaged in cotton and sugar planting until 1868. That year he leased his plantation and for several years engaged in buying and selling cotton at Calvert, Galveston and other points. In September, 1873, he retired from active business and settled in Austin, where he resided until his death, May 19th, 1891, with his son, Col. William P. Gaines.

In the war between the United States and Mexico in 1846, Colonel Gaines served with distinction as an officer in Col. Jack Hays' regiment of volunteers under Gen. Zachary Taylor, participating in several of the famous battles of that struggle. His gallantry at the four days' fighting at Monterey attracted attention and was recognized by Brigadier-General Worth, who, in commemoration thereof, presented him with a handsome sword. When his term of enlistment expired, he returned to his plantation in Brazoria county. In 1855-56 he was elected to the Legislature to represent Brazoria and Fort Bend counties in the lower house and was recognized as one of the leading men of that session, taking an active and prominent part in all discussions and questions of legislation coming before that body. In politics, Colonel Gaines was always a firm and consistent Democrat of the Calhoun school. The political teachings of that profound and sagacious statesman early impressed him as being eminently correct and the principles he enunciated were ever held by Colonel Gaines as the true exposition of what a republican government should be. When Texas seceded from the Union on the 23rd of February, 1861, and cast her lot with the Confederate States of America, Colonel Gaines, although beyond the age for military duty, tendered his services to his state and at an election held in the counties of Brazoria and Fort Bend on August 31, 1861, he was elected colonel of the Second Regiment, Sixteenth Brigade, Texas Militia, and on the 18th day of September following was commissioned as such by Gov. Edward Clark. He had great faith in the cause of the South and not only rendered valuable personal services to the army but contributed largely in money and cotton to the funds required for war purposes. His services, his home, his private means were all at the disposal of the Confederate cause and were freely used. He was a large planter and slaveholder and like all others of that class in the South his loss as the result of the war was very great. The accumulations of years were swept away and he was compelled to begin life anew.

In 1850 Colonel Gaines was married to Miss Eugenia Gratia Harris, of Charlotte, North Carolina, and from this marriage there were five children: William Pendleton, Celeste, Percy Orville, Aimee and Beauregard Percy. Mrs. Gaines was a beautiful and accomplished woman, a daughter of Jonathan Harris and a granddaughter of James Harris, a colonel in the Revolutionary War, a firm patriot and one of the framers and signers of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence; and, on her mother's side, a great-granddaughter of Colonel Adam Alexander, also an officer of the Revolution, chairman and a leading spirit in the Mecklenburg convention and a signer of the famous declaration. She died in December, 1867. Colonel Gaines for forty years or more was a consistent member of the Presbyterian church; was a man of indomitable will and energy, and of strictest honor and integrity and in his character were combined all the elements of the true gentleman. His funeral took place from the home of his son, Col. W. P. Gaines, in Austin and was attended by many former friends and associates. Rev. E. B. Wright, of the Presbyterian church, performed the ceremonies at the residence and concluded them at the grave. When the last clod of earth had been laid, the grave of an honored man and veteran of three wars was covered with chaplets and floral tributes by those who had known and admired him in life.

The Austin Daily Statesman, of May 20, 1891, said: "With the demise of Colonel Gaines there passes away one of the links between the Old and the New South—a typical Southern gentleman of antebellum days, a true type of Southern chivalry; a man whose purse was always open to the weak and oppressed and whose strong arm was ever ready to defend them against wrong and oppression—who was ever ready to lay upon the altar of his country's liberty his fortune and his life if need be."

and whose voice and influence were ever active in the advocacy of pure and honest government." The same paper said editorially: "In the death of Col. W. B. P. Gaines there has been broken another link binding the present generation with that which looms up from a sublime past—the generation that made the South glorious and powerful before the war and conducted one of the most gigantic conflicts of history. Few men have been as many stupendous changes in government and in the history of the country as did Colonel Gaines. One of the most prominent and distinguished actors in the struggle of Texas against Mexico his sympathies were always on the side of the oppressed and it was with such eminent patriotism that he engaged in that other struggle, more Titanic, where Colonel Gaines was fated to see the cause he loved so well go down in the shadows of Appomattox. In the Mexican War of 1846, on the historic field of Monterey, Colonel Gaines showed that lofty courage, manhood and gallantry that won him the distinction of being presented by General Worth with a handsome sword as a memento of that commander's appreciation. 'After life's fitful fever, he sleeps well.' He has gone the way that all must travel. But he has left a name and a record, honorable, above reproach, unullied."

William Pendleton Gaines, the only surviving son of Col. William Baxter Gaines, was born in Brazoria county, Texas, November 20, 1851. He was given excellent educational advantages, preparing for college under a private tutor, the Rev. W. C. Somerville, a graduate of Princeton, and in January, 1869, entered Lafayette College, at Easton, Pennsylvania, there taking a classical course. He was graduated in June, 1872, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and in 1875 the degree of Master of Arts was conferred upon him by his alma mater. On completing his collegiate education Mr. Gaines returned to his home in Texas and having chosen the profession of law, for which his studies eminently fitted him, he began a systematic course of reading. He was subsequently examined, and in October, 1873, was admitted to the bar at Austin. He then engaged actively in the practice of his profession until 1882, when he purchased the Austin Daily Statesman and became editor and proprietor of that paper, positions which he filled up to 1890. In that year a stock company was formed and the Statesman was transferred to it, Colonel Gaines retiring from active connection with the paper, although retaining a considerable interest in it and becoming one of the directors of the new company.

Colonel Gaines is a man of extensive information and progressive ideas and in all movements to advance the social, moral and political welfare of the state he has been prominent and active. He has never held office, nor has he been a candidate for any office, elective or appointive. He has always, however, taken an interest in the volunteer military service of the state of Texas, and the effort to organize and build up a creditable militia has had his hearty co-operation. In April, 1883, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel and assistant adjutant-general of the First Brigade, and December, 1886, was made colonel and assistant adjutant-general of the First Division of the Texas Volunteer Guard. These positions, however, he resigned in September, 1889.

Colonel Gaines has his home in Austin, and maintains business offices at 605-6 Scarbrough Building, his attention being devoted to farming and operating on lands. In social intercourse he is somewhat reserved and quiet, except with his more intimate friends; he is strong and loyal in his attachments to his friends and is an upright, conscientious and honorable man and useful citizen. He is married and has two children.

ANDREW H. EVANS, M. D. The record of Dr. Andrew H. Evans needs no introduction to the citizens of Eagle

Pass, for during the past thirty years he has been closely identified with the professional, business and public interests of the city, and by his strict personal integrity and honorable dealings, combined with brilliant financial and professional qualifications, has become a leading figure in the medical profession and a prominent factor in the commercial and public life of the city, where he has served as collector of customs since March, 1913. Dr. Evans was born at High Grove, Nelson county, Kentucky, March 12, 1856, and there resided until his twenty-eighth year, since which time he has resided in Eagle Pass.

The early education of Dr. Evans was secured in the public schools, following which he became a teacher, and for one year continued to instruct the young in his native state. Desiring to further his own education, he took an academic course at Bardstown, Kentucky, after leaving which he became a student in the Louisville Medical University. On receiving his diploma and degree, in February, 1880, Dr. Evans entered upon the practice of his profession in his old home town of High Grove, but after three years went to New York and took a post-graduate course in medicine at Bellevue Hospital Medical College. Subsequently he returned home and after a short visit came to Eagle Pass and opened offices. Here he has continued in practice to the present time, and has met with much more than ordinary success, his high attainments having won recognition and appreciation. He is local surgeon for the Southern Pacific Railway Company, and is a valued member of the American Medical Association, the Texas State Medical Society and the Maverick County Medical Society, contributing at various times by voice and pen to the advancement and development of these organizations. He has ever been a close and careful student, owns an excellent medical library, and has well-appointed and well-equipped offices. Among his fellow-practitioners he is known as a strict observer of the unwritten ethics of the profession.

Dr. Evans was married (first) in the town of High Grove, Kentucky, to Miss Mattie E. Harris, who died in 1886, in the faith of the Baptist church and is buried in Kentucky. One daughter was born to this union: Mattie, who died at the age of two years. Dr. Evans' second marriage occurred at Corpus Christi, Texas, in 1900, when he was united in marriage with Miss Lulu Burke, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. T. S. Burke, of that place. Three daughters and one son have been born to this union: Lulu Somerville, who is deceased; Elsie Lee; Florence Elizabeth and Andrew Hugh, Jr.

Dr. Evans belongs to the Episcopal church, in which he is serving as vestryman. He has ever shown a commendable interest in the work of education, and for twenty years was a member of the school board, and during eight years was the president of that body. A Democrat in his political views, he has been an active and faithful worker in the ranks of his party, and in March, 1913, was appointed by President Wilson to the office of collector of customs. Dr. Evans has been active in business and financial circles and is president of the State Bank and Trust Company and the P. D. & E. P. Bridge Company, and a director in the First National Bank. He has taken the Scottish Rite degrees in Masonry and is a Shriner. He is fond of hunting and fishing and takes occasional trips into the country, from which he seldom returns without some excellent specimens of the furry or finny tribes. It is his opinion that the State of Texas is the greatest in the Union and offers more and better opportunities for the progressive and ambitious young man than many of the older settled States. His opinion in this matter should carry much weight, for his own experience has been crowned with such success as comes to few men. Honored in his calling and as a citizen, regarded as worthy of trust by his government, with hosts of admiring friends, Dr. Evans need have no regrets for the locality which he chose in young manhood as his scene of endeavor, nor need he feel ashamed of his record either in public or private life.

WILLIAM DAVID MAYFIELD. The Mayfields came to this country from Ireland and were among the early settlers. John Mayfield married Rebecca Armitage in 1666. (New England Genealogy, Vol. 5, 339.) For more than an hundred years they took part in defending the settlers against the Indians and French. John Stanwix, a British soldier, promoted from time to time until made brigadier general, built two forts for defense. One of these forts was completed in 1758 which was called Fort Stanwix in honor of his name. John Mayfield and Samuel McJunkin, a Scotchman, served as privates under General Stanwix at this fort. John married Mary, the daughter of Gen. Stanwix, and Samuel married Sarah Bogan, the daughter of another officer of the fort. John and Samuel came south with their wives and settled in the northern portion of South Carolina. Here they lived and reared their children, aiding in defending against the Cherokee Indians, many of whom lived in what was then known as Cherokee Territory. On the outbreak of the Revolutionary war they both took the side of the colonists and with their sons, old enough, went to war. All of them were in the battle at King's Mountain, North Carolina. John had attained the rank of captain, Samuel that of colonel, and Samuel's son Samuel that of captain. John and Mary (Stanwix) were the parents of John, Abraham, Elijah, Isaac, Micajah, Jesse and Stephen. From this source Texas has many descendants.

Jesse, the son of John and Mary (Stanwix) Mayfield, married Penelope Brumett, of French descent, and settled on Saluda river, now Greenville county, South Carolina, there reared their children, but removed to McMinn county, Tennessee, about 1820, settling near Athens. Some of their children married in South Carolina, others in Tennessee. They were the parents of Jesse, Pearson, William, Carter, Thomas Brumett, Williams, Presbia, Hulda and Elizabeth. From this source Texas has many descendants; Williams, who married Narsissa Hoyle of Tennessee, removing his entire family to Texas in the winter of 1874, settling near Alvarado. Pearson married Nancy McJunkin of South Carolina, daughter of Captain Samuel McJunkin, settled on the Saluda river, Greenville county, South Carolina, there reared most of his children, later removed to Polk county, Tennessee, settled on Conasauga creek near the south line of McMinn county. They were the parents of Jesse, Samuel, John, William, James, Thomas, Stanwix and Pearson Brumett. Jesse and Samuel settled in east Texas, married and reared children. Thomas and James married in South Carolina, removed to Rusk county, Texas, settled and reared their children. John married Mary Cobb, daughter of Joseph, purchased the Mayfield homestead and there reared his children. Pearson Brumett married Caroline McConnell of Benton, Tennessee, settled in Cleveland, Tennessee, practiced law and reared his children. Stanwix married Lou Rice of, or near, Riceville, Tennessee, moved to Arkansas, settled at Pea Ridge and reared his children. On his farm the Pea Ridge battle of the Civil war was fought. William married Lillian Blythe, daughter of David, of Greenville county, South Carolina, of English descent. They were the parents of Mary Melissa (Mrs. W. S. Birge), of Austin, Texas; William David of El Paso, Texas; Stanwix Greenville of Denmark, South Carolina, who married Leda Kennerly of that place, was county senator for sixteen years and chairman of the senate Judiciary Committee; Catherin (Mrs. W. M. Ponder), of Dacusville, South Carolina; George Rolls of Marietta, South Carolina, who owns and lives on the old maternal, or Blythe, homestead; John, of Selsa, Oklahoma, and Adelia Caroline (Mrs. J. H. Martin), of Brownwood, Texas.

In South Carolina, Tennessee and Texas, the Mayfield name has been synonymous for generations with thorough business and ability and high capacity citizenship. One of the strongest business firms in El Paso, Texas, is the Mayfield Building and Improvement Company. This company was organized and incorporated under the laws of Texas, April, 1913, with paid up capital of $150,000.00. It is successor to the Mayfield Realty Company, established in 1905 by William David Mayfield for himself and two sons, James Davis and Thomas Moore Mayfield. Upon the reorganization William David retired, James Davis being made Fiscal Agent and Thomas Moore Secretary and Treasurer of the new company, which position they now hold. This company has done much to make El Paso a great city.

William David Mayfield is a son of William and Lillian (Blythe); a son of Pearson and Nancy (McJunkin); a son of Jesse and Penelope (Brumett); son of John and Mary (Stanwix), a soldier of the Revolutionary war. Mr. Mayfield was born in Polk county, Tennessee, near Benton, June 22, 1854. Both parents were South Carolina born. The family goes back directly to the very earliest settlers. One of the forefathers of the El Paso real estate man had the honor of being one of the first grantees of land and estate in South Carolina for military service rendered in fighting Indians and in the Revolutionary war. See —(S. C. Rep, 9Qt; 164, Vol. 4, 424, D. A. R.). Pearson and Nancy (McJunkin), the grandparents of Mr. Mayfield, at an early day moved across the mountains from South Carolina and established a pioneer home on Conasauga creek, Polk county, Tennessee, near the south line of McMinn county, where his children were reared and educated. The late William Mayfield, the father, subsequently returned to South Carolina, where he married Lillian Blythe, daughter of David Blythe and brought his bride over the mountains to Tennessee, established his home near Benton, Polk county, in 1848, where they remained, reared and educated their children, until 1870, when they returned to South Carolina and took up residence on the old Blythe homestead.

Four brothers of William Mayfield, Jesse, Samuel, James and Thomas, came to east Texas, and all became prominent in the parts of the state in which they settled. Alison Mayfield, a son of James, of Rusk county in particular, is known from one end of the state to the other as one of the Texas railway commissioners, being Chairman, and as one of the strongest men in the public life of the state. He was formerly secretary of state. John Blythe Mayfield is a son of Thomas and Melissa (Blythe), daughter of David Blythe of South Carolina. He is a resident of Tyler, Texas, is also prominent, and his son, Earle Blythe Mayfield, is also a railroad commissioner.

William Mayfield, the father of the El Paso business man, spent all his life as a farmer, and continued to reside in Tennessee until 1870, when he and his wife returned to South Carolina to make their home upon the old maternal homestead, and there the father passed away in 1896, at the age of eighty-one. The mother also died in the old South Carolina home where she was born, at the age of seventy-nine years. During the Civil war William Mayfield had given much valuable service to the Confederate cause by supplying the troops with provisions. With his brother John and others he managed a large slaughtering house at Athens, Tennessee, in order to provide meat for the Confederate army. In the family of William and Lillian (Blythe) Mayfield there were eleven children, six sons and five daughters. Two daughters and a son died in infancy. William David was the oldest son and second in order of birth.

Mr. Mayfield spent his early years in Tennessee, attended first the public schools and then Cane Creek Academy. Subsequently he was a student in Hiwassee College, Monroe county, Tennessee, where he graduated.

J. B. Ross

ated in 1874. Immediately on leaving college he entered a store in McMinn county, and had one year of valuable mercantile experience. He then turned his talents to teaching, and while pursuing that useful vocation studied law under his uncle, Judge P. B. Mayfield, of Cleveland, Tennessee. In 1877 he went to South Carolina, where his parents were then residing, and continued reading law and teaching school. In 1878 he was honored by election to the office of county superintendent of education in Greenville county, South Carolina. His ability as an educator was appreciated, and he was retained in the office for ten years. In 1880 he was admitted to the bar, and while county superintendent of education was also engaged in the practice of law, being a member of the law firm of Blythe, Mayfield & Williams at Greenville, South Carolina. He continued in practice in that city until 1890. Along with a successful practice as a lawyer he was also prominent in local politics and participated in many of the keen political struggles of that time. In 1890 he was elected state superintendent of education, and was re-elected for three terms of two years each, thus giving eight years of service to the office which controlled and supervised the entire educational system of the state. In 1891 Mr. Mayfield took up his residence in Columbia, South Carolina, and for eight years devoted his time and talents to the promotion of the cause of education in South Carolina, after which he engaged in the practice of law at Columbia, that state, and there remained until February, 1905. The latter date was the time of his removal to El Paso, Texas, where he established the Mayfield Realty Company. As a real estate man he is much more than a broker, and has given his personal resources to the development and improvement of a large amount of city property in this vicinity. The offices of his real estate company are in the First National Bank Building.

Fraternally Mr. Mayfield is affiliated with the Masonic order, in politics is a Democrat, and is an active member of the Baptist church. He was married November 7, 1882, to Miss Carrie Bonds. Their marriage was celebrated in Columbia, South Carolina. Mrs. Mayfield is a daughter of the late John Bonds, of Baldwin, Mississippi, formerly of Newberry county, South Carolina, the maiden name of whose wife was Fannie Hatton. The four children of Mr. and Mrs. Mayfield are as follows: James Davis, who was born in Greenville, South Carolina, in April, 1884. He is a graduate of the South Carolina University, and is now Fiscal Agent of the Mayfield Building and Improvement Company. He married Miss Grace Ellis, of El Paso. Thomas Moore Mayfield, born at Greenville, December 4, 1886, is a graduate of the University of South Carolina, and is Secretary and Treasurer of the Mayfield Building and Improvement Company. Frances Blythe Mayfield, born July 5, 1892, at Columbia, South Carolina, is a graduate of the El Paso High school. She resides with her parents. William David Mayfield, born December 30, 1890, at Columbia, South Carolina, is now attending school in El Paso.

JUDGE JOHN B. ROSS. The present county judge and ex-officio superintendent of county schools of Terrell county, Judge Ross, is one of the citizens of this county whose long residence, success in business and profession and high personal character have entitled him to the best distinctions in public life. Judge Ross is one of the old-timers of southwest Texas, and has had a long and varied career as merchant, as school teacher, as county official and in the practice of law.

John B. Ross was born in Colbert county, Alabama, on October 29, 1849, and attained his early education in the private and public schools of Alabama. On leaving school he engaged in farm work, having been reared on a farm, and continued in that line until he was about twenty-six years of age, when he moved to Texas. In seeking a location in this state, about 1876, he moved out to what was then the southwestern frontier in Uvalde county, where he spent two years. His chief occupation while there was as a school teacher, and from Uvalde county he moved into Frio county, where he was connected with mercantile business for a couple of years. He then spent four years in the cattle industry in what was organized as Zavalla county during his residence there. Being one of the popular citizens of that district, at the first county election he was chosen to the office of county and district clerk, and remained at the court house and discharged the duties of that position for seventeen years, his name and official career having a permanent place in the county annals of Zavalla county. While acting as clerk he studied law, was admitted to the bar and on finally retiring from office he engaged in practice up to 1905. In that year he moved to Terrell county, where he continued the practice of law at Sanderson, and had a good business in his profession until the fall of 1910 when he was elected to his present office as county judge, and by virtue of that office also has responsibility of superintending the schools of Terrell county.

In November, 1875, Judge Ross was married in Colbert county, Alabama, to Miss Jennie L. Downs, a daughter of Isaac M. Downs of Colbert county, Alabama. Eight children have been born to their marriage, five daughters and three sons, four of whom have passed away. The living children are Daisie, the wife of P. F. Martin, of Crystal City, Texas; Sallie Blanche, wife of C. W. Martin, also residents of Crystal City; Jacques Lou, wife of C. F. Burling, of Sanderson; and Tina, who is the baby of the family and remains at home with her parents. Judge Ross and wife are members of the Church of Christ, but religiously is broad-minded in his faith and belief, and supports all denominations which are working for the welfare of humanity. Fraternally he is a member of the Woodmen of the World, and belongs to the Sanderson Commercial Club. He has long been considered one of the active party-fighters for the Democratic cause, and gives his influence in both local and state politics. As a diversion from his regular duties, Judge Ross enjoys nothing better than a good baseball game, and in fact is fond of all the social amusements and outdoor entertainments. Judge Ross in addition to looking after his official business deals in real estate and does a considerable volume of transactions each year.

JOE M. HANCOCK has advanced rapidly in the real estate business since he first became identified with that line in Hillsboro, and his progress has come because of his splendid energy and the quality of stick-to-it-iveness, to use a homely but expressive phrase, the which, as an attribute of character, is worth infinitely more to its possessor than more material assets without it. Mr. Hancock has flitted from one berth to another, not in any sense as an idler, but always using one position as a stepping stone to another and better one, until the time came when he felt himself sufficiently experienced to enable him to launch and navigate a business enterprise of his own. His success since he began in 1912 has been altogether a praiseworthy one, and one that places him in the ranks of the rising young men of the city of Hillsboro.

Joe M. Hancock was born in Mexico, Limestone county, Texas, on December 4, 1881, and he is a son of Benjamin F. and Anna J. (Smith) Hancock. The father was born in Limestone county in 1861, and is now the proprietor of a cotton gin at Munger, where he has been established for the past twelve years. He was formerly a ranchman of some prominence in his native county, but gave up that business to interest himself in the enterprise with which he is now connected. The mother was born in Arkansas in 1858, and to her and her husband were born six children. They are Joe M., of this review; Ernest J., Maude E., Jessie, Walter B. and Anna R.

Joe M. Hancock had his education in Mexia, where he attended school up to the age of fifteen years. He then worked on his father's ranch until 1903, when he determined to get into business, and accordingly began a course of study in a commercial school at Tyler, Texas. He finished a well rounded business course there and then became a clerk in a real estate and loan business at a small salary. He remained in that post for three years, in the meantime letting nothing in the way of system and management in the business escape his watchful eye. His next position was as clerk and stenographer in the office of the superintendent of the M. K. & T. R. R., where he continued for eight months, and then became clerk for Judge G. F. Tarlton for the space of five years. He had a goodly training there and in 1912 he embarked on an independent enterprise as the proprietor of a real estate and investment business. Already he has accomplished much in his realty business, and takes his place among the foremost real estate men of the city.

That Mr. Hancock has shown unusual aptitude in his business enterprise is a fact that is readily conceded by all who have watched his steady and prosperous rise in the field of real estate. A local paper, in writing of him under the very significant caption "Too Big For a Salary," succinctly and familiarly speaks of the man as he is, and it is considered appropriate and consistent with the spirit of this work to quote freely and at some length from that article at this point. The article follows: "Thirty dollars a month and board yourself doesn't look very big to anybody except a newspaper man, yet there are people who get less. I know a young man in Hillsboro who was working for a real estate concern here ten years ago at such a salary. You may judge the sort of man he is when I tell you that his salary went to forty, fifty, sixty-five, seventy-five and on up to one hundred and twenty-five dollars. At the $125 point he gained a partnership in the concern which employed him. And all the time he was saving money and buying property. He had been in all the branches, —bookkeeper, stenographer, and general office man, and he knew the business thoroughly.

"About a year ago this man entered business on his own account. The same forward stepping marked his own business, as that which formerly marked his own efforts in behalf of his employers.

"I was up in his office yesterday. I guess I didn't mention it, but his name is Joe M. Hancock, and I sized him up about like this: He is going to be pretty certain about what he goes into,—most accountants are that way; he doesn't take a whole lot of time in which to see the business point of a bargain; he is square and he knows that a dollar is worth a hundred cents. He is a business man pure and simple, and I believe he is a safe man to deal with; that one could feel sure that square treatment would be accorded in any dealings one had with him.

"Upstairs over the Hill County State Bank is his office, and if you chance to call on him you won't have any trouble in verifying the things I have said of him. You will find him selling something, but you can wait, and he makes a friend of everybody he has dealings with."

Mr. Hancock has introduced the most up-to-date and systematic methods into his business dealings, and his activities extend through the entire county, as a result of his aggressive and progressive manner of procedure. He is interested in the B. B. Cochrane Oil Company of Hillsboro, and he owns a nice home in the city, together with other properties in Fort Worth and in other parts of the state.

Mr. Hancock is an active Democrat, a member of the Hillsboro Methodist church and of the Hillsboro Booster's Club. He is the teacher of a class of boys in the Sunday school, and his influence in general is of an elevating nature in the community.

On September 8, 1907, Mr. Hancock married Miss Ethel Perkins, a daughter of J. E. Perkins of West Hill county, and to them have been born two children.—David T. and Mary E. Hancock.

The brothers and sisters of Mr. Hancock are briefly mentioned as follows: Ernest J., who married Iva Scott. He is a farmer, and they have three children.

Maude E. married C. Duke, a farming man, and they have three children.

Walter B. married Buene Ratcliff, and he too is engaged in farming activities.

Anna R. is unmarried and lives at home in Mungo with her parents.

Mr. Hancock is a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Woodmen of the World and the Modern Woodmen of America, in all of which he is prominent and popular.

MILTON B. CHASTAIN. The public service in county and local government in this state has no better representative with equipment of special qualification than the present sheriff of Presidio county, Milton B. Chastain. Mr. Chastain is a cattleman, one who has experienced in this section of the state from the old days of the open range, and has experienced all the ups and downs and vicissitudes and prosperity of the cattle industry during the last thirty years in Texas.

Along with successful accomplishment in business he is possessed of a peculiar skill in handling men and has always enjoyed the high esteem of his fellow cattlemen and citizens generally. He is a man of thorough tact and possesses that quiet courage and efficiency which are more essential in the performance of duty on the part of officers of the law than the bluster and bravado which are sometimes associated with frontier sheriffs and officials.

Milton B. Chastain was born in Collin county, Texas, April 16, 1865, and has spent all his life in this state. His father, Joseph A. Chastain, was a very prominent citizen and business man in north Texas. He located in this state in the early forties, being a native of Tennessee, and for many years engaged in the milling business. He took an active part in the affairs of the Christian church. His death occurred in 1909 at the age of eighty-one, and his wife also passed away at the same age, and they were buried side by side at Marfa, a beautiful monument having been erected by their heirs to cover the site of both graves. The maiden name of the wife was Martha Luraney, who was born in Tennessee, where she was married and she was likewise a very devout Christian. There were eleven children in the family, and Milton B. was the tenth and the youngest son.

His early education was attained in Collin county, and when he was about ten years of age, the family moved to Hayes county, where he finished his schooling, with the exception of a term or two in the Fayette county schools, where the family also resided during those years. His education was completed in the Coronal Institute in Hayes county, and on leaving school at the age of eighteen he began the battle of life for himself. He left home and came west to Presidio county, which has been his home to the present time. During the first year he worked on cattle ranches, and then entered the service of the Texas Rangers, being in that service for several months under Captain J. T. Gillespie, at the end of which time he resigned to accept appointment as deputy United States marshal for one year. He then turned his whole attention to the cattle business, and has since managed and been proprietor of a ranch in this county, and each year has sent his share of livestock to the market.

Mr. Chastain was married at Alpine, Texas, May 25, 1887, to Miss Ella Darling, daughter of James Darling of Alpine. They are both active members of the Baptist church, Mrs. Chastain being treasurer of the Ladies' Aid Society. Fraternally he is affiliated with both the York and Scottish Rites of Masonry, being a member from the Blue Lodge to the Commandery in the former and having attained to the thirty-second degree in the latter, and is also a member of the Mystic Shrine. He has served as master of his lodge, and at the present time has an official position in the Royal Arch Chapter. He has taken a very active interest in state and local Democratic politics, and during a brief residence at Alpine served as justice of the peace. He has held several commissions as deputy sheriff, and first became sheriff by appointment, his incumbency of the office being confirmed by subsequent election, and at the present time he is on his fourth term in the office. As sheriff he has handled many hard characters, and has undertaken many hazardous enterprises, but his efficient performance of all duties has never been marred by any serious result, either to himself or to other parties. Mr. Chastain is a member of the Marfa Commercial Club, and is especially fond of outdoor and camp life in the mountains, and of automobiling. Mr. and Mrs. Chastain have no children, but in the family circle is to be found Miss Joe Ruth Stroud, who has made their home her home since her sixth year.

EMMETT L. BARMORE. There are doubtless few who can more justly lay claim to the distinctively American title of self-made man than can Emmett L. Barmore, whose life has been one of industry and earnest effort, and who finds himself today, while still in the very prime of life, with abilities undiminished and powers unabated, at the head of one of the large business concerns of Milam county. When he embarked upon his career, Mr. Barmore was not afraid to begin at the bottom of the ladder and accept such employment as was offered him, but as he grew in experience and ability he rose from position to position, and eventually was placed in the capacity which he now occupies, that of manager of the Milam Lumber Company, at Cameron.

Emmett L. Barmore was born in Atlanta county, Mississippi, October 22, 1872, and is a son of W. B. and May (Gaston) Barmore. His father, born in 1833, in Winston county, Mississippi, was a farmer by vocation and came to Texas in 1878, locating in Milam county, where he took up a property and engaged in agricultural pursuits. He was an industrious and progressive man and was just establishing himself nicely when he was overtaken by death, in 1883, when but fifty years of age. He married Mary Gaston, who was born in Georgia, and she still survives him and makes her home at Milam, being alert and active at the age of seventy-one years. There were five children in their family, namely: Eugene; Cora C.; Emmett L.; Jewell L. and Elmer P.

Emmett L. Barmore was a lad of six years when he accompanied his parents from his native Mississippi to Texas, and his education was commenced in the public schools of Milam county. He was but eleven years of age when his father died, and it was necessary that he early begin to assist in the family's support, so that his educational advantages were not great although he made the most of his opportunities and was able to gain a thorough knowledge of a number of important subjects. At intervals he continued to attend school until reaching his majority, and in the meantime passed the summer months in farming, and from the time he was twenty-one until he was twenty-nine concentrated his energies upon work of an agricultural nature. At the end of that period he secured a position as brakeman for the S. A. & A. P. Railroad, and later was with the Santa Fe until 1907, at which time he became yard boss for the Milam Lumber Company, where he received his introduction to the lumber business. After three months thus spent, he was offered and accepted a position as manager for the Burlington Lumber Company, at Burlington, Texas, and continued to act in that capacity for three years. In 1911 he returned to the Milam Lumber Company as manager at Cameron, and here he has continued, much of the success of this firm being due to his ability and well-directed efforts. Mr. Barmore has won the confidence of his associates by the able manner in which he has handled the affairs of the company, and his clear-sighted judgment in matters of importance. A sane, level-headed citizen, viewing things with a clear and proper perspective, he attends to his job, does his work, undertakes all his responsibilities, meets all of his obligations, and is recognized as a quiet, unobtrusive, self-contained and capable man of affairs.

Mr. Barmore was married December 24, 1906, at Cameron, to Miss Ora T. White, daughter of J. F. White, of this city, and they have no children. Fraternally, Mr. Barmore is affiliated with the local lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a Democrat in his political views, but has not cared for public office, being too wrapped up in his business to be tempted by the doubtful honors of the political arena; his business may be said to be his hobby, while his greatest pleasure is found in his home, and he is the owner of a comfortable and commodious residence, where his many friends are always made welcome. With Mrs. Barmore, he attends the Presbyterian church.

J. W. CAUFIELD. Since the year 1896 Mr. Caufield's service as county surveyor of Coryell county has been practically continuous. Mr. Caufield was educated for a career as civil engineer and surveyor, and though in earlier life he was identified with the stock business, for more than twenty years his attention has been chiefly given to his regular profession.

J. W. Caufield was born March 23, 1863, in Coryell county, Texas. His parents were Col. Daniel and Oliva (Copeland) Caufield, both parents from Alabama, having moved to Texas in 1853, and settling in Coryell county. The date of their settlement indicates that they were among the pioneers, since Coryell county had few settlers before the war, and was practically undeveloped for some years after they located there. Daniel Caufield was a stock man, and continued in that industry up to the time of his death in 1886. The mother died in 1902 at the age of eighty-five years. Daniel Caufield had a varied career, and among his earlier experiences was his service as a soldier under General Jessup in assisting to remove the Indians from Florida to the Indian Territory in 1836. There were four children in the family, two sons and two daughters, and J. W. Caufield is the youngest. The only other one now living is Mrs. Bryant at McGregor, Texas.

J. W. Caufield received his first school training in the public institutions of Texas, and later was sent to St. Vincents College at Cape Girardeau, Missouri, where for three years he took special courses in civil engineering. Returning to Texas, he joined his father in the stock business, and so continued for some time after his father's death. His main enterprise up to about 1890 was stock raising, since which time he has given his attention to surveying and engineering. In 1896 he was elected county surveyor of Coryell county, and his service has been practically continuous up to the present time.

Politically Mr. Caufield has always been a Democrat since he cast his first vote, and has not only voted but worked for the good of his party. He belongs to the Catholic church. Mr. Caufield is of Irish descent, but very proud of the fact that he is American born, and also a native of the great state of Texas.

FRANCIS MARION MAULDIN. Now living retired at a comfortable home in Gainesville, Mr. Mauldin has had a varied and active career as a farmer chiefly, and also as a blacksmith. He belongs to one of the old families of the south, and its members have always been noted for their worthy part in the community, and have lived upright lives and provided well for their families.

Francis Marion Mauldin was born in Tippah county, Mississippi, in 1852, a son of Benjamin and May (Welch) Mauldin. The father was a blacksmith, and also the grandfather followed that trade, so that it has been a pursuit common to three successive generations. The father was a native of Alabama, and the mother of Tennessee, her family having been among the first settlers of Lawrence county, Tennessee, and her people were all farmers. The eleven children in the family of Benjamin and May (Welch) Mauldin were: Mary F., deceased; George Washington, a farmer of Wise county, Texas; Francis M.; James, who died in infancy; John, of Tennessee; Malinda, wife of James O. Estes of Memphis, Tennessee; Benjamin F., a farmer of Whitesboro, Texas; Whitfield, a farmer of Oregon; Alpine, a farmer in Oklahoma; Lucy, deceased; and Evalina, wife of G. E. Clark, a farmer of Oklahoma.

Francis M. Mauldin grew up on his father's farm, and divided his time between farming, the local schools and his father's blacksmith shop, in which he learned the trade. He had the advantages of the country schools, until he was nineteen years old, at which time he was married. He then farmed the old homestead for a time, after which his economy and management enabled him to buy land of his own. Three years after his marriage, about 1874, he came to Texas, first locating in Houston county. After the first year he bought one hundred acres, and cultivated it for three years. Selling out he then moved to Hill county, where the first four years were spent as a renter on farmland. He then went to Wise county, and was engaged in farming there for three years, and next moved into Grayson county, where a few years were spent in farming rented land. He then established a blacksmith shop at Sherman, and did a good business for four years. He has divided his time between farming and his trade, and following his experience as a blacksmith in Sherman, he conducted a truck farm for three years. In 1907, he sold out his interests at Sherman, and moved to Gainesville, which has since been his home. Here he worked at his trade, and then opened a business for himself. Since selling out his shop recently, he has lived retired, and is now one of the respected retired citizens of Gainesville. He is a Democrat in politics, and he and his family worship in the Methodist church. His home is at 11 North Taylor street in Gainesville.

On October 12, 1871, Mr. Mauldin married Miss Jennie Lynn Crook, a native of Tippah county, Mississippi, and a daughter of Willis and Tabitha (Cotton) Crook. Her father was a native of South Carolina and was killed while serving the Confederacy in the Civil war. The mother was a native of Tennessee. There were eleven children in the Crook family, eight of whom lived to maturity, namely: Nannie, deceased; Lucy, deceased; Evelyn, wife of H. B. Smith of Mississippi; Mrs. Mauldin; James P. Crook, of Martindale, Texas, a farmer; Miranda, wife of J. C. Hill, of Robertson county, Texas; Peter J., a farmer of Martindale, Texas; Willis, wife of J. B. Emory, of San Marcus, Texas.

Mr. and Mrs. Mauldin are the parents of eleven children, whose names and situations are noted as follows: Bertie H., wife of Lee Warnock, who is in the retail meat business at Gainesville, and they are the parents of two children, Willis, a farmer at Reedville, Texas, and the father of four children; James Porter, of Fort Worth, and the father of four children; Luella, wife of J. L. Sanders, of Fort Worth, and they have one child; Oscar B. is a druggist at Eureka Springs, Arkansas; Walter O. lives in Gainesville, and is married and has three children; Annie is at home in Gainesville; Claude B. is unmarried and lives at home; Jessie is at home; Bailey in the grocery business at Fort Worth; Carl, at home.

NICK H. CARSON. Since 1886 a resident of El Paso, Mr. Carson for upwards of thirty years has been a contractor and worker in the plastering and cement trade, and in point of years of service is the oldest business man in this line in the city. He has had a long and successful career, devoted to quiet and inconspicuous lines of enterprise, and for many years has enjoyed the full respect and esteem of his community.

Nick H. Carson was born in Baltimore, Maryland, February 16, 1860. His father was John N. Carson, also a native of Baltimore, and of Scotch ancestry. The Carson family goes back five generations to the year 1740 when the first member came to America. Men of the name bore arms as soldiers in the Revolutionary war, in the War of 1812. The father, who was a building contractor, and lived in Baltimore until 1872, was born in 1832 and took part in the Civil war as a Confederate soldier. He enlisted at Charleston, South Carolina, in the artillery branch of the army, and served from the beginning to the end of the struggle. From 1872 he resided in western Maryland, and his death occurred at Frostburg in 1898, when he was sixty-six years of age. He married Mary E. Elliott, who was born at Baltimore and was of English descent, her family having resided in Maryland for many generations. Mrs. Carson is still living and a resident of Baltimore. There were four sons and one daughter in the family, and Nick H. was the third in order of birth. He attained his early education in the Baltimore and other public schools of Maryland, and when sixteen years of age began his apprenticeship in the plasterer's trade. He worked as a journeyman and contractor for some thirty-five years. Mr. Carson moved to Texas in 1882, his first location being in the city of Austin, where he remained until the spring of 1886, when he came out to El Paso. In the cement, sidewalk and street building, Mr. Carson has done more work in El Paso than all the balance of the contractors in this line put together. At the present time he employs regularly from thirty to forty workmen, and does a large business. He is also financially interested in the Great Texas Realty Company at El Paso. In politics, though an active Democrat, he has never filled or sought any public honors. He is affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Woodmen of the World, and the Beavers. At Silver City, New Mexico, on August 13, 1888, he married Miss Lydia Sallier, a daughter of Arsen Sallier. Mrs. Carson was born in Louisiana and is the mother of one son, Dewey Lee Carson, who was born at El Paso May 2, 1898, only a day after the victory of Admiral Dewey over the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay. The Carson home is an attractive place at 1019 San Antonio street.

GEORGE H. ECHOLS. For twenty-eight years George H. Echols has been identified with the farming and stock raising interests of Brazos county, Texas, and during this time has steadily advanced to a position of prestige in the line of his vocation. He has contributed in various ways to the advancement of his community's interests, at all times has displayed a commendable public spirit, and while he has never been a seeker after public honors wields a wide and healthy influence among the people of his county. He was born in Barber county, Alabama, August 14, 1853, and is a son of Sanders and Martha (Perry) Echols.

Sanders Echols was born in Webster county, Georgia, where he was equipped moderately with educational advantages, and grew up in his native state, where he married Martha Perry, a daughter of John Perry, of Georgia. The young couple at once moved to Barber county, Alabama, where they were residing at the outbreak of the war between the North and the South, and Mr. Echols, casting his fortunes with the Confederacy, donned a gray uniform and became a private in the great Army of the Tennessee. He remained in the service until the fall of the Lost Cause, and had an excellent record as a soldier, participating in a number of important engagements, among them that at Chickalauga. He then returned to his Alabama farm, but his nances had been greatly depleted by the war and he ecided to seek a new field for his activities. Accordingly, he closed up his business interests and began his ourney to Texas in the fall of 1865, beginning the trip o the West from Fort Browder, Alabama, and embarking on a sailing vessel with his family at New Orleans, rom which point the little party came direct to Galveston. The trip was without unusual incident, and was continued up Buffalo Bayou to Houston and thence on he H. & T. C. Railway to Millican, at that time the end f that road. After two years' residence at that point the family moved to Bryan, where Sanders Echols engaged in mercantile pursuits, first as a clerk, as he was without means, and later as the proprietor of an establishment of his own, a capacity in which he demonstrated marked ability. He also became a farmer of the Brazos bottom, and erected a brick home south of Bryan, where his death occurred in 1880, when he was but fifty-four years of age. He was a consistent member of the Baptist church, in the faith of which his children were reared. He never took an active part in political matters, and his fraternal connections were limited to membership in the Masons. Mrs. Echols died at the age of fifty-three years, having been the mother of five chilren: George H., of this review; Laura, Carney and Robert, who all died in childhood; and Frank, a resident of Washington, D. C.

George H. Echols received his early education in the public schools of Alabama and completed it at Bryan, to which place he was brought as a lad of thirteen years. This was subsequently supplemented by a course in the military school at Warrenton, Virginia, after leaving which he became associated with his father in the mercantile business, being connected therewith until the elder man's death. At that time he disposed of the business and turned his attention to farming, in 1886 purchasing a tract of land west of College Station. Later he bought a farm in the Jones Survey of Brazos county, and of his 900 acres he now has about 400 acres under a high state of cultivation, most of this having been cultivated under his supervision. He has built houses for his tenants sufficient to house eight families and one of his chief interests or features has been the growing of and dealing in cattle. In the community where the greater part of his life has been passed, Mr. Echols has a wide and favorable acquaintance, and the kindly regard in which he is uniformly held is, at once an indication of his business honor and his genuine personal worth, his warmest friends being those who have known him from his youth to the present. Like his father, he has kept out of politics.

On January 7, 1885, Mr. Echols was married at Bryan,
Texas, to Mrs. Fannie McIntosh, a daughter of a Mr.
Hassell, who came from Mississippi to Texas prior to the Civil war. Mrs. Echols has one brother, James Hassell, of Foard county. Mr. and Mrs. Echols have no children.

JUDGE WALTER J. ARRINGTON. One of the well established facts concerning local government in west Texas is that county offices in particular are entrusted to the care and administration of more than representative citizens, and nowhere in the west are better official standards maintained than in many of the counties of west Texas, which up to a few years ago were open cattle range. This is especially true of Stonewall county, and the men whom the electorate have chosen to manage affairs from the county seat are foremost citizens of the county. The office of county judge has been held altogether for four terms by Walter J. Arrington, who is a prominent member of the bar, and is now serving his second executive term in the office of county judge.

Walter J. Arrington was born in Claiborne Parish, Louisiana, November 22, 1859. When he was twelve years old he came to Texas with his parents, and for more than forty years has claimed the Lone Star state as his own. His early education was received in private schools in Louisiana, and after that he educated himself. Reading and studying, especially in later years in law, have been the inveterate occupation of Judge Arrington since boyhood. Some thirty-two years ago he bought himself a lamp, and to this day he uses that source of illumination nearly every night of his life.

He was fourteen years of age when he took up the gauge of battle with the world, and from that time until he was twenty-one earned his way by various light occupations. In the meantime he had qualified himself for teaching, and has a successful record in different counties of the state as a teacher for about eight years.
In Stephens county he was elected county and district clerk, and served for four years. During these years he devoted himself industriously to the study of law, and at the close of his second term as clerk in 1900, was admitted to the bar. He then moved to Aspermont, and has since been a member of the local bar. In 1904 occurred his first election to the office of county judge, and he served two terms at that time. Retiring for two years he was again elected in 1910 and is now on his second term. Judge Arrington has been twice married. In December, 1885, at Weatherford, in Parker county, Texas, he married Miss Bobbie Smith, who was born in Texas. Her death occurred in 1905 at the age of forty-seven. She was a regular attendant and member of the Methodist church. She became the mother of five children, three daughters and two sons, namely:
John, deceased; Georgia, the wife of Sanders Lowry, of Aspermont; Laura, wife of James Kennedy, of Jayton, Texas; Noble, who married Frank Skinner, and lives at Kress; Carroll, unmarried and at home. Mr.
Arrington in 1906 at Clairemont, Texas, married Fannie Garrett, who was born in Mississippi. Judge Arrington and wife are members of the Christian Church, in which she is active in the Ladies' Aid Society. Fraternally his affiliations are with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Woodmen of the World, and he has been through all the chairs in the Odd Fellows. His interests in politics are of a practical and progressive nature, and he is considered one of the leaders of his party in Stonewall county.

Judge Arrington has maintained a vigorous constitution by occasionally getting away from the sedentary conditions of office and study, and enjoying a hunting or fishing trip.

Judge Arrington was the second child and the oldest son in a family of eight children. His father was John W. Arrington, a native of Georgia, who moved to Texas, but after a few years left the state and now has home in Kansas. He is leading a retired life. During his younger days he followed farming and stock raising.
The maiden name of the mother was Addie Jordan, who was born in Alabama. They were married in Louisiana. She is an active member of the Methodist church.

EUGENE B. WELSH. Among the prominent business houses of the city of El Paso, Texas, which have grown from a small beginning to large and prosperous establishments, is that of the E. B. Welsh Company. The success of this firm has been due entirely to the efforts of its founder, Eugene B. Welsh, who has built up his business by hard work and a native business ability which has enabled him to seize every opportunity that offered. He has lived in El Paso since the time when there was nothing here but a few small adobe houses and he believes that the remarkable growth of the last ten years will be duplicated during the next decade.

Eugene B. Welsh was born in Ashland, Ohio, on the 10th of October, 1858. His father, Johnson Welsh, was a native of Ohio and spent all of his life, save those years in which he was at the front as a soldier fighting for the Union cause during the Civil war, as a farmer. He died in Ohio in 1886 at the age of fifty-six. Johnson Welsh married Emeline Buchanan, who was also a native of Ohio and who died there in December, 1911, aged seventy-one. Seven children were born to Johnson Welsh and his wife and of these Eugene R. Welsh was the eldest.

Eugene B. Welsh received his education in the public schools of his native state and when he was old enough to start out for himself he determined to go further west. He consequently came to Kansas and held various positions in the state until 1896, when he came to El Paso.

In January, 1897, Mr. Welsh established in El Paso the E. B. Welsh Company, beginning with a very small and unpretentious retail establishment. He opened this store when there were very few inhabitants in the town and as the place grew he kept expanding his store to meet the demands of his rapidly growing trade, until he now has a large business. In 1907 he opened up a wholesale business and this has grown so rapidly that he now has branches in many points in Old Mexico, and his house has a fine reputation for upright business methods not only in El Paso but in Mexico.

In politics Mr. Welsh is a member of the Republican party and his sole fraternal allegiance is with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. Mr. Welsh owns the property on which his warehouse is located and is the owner of other property which has increased remarkably in value during the past years.

In September, 1888, Mr. Welsh was married to Miss Mollie Pratt, of Lawrence, Kansas. Mrs. Welsh is a daughter of Alfred and Mary Pratt. Three children have been born of this union, as follows: Louise, who was born in El Paso in March, 1898, and is now at school in California; Paul, who was born in El Paso in December, 1899, is attending a military school and Eugene, the youngest, who was also born in El Paso, in 1905, is also going to school.

BEN H. KELLY. Though his home and practice have been centered at San Antonio since 1912, Ben H. Kelly won his early distinctions in the law and civic affairs as a pioneer member of the Panhandle bar, and for years practiced in that vast country, most of which was without organized local government and the only inhabitants the ranchers, cowboys and varied class of folk who belonged to the range cattle industry.

Of one of the oldest families of eastern Texas, Ben H. Kelly was born near Tatum, in Rusk county, Texas, May 2, 1868, a son of Ben G. and Virginia (Pace) Kelly. Their living children are R. S. Kelly, of Vernon, Texas; P. M. Kelly, of Frederick, Oklahoma; Mrs. J. D. Summerour, of Vernon, Texas, and Ben H. Kelly. Mr. Kelly's father, who was born in Tennessee in 1827, was taken in childhood to Alabama, and in 1853 came from that state to Texas in an ox cart with his wife and one child. They located within a mile of Henderson, the county seat of Rusk county, but soon afterwards established their home permanently on a farm near Tatum in the same county. That place is still known as the old Kelly homestead, and one of the landmarks of Rusk county. Ben G. Kelly had a long and varied career and was a soldier of two wars. He fought against Mexico before moving to Texas, and was in the battles of Monterey and Buena Vista and also participated in the capture of Mexico City. Later, in the war between the North and South, he fought with the Confederate forces in the Trans-Mississippi Department, and was in all of the fighting in the Banks campaign along the Red River in Louisiana, and at the battles of Mansfield, Pleasant Hill and Yellow Bayou. He survived for many years the incidents and hardships of the war, led a prosperous career as a nurseryman and farmer, and died in May, 1911, at Frederick, Oklahoma. His wife, who was born in Georgia in 1830, died at Vernon, Texas, in 1892.

Ben H. Kelly as a boy attended one of Texas' noted schools, at Omen in Smith county, conducted by Professors Orr and Long, both men of distinction in their vocation, and each of whom subsequently filled the office of president of the Texas State Teachers' Association. While still young Mr. Kelly began the study of law at Fort Worth in the office of Ball, Wynne & Macart and was admitted to the bar at Vernon in November, 1888, at the age of twenty, after having his disability of minority removed, beginning his practice in that town. Vernon was at that time on the northern and western frontier of Texas, and in 1889, Mr. Kelly went into the upper Panhandle and became one of the first attorneys who practiced over that sparsely settled country. In Hall county, which was as yet unorganized, he was the first lawyer to settle, and helped to lay out the town of Memphis, the county seat, and helped organize Hall county. Besides his general law practice he was agent several years for the Townsite Company. Mr. Kelly lived at Memphis until 1897, then returned to Vernon, and was engaged in practice there until November, 1901. The following year was spent in ranching in Lipscomb county, but he soon gave that up and re-engaged in the practice of law at Miami in Roberts county, and lived there until 1907. All the active years of his career, over twenty-five in number, have been spent here and in connection with the varied affairs of the Panhandle, and in 1907 he came to Southwest Texas, locating at Kerrville, the county seat of Kerr county. From Kerrville, where he had enjoyed a good practice, Mr. Kelly in March, 1912, went back to Vernon, but in September of the same year came to his present home city of San Antonio. His law office has enjoyed a very extensive clientage and represents a number of important interests in southwest Texas. His present firm is known as Kelly & Cater.

Mr. Kelly has had some experience in public affairs, in 1904 having been elected district attorney of the Thirty-first judicial district while living at Miami, and re-elected in 1906. He resigned from his office during his second term in order to remove to Kerrville in 1907. Mr. Kelly belongs to the First Baptist church of San Antonio, and has attained many of the degrees and honors of the Masonic Order, being a Knights Templar of the York Rite, and having taken eighteen degrees in Scottish Rite. He is a Past Master of Vernon Lodge, A. F. & A. M., Past High Priest of Kerrville Chapter No. 305, R. A. M., Thrice Illustrious Master of Kerrville Council No. 188, R. & S. M. He is also Past Chancellor Commander of Kerrville Lodge of the Knights of Pythias.

Mr. Kelly in June, 1913, completed a beautiful new home on Alamo Heights, San Antonio, and it is regarded as one of the finest residences in that section of the city. It is in the Grecian Ionic style of architecture, two stories, containing twelve rooms, and all the arrangements and furnishings are such as modern convenience and a happy taste for home environment would suggest. Mr. Kelly was first married in 1891 to Miss Jennie Wright, of Smith county, who died at Kerrville in January, 1912. Her four children were as follows: Remus Hill Kelly, born April 28, 1893, and now, at the age of twenty-one, manager of the Hillyer-Dutsch Lumber Company at Placedo, Texas; Ben Frank Kelly, born July 31, 1897, now a student in the Baptist Academy at San Marcos; Henry Sims Kelly, born May 31, 1902; and Hazel Allie Kelly, born in October, 1905. Mr. Kelly's present wife before her marriage was Mrs. Alberta (Persons) Miles, of Troup, Smith county.

THOMAS J. RATLIFF, M. D. The medical profession of Mitchell county is ably represented by Dr. Thomas J. Ratliff, who has been engaged in practice at Colorado since 1906 and during this time has risen to a position of prestige in his calling. A Texan by birth and training, he has passed his entire life within the borders of the Lone Star state, where he has impressed himself upon the professional and civic life of the communities in which he has been located. Dr. Ratliff was born November 16, 1868, at Glory, Lamar county, Texas, and is a son of Robert and Pernelia F. (Craft) Ratliff.

The Ratliff family is of Welsh origin and was founded in America during the early settlement of Virginia, while the Crafts originated in Scotland and Ireland and took up their residence in Kentucky during the early days of that State. Robert Ratliff, father of Dr. Ratliff, was a native of Alabama, and in 1856 came from that State to Texas, locating at Glory, Lamar county, where he followed farming and stock raising up to the time of his death, which occurred October 6, 1885. Prior to the war between the North and the South, Mr. Ratliff was an extensive slave holder and operated his land exclusively with negro labor. He was married three times, his first union occurring November 16, 1834, by which he had five children. His second wife bore him six children, and by his third wife he had eleven children, making a total of twenty-two children in all. The fifth child of the third union, Dr. Ratliff was born on the thirty-second anniversary of his father's first wedding day. Two of Dr. T. J. Ratliff's half-brothers served throughout the war between the States in the Confederate service, S. C. Ratliff of Cooper, Texas, and W. E., of Kingston, Louisiana, both still living. Pernelia F. (Craft) Ratliff was born in Kentucky, a member of an old and prominent family of that State, who operated vast plantations with slave labor, and who came to Texas in 1845.

Thomas J. Ratliff secured his primary schooling at Glory, in the public schools, following which he embarked upon a career as a teacher in that county. It was his desire, however, to follow a profession, and in 1891 he entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons, at St. Louis, Missouri, being graduated therefrom March 17, 1897. He entered practice, fully prepared, at his old home at Glory, Texas, and there continued until 1906, in which year he came to Colorado, this city having since been the scene of his activities. He has continued to be a close and careful student, keeping fully abreast of the various advancements and discoveries which have affected medicine and surgery, and as his abilities have become recognized his standing in his profession has advanced commensurately and his practice has steadily grown to large proportions. He takes a keen and active interest in the work of the various medical organizations, and strives in every way to maintain the prestige of his honored calling. Dr. Ratliff is a Democrat, but his only activities in public life have been those participated in by every good citizen who has the welfare of his community at heart. Doctor Ratliff is a member of the Masonic lodge and chapter and holds membership also in the Odd Fellows and the Woodmen of the World. With his family, he attends the Baptist church.

On December 29, 1897, Doctor Ratliff was married to Miss Fanny Kirkpatrick, of Lamar county, Texas, daughter of William J. Kirkpatrick, a Confederate veteran who is still engaged in farming in the vicinity of Paris, Texas. Mrs. Ratliff's mother passed away in 1880. Doctor and Mrs. Ratliff have two sons: Lester and Kirk, aged respectively fourteen and twelve years, bright, energetic lads who are prosecuting their studies in the public school.

S. GARZA ALDAPE. One of the most prominent physicians and surgeons in the city of El Paso is Dr. S. Garza Aldape. Although he is one of the younger physicians of the city both in years and in point of residence, he has a large practice and has won a reputation for brilliant and successful work. Dr. Aldape comes of a prominent Mexican family, noted for their intellectual attainments, and his coming to El Paso is a distinct addition to the professional ranks of this city.

S. Garza Aldape was born in Muskes, Mexico, on February 28, 1877. His father is Josi Maria Garza Aldape, who was also born in Mexico. The latter is a prominent and wealthy cattleman of that section of Mexico where his son was born, and he is still living there, aged sixty-four years. The mother of Doctor Aldape is Catalina (Garza) Aldape, and she was also born in Mexico, being the daughter of influential and wealthy parents whose ancestors were of the proudest of the Spanish nobility and settled in Mexico many generations ago. Mrs. Aldape is a highly cultured lady, belonging to that old aristocratic society of Mexico that has come down since the dominion of the Spaniards. She is still living, having reached the age of sixty years.

Seven children were born to Josi Aldape and his wife, all of whom have become prominent in their several lines of work. Manuel Aldape is a well known attorney of Torreon, Mexico; Zoraida Aldape is principal of a school at Torreon, Mexico; Josi Maria Aldape is a civil engineer in Mexico; Michael Aldape is a prominent attorney in the City of Mexico; Catalina Aldape is a professor in one of the Mexican schools; Rodolpho is engaged in the general mercantile business in Torreon, Mexico. Of these children S. Garza Aldape was the third in order of birth.

The schools of Mexico City, Mexico, provided Dr. Aldape with his first education. He then attended the National Medical College at Mexico City, from which he was graduated in 1904. He then came to the United States and matriculated at the University of Texas, from which he was graduated in 1906. In order to complete his education he now went to New York City and there entered the post-graduate department of the New York Medical College. Upon completing the course he returned to Mexico and began to practice in Torreon. He remained in his old home for five years and then came to El Paso in the early part of 1912. Since coming here he has built up a splendid practice and has become a prominent member of the profession. He now owns his own home at 1215 East Boulevard, which is one of the beautiful resident districts of the city, and he is deeply interested in the future growth of the city and is anxious to do all in his power to assist in her development.

Dr. Aldape is a member of the American Medical Association and of the International Medical Association. He belongs to the Masonic order being a Royal Arch Mason.

Dr. Aldape was married on November 27, 1907, to Miss Beatrice Castillon, of Torrian, Mexico. Mrs. Aldape is the daughter of Juan Castillon, and her parents reside in Torreon, Mexico. Three children have been born of this union: Mario, who was born in Torreon on the 12th of October, 1908; Oscar, also born in Torrian in August, 1911, and Juan, who was born in January, 1913, in El Paso.

WILLIAM F. GOODRICH. Two of the oldest families in Texas are represented by the prominent Sabine county lawyer, William F. Goodrich of Hemphill. The career of Mr. Goodrich has for upwards of thirty years been identified with the leading profession in southwestern Texas and besides his large practice as a lawyer he is owner of extensive lands, and has done much in the way of development of the splendid resources of the country in Sabine county and along the Sabine and Neches rivers. The following paragraphs besides entering briefly into the main facts about the Goodrich family in Texas, also introduce the Pace and Davis names, both of which have been identified with Texas since it was a province of Mexico.

William F. Goodrich was born in Sabine county,

Texas, in 1860. He is a child of John S. and Elizabeth (Pace) Goodrich. His father, a descendant of Thomas Goodrich, whose father was of English birth, and who settled in Virginia during the colonial days, was born at the city of Lynchburg in the state of Virginia, and when quite young moved to Nashville, Tennessee, with his parents. In 1848, he and a sister came to Texas settling first in Jasper county. Afterwards he married Miss Elizabeth Pace of Sabine county. After a brief residence in Jasper county, he moved into Sabine county, locating five miles south of Hemphill, the county seat. Sabine county continued to be the home of John S. Goodrich, until his death which occurred in 1887.

Mrs. John S. Goodrich is still living, and was born in Sabine county in 1840, a descendant of the two old Texas families already mentioned. The history of the Pace name in Texas goes back to 1819, a year which marked the formal establishment of the boundary between the United States at the line of Louisiana and the Mexican province of Texas, and also a year of historical interest because of the Florida purchase from Spain. Mrs. Goodrich is a daughter of Franklin and Marie (Davis) Pace, and a granddaughter of Cadwalder Davis, both of whom are briefly referred to in the following paragraph:

William or "Billy" Pace as he was known among all the old-timers had a long and interesting career as a soldier, pioneer and frontiersman. He was born in South Carolina, his parents being near neighbors to the mother of Andrew Jackson. For several years Billy Pace's life was closely associated with that of General Jackson. He fought the Indians under Jackson in Alabama, Georgia and Florida, and was also under Jackson at the battle of New Orleans. About this time there was a dispute between the United States and Spain as to the boundary line between Mexico and Louisiana. That dispute had almost resulted in a war in the early years of the century, and it continued to be more or less a troublesome question until finally settled in 1819 by the establishment of the Sabine river as the boundary. In the latter phases of this dispute, Billy Pace and others seeking adventures and a new country located in what was known as the "neutral ground," lying along the east side of the Sabine river in Louisiana. That strip of territory was guarded by a detachment of United States Troops, under General Jessup. From that neutral strip Billy Pace first entered upon Texas soil, in 1819, and in that year had his last fight with the Indians. In 1822 he located permanently with his family in what is now Sabine county, but was then an unnamed section of the state of Coahuila-Texas and a part of Old Mexico. Billy Pace died and was buried in Sabine county in 1837. His son, Franklin Pace, the father of Mrs. Goodrich, was also a prominent man during the early years, served as alcalde of the municipality of Sabine, took part in the war of Texas for liberation from Mexico in 1835-36, and was one of the organizers of Sabine county in 1837.

The other Texas pioneer whose name belongs in the ancestral relations of Mr. Goodrich is Cadwalder Davis who was a Kentuckian, and his early history was very similar to that of William Pace. He too fought the Indians in the far south, and served at the battle of New Orleans. In 1834, coming to Texas, he located in Sabine county, where he lived and died and where his body now rests. Both the Pace and Davis families were planters of large and substantial resources.

William F. Goodrich was born and reared on his father's plantation five miles south of Hemphill. His first advantages were supplied by the common schools of Sabine county, and his studies in the law were pursued in the law department of the State University at Austin, where he was graduated LL. B. with the class of 1886. In the same year he started to practice at Hemphill and in the subsequent twenty-seven years has built up a clientage probably second to none in importance in East Texas. Mr. Goodrich is the owner of extensive tracts of valuable land, both timber and mining, in Sabine county. Among his possessions in real estate he especially prizes a portion of the land which was in his Grandfather Pace's headright. Mr. Goodrich is taking an active part in the modern development of the resources of Sabine county, and the upbuilding of Hemphill. He is president of the Sabine county Agricultural Association, which holds an annual fair in Hemphill.

At Austin, Texas, Mr. Goodrich married Miss Bertha Sutor, a daughter of the late Frederick Sutor. Her father was one of the pioneer German colonists of Austin. Her mother built and is the owner of the Sutor Hotel at Austin. Mr. and Mrs. Goodrich are the parents of six children, namely: Dixie Sutor, Frederick, Agnes, Knox, Bertha and Ernest.

ALEXANDER F. GATES. It is no small distinction to have been the first in any community to be preferred for official distinction. The honor of being first to hold an important public office is one that will remain in the annals of the community as long as it exists and will be a source of worthy pride to the descendants of the first citizen so honored. In December, 1912, when the town of Lytle, in Atascosa county, was first incorporated and the first election for city officers held, the premier honor in the community was bestowed upon an old and honored resident of that locality, Mr. Alexander F. Gates. Mr. Gates is the present mayor of Lytle, and has long been identified with the stock business and other lines of commercial enterprise in this locality.

Alexander F. Gates was born April 3, 1846, in Natchitoches parish, Louisiana, a son of William N. and Elizabeth J. (Stacey) Gates. The family in 1854 came to Texas and located in Atascosa county, and have now resided continuously in this county for nearly sixty years. Mr. Gates is one of the oldest residents of the county, no other person having lived here for so many years as he has, with perhaps the exception of his sister, Mrs. Levana Cockrell, who is now seventy years of age. The family first settled where now is the thriving little town of Poteet. The locality, however, then was known as Gates Valley, called so in honor of the late William N. Gates, who died an honored pioneer resident in 1903 at the age of eighty-seven years. Atascosa county, at the time of the Gates family settlement, was a wilderness, and for a great many years the entire locality was in the domain of the range cattle industry, and only in recent years have railroads entered its confines.

Alexander F. Gates was reared "in the saddle," and has been a stockman all his life. Few men in the state know the business better than he, for he has not only had a wide and varied experience in every branch, but has brought to the business a splendid capability and talent as a business executive and manager. In 1875 Mr. Gates located on his present ranch, which is situated three miles east of Lytle. In all southwest Texas the Gates ranch has a reputation as a center of the live stock industry, and some of the finest cattle produced in the entire state have come from that ranch. Although still actively engaged in the direction of the ranch, Mr. Gates in 1907 established his home in the town of Lytle, where he has since resided. He was the owner of the town site property, and with the rapid development of this commercial center has sold much of this real estate for business purposes. It was largely due to his own active work in developing and improving the town of Lytle that the citizenship conferred upon him so distinctive an honor at the past election. He established in the town a lumber yard and a drug store, and though he has since disposed of both to other parties his own enterprise has always been foremost in the improvement of this little business and social center of Texas. Mr. Gates has always been very successful in his business enterprise, and financially is in more than comfortable circumstances.

Mr. Gates is the oldest Mason in Atascosa county, having been raised in the Blue Lodge at Pleasonton in 1867. He is also affiliated with the Royal Arch degree of the order. He has had an exceptionally happy home life, and he and his wife have lived together for many years and reared a fine family of children. Mrs. Gates before her marriage was Miss Mary A. Hethcock, a native of Arkansas. Their seven children are named as follows: Fount Gates, Sam Gates, Mrs. Leana Crouch (who died January, 1914), Mrs. Bittie Kilborn, Dr. Ellis Gates, Joe Gates and Mason Gates.

LLOYD E. LOCKHART. Secretary and treasurer of the Van Horn Trading Company, Mr. Lockhart is one of the foremost business men of Culberson county. The Van Horn Trading Company was one of the pioneer business organizations in this part of the state, and has been developed into a large wholesale and retail store.

Lloyd E. Lockhart was born in Milam county, Texas, February 5, 1851, a son of Charles H. and Jessie O. (Lloyd) Lockhart, natives respectively of Georgia and Texas. The father was a boy when his family came to this state, and settled in Rockdale, in central Texas in 1865. He subsequently moved to Mountain Home, a settlement which has subsequently become the thriving town of Holland, in Bell county. There he was the first merchant, and continued in business there for twenty years, and was prominent both as a business man and in politics. In 1898 he sold out and moved to Durant, Oklahoma, where he was engaged in the cotton and grain business on a large scale until 1912. In that year he returned and now makes his home in Chicago with his son Leslie M. Lockhart. The five sons, of whom the Van Horn merchant is the oldest, are named as follows, beginning with Lloyd E.: Herman L., who is an oil operator at Colgate, Oklahoma; Cecil H., a farmer of Hugo, Oklahoma; Leslie M., auditor for the J. V. Farwell Dry Goods Company of Chicago; and Arthur M., who is in the general offices of the Western Union Telegraph Company at Chicago.

Lloyd E. Lockhart attained his education in the public schools of Holland, Texas, and when seventeen years old began working as a clerk at Temple, where he remained one year and then for a similar period was clerk in a dry goods store at Temple. With this equipment for business he spent two years as traveling representative for the Penick & Ford Syrup & Sugar Company of New Orleans. For a year he was also salesman on the road for Wogan Brothers, sugar and syrup dealers, of New Orleans. Leaving the road in 1904, Mr. Lockhart engaged in business for himself at Wealaka, Oklahoma, and has the distinction of being the first merchant and the first postmaster in that town. In 1906 he moved to Kiefer, Oklahoma, and was in business for two years in that noted oil center of northeastern Oklahoma. After successful period of business there, and selling out to advantage, he moved to Mustang, Oklahoma, had a store there for a short time and next engaged in the oil business for himself at McAlester, Oklahoma. There his health failed, and at the end of two years he sold out and located at Van Horn, Texas, where he bought an interest in the Van Horn Trading Company, and became Secretary and Treasurer, and Postmaster at Van Horn.

In politics Mr. Lockhart is a Democrat and is affiliated with the Woodmen of the World. In 1903 he married Miss Cleve Odell Daugherty, whose father is J. M. Daugherty, president of the Van Horn Trading Company, and one of the most prominent citizens in this section of Texas. They are the parents of one son, Ross Monroe Lockhart. Each year Mr. Lockhart makes two trips to the central markets of St. Louis and Chicago as buyer for his firm, and with a broad experience in mercantile affairs has succeeded in placing the Van Horn Trading Company in the front ranks of similar concerns in all west Texas.

M. M. MAYFIELD. Something more than passing mention is due the memory of M. M. Mayfield, who, among the cattle men of the Southwest, was one who ever worked for the advance of his section, while forwarding his personal interests, who was a citizen of exemplary character, and whose loyalty and fidelity to friendships made him widely known and greatly esteemed in Abilene and the adjacent country. A Texan by birth and training, he spent his entire life within the borders of the Lone Star state, and his death was sincerely mourned by those who had come to know him for what he was. Mr. Mayfield was born August 26, 1859, in Karnes county, Texas, and was a son of Albert and Anna Mayfield.

The Mayfield family originated in Ireland, from which country (so runs tradition) three brothers of the name emigrated to America. Settling in the South, they became large landholders and slave-owners, and members of the family still make their homes all over the South. On his mother's side, Mr. Mayfield was descended from the Cotton family of Gonzales, Texas, and also was connected by relationship with Gen. Warren, of Revolutionary fame. During the early days, Albert Mayfield, the father of M. M. Mayfield, engaged in merchandising at Helena, Texas, for several years, it being necessary that he haul his goods by wagon from New Orleans. In connection therewith, he was interested in cattle dealing, and drove his stock from Texas to as far a point as Kansas City, Missouri. He died February 4, 1896, at his home in Karnes county, Texas, while the mother is still living and making her home with her son, Eugene, at Aspermont, Stonewall county, Texas, the only living child. She is seventy-seven years of age, but is possessed of all her faculties, and is one of the widely known and well-beloved ladies of her community.

M. M. Mayfield received his education in the public schools of Texas, and as a youth started upon a career of his own on the "trail," driving and breeding cattle for the market in the employ of others, and eventually entering the cattle business on his own account. In this line he continued during the remainder of his life, and while he passed away when still in his prime, he had made a decided success of his operations, and was known as a man who had made a commendable and honorable record in the world of business. A Democrat in politics, he faithfully supported his party's candidates and principles, and his fraternal connections were with the Ancient Order of Foresters. For nearly twenty years he held membership in the Baptist church, contributing to its movements, and doing all in his power to advance the cause of morality and religion.

On December 18, 1884, Mr. Mayfield was married to Miss Helena Anderson, daughter of J. M. and Kate Anderson, of Taylor county, Texas. Mr. Anderson was in the milling business in Lincoln county, Missouri, for several years before coming to Texas, and in 1881 settled in Taylor county, where he was engaged in farming and sheep raising. When he found it no longer profitable to raise sheep, he went to Scurry county, Texas, and there continued to be engaged in agricultural pursuits up to the time of his death, which occurred in 1899. His widow is still living, and makes her home with Mrs. Mayfield in Abilene, being seventy-six years of age, but quick and active, showing her years but lightly. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Mayfield, of whom two died in infancy, while the five survivors are: Malcolm, twenty years of age; Alberta, who is seventeen years of age; Percy, fifteen; Merso, aged twelve years; and Prentiss, the youngest, a sturdy lad of eight. All of the children live with their mother, who has done her best to rear them to lives of industry and honesty, and to give them the best possible educational advantages.

The funeral of Mr. Mayfield, which was held at the family residence in Abilene, was said to be the largest held in the city of Abilene up to that time, being attended by people of all walks of life who had learned to know and respect the deceased. The funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. C. C. Coleman, his pastor, and the remains were laid to rest in the Abilene Cemetery.

VIRGIL A. JOHNSON. Many lives have entered into the foundation of Texas, and none of them more worthy to be considered in a history of pioneer personalities than Virgil A. Johnson, now an honored resident of Lytle, in Atascosa county, and with a fine ranch property in Medina county. Those who have come and enjoyed the splendid prosperity of the modern era, however important their own contribution, have all owed a great debt to such men as Mr. Johnson, pioneers whose lot it was first to test the capabilities of soil and climate, and to face the hardships of existence when only strong and brave men could remain in this locality, and whose trials, sacrifices and labors permanently laid the foundation of a greater civilization and prosperity.

Among the old-time cattlemen of Texas who still survive there is probably none more honored or more worthy of honor than Mr. Johnson. He has been identified with this industry since the war-times. He was riding herd over the plains when only the poorest quality of range stock or wild cattle were to be found in this state. At that time the cattle had to dispute possession of the pastures with the buffalo, and the cattlemen had equally to contest his right to remain and continue his work in the face of opposition from the ever vigilant and hostile Indians. It has been the privilege of Mr. Johnson to witness the passing of the old range period, along with the driving out of the Indians and the obliteration of the buffalo. He has adapted himself and his facilities to the modern conditions of stock farming, and has succeeded prosperously under the new regime as under the old.

Virgil A. Johnson was born at Jackson, Mississippi, July 14, 1842, a son of William D. and Cynthia (Miller) Johnson. The parents came to Texas in 1847, and established a pioneer home in this state. Ever since 1850 Virgil A. Johnson has been a resident or has had his headquarters in that section of southwest Texas, which is contiguous to the modern town of Lytle in Atascosa county. When the family came to Texas in 1847, they located first in Van Zandt county, and in 1850 moved to San Antonio. In the fall of that year they camped at the head of San Pedro creek, then north of the town of San Antonio, but now practically in the heart of the residence district of this city. The father had brought a herd of cattle from Mississippi and he was engaged for a number of years in cattle raising and general agriculture in Bexar county. He made his first crop in this county in 1851, not a great distance east of San Antonio. After that he removed to a place on the Medina river, in the southwest part of Bexar county, near the Lytle place. Several years later the Johnson family transferred their residence to Elm Creek, some miles below the former ranch on Medina river, though still in Bexar county. It was at the latter place that William D. Johnson spent his last years and there death came to him in 1857. The wife and mother lived on the old Elm Creek place for several years and she died after the war.

Mr. Virgil A. Johnson is a veteran of the Civil war. In March, 1862, he joined the Confederate army as a member of Wood's regiment, the Twenty-ninth Texas Cavalry. With this regiment, in 1863, he went into the Brownsville country on the Mexican border. While there he was transferred to Company A of Duff's regiment, the Thirty-third Texas Cavalry. Nearly all of his military service was in the state of Texas, although he took part in one of the various expeditions into the Indian Territory. He was in one campaign which extended over the country south from Fort Gibson in Indian Territory to a point on the Red River in the southwest part of Arkansas. The close of the war found him with his regiment at Independence, Texas, and soon afterwards he returned home and began the work of getting a new start in life and another beginning in the cattle business, with which he already had some experience during his youthful years.

Mr. Johnson's early education was along the principle of learning by doing, and since the cattle business was the one great avenue of enterprise in his day, he early began to prepare himself for that vocation. He became familiar with the details of live stock raising when a boy, became an expert in the management of horses and was a skillful cowboy when not yet out of his 'teens. For the first three years after the war he worked with cattle throughout southwest and west Texas. In 1871 he established headquarters at the mouth of the Hondo in Frio county, but this was a period when the large borderland between San Antonio and the Rio Grande River was a scene for the operations of Mexican bandits, Indians and all manner of desperadoes, and owing to the hostility of these outlaws, he had to move away from his place in Frio county in 1872. At that year he bought a place in Atascosa county, a mile and a half south of the present town of Lytle. He owned and occupied that ranch until 1895 at which date he bought his present ranch in Medina county, twelve miles south of D'Hanis. Since that time he has operated and lived upon his Medina ranch, although he maintains a home in Lytle and spends a large part of his time there.

All the thrilling experiences of the frontiersman and old-time cattleman have been part of Mr. Johnson's life. In the early days he made a number of trips with herds of cattle over the famous old trails which led up into Kansas and Missouri, to Dodge City, and as far north as Ogalalla, Nebraska. He was an intimate friend and associate of the late reverend Captain John T. Lytle, and in 1876 they two established the furthest western trail outside Texas, this trail crossing the Red River at what is now known as Doan's Crossing, at that time known as Doan's Store. The Indian troubles on the Texas frontier became really serious after the close of the Civil war and continued with little abatement until about 1874. Throughout this period Mr. Johnson had his full share of experience and adventure, and probably no Texan now living has had more narrow escapes or more dangerous adventures in his encounters with savages of the times. He not only risked his own life in engaging in the hazardous occupations and struggles with the Indian foes, but the Indian depredations caused a constant loss in his herds of cattle and horses.

Mr. Johnson in 1867 married Miss Joyce A. Newton, whose death occurred in 1910 after a long and happy married life. She was born in the State of Mississippi. In 1912 Mr. Johnson married for his second wife Mrs. Emily L. (Wheat) Avant, a daughter of George Wheat. George Wheat, who was one of the earliest settlers of Medina county, was killed by the Indians about the beginning of the war. The names of the ten children of Mr. Johnson by his first wife are as follows: W. A. Johnson; Tom M. Johnson; H. D. Johnson; L. O. Johnson; Walter L. Johnson; Mrs. Rosa Wait; Mrs. Mattie Jones; Mrs. Zulia Johnson, and Miss Sue Johnson. Fraternally Mr. Johnson has been affiliated since 1876 with the A. F. & A. M., Berton Lodge No. 379.

AVERY L. MATLOCK, one time member of the Texas legislature, and for years prominent in the legal activities of San Antonio and vicinity, has been a resident of the state since the latter part of the year 1873. His career in the state as legislator, prosecutor and law maker is one that reflects no little credit upon him, and he stands today among the foremost men of this county.

Born in Roane county, Tennessee, on April 23, 1852, Avery L. Matlock is the son of Col. A. and Margaret (Russell) Matlock. The father was also born in Roane county, where the Matlock family were pioneer settlers. Col. Matlock was Commissary General under General Wheeler in the Confederate army and served throughout the war.

It was late in 1852 that the Matlocks removed from Roane to Blount county, where the subject received his early education. He attended Ewing-Jefferson college in that county, where he was graduated in 1869, and later studied law in Lebanon Law School, Cumberland University, where he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Laws in the class of 1872. He was located temporarily at Loudon, Tennessee, until September, 1873, and on December 14, 1873, he located at Montague, the county seat of Montague county, Texas, and there began the practice of his profession. He soon formed a partnership with John H. Stephens, who had been his classmate in the law school, and who for the past several years has been a Congressman from Texas.

In 1875 Mr. Matlock was elected county attorney of Montague county, and served as such until 1878. During that comparatively short period he prosecuted more criminals than any other prosecuting attorney in Texas within a similar length of time, according to any known records. To those who recall those days in Northern Texas, the personal risk and danger involved in the position of prosecuting attorney are matters of familiarity to them, for it is well known what a desperate and murderous band of criminals infested the country in those days, the enormity of the crimes they committed, what a menace they were to law and order, for which they had the most utter disregard, and the danger and difficulty of arresting them and trying them in court. During a part of the time that he was prosecuting attorney Mr. Matlock was compelled to act as sheriff or marshal, so difficult it was to get officers to arrest the desperadoes. While the trying of cases went on he found it necessary to go constantly armed, and in many cases he had to have armed posses guard the court house in order to prevent an outbreak of shooting. Mr. Matlock prosecuted and convicted the three Brown brothers,—Andy, George and Jesse, the first two mentioned being sentenced to death by hanging. He also successfully prosecuted the Kribs, Creston and Taylor cases, with many other murder cases that are notable in the criminal history of Northern Texas. It should be said of Mr. Matlock that, starting in as a prosecuting attorney when a very young man, he discharged his duties fearlessly, and with such personal courage and bravery as won for him the respect of the entire section of the country where he was known.

In 1880 Mr. Matlock was elected to the state legislature, serving in the lower house, and in 1882 he was elected to represent his district in the state senate, in both of which bodies he proved himself an efficient lawmaker, and was the means of bringing about legislation that has been of great benefit to the state. In both bodies he was chairman of the Committee on State Lands, and he introduced and saw to the ultimate passage of a law raising the price of school lands from $1 to $2 per acre, an act of great benefit to the public schools of the state. He was the author of the bill prohibiting the cutting of wire fences, had charge of the bill prohibiting the use of free grass, also of the bill, which became a law, repealing the former law which granted sixteen acres of land to railroads for each mile of railroad they built,—a law that was rapidly depriving the state of its best lands.

In 1884 Mr. Matlock was one of the presidential electors from Texas, being one of those who cast the electoral vote of Texas for Grover Cleveland's first term. In the celebrated Clark-Hogg gubernatorial campaign of 1892, Mr. Matlock was chairman of the Clark forces in the Houston convention. Since that time he has taken very little active participation in state politics. From 1873 to 1890 he lived at Montague, in the latter year removing to Fort Worth, where he continued successfully in the practice of his profession. He has been a party to a number of legal firms, being first a member of the firm of Matlock, Cowan & Burney, general attorneys for the Texas Cattle Raisers Association, and later of the firm of Matlock, Miller & Dycus. Previous to his association with either of these firms, it should be stated, he had been attorney for the Capital Syndicate, which built the present state Capitol, in 1887-88, and spent considerable time in the Panhandle, looking after the land and other interests of the Syndicate.

In 1906 Mr. Matlock moved from Fort Worth to San Antonio, the latter place representing his home since then, and here he has continued in practice. He was attorney for the capitalists who financed the San Antonio, Rockport & Mexican Railroad, of which he was one of the originators, and he was actively engaged on that project for nearly two years.

Mr. Matlock was married in Fort Worth to Miss Susan Polk Hyman, who was born in Tennessee, but reared in Texas. They have one daughter,—Ruth Russell Matlock.

CAYETANO M. DE LA GARZA. One of the promising young business men of Laredo is Cayetano M. de la Garza, former assistant cashier of El Progreso, the Mexican daily newspaper of that city. He is a native Texan, having been born in San Antonio, November 27, 1890, though for several generations his family has been connected with the fortunes at Laredo. His parents, Cayetano C. and Andrea (Sanchez) de la Garza, were both born in Laredo, the former on October 31, 1855, and the latter on November 30, 1858. Their marriage occurred on May 25, 1878, and the mother is still living, the father having been a ranchman and cattleman of Webb county.

Cayetano C. de la Garza died at his ranch, "Santa Isabel," Webb county, Texas, on Sunday, December 29, 1912, and Cayetano M. was obliged to resign his position as assistant cashier with the daily Spanish paper, El Progreso, and dedicate himself to the business his father left him—that of stock raising and agriculture.

Andrea (Sanchez) de la Garza is a lineal descendant of Captain Tomas Sanchez, who was the founder of Laredo in the year 1757. (See sketch of Dario Sanchez for a further account of this family.)

Mr. de la Garza's paternal grandparents were Cayetano and Margarito (Sanchez) de la Garza. The grandfather was born in La Hacienda de Guadalupe, Coahuila, Mexico, July 28, but the exact year of his birth is not known. He was the son of Cayetano and Ynocente (Benavides) de la Garza, and his death occurred in Laredo, November 30, 1890. Margarito Sanchez, a daughter of Elias and Loreto (Garza) de Sanchez, was born in Laredo, July 22, 1820, and died there on May 25, 1896. Her father was a son of Jose Ma Gonzalez and Petra Sanchez who were members of some of the oldest Laredo families.

Cayetano M. de la Garza, the immediate subject of this review, was educated in the San Luis College of San Antonio, and upon completing his schooling accepted a position in the office of George R. Page, who at that time was the county clerk of Webb county. While holding this position he discharged his duties in such a way as to merit the confidence and approbation of his superior, but it was his desire to get into business for himself. Consequently, in September, 1912, he became identified with El Progreso, of which he was assistant cashier, as stated in the opening paragraph. Although a young man, Mr. Garza has been honored by the Democratic party with important positions. He is now a member of the executive committee of that party for Webb county, and he was a delegate to the Democratic state convention at San Antonio. In thus conferring upon him these signal marks of their confidence in his judgment, the Democrats of Webb county have expressed their belief in the truth of the old political adage: "Old men for counsel; young men for war." In accepting these positions, young de la Garza recognized the responsibility thrust upon him, but he has never failed in the performance of the duties entailed upon him, and those who know him best predict for him still greater honors in the future.

On Saturday, September 17, 1911, at 9:30 a. m., Mexican time, the marriage of Cayetano M. de la Garza and Miss Maria de la Paz Martinez was solemnized at Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, the ceremony being witnessed by Leopoldo Villegas, Augustin Salinas, Serafin Saenz and Shelby Theriot. To this union has been born one daughter—Inez Josefina—whose birth occurred on June 17, 1912. Mrs. de la Garza was born in Guerrero, Tamaulipas, Mexico, January 24, 1889.

DR. JOSEPH B. PLATT. The business which Dr. Joseph B. Platt, of San Antonio, Texas, has founded and developed, is an example of the ability some men have of adapting themselves to circumstances and of seeing possibilities that have been heretofore undiscovered. By profession, first a doctor and then a dentist, Dr. Platt, upon coming to San Antonio, saw that here was a field for a dental laboratory, which he immediately proceeded to open. He has been successful and is a well known man in the professional and social life of the city.

Both of the parents of Dr. Platt were born in the state of South Carolina. His father, J. E. Platt, was born near Charleston, but when the latter was a child his parents removed to Alabama and settled in Choctaw county. Here J. E. Platt grew to manhood and was from this county that he enlisted in the Confederate army. He served throughout the war and after its close he removed to Mississippi and located in Rankin county. He later removed to Meridian, Mississippi, and there spent the remainder of his life, dying in 1909 at the age of seventy-two. He married Caroline Grace.

Joseph B. Platt was born in Rankin county, Mississippi, in 1867. He was reared in Meridian, Mississippi, and here attended school, until he was of college age. He then matriculated in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in Baltimore. He began the practice of medicine in Washington, District of Columbia, in 1891, and continued there until 1893. At this time he took up the study of dentistry in the National University at Washington, and after the completion of his studies he took up the practice of dentistry in the city of Washington. He practiced here with considerable success until 1903 when he came to San Antonio, where he has since lived. He established his dental laboratory in San Antonio shortly after locating in the city and his work has been of great assistance to the dental profession. He works exclusively for the dental profession and has won for his laboratory a reputation for efficiency and satisfactory service that is an enviable one indeed. He has long since discontinued the practice of dentistry.

The professional career of Dr. Platt has been broken into but once and that was occasioned by the outbreak of the Spanish-American war. He enlisted for service in May, 1898, at Washington, D. C., and was made quartermaster sergeant of Company I, First District of Columbia Volunteer Infantry. He was first sent to Camp Alger, and thence to Camp Thomas. His next move was to Camp Tampa, from whence he embarked for Siboney, Cuba. From the time he landed he began to see active service. He was in the trenches before Santiago from the 10th of July until the 17th and later was at Camp San Juan. He was mustered out of the service in November, 1898, leaving behind him a record for splendid service and high efficiency as a soldier. He is now commander of Camp No. 1, of the Spanish-American War Veterans, in San Antonio.

Dr. Platt was married in Washington, D. C., to Miss Isabelle Wallace and they have two children, Marion, who was born in San Antonio, and Isabelle, who was born in Washington, D. C.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE BROWN. The old time Texas cattlemen have no finer representative than the veteran retired citizen of El Paso, Napoleon Bonaparte Brown. Mr. Brown became acquainted with the live stock industry during the old range days soon after the war. He has known every vicissitude and success and gradation of prosperity experienced in the live stock industry of the southwest during the past half century. His own career has identified him with practically every section of Texas. He in fact is a native of Bell county, which at the time of his birth was on the extreme northern and western frontier, and during his active life he has extended his industry out into the western counties even to the famous Staked Plains regions, and also New Mexico has been a field of his activity. With the richness of practical experience, Mr. Brown has also combined the finer qualities of the typical cattlemen: Simplicity of manner and conduct, liberality in all his personal relations, great open-hearted hospitality, and complete adequacy which is the highest characteristic, and the very fruit of pioneer character, all of which are typified and embodied in the personal career of Mr. Brown.

He was born in Bell county, Texas, January 9, 1855, a son of James Cornwell and Sally (Hodnett) Brown. The father, a native of Alabama, came to Texas from the eastern side of the Mississippi River, in 1847, making the journey overland. He located in Bell county and took up land there, and became one of the very first cultivators and developers of the wilderness region which at that time marked the entire border of settlement in Texas. He continued a resident there until the outbreak of the Civil war, at which time he volunteered for service and became first lieutenant in General D. Bray's Regiment. His first important battle was the terrible encounter at Shiloh, where during the course of the fighting he received nine slight wounds, but was not incapacitated for further service. He then continued a soldier for the south until near the close of the war, at Yellow Bayou, in which conflict he was severely wounded that he died four days after the battle, and his body was interred upon the battlefield. He was born in 1830 and at the time of his death was in the very prime of his manhood. The mother, who was born in Mississippi, and married in that state, died in Bell county in 1896 at the age of sixty-six years. There were seven children in the family, four of them being now deceased, and the brother and sister of Mr. Brown of El Paso are S. G. Brown of Albany, Texas, and Mrs. W. H. Long of Borden, Texas.

Bell county, where Mr. Brown spent the early years of his life, was until several years after the war a frontier community, and he was reared in the peculiar, stimulating atmosphere and environments of a locality situated between civilization and the great expanse of wilderness which at that time was peopled with hostile Indians and the countless herds of buffalo, which were the lords of the prairie. Few schools were established in Bell county at that time, and Mr. Brown had only limited educational advantages, although his opportunities for experience in the practical things of life were unlimited. Like many other young men, as soon as he was ready to embark upon his own career, he engaged in the cattle business. When he was thirteen years of age, he accompanied A. G. Bowie across the country to California helping to drive a herd of cattle. He remained with Mr. Bowie under these experiences, for three years. Subsequently he engaged in business for himself in Falls county, and there became one of the most successful cattlemen and remained in business for eight years. From that time his experiences and various changes had been many, and may be briefly outlined here. He was for one year in Brown county; then returned to Falls county for two years in the cattle business, and for one year was a practical farmer. Bosque county, in the northwestern part of Texas was the next scene of his operations, where for two years he was engaged in the farming and ginning business; Double Mountain Fork in Stonewall county was the center of his operations for the next seven years; he was also running his cattle in the Staked Plains country in Yocum county. In that region he continued in the cattle business eight years, selling out his interest there he transferred his headquarters to Gaines county, where he remained three years, and then operated in Upland county, being there for about two years; Ward county was the next scene of his business as a cattleman, and after three years there he moved his herds over into New Mexico, and was a cattleman in Lincoln county of that territory for twelve years. After these various changes, and the whole was a series of successful operations as a cattleman, Mr. Brown sold out in 1911 and moved to El Paso, where he has since led a retired life, enjoying the comforts and fruits of many years of well directed endeavor.

Mr. Brown is affiliated with the Masonic Order, having attained the Royal Arch degrees, and is also a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He has long had active membership in the Panhandle and Southwestern Cattlemen's Association, and has served the association, as an inspector. He is a member of the Baptist church and in politics is a Democrat.

In Falls county in April, 1876, Mr. Brown married Miss Harriet Roberts. Mrs. Brown died in Midland county, Texas, in February, 1899. The two children of their marriage were: James C., who was born in 1886 in Jones county, and who married Miss Nettie Dry, and they have one child named Neldra Maris Brown; and Miss Hattie May Brown, born in Midland county in 1894 and now residing with her family in El Paso. At Pecos City, Texas, in October, 1899, Mr. Brown married Miss Georgietta Wellingham, a daughter of J. T. Wellingham, who was one of the well known pioneers of Texas.

HENRY KATZ. The story of the success which Henry Katz has had since he came from his European home to become a resident of the United States is a good example of what the intelligent educated foreigner may accomplish in this country even though he be not blessed with a very large share of this world's goods. He has lived in El Paso since 1906 and has proved to be not only an able merchant and business man but a valuable citizen and an addition to the community.

Henry Katz was born in Alsace in Germany on the 5th of November, 1873, the son of Felix and Rose (Wheiller) Katz. Both of his parents were natives of Germany but when he was three years of age they removed to Switzerland where his father became a well known dealer in cattle. He is still living, being a resident of Basel, Switzerland, and having reached the age of sixty-nine. The mother also is still living being sixty years of age. Felix and Rose Katz were the parents of three children and of these Henry is the eldest.

The excellent schools of Switzerland furnished Henry

Katz with his education and after leaving school he went into the stock business with his father. For nine years he remained at home, but the attraction of the lands across the seas and the stories which he heard on all sides about America decided him on coming to the United States to try his fortune. It was in 1892 that he first came to this country but he did not remain long, returning to his father's home. Here he remained for three years and then again crossed the ocean to America. This time he located in Juarez, Mexico, where he lived until 1906, at which time he came to El Paso and established his present business here in 1910. He is in the gentlemen's furnishing goods business and carries one of the best stocks of its kind in the city. He has built up his business by his own efforts, his progressive ideas and his knowledge of his business being two of the factors which have contributed largely to his success. He is the owner of his home and of other valuable pieces of property in the city, and is a firm believer in the future growth of this section of Texas.

In politics Mr. Katz is a member of the Democratic party and in religious matters he belongs to the Mount Sinai church. His only fraternal affiliation is with the Knights of Pythias of which order he is a loyal member.

On the 27th of August, 1898, in El Paso, Texas, Mr. Katz was married to Miss Bertha Weiller, who is a daughter of Kaspar and Fannie (Driefas) Weiller, of Switzerland. One son, Max Katz, has been born to this union, his birth occurring in El Paso, in April, 1906.

GEORGE W. NEELY. In business in El Paso as an exclusive merchant tailor, Mr. Neely has what is regarded as one of the most distinguished shops of the kind in the city. George W. Neely was born in Hubbard City, Texas, June 24, 1883, the fifth in a family of eight children born to Dr. James J. and Carrie B. (Green) Neely. His father, a native of Georgia, and a graduate of Tulane University, and the University of Kentucky, came to Texas and was one of the most skillful and successful physicians and surgeons in his part of the state. His death occurred at McGregor, Texas, and he was a Democrat in politics and a member of the Methodist church. The mother was born at Plantersville, Texas, of an old family of this state, and her death occurred at Hubbard City, in September, 1912.

George W. Neely received his early education in the public schools, finishing with the high school at the age of sixteen. As soon as he left school he began an apprenticeship in learning the tailoring trade, and his success has been won largely because he has devoted all his energy and study to one line of business. As an employe he worked from 1899 to 1905, being with H. H. Everts at Hubbard, later moving to Waco, where he was connected with Sanger Brothers until October, 1905, and then with Wood Brothers at Waco until January 1, 1907. In the following year he was on the road as a traveling salesman, after which he opened a men's furnishing store at Abilene, and did a first class business there for three years. October 1, 1909, he came to El Paso to accept the place of manager for George A. Mansfield, in the men's furnishing business. After a short time he engaged in business for himself, opening his present shop at 108 South El Paso street, on October 1, 1911, and has since gained a large part of the best trade in the city.

Mr. Neely is a Democrat in politics, but has never sought any public or official distinction. He is affiliated and a popular member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Modern Order of Pretorians, and belongs to the Methodist Church. He was married in Hubbard City, October 11, 1914, to Miss Edna Frances Barnes, daughter of W. B. Barnes, of Irene, Texas. The Barnes family came from South Carolina, and located in this state many years ago. The one child of

Mr. and Mrs. Neely is Lela Octavene, born January 22, 1906, at Waco. Their home is at 711 Ocavaria street.

JOHN W. McCURE, JR. A lawyer by profession and now engaged in the real estate business in El Paso, Mr. McClure came to this city a year or two ago on professional business, and became so well pleased with the city as it is and its remarkable prospects for the future that he located here permanently and has since attained a successful position in business affairs.

John W. McClure was born in Pettis county, Missouri, October 22, 1886. His father, John W. McClure, Sr., was also born in McClure, went through the Civil war as a soldier of the Confederacy and became very successful as a cattle raiser and dealer and stock farmer in Pettis county, where he now resides. He is a man of quiet, unassuming nature, has done his part as a citizen with public spirit, but has never sought conspicuous honors in politics, and has been offered some of the best offices in the state. The maiden name of his wife was Erma A. Glasscock, a native of Missouri, and of an old pioneer Missouri family. Her father, Robert E. Lee Glasscock, was first lieutenant of a company under General Price during the Civil war. The mother is still living and there were four children, of whom the El Paso lawyer was the second.

He was liberally educated, first in the schools of his home county, and then in Central College at Fayette, where he specialized in history and English, and afterwards entered the McClures State University at Columbia, where he was graduated with his law degree in 1909. He opened an office for practice at Sedalia, Missouri, and in 1910 had the management of an estate which brought him out to El Paso, and during the work involved in the local business determined to make El Paso his permanent home. In July, 1912, Mr. McClure established a real estate office at 202 Texas street under the firm name of the McClure Realty Company, and has since done a large business in city property and valley land. Mr. McClure is a Democrat in politics, and is affiliated with the Blue Lodge of Masons at Sedalia. He and his family worship in the Methodist church south. At Lexington, Missouri, on January 2, 1912, he married Miss Ivy Roma Shelton, daughter of J. C. Shelton. They have their home at 1523 Rio Grande street.

WALTON D. HOOD. For a young man still in his early thirties, Walton D. Hood has had a commercial career which is an inspiration. Energy, enterprise, pluck and persistence have brought him from a clerkship fourteen years ago to a position among the prominent young business leaders of San Antonio, and at the present time he is serving as a member of the school board of that city.

Walton D. Hood was born at Caldwell in Burleson county, Texas, August 25, 1882. He comes of a family of more than ordinary prominence in the south and in Texas. His parents were Robert P. and Minnie (McLaran) Hood, and his father is now a successful merchant of San Antonio, and was born also in Burleson county, where the Hoods were among the pioneer settlers. Grandfather Captain Perry C. Hood came from Tennessee, established a home in Burleson county, Texas, in the early fifties, served fourteen years as sheriff and tax collector for that county, was captain of a company in the Confederate army, and led his men with gallantry and efficiency for four years in every conflict. He was one of a numerous family which moved to Texas, but all died with cholera shortly after landing at Houston, the only survivors being Captain Perry C. and a brother. This family is closely related with that of General John B. Hood, one of the distinguished officers of the Confederacy. Minnie (McLaran) Hood was the daughter of Dr. McLaran, of Scotch ancestry, who was an early settler and physician in Texas, served with the rank of surgeon in the Confederate army, and after the war practiced his profession at Bellville, the county seat of Austin county, where Mrs. Hood was born.

Walton D. Hood grew up at Caldwell, and also spent his years until he was eighteen at Wallis, in Austin county. His education was supplied by the common schools, and at the age of eighteen he left Austin county and became clerk in a grocery house at Galveston. While there he took up telegraphy, learned the trade and became an expert telegrapher and train dispatcher. After some service with the Western Union Company in 1900 he was sent to several points along the line of the Southern Pacific out of Victoria, and in 1902 transferred to the Santa Fe Railway Company at Milano, going from there to Eagle Lake, and became one of the first train dispatchers on the old Cane Belt Railroad. After the Cane Belt was absorbed by the Santa Fe he was sent to Galveston as chief operator. Later he was a dispatcher at Temple, from there went to the San Antonio & Aransas Pass Railway as dispatcher at Yoakum, and finally left the railway and telegraph service in 1907, coming to San Antonio early in that year. The cotton firm of George H. McFadden & Company employed him as its traffic manager, and he did extra work at night in the office of the San Antonio Express in the news service on what is known as the State Circuit. From McFadden & Company he entered the real estate business, and his two years in that work were marked by a great deal of accomplishment and enterprise which deserve to rank him among the leaders in recent years in that business. He promoted and was president of the company which developed Palm Heights, the beautiful addition to the southwest quarter of the city, where his own home is. After selling his interests in Palm Heights, Mr. Hood transferred his attention to the industry and manufacturing enterprise with which his name is now chiefly associated, the Jenner Manufacturing Company, candy manufacturers and wholesale dealers. He is now its secretary and treasurer, having first gained an interest in the company in 1912. During the first year he was on the road selling the products of the factory, but since then has devoted all his time to the executive duties of the home office. The Jenner Manufacturing Company has had and is still enjoying a remarkable growth. It does a splendid business both as manufacturers and wholesalers of candy, and stands as one of the largest manufacturers of chocolate goods in the South. A large addition has been built on South Flores street, and this capacity, though large, must be increased to take care of the extending trade of the concern.

Mr. Hood is a prominent Mason, both in the York and Scottish Rite, and has taken thirty-two degrees in the latter. At the present writing he is assistant rabban of Ben Hur Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Austin, and is junior warden in the Knights Templar Commandery No. 7 at San Antonio. He is a member of Cavalry Baptist church, and a trustee and deacon. Mr. Hood married Miss Lillie May Johnston, who was born at Wallis, in Austin county. Their three children are: Walton Donnie Hood, Jr., born February 1, 1904; Gladys May Hood, born August 17, 1906; and Kennie Robbin Hood, born September 25, 1909.

WOODS LYNCH, M. D. The second oldest physician at Midland from the standpoint of years of practice, Dr. Lynch is a physician and surgeon whose career throughout has been marked by expert qualifications and successful work. From the beginning he has enjoyed a successful practice, and he has also interested himself in the social and civic life of this community. He and his wife are leaders in the social affairs of Midland, and, possessing an abundance of energy and accomplishments, and with many interests outside the commonplace things of life, they have found and enjoy happiness in a remarkable degree.

Halton O. Hood

Woods W. Lynch was born in Columbus, Muskogee county, Georgia, February 15, 1873, a son of George R. and Callintia A. Slayton Lynch, both parents having been born in Georgia. They came to Texas in 1894, and after reaching this state the father, who was a contractor and builder by profession, conducted a successful business in that line at Galveston until 1900, when he moved to Dallas, opened an office and was in business there until 1905, in which year he moved to Midland. This city continued to be his home until September, 1912, and he filled a number of important contracts as a builder in this city, and since the last mentioned date he and his wife have resided in Pasadena, California.

Dr. Lynch, the only child of his parents, attained his education in the public schools of Dallas county, Georgia, and came to Texas in advance of his parents. He entered the State University at Austin, where he was graduated with his medical degree in 1899. For one year he served as interne in St. Mary's Hospital in Galveston, and received two appointments in the United States Marine Hospital. Leaving Galveston in the fall of 1900, he first located at Plano, where he built up a nice practice and remained until February, 1904, at which date he located in Midland. Here he has likewise succeeded in establishing an excellent practice, and his patronage is drawn from the best people of the city and vicinity. Dr. Lynch is now railroad surgeon for the Texas and Pacific Railroad. He is a member of the Texas State and the District Medical Societies, of the New Mexico State Medical Society and of the American Medical Association, and also belongs to the National Society for the Prevention of Tuberculosis. His membership is also with the North Texas Medical Society. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and, with the Woodmen of the World. As a public spirited citizen he uses the Commercial Club as the medium for exercising his influence for larger and better things in this city.

In November, 1901, Dr. Lynch married Annie F. Farrell, a native of Texas and a daughter of Hunter T. and Alice (Lanham) Farrell. Her father was born in Virginia and her mother in Missouri, and the former was for many years prominent as a cattleman and farmer in this state. One son has been born to this marriage, George Hunter Lynch. The Lynch home in Midland is one of the most attractive in the residence district of the city. Each year Dr. Lynch has two vacation periods. During the winter he hunts deer in the Diabolo and Davis Mountains of western Texas. He is an expert hunter, and in his home and office has interesting collections of deer heads and of mounted eagles and prairie chickens and other mementoes of his skill. The two weeks of the summer vacation are devoted to carp and bass fishing at various popular resorts. Mrs. Lynch always accompanies the Doctor on his hunting and fishing trips, and is likewise a splendid shot and a skillful angler, and both of them enjoy camp life. The son, George, is already master of the rifle and the rod. Dr. Lynch and wife are lovers of books and good literature, and many of their most pleasant hours are spent in the fine library which they have collected at their home.

WILLIAM M. FENLEY, M. D. One of the best known and most successful medical men of Menard and of the county is Dr. William M. Fenley, who has been here engaged in the practice of that exacting profession since 1895, the year in which he was graduated from his Alma Mater, the Kentucky School of Medicine in Louisville. In addition to his private practice, in which the doctor has gained a most excellent reputation, Dr. Fenley has served as county health physician for a number of years, his service in that office being of such a nature as to result in his annual re-election to the post. Success has been the just meed of the doctor in his practice here, for he has been hard working, a close student of his profession and a most conscientious and honorable patron of the healing art.

Born on June 30, 1869, William M. Fenley is a native of Uvalde county, Texas, and is a son of J. T. and Jane M. Fenley. The father was born at Shreveport, Louisiana, and the paternal grandfather of the Doctor, John M. Fenley, located in Uvalde county in about 1847, just about the time his son, the father of the subject was born. John M. Fenley was one of the first settlers in that part of the state, and he was a man of prominence in the district where he lived and operated for many years. His son, the father of the Doctor, moved to Presidion county in about 1883, there engaging in the stock business, and still later he moved to El Paso county, there continuing in farming and stock raising. He is now a man of about sixty-six years, hale and hearty and in the very prime of his life, one might say to see him. The mother also is living, and she too enjoys excellent health and spirits. They were the parents of twelve children, the Doctor being next to the eldest of the number.

In private schools in his home community William M. Fenley gained his rudimentary educational training, and in his teens he entered Adrian Christian University, where he continued for three years in study. He then took his medical course at the Kentucky School of Medicine in Louisville, and was graduated therefrom in 1894, with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. The doctor located soon thereafter in Menard, Texas, where he has since continued in active practice, and where he has made most worthy progress in his chosen field of activity, as has already been intimated.

The Doctor is a Democrat, staunch and true, and a member of the Masonic fraternity, with Shriner affiliations. His church is that of the Christian denomination.

In February, 1893, Dr. Fenley was married to Miss Maggie Johnston, the only child of William Johnston, who was for years in the United States army, and who died in Menard several years ago. Three children have been born to the Doctor and his wife, named as follows: Miss Willie, aged fourteen years; Eveline, aged eleven; and Milana, aged eight years.

Dr. Fenley comes of a family of sturdy Scotch-Irish ancestry as the name indicates, and one that is well known in Texas, Arkansas, Georgia and South Carolina, the name of Fenley being one that is frequently met with in those states. Many of them were well-to-do slave-holders prior to the war, and innumerable Fenleys fought in the long Civil war waged between the north and the south, bearing arms in defense of their beloved southland. Especially prominent as slave-holders were the Holland family on the maternal side of the Fenley house. The father of Dr. Fenley served the last two years of the Civil war.

It has been the fortune of Dr. Fenley, in the years of his life and experience thus far, to have visited seventeen states in the Union. None of them, however, does he regard as being the equal of Texas in wealth, climate, or in any of the opportunities that make this the greatest state in the Union for men who want to make homes for themselves and their families, and who will make the most of such opportunities as are presented to them. In his opinion, too much can not be said for the superior advantages of the state along those lines, and he is most emphatic in his opinion.

JUDGE SAMUEL H. ALLEN. Among those who have served with credit in the judicial position in Mills county, Texas, one whose record, general qualifications and character have ably fitted him for the duties of his responsible position is the Hon. Samuel H. Allen, judge of the county court. Judge Allen has the reputation of being an indefatigable worker, combining scholarship with an active energy and forceful personality, and as a member of the bench has at all times upheld the dignity and maintained the high standard of the judicial office. He was born June 9, 1869, at Hot Springs, Arkansas, a son of John W. and Sarah J. Allen.

The Allen family of which Judge Allen is a member is of Scotch-Irish and English descent, and numerous families bearing the name are still found in Arkansas and North Carolina, the greater portion of them having been slave-holders prior to the war between the North and the South. John W. Allen and his wife were both born in Arkansas, where they were engaged for some years in agricultural pursuits, but in 1884 came to Texas and located in what is now Mills county, where for some years he continued to carry on farming operations. He has been successful in his ventures, and is now passing the evening of his life in quiet retirement with his wife, in their home in Goldthwaite, although he still owns the homestead place in Mills county. He was married at the early age of fifteen years, and when but sixteen enlisted for service in the Confederate army during the Civil war, serving in numerous engagements and being wounded in the wrist in one of his battles, that at Pilot Knob, Missouri. At the close of the war he returned to Arkansas home and took up the duties of peace, proving himself as good a farmer as he had been a soldier. He and his wife became the parents of five sons and one daughter, and of these Samuel H. was the third in order of birth.

Samuel H. Allen received a very limited education in the public schools of Arkansas, but was a close and earnest student, made the most of his opportunities, and eventually became well read. He was fifteen years of age when he accompanied his parents to Texas, and in 1890 was able to enter Owachita Baptist College, at Arkadelphia, Arkansas, from which he was graduated in 1895, having received the degree of Bachelor of Arts. He then engaged in school teaching, in the meantime devoting himself assiduously to the prosecution of his legal studies, to such advantage that in 1906 he was admitted to the bar at Mena, Arkansas. After practicing for a short time there, in 1907 he came to Goldthwaite and purchased two farms in Mills county, which he operated for three years. In 1910 he was elected county judge, and his services during his first term were so satisfactory that in 1912 he was re-elected by his fellow-citizens. His decisions have ever indicated a strong mentality, careful analysis and a thorough knowledge of the law, and no one has ever had cause to doubt his mental strength or absolute integrity.

The county of Mills was organized in 1887, with a population that was very small. At the last census it was shown that there were 9,694 people within its borders; forty-seven schools, taught by seventy-five teachers, give evidence of its educational prestige. Four thriving towns,—Mullin, population about 600; Star, population 200; Priddy, population 150, and Goldthwaite, the county seat, with 2,500 population, are centers of commercial and industrial activity. The original court house was destroyed by fire May 6, 1912, with $2,000 insurance, and the county then voted $5,500 for the erection of a new building, which was completed in August, 1913. There are two banks in the city of Goldthwaite, the Goldthwaite National and the Trent State Bank, which are largely patronized, as are also those at Mullin and Star. As a center of morality, Mills county compares favorably with any other in the State, and it is a well-known fact that the county jail has no occupant ninety-five percent of the time. Its citizenship has been composed of men who have done things in the way of progress and advancement along all lines, and the climatic conditions of this section make it a peculiarly desirable locality for a home. Judge Allen has at all times been enthusiastic in his praise of Mills county and its opportunities, and is firm in his confidence in its future growth and advancement along all lines.

In 1896 Judge Allen was married (first) to Miss Leida Moncrief, of Powell, Texas, daughter of D. A. and Kate Moncrief, of this State. Mrs. Allen's father was a Confederate soldier throughout the Civil war, after which he engaged in farming up to the time of his death. His wife survived him until a few years ago, when she passed away. Three children were born to Judge and Mrs. Allen, of whom two are living: Miss Lois and Woodson, who are aged fifteen and eleven years, respectively. Mrs. Allen died July 20, 1906, and on September 6, 1908, Judge Allen was married (second) to Miss Maude Prater, of Goldthwaite, Texas, daughter of J. F. and Ida Prater. Mr. Prater was for many years a merchant of this city, but is now deputy county clerk and resides here with his wife. Two children have been born to Judge and Mrs. Allen: Walter Prater and Samuel H., Jr.; aged three and two years, respectively.

Judge Allen has always been a Democrat, and has faithfully worked in the interests of his party, being especially active in the campaign of 1912 which resulted in the great Democratic landslide. He is a member of the Masons, the Woodmen of the World and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and has numerous friends in the local lodges of all of these organizations. With his family, he attends the Baptist church.

ARTHUR C. ROSS. While the ultimate possibilities of Texas as a great poultry state have been scarcely touched at the present time, the state in the aggregate contributes a surprisingly large volume to the aggregate poultry products of America, and there are a large number of successful individual poultrymen in Texas. One of these, whose career has many features of encouragement to men in that industry, and who is likewise a representative citizen of southwest Texas, is Arthur C. Ross, of San Antonio, proprietor of the Valley View Single Comb White Leghorn Farm in that city.

Arthur C. Ross, who is a son of one of the army men who at various times have made Texas their home, was born at Washington, D. C., August, 1877, a son of Carl and Sarah Anne (Kelly) Ross. His mother is still living, her home being in San Antonio, and is of Irish extraction. His father, of English ancestry, who died in Philadelphia in 1911, though for many years a citizen of Washington, was at one time connected with the quartermaster's department of the United States army at San Antonio and was also with the command at Fort Davis in this state.

Arthur C. Ross accompanied his parents to Texas in 1888, spent a few years at San Antonio and later Fort Davis, and finally returned to San Antonio, which has since been his permanent home. Most of his education was acquired by attending the local schools of the Alamo City, and he became identified with the public service, as assistant public cotton weigher for eight years, and since 1906 has held the chief office of public cotton weigher at San Antonio. This is an elective office, and his thorough efficiency in its management and his popularity among all classes of citizens account for his continued reelection.

Mr. Ross has for a number of years been interested in the practical side of the poultry business, but it was only in 1913 that he established his successful Valley View Single Comb White Leghorn Farm at San Antonio. This farm is located on the east bank of San Pedro Creek and near South Flores street. It is a beautiful location, ideal for the poultry business, and contains altogether thirty-eight acres of land. Mr. Ross has already demonstrated the successful possibilities of the poultry business when conducted on modern, scientific and efficient principles, and has made some costly improvements at the Valley View farm. These include a handsome and comfortable residence of red pressed brick, two stories in height, equipped with every facility and convenience. His chicken houses, yards and runs are all built and arranged to afford light, clean and sanitary quarters and afford every encouragement to the American hen to go about her business in the most profitable manner. Cleanliness is so conspicuous a feature of the Valley View farm that not a single case of vermin has been discovered among his fowls since he established his poultry farm. Mr. Ross has made his success as a poultryman from the single comb white leg-horns, a stock of which he has developed from baby chicks, and which under his care and management have proved healthy and have maintained the highest standards of egg-productive capacity. His business is chiefly in supplying fresh eggs to a select list of hotels, bars, restaurants, sanitariums, hospitals and soda fountains, and furnishing the balance of his daily supply to a family trade. In March, 1914, the Valley View Farm had two thousand layers, and that number will be largely increased during the year. The success of Mr. Ross is due not so much to his particular breed of chickens nor to any other adventitious circumstances, but rather is due to the hard work and attention to details on the part of himself and wife. He has not suffered a single reverse since he started, and the profits of the Valley View Farm are already sufficient to demonstrate the continued prosperity of the farm. One interesting feature of the farm apart from the poultry business, and one that affords promise of future wealth, is the presence of natural gas along the creek bank. This resource has not yet been prospected in a practical manner, but the presence of gas is easily demonstrated by sinking a hole only two or three feet deep, and there is sufficient gas collected and discharged from such an opening that it furnishes a brief gas flame.

Mr. Ross was married in San Antonio to Miss Carolina Navarro, of the old and distinguished family of that name in San Antonio and Texas. She was born in San Antonio, and is a great-granddaughter of Colonel Jose Antonio Navarro, one of the most noted characters connected with the early history of San Antonio and the Texas struggle for independence. Colonel Navarro was a close friend and warm associate of Stephen F. Austin, represented Texas in the Federal Congress of Mexico, became a delegate from San Antonio to the convention which drew up the declaration of independence in March, 1836, took a prominent part in early affairs of the republic, and as a member of the Santa Fe Expedition of 1841 was one of the chief sufferers as a prisoner in Old Mexico. Colonel Navarro died at San Antonio in 1871, and left descendants who are still numerous represented in that city and in various parts of the state. Mr. and Mrs. Ross have two sons, Clifton and Lloyd.

DR. CHARLES THOMAS. Seven years of medical practice in New Mexico and Texas have been sufficient to place Dr. Charles Thomas in the front ranks of his profession in El Paso, where he has been located since 1911. His progress from the inception of his career has been of a worthy order, and he is in every way entitled to the position and standing that have been accorded to him in El Paso and the community hereabouts.

Born in Burleson county, Texas, on September 22, 1883, Dr. Thomas is the son of Jerome E. and Annie E. (Curtis) Thomas, both natives of the state of Mississippi. The father came to Texas in 1870, and died in this state on September 18, 1897, at the age of forty-five. He was a physician, and was graduated from the Missouri Medical College of St. Louis, and was occupied in the great humanitarian profession of medicine until death called him from his labors while he was still in the very prime of his manhood. He was one of the most prominent men of Burleson, and possessed an exceptionally high standing in professional circles. At one time he served as county health officer, and all his life he was active in public and civic affairs. His wife came to Texas with her parents at an early age making the trip in a wagon in the early seventies. Her father entered upon a government claim near to Buffalo, Texas, and as a pioneer farmer of that section of the state was well and favorably known. Mrs. Thomas today is a resident of El Paso. Of the seven children born to Dr. and Mrs. Thomas, four are living, and Dr. Charles Thomas of this brief review was the fourth born into the family.

Charles Thomas received his rudimentary training in the schools of Mexia, Texas, and from the high school of that place was graduated in 1900. He then entered the University at Galveston where he pursued his literary studies, and his medical studies he finished at Louisville, graduating from the university at that place on April 12, 1905. His first practice was carried on in New Mexico, where he remained until 1907, when he returned to Texas, and since 1911 he has been located in El Paso, and is here enjoying an excellent practice and the confidence and high regard of all who know him.

Dr. Thomas is a Democrat, but is without political ambition, and does not enter into the activities of the party. When in New Mexico, he served as county health officer of Ada county, but held to other public office at any time.

As an aid to his profession, Dr. Thomas maintains membership in the County and State Medical Societies, and in a fraternal way he is affiliated with the Masonic order. He was married in New Mexico, on October 9, 1906, to Miss Jessie Mae Denning, the daughter of S. P. Denning, of Texas. Mrs. Thomas was born in Mohair, this state, and she died on August 26, 1907, without issue. Dr. Thomas is a Baptist in his religious faith.

WILLIAM W. ARMSTRONG. "Efficiency" is the slogan of the day and has been the key to the successful career of William W. Armstrong, now chief of the fire department of the city of El Paso. Fire is a foe that conquers or is conquered; it knows no flag of truce. Protection against fire is of vital importance to every city and public sentiment is never divided as to the essentiality of such a department or as to the necessity for the utmost efficiency in equipment for such protection. However keen this realization, yet the accomplishment of the desired end comes only through a wise and energetic directive head. There is no position that makes greater demands for cool and deliberate judgment, yet quick and decisive action, for courage and bravery than that held by the chief of a fire department, for he is the inspiration of his force. The fire department of El Paso, Texas, has had Mr. Armstrong at its head since 1909 and has found him in every respect an efficient chief. His is an efficiency gained through full twenty-five years of experience in this line.

Born August 27, 1865, at Mitchell, Mitchell county, Iowa, he is a son of Jacob and Harriet (Laraway) Armstrong, both of whom were natives of New York. Jacob Armstrong was born near Albany, New York, in 1830 and along in the early '60s removed to Iowa, of which state he was a pioneer settler and where he became a very successful farmer. He is yet living and now resides at Plymouth, Iowa. Harriet Laraway Armstrong, the mother, was born near Syracuse, New York, December 11, 1842, and passed away in Iowa in 1906. Twelve children came to this union and of this family William M. was fifth in order of birth and is one of nine yet living. He grew up a farmer boy and attended the country schools near Plymouth, Iowa, until eighteen years of age. On attaining his majority he set out to hew his own career. Locating at Joliet, Illinois, he there secured employment in a wire manufacturing establishment and learned the trade of wire making. He followed that occupation but a short time, however, and then entered the service of the Joliet fire department in 1888, continuing to be identified with that department nineteen years, or until 1906. He began as a driver and after three years was made a captain, in which capacity he served fourteen years. The following two years he served as chief of the department. In October, 1907, he left Joliet to become chief of the fire department at Douglas, Arizona, but after fourteen months at the latter location, he removed to El Paso, Texas, where in February, 1909, he took charge of the fire department as the first paid chief. This city has found him to be the right man in the right place. He has continued as chief to the present time and devotes all of his time and attention to these duties, striving to make this department second to that of no city of the state in its efficiency. He is more than satisfied with his Texas home and is very optimistic in his faith in a great future for the whole commonwealth. This sentiment he supports in a practical way whenever opportunity offers. In politics he is independent, bound by no party ties and taking no part in political affairs. Fraternally he is affiliated with Lodge No. 296, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks at Joliet, Illinois, with the Knights of Pythias Lodge No. 532 in the same city, and with Cornello Camp No. 42, Woodmen of the World, at El Paso, Texas. In church membership he is identified with the Methodist Episcopal denomination.

On August 25, 1900, at Joliet, Illinois, Mr. Armstrong was joined in marriage to Miss Mary McCully, daughter of James McCully, who came to Illinois from his native state of New Jersey. Mr. and Mrs. Armstrong have one son, William G., born at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, July 23, 1901. Their home is at 917 North Stanton street.

ALFRED ELI DAY. Superintendent of the schools of Garrison since August, 1911, Prof. Alfred Eli Day is generally recognized as one of the leading educators of this part of the state. In no profession is there a career more open to talent than that of education, and in no field of endeavor is there demanded a more thorough preparation or a more thorough appreciation of the absolute ethics of life. Unflagging application and intuitive wisdom and a determination to fully utilize the means at hand, are the concomitants which insure personal success and prestige in this great profession—one into which none should enter without a recognition of the obstacles to be overcome and the battles to be won, for success comes only as the diametrical result of capacity and unmistakable ability. Such elements have entered into the successful career of Prof. Day, and have made him widely and favorably known in his field of endeavor. Mr. Day was born near Center, Shelby county, Texas, October 1, 1870, and is a son of Thomas H. and Lucinda (Childress) Day.

Thomas H. Day was the eldest of five children, the others being: Rebecca, who married George Lowe and died in Shelby county, Texas; Mary, who married George Mitchell and died near Joaquin, Shelby county; William, who died at Springfield, Missouri, and left a family, and "Teen," who lives in Calcasieu parish, Louisiana. Thomas H. Day was born near Chattanooga, Tennessee, in 1838, where he was given somewhat limited educational advantages. He came to Texas when he was ten years of age. As a young man he took up farming for his calling, but laid aside his farming utensils when the Confederacy asked for troops at the outbreak of hostilities between the South and the North. He became a soldier musician, and served through the Mansfield campaign in Walker's Division of the Trans-Mississippi Department, fought gallantly and escaped capture and wounds. After the close of the war he returned to Texas and has since been engaged in merchandising at various places, including Willow Grove and Timpson, but is now somewhat retired and a resident of El Paso. He has been a democrat all of his life, and served as county commissioner of Shelby county at the time of the erection of the new courthouse. Mr. Day was married in Shelby county, prior to the outbreak of the Civil War, to Miss Lucinda Childress, daughter of Rev. Moses Childress, a Baptist minister who came to Texas in 1845 from Eastern Tennessee and on through Missouri. He married Miss Jane Oliver, and they had the following children: Russell, who was killed at the battle of Mansfield during the Civil war; Jack, who died in Shelby county; Sam, who was a Baptist minister and spent his life in Shelby, where he died in 1890; Polly, who married John Wilson; Lucinda, wife of Mr. Day, who died in 1903; and Hiram, who is resident of Miles, Texas. The children born to Thomas H. and Lucinda Day were: Thomas Russell, educated in the public schools and the Agricultural and Mechanical College, taught at Willow Grove, Timpson and Henderson, being in school work some twenty-five years, then took up real estate in El Paso, was president of Hereford College, Hereford, Texas, for a year after leaving Henderson, and had the distinction of having established the first department of agriculture in a public school in Texas, at Henderson; Emma, who married Peter Herring and resides at Portland, Oregon; Prof. Alfred Eli; Robert, a resident of Timpson; and Katie, who is the wife of A. M. Reese of Dalhart.

Alfred Eli Day received his early instruction under his brother, Thomas Russell, at Old Willow Grove and Timpson, in the latter place going to high school and graduating therefrom in the first class to finish from this school. Subsequently he became a student in Keechi College, at Nacogdoches, Texas, the successor of the old Nacogdoches University, and remained there until the school was disbanded. Upon leaving that institution he attended a commercial college at Dallas for one year. Prof. Day holds a permanent state certificate granted by the state of Texas and the Bachelor of science from Tenaha Academy. He entered upon his career as a teacher at Huber, Shelby county, his abilities being recognized two years later by his appointment to the principalship of the High School of Timpson. After five years in that capacity he was elected superintendent of schools at Center, where he remained nine years, and during this time changed it from the Center University to the Center High School, under the independent district plan, replaced the old buildings with new ones with modern equipment and beautiful grounds, and built the schools from 170 pupils to about 800 pupils and had all the departments of high school, a business college and manual training, together with normal training. The high school affiliated with the State University, and Mr. Day's outside school patronage numbered 150 people. His positions of honor were secretary of the State Teachers' Association, Secretary of the Summer Normal Board of Examiners, member of the regular State Board of Examiners and instructor in Sam Houston Normal school. During these years he was either teaching normals or attending summer terms of the State University. Professor Day left Center on his own account and was at Dalhart, Texas, for eighteen months, resting, and returned to accept a position in the Tenaha schools, where he remained during a part of one term. In August, 1911, he came to Garrison as superintendent of schools. Here he has remade the schools, built and equipped a modern high school building, valued at some $16,000, increased the teaching force and raised the standard of the school to a high school of the first class as recognized by the Department of Education of Texas and increased the school revenue about 200%, added departments of domestic science and agriculture and graduated nineteen students. His school in 1912 at the county athletic association won first place; the basket-ball team defeated all teams it went against, and for two years the school won first honors in the intellectual contest also under the county association. On December 25, 1892, Professor Day was married to Miss Nellie Smith of Beckville, Texas, daughter of William Smith, one of the old citizens of Texas, who came from Tennessee and engaged in farming here. He married Miss Mary Herrin, and they became the parents of eight children. Mr. Day was educated in Timpson High school and was a school-mate of her husband, graduating in the same class with him. She began teaching in the Timpson schools and subsequently taught in the schools of Center, and is now one of the faculty of the Garrison High School. Professor and Mrs. Day have four children: Nellie May, a graduate of Garrison High School, who studied music in the Conservatory of Portland, Oregon, and is now musical director of the Garrison schools; Bernice, who graduates from Garrison High School in May, 1914; Moxie, and Tommie.

Professor Day is a member of the Christian church and was reared under that influence. He has always been active in Sunday school work wherever he has resided. He was instrumental in having the county office of county superintendent of Shelby county created and was appointed its first incumbent. In the Royal Arch Masons he is scribe of his chapter, and he also holds membership in and is popular with his fellow members of the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World.

WILLIAM T. HIXSON. The pioneer jeweler of El Paso where he has been a resident for nearly thirty years, Mr. Hixson has the largest as well as the oldest business of the kind in the city, and through many years has made it his pride and determination to keep his stock and entire equipment abreast of the times and to furnish the people of this city and vicinity everything in the line of jewelry which their tastes and desires could ask.

William T. Hixson is a native of Ithaca, New York, where he was born August 8, 1854. He was the fifth in a family of seven children, five of whom are still living, born to Joseph F. and Mary E. (Thomas) Hixson. The father was born in New Jersey and died in 1878, after a long career as a farmer and lumberman. He was of Scotch ancestry, and Grandfather Amos S. Hixson was the founder of the American branch of the family, locating at Ithaca, New York, and the old homestead near there was owned by the family until 1913. The mother was born in Tompkins county, New York, three miles from where her husband was born and reared. The Thomas family was of English descent. The father passed away in 1878 and the mother in 1882.

Mr. Hixson was educated in the public schools and in an academy at Ithaca, graduating in 1873. He began his practical career as a bookkeeper in his native city, and remained there until about 1880. He was then located in Chicago, Illinois, for four years, going from there to Santa Fe, New Mexico, where he was in the jewelry business for four years, and from there located in El Paso on the first of March, 1888. He here established the Hixson Jewelry Company, and from the pioneer times when El Paso was a little more than a village until it is now one of the largest and most important cities of Texas, his establishment has always stood for the best of its kind. Mr. Hixson is also director of a bank recently organized in El Paso.

In politics he is Republican, and has gone through the two branches of the Masonic Order, through the highest degrees. He is also affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, the El Paso Country Club and the Toltec Club. He and his family worship in the Presbyterian church. At Chicago, Illinois, February 11, 1889, he married Jeanie G. Campbell, who was born in Chicago and was the daughter of William Campbell of Scotch family. Their home is at 717 West Boulevard, in El Paso, Texas.

RALPH W. BORDER. In designating and according consideration to those who have gained secure standing as representative members of the bar of El Paso county there is all of consistency in granting special recognition to Ralph Winebrenner Border, who has here been engaged in the active general practice of his profession since 1910, and whose achievement has been such as can come only to those thoroughly fortified in knowledge of the science of jurisprudence and definitely appreciative of and loyal to the exacting calling which engages their time and attention. He is one of the progressive citizens of the city of El Paso and is an enthusiast in regard to the manifold advantages and attractions of the state of his adoption, and while his judgment is the more authoritative by reason of the fact that he has visited various sections of the Union and has also indulged himself in travel and adventure in Central America, where he was for a time identified with the work of the great government canal across the isthmus of Panama. He is a young man of most engaging social qualities and in his home city his circle of friends is coincident with that of his acquaintances.

Mr. Border was born at Kearneysville, Jefferson county, West Virginia, on the 3d of February, 1882, and is a son of Dr. Daniel Webster Border and Clara C. (Getzendanner) Border, the former of whom was born in West Virginia, a representative of one of the old and honored families of that state, and the latter of whom was born in Maryland, of stanch German lineage. Dr. Webster has long been recognized as one of the representative physicians and surgeons of his native state and he and his wife now reside in the city of Charlestown, Jefferson county, where he is engaged in the active practice of his profession and is a citizen of prominence and influence. He is unwavering in his allegiance to the Democratic party and is identified with various professional organizations.

After due preliminary discipline in public and private schools in his native state Ralph W. Border continued his studies in the West Virginia State Normal School, and thereafter he entered the University of West Virginia at Morgantown, in the law department of which he was graduated as a member of the class of 1909 and from which he received his well earned degree of Bachelor of Laws.

Prior to preparing himself for the legal profession Mr. Borden had gained most interesting experience in connection with the initial stages of construction work on the Panama canal. In January, 1895, he embarked, at the port of New York city, for Panama, and upon his arrival at his destination he was given charge of a large force of men who were working on the celebrated Culebra cut of the canal. He held this post for fifteen months, at the expiration of which he resigned his position to indulge in a somewhat adventurous project and one that proved most interesting, though attended with many hardships and not a little peril. In company with William Lee, a cousin of the distinguished General Robert E. Lee, and a man named Guernsey, he set forth from Panama to penetrate the virtually untrammelled wilds of the old province of Darien, of the United States of Colombia. The journey into the wilderness was made along the Rio Congo, and the prospecting tour of the three sturdy companions covered a period of five months. They scrupulously sought for gold in the district's traverses and did a certain amount of placer mining for the precious metal, though their efforts did not bring forth results of prodigal order. During the period of five months they failed to see a single white man outside of their own little party of three, and eventually they returned in safety and good spirits to Panama, from which point Mr. Border soon afterward returned to his native state, to resume his educational work. He continues to have a distinct predilection for travel and mountain climbing, and was his spirit of adventure not subordinated to his judgment he would become undoubtedly a loyal devotee of the wanderlust.

In January, 1910, shortly after his graduation in the law school, Mr. Borden came to Texas and established his home in El Paso, where he has built up a substantial law practice and gained excellent repute as a versatile and resourceful trial lawyer and effective counselor. He is careful in the preparation of all cases presented by him before court or jury and is never found unprepared to meet exigencies or arguments, as he has his cause well in hand in every instance and anticipates the salient points of attack on the part of opposing counsel. He is a popular member of the El Paso Bar Association and is also identified with the Texas Bar Association, the while he is known as one of the essentially representative lawyers of the younger generation at the bar of El Paso county, where his practice is constantly expanding in scope and importance.

A student of economic and governmental affairs and well fortified in his convictions and opinions, Mr. Border is unflinching in his allegiance to the principles of the Democratic party as expounded by its greatest leaders of old, Jefferson and Jackson, and he takes a loyal interest in the furtherance of the party cause, though he has not appeared as a candidate for any public office. He is affiliated with the time-honored Masonic fraternity and also with the Loyal Order of Moose.

On the 8th of August, 1913, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Border to Miss Annie Ethridge, who is a true daughter of the Lone Star state and a young woman of most gracious personality, so that she has found a warm reception in the leading social circles of El Paso, even as she had in her native city of Galveston, Texas. She is a daughter of Colonel S. G. Ethridge, who was a distinguished officer in the Confederate service in the Civil war and who still retains his residence in Galveston, an honored citizen of much prominence and influence. Mr. and Mrs. Border have established an attractive home in El Paso, and the same is a center of most generous and cordial hospitality.

JOSEPH F. WRIGHT. One of the prominent men of Hill county and of Hillsboro is Joseph F. Wright, since 1912 Justice of the Peace of Precinct No. 1, and prior to that time identified with ranching interests in the county, as well as having served for six years as surveyor of Hill county. His activities have been of a diversified nature that have brought him into contact with practically all classes of business, winning him a wide acquaintance and a host of stanch friends throughout the county. Since he took up his residence in this city, he has given his best in the way of citizenship, and the furtherance of the interests of the city is a matter that claims his honest attention at all times.

Joseph F. Wright was born near Jacksonville, Cherokee county, this state, on December 31, 1855, and is a son of A. Hayes Wright and his wife, Martha (Wallace) Wright. The father was born in Clinton county, Kentucky, in 1821 and in early life was active as a tanner and manufacturer of leather goods. During the war he was engaged in the business of supplying the Confederate army with boots and saddles of his own manufacture, and he continued in the work for a good many years, enjoying a fair measure of success until the increasing facilities of the larger establishments crowded him out of the running, after which he turned his attention to farming and stock raising in Texas. He had come to this state as early as 1840 and settled in Cherokee county, being one of the earliest pioneers of that section. He was a prominent man in that county for years, and was the warm personal friend of Major Maples of that section, famed for his participation in the military activities of the Texas and Mexico war periods. Mr. Wright died in 1866. His wife was born in Morgan county, Alabama, in 1836 and came to Texas in 1850. She died in 1896, and was the mother of seven children, here named as follows: James A., Joseph F., Melvina, Cynthia F., John A., and two others who died in infancy.

Joseph F. Wright was educated in the common schools of Texas to the age of seventeen years. He early identified himself with the business of farming and stock raising, and continued in the work up to 1898, when he sold his ranch properties for the most part and came to Hill county. He was manager of the Singer Sewing Machine Company in Hillsboro, Texas, for about four years thereafter and then was elected surveyor of Hill county, which office he held for six years, discharging his duties in a manner creditable to himself and pleasing to the county. He then retired from business of whatever sort for two years, but when he was elected Justice of the Peace for Precinct No. 1 of Hill county in 1912, he was ready and willing to get into the harness again, even though he was taking up work with which he was in a measure unfamiliar, for idleness had become irksome to him, and he was impatient for activity. Thus far his administration has been a most successful one in the office of Justice, and he is fulfilling the expectations of the people most creditably.

Mr. Wright is still the owner of a fine farm of two hundred acres in the county, with ranch lands aggregating one hundred acres as well, and he owns a comfortable home in Hillsboro, so that his realty possessions in the county are considerable. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World, of the Odd Fellows, and is a steward in the Methodist Episcopal church of the city and the superintendent of its Sunday school. As a member of the Booster's Club of Hillsboro, his influence and activity is invaluable to the city and he is one who has the advancement and progress of the community ever before him. He has recently been the stanch advocate of a City Welfare Committee, having at heart the progress of the city in both population and industries, and if the proposed movement materializes it will undoubtedly be a factor in the upward and onward movement of Hillsboro.

On December 16, 1874, Mr. Wright married Julia Choat, daughter of William and Julia (Matthews) Choat of McLennan county, this state. Mr. Choat was long a prosperous farmer of McLennan county, and a prominent man in his region. Mrs. Wright died January 14, 1914.

To Mr. and Mrs. Wright eleven children were born. Lottie W., the eldest, married W. E. Ralh, a carpenter, of Hillsboro, and four children have been born to them, one of the number now deceased. A. H. married Josie Johnson, and is engaged in the printing business, as superintendent of a large printing house in Dallas. They have four children. John A. married Ollie Campbell, and lives in Muskogee, Oklahoma. They have two children. William C. married Julia Jones, who died in 1911, and he has since married Edna Martin. His first wife left two children and one child has been born of the second union. They are Hillsboro residents. Nellie W. married J. E. Morris, who is secretary of the Y. M. C. A. at Denison, Texas, and they have three children. Fannie L. married Prof. Leon Culbertson of Osceola, Hill county. He is the present superintendent of county instruction of Hill county, elected July 25, 1914. They are the parents of three children. J. F. Jr. married Chester Johnson, and he is engaged in the printing business in Dallas; they have one child. Hal, the youngest son, is an electrician and lives in Hillsboro. Velma lives at home and Edward is deceased.

Mr. Wright is a man who is deeply devoted to his family, and finds his greatest diversion at home among his children and grandchildren, of which there is a goodly array, as has been noted above.

HON. DAVID G. HILL. A resident of Abilene for more than thirty-two years, Judge David G. Hill has been a witness of and participant in the wonderful changes that have transformed this community during this time from a village of several hundred inhabitants to a prosperous city with a population of ten thousand. A prominent member of the Texas legal fraternity, a man who has shown his worth and capacity in various positions of public responsibility and trust, and at all times a progressive, energetic, wide-awake citizen, Judge Hill has identified himself with various activities that have contributed to the public welfare, and his standing is accordingly high among the citizens of his native state. By birth and training Judge Hill is a Texan. He was born in Fayette county August 12, 1858, and is a son of Malcolm H. and Mary J. Hill.

The Hills are of Scotch and Irish stock, and members of the family located in the south years prior to the war between the states, many of the name being large land owners and slave holders. Malcolm Hill, who came to Texas about 1846, was one of the early settlers of Fayette county, where he carried on farming and stock raising until his removal to Lee county. There his death occurred, but his widow survived him some years and passed away in 1906. They were the parents of two sons and five daughters, David G. being the fourth in order of birth.

The early education of David G. Hill was secured in a private country school in Fayette county, and he attended Trinity University from 1876 until 1879. His law studies were prosecuted at Brenham, Washington county, Texas, and there he was admitted to the bar in 1880. He returned to Fayette county in the same year, but in September, 1881, came to Abilene, which has since been the scene of his activities and the field of his endeavors. In 1882 he was elected county attorney of Taylor county, and in 1894 received the election to the office of district attorney for the Forty-second judicial district. In 1890 he became the successful candidate for the office of judge of the county court, and this position he continued to hold for sixteen consecutive years, less four months. At this time he is acting in the capacity of chairman of the county school board, and devotes his time not necessary to the duties of that office to the practice of his profession. He is known as an able, astute and thoroughly learned lawyer, one who respects the ethics of the profession, and has a high regard for the responsibilities of his position as regards the rights of his clients. His standing at the Texas bar is high, and his connection with a number of noted cases has made him more or less a familiar figure in the courts of the southwest. For two years after its organization he served as a director of the Citizens National Bank. He has had faith in the future of his adopted city, which he has watched grow from a village of six hundred people to its present prosperous state, with modern office buildings, a Federal post office and court house worth $125,000, a State Epileptic Colony, with buildings to accommodate four hundred guests, and beautiful grounds, and other modern improvements. Judge Hill has never hesitated to advise those of energy and ambition to settle in western Texas, where he believes the opportunities are propitious for those who have the courage to grasp them and the necessary perseverance to carry them through to a successful conclusion. He has always been a Democrat, and has contributed of his money and time in supporting his party, frequently making speeches during campaigns. His fraternal connections are with the Odd Fellows and the Elks, while his religious faith is that of the Episcopal church.

On December 4, 1884, Mr. Hill was married to Miss Lucerne Campbell, a daughter of George W. and Elizabeth Campbell, of Tuskegee, Alabama, both deceased, the former of whom was for years a well-known banker and merchant of that city. Six children have been born to Judge and Mrs. Hill: George B., who is a lawyer practicing at Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; David G., Jr., is connected with the electric company at Dallas, and he married Judith Red, of Abilene; Henry W., who married Miss Myrtle Myers, of San Angelo, and is associated with a wholesale grocery concern there; Macie, who married Roy McCullough and lives in Abilene; Lila Mae, who married W. R. Keeble, cashier of the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Abilene; and Lucerne, who is the youngest child, and lives at home.

JAMES B. GILLETT, owner of Barrel Springs Ranch and breeder of fine Herefords, is well known in this section of the state and is famous as an ex-ranger and police officer in western Texas. He was born at Austin, Texas, in 1856, and is a son of Major James S. and Elizabeth (Harper) Gillett.

Major James S. Gillett was born in Kentucky, and was reared for the most part in the state of Missouri. He came to Texas in 1848, locating in Paris, the county seat of Lamar county. Previous to this time Major Gillett had passed through Texas on his way to Mexico with the American army of invasion, and served as a soldier through the Mexican war. He was elected to the state legislature from Lamar county, and long before the war came to be known as a man of state-wide prominence. He served several years in the State Ranger service, in the early days of that famous organization, and he was also adjutant general of Texas under Governor Sam Houston. On account of his age he was not accepted for service in the Confederate army when the war broke out, but he joined the army and got into the conflict about a year before the close of the rebellion, being a member of Captain Carrington's company. Major Gillett was one of the historic characters of Texas. He died in 1874, at his home in Lampasas, to which place he had removed from Austin several years previously.

The mother of James B. Gillett, who was Elizabeth Harper, died in 1879. She was the daughter of Captain Harper, an old time planter of Washington county, Texas, and the brother of Tom and Rufus Harper, who were soldiers of distinction in the Confederate army, Tom Harper having been killed at the battle of Gettysburg.

James B. Gillett was reared and received his schooling at Lampasas. He went into the State Ranger service in 1875, when he was nineteen years old, joining Company D, Frontier Battalion, under Captain Dan Roberts at Menard, Texas. Later he became a member of General John B. Jones' escort, and still later was assigned to duty in Company D, under Captain Neal Caldwell. In 1879 he was transferred to the Ranger troops under Colonel George W. Baylor in El Paso county, in which organization he remained until 1882.

During the seven years that Captain Gillett was in the Ranger service his life was almost daily filled with thrilling adventures and dangerous exploits. It will be recalled that this was the bloodiest period in the Indian history of Texas. His service was entirely on the frontier, and it brought him into conflict with the Comanche and Kiowa Indians on the northern part of the frontier, and with the Lipan Indians on the southern portion. In addition to this bloody warfare with the Indians that period was also the worst in the criminal history of Texas with respect to cattle thieves, highwaymen and desperadoes of all kinds, and in conflict with this dangerous element a Ranger was constantly called upon to perform deeds of courage and to face dangers that would appal any but the stoutest hearts. Captain Gillett left the service with the record of having been one of the bravest and most efficient Rangers in its history, and so well known was his reputation in this regard that upon quitting the service in 1882 he was immediately appointed chief of police of El Paso, a position which in those days required a man of the highest efficiency and courage. He remained in that office until the latter part of 1885, covering what was perhaps the wildest period of its career. He was then placed in charge of the cattle interests of the Estado Land & Cattle Company in Brewster county, west Texas, since which time he has been engaged in the cattle business without interruption. In 1888 he resigned his position with the company above named and engaged in the cattle business for himself in western Texas. He is the owner of the famous Barrel Springs Ranch in Jeff Davis county, Texas, where he has between fifty and sixty sections of land. This is one of the finest ranches in west Texas, situated in a country that is noted for its fine water supply, being in the Davis Mountains, its splendid climate and its abundant grass. Mr. Gillett's ranch home is located twenty-three miles west of Fort Davis, the county seat of Jeff Davis county, and his railroad station is Marfa, on the Southern Pacific Railroad. Captain Gillett is a noted breeder of Herefords, his herd being registered since its establishment in 1890. He breeds only the highest class cattle, all his male calves being sold for bulls, and his stock is always at a premium in the leading cattle markets of the state.

Captain Gillett is a member of the Christian church. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, in the Knights Templar and Shrine bodies, and is prominent in the Order. He married Miss Lou Chastain, who was born in Collin county, Texas. They have four children living, namely: Beulah, the wife of G. W. Evans, Lou C., Leota and Milton E. Gillett.

A. P. SHOCKLEY. For many years an old and honored resident of Hamilton county, where his name and activities have been prominently associated with farming, stock industry, and public affairs, Mr. P. A. Shockley has spent practically all his life in Texas, and is a self-made man who has accomplished a great deal since starting out in the world on his own account.

A. P. Shockley was born January 28, 1847, in Kaufman county, Texas, son of Thomas and Cynthia (Niblack) Shockley. The parents were Georgia people who settled in Texas in 1846 in Kaufman county, and later moved to Smith county, where his father lived until his death, in 1852. The mother died a number of years later. A. P. Shockley was the youngest of nine children, five daughters and four sons. Only one other is still living, G. H. Shockley, in Comanche county, engaged in farming.

Judge Shockley had very limited education in private schools. His first regular work was in the live stock industry during the years of the free range. After the Civil war he engaged in farming and stock raising until 1870 and in 1876 engaged in the business of raising horses. In 1884, having sold out all his stock interests, he returned to farming, and for many years followed that work in Hamilton county. Since 1892 his home has been in the city of Hamilton, and since that time he has rented his farm.

In 1892 he was elected sheriff and tax collector of Hamilton county, holding the office for two years. In 1902 he was chosen justice of the peace and county commissioner, and served three terms, and in 1912 was re-elected justice of the peace, a place which he now holds. Mr. Shockley has always been an active Democrat, and fraternally has been affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows since 1879. His church is the Methodist south.

In Hamilton county on January 18, 1872, Mr. Shockley married Miss Augusta E. Gentry, a daughter of Captain Frederick B. and Rebecca Barnett Gentry, of Hamilton county. Her father came from Tennessee, and her mother from Mississippi, and were early settlers in Texas, first locating in Washington county. Her father was one of the early Texans who bore a part in the war for independence during 1835-36, and was under General Sam

Houston in the Battle of San Jacinto. He was a well-known farmer and stock raiser, and died April 18, 1897. Mr. and Mrs. Shockley have five children, four of whom are now living. Olive R. is the wife of A. H. Moore, a stockman and farmer in Tom Green county; George S. married Miss Maud N. Durham, and is in the grocery business at Hamilton; Alice E. is the wife of Ora Cathey, living in Temple, Texas, and a clerk in a furniture store at that place; Fred E. married Miss Lizzie Crews of Hamilton, and has been assistant postmaster for six years.

JEFFERSON DAVIS MAGEE, M. D. The Taylor county medical profession is honored by the superior talents of Dr. Jefferson Davis Magee, of Abilene, a physician of recognized standing. He has been engaged in practice in this city since 1902, and in addition to firmly establishing himself in the confidence of the people as a practitioner, has shown himself a good business man in the management of his pharmacy, which he has maintained here almost since the time of his arrival. Dr. Magee was born May 24, 1861, in Pike county, Mississippi, and is a son of Dr. Levy and Malissa Magee, of the Bayou State.

The Magee family, as its name would indicate, originated in Ireland, from whence the progenitor of the family came to America at an early date, gradually drifting to Mississippi. There Dr. Levy Magee, the father of Dr. Magee, was born, and became a well-known physician of Holmesville. He was also the owner of a large estate, which he cultivated with slave labor, but, like many other wealthy and patriotic Southerners, lost his fortunes in the great struggle between the North and the Confederacy, and on the close of hostilities moved to Wood county, Texas. He survived but a short time, however, and passed away in 1868, when still a comparatively young man. His widow survived him for a long period, dying in Smith county, Texas, in 1906.

Jefferson D. Magee early gave evidence of possessing an inclination for the medical profession, and after attending the public schools of Smith county, Texas, and Rosedale High school, he took a medical course in the Louisville Medical College, Louisville, Kentucky. He was graduated in 1886, although later, in 1902, he took a post-graduate course at the Polyclinic Institute, New Orleans. After receiving his diploma, Dr. Magee entered upon the practice of his profession at Mount Sylvan, Texas, and continued there for sixteen years, at the end of which period he came to Abilene, and has since built up an excellent practice among the most representative people of the city. He has been very devoted to the duties of his profession, and has found in the faithful performance of each day's work inspiration and strength for the labors of the next. He has a broad and comprehensive knowledge of the science of medicine, and his ability and success are indicated by his extensive practice. He carries a full line of the finest drugs, also handling druggists sundries, toilet articles, and such other goods as are to be found in first-class establishments in the leading cities. The Doctor is a Democrat in his political views, but has not sought public preferment, preferring to give his whole attention to his profession. In addition to belonging to the various medical organizations of his county and State, and to the Baptist Church, of which he is a trustee, he holds membership in the local lodges of the Masons and the Woodmen of the World, and in all of these connections has numerous friends.

On January 8, 1888, Dr. Magee was married to Miss Anna Millbanks, daughter of J. H. and Anna Millbanks, of Smith county, Texas, whose father was a farmer of that county until his death in 1905, while her mother passed away several years prior to that date. Dr. and Mrs. Magee have had children as follows: The eldest, a son, aged twenty-three years, is attending Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tennessee, preparing for a medical career; Murray and Holt, who assist their father in his drug business; Carl, who is attending Simmons College; Ruth, who is a pupil in the Abilene public schools; J. D., Jr., who is but two and one-half years old; and two children who died in infancy.

Like other men who have found their success in the Southwest, Dr. Magee has never hesitated to extol his section, and from his own experience can speak of the opportunities offered by the Lone Star State to the men who have the ability and determination to succeed. He has always encouraged settlement here, and is at all times ready to satisfy the seeker of information.

BURLESON STATEN, M. D. In the El Paso medical fraternity Dr. Staten has a place of exceptional prominence owing to his splendid personal ability, his training and experience in the best schools and hospitals of America and Europe, and in his specialty of children's diseases, he has no superiors in the entire state of Texas.

Dr. Burleson Staten comes of an old and honored southern family. He was born in Desoto county, Mississippi, December 7, 1873. His father before him was a physician and on his mother's side the Burlesons are among the most distinguished of southern families. The Burlesons were of English origin. Two brothers of the name came from that country during the colonial era, Sir Edward Burleson founding the branch of the family in Massachusetts and his brother Aaron settling in North Carolina. Aaron subsequently moved over the mountains into Kentucky along with Daniel Boone and other pioneers of Old Kentucky, and brought his son Aaron Jr. Aaron Jr. acquired distinction and fame as an Indian fighter. In the next generation was Jonathan S. Burleson, who married a daughter of Governor Adair of Kentucky, this having been an elopement, and an event which created much excitement in social circles of Kentucky at the time. Jonathan Burleson, a son of the last named Jonathan, married a granddaughter of Sir Edward Burd of Virginia. From Kentucky, Jonathan Burleson moved into Alabama, locating at Decatur, and became president of the first legislature of Alabama. His oldest son, Aaron Burleson, was the first white child born in Alabama. Mary Adair (Burleson) Staten, the mother, was a daughter of this pioneer Alabamian. Dr. James Staten, father of the El Paso physician, came to Mississippi in 1838, locating in Desoto county. During the Civil war he served as a surgeon under General Forrest until recalled home in order to take charge of the widow and orphans. He was a very prominent man both in his profession and as a citizen. His death occurred in 1883, in Desoto county, and his mother survived him many years, spending her later years in El Paso, where her death occurred in 1909.

Dr. Burleson Staten, the only child of his parents, completed his literary education in Baylor University, at Waco, where he was graduated Bachelor of Science in the class of 1897. During the following year he taught a class in mathematics at Baylor, and next became principal of one of the public schools in Fort Worth, where he remained two years. During his career as teacher he spent his evenings and his vacations in the study of medicine and in 1900 entered Tulane University Medical College at New Orleans, where he remained one year. He was granted a license to practice in 1901, and then became railroad surgeon for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company with headquarters at Hartzell, Alabama. During his early career he was never able to pursue his studies to the satisfaction of his ambition in a consecutive manner, owing to the necessity of providing for his livelihood, but he has never on that account desisted from his determination to secure the best training and equipment possible for the larger fields for his professional service.

After one year in the railway service he took post-graduate work in the Columbia and National Universities at Washington, D. C., then in 1903 he located in El Paso. The removal here was in consequence of his ill health, and he began his practice in the eastern part of El Paso county, in order to get the full benefit of the altitude and climate. After a year's practice there he again gave up practice in order to continue his studies. He made an extended trip abroad in London, studied under the auspices of the eminent physicians and surgeons in the great Ormond Street Children's Hospital. He also attended lectures in Paris, and for some time was a student in the Pasteur Institute. After his return from Europe he spent two years in New York city in post graduate work, and in 1905 returned to El Paso, as his permanent location. Here he has enjoyed a large practice as physician and surgeon, and has no superior in both equipment, education and practical skill. His best success and the largest share of his practice is in the treatment of children's diseases. He has had charge of the Baldwin Sanitarium. He is a member of the El Paso County and State Medical Societies, and the American Medical Association. In politics he is a Democrat.

Dr. Staten, in 1903, married Miss Lillie Cowden, daughter of George E. and Minnie (Dysart) Cowden, her father being a prominent banker of Fort Worth. Mrs. Staten, like her husband, is a graduate of Baylor University. Their church is the First Baptist, and Mrs. Staten is a member of the Daughters of the Revolution, and the Daughters of the Confederacy. Both the doctor and wife are fond of travel, and were together during the doctor's extended studies in Europe. The four children born to Doctor and Mrs. Staten are Lilly Adair, George, Mary Elizabeth, deceased, and Ruth Dysart.

Dr. Staten besides his practice gives much time to agriculture and is the owner of one hundred and seventy-seven acres of fine irrigated land in El Paso county, this land having cost him twenty-five thousand dollars. He also owns a beautiful home on Mesa Avenue. The doctor is a firm believer in the greatness both actual and potential of El Paso and west Texas. He is a man of decided opinions and large experiences from travel and practical work and observation entitle him respectful hearing. He insists that the greatest need of our country today is greater opportunities of education, not only for the children, but for all classes of people, and particularly for our national legislators. He thinks it would be profitable if the government might pay the expenses of our congressmen while studying conditions in Europe and other foreign lands, since he believes that such an experience would be of great advantage to them in making better laws and providing more wisely for the national welfare.

LOUIS W. SANDUSKY. To the political and religious struggles which have featured the history of various European countries in past years, America owes some of its best citizenship. Denied what they have considered their inalienable rights, men of determination and character have journeyed to the shores of this country, seeking the freedom of thought and belief allowed under this liberal form of government. A notable example of this class is found in the Sandusky family, members of which have risen to distinguished positions in civic and military life, in the professions, in politics and in business. At an early time in the history of this country three brothers named Sandusky were banished from Poland on account of their religious convictions, and emigrated to Virginia, from whence they journeyed to Kentucky with the famous Daniel Boone. One brother subsequently went north and established a trading post, now the important city of Sandusky, Ohio. A direct descendant of one of these brothers is found in Louis W. Sandusky, who has maintained the high reputation of the family name at Colorado, Texas, as one of the leading members of the Mitchell county bar.

Louis W. Sandusky is a Texan, born near Allen, Collin county, July 12, 1879, a son of J. W. and Zabelle Sandusky, natives of Kentucky. His father was a prominent planter and stock raiser at Versailles, Woodford county, that State, and owned large estates, although the war between the North and the South greatly depleted his fortunes. In 1878 he came to Collin county, Texas, and entered into extensive farming and cattle raising operations, but in 1890, upon the death of his mother, returned to his native State to take charge of the estate. He again came to Texas in 1901, locating at Denton, where he became known as one of the large wheat raisers, and was so engaged at the time of his death, in March, 1912. His widow still survives and makes her home with her son, T. W. Sandusky, at Prescott, Arkansas.

After the conclusion of his course in the public schools of Kentucky, Louis W. Sandusky began his legal studies and entered the University of Louisville, where he was graduated in 1901, with the degree of Doctor of Laws. He at once entered upon the practice of his profession at Decatur, Texas, and in 1905 came to Colorado, here opening offices. Studious, industrious, painstaking, and thoroughly systematic and upright in his method of doing business, he rapidly grew into prominence in his adopted city, and soon assumed a commanding position among the younger legists of Mitchell county. His practice has continued to be of a most representative and lucrative character, and he stands high alike in the esteem and respect of his colleagues and in the confidence of the people. A Democrat in his political views, his voice and pen have ever been at the disposal of his party, but he has had neither the time nor the inclination to enter the political arena as a seeker for personal preferment. In 1903, while at Decatur, Mr. Sandusky was a member of the State National Guard, and was an attendant at the National Encampment recently held at Manassas, Virginia. He has reached the Knight Templar degree in Masonry and is also a Pythian. A consistent member of the Christian church he has been earnest in assisting its work, and for several years has acted in the capacity of deacon.

On January 15, 1908, Mr. Sandusky was united in marriage with Miss Sallie L. Guss, of Denton, Texas, daughter of C. W. and Louisa Guss. Mr. Guss, who is a well-known magazine and newspaper writer, and for forty years editor of the Denton Monitor, is still living, and makes his home in Fort Worth. In 1912 he was a candidate for the office of land commissioner. One child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Sandusky, Margaret L., an interesting miss of four years.

WALTER TERRY SAXON. Probably the longest record of service in any one county office in west Texas is that of Captain Saxon, who has served as county surveyor of Hamilton county for thirty-four years, and with the exception of one two years' term this service has been continuous since 1877. Captain Saxon has been prominent in Hamilton county for forty years, and came to Texas after the war, in which he made a splendid record as a Confederate soldier.

Walter Terry Saxon was born April 20, 1836, in Autauga county, Alabama, a son of Dr. B. W. and M. C. (Terry) Saxon. On his father's side he is of English ancestry, and Irish on his mother's. His father was a native of South Carolina, and the mother of North Carolina. His father practiced medicine for many years in Alabama, and in 1856 moved to Florida, where he was a planter, farmer and slave owner. He served as a delegate to the secession convention at Tallahassee, Florida, in February, 1861. On the 15th of February he voted for secession and his death occurred during the same evening. His mother passed away in 1862. There were seven children in the family, four sons and three daughters, and three are now living as follows: Frank E. Saxon, who served as county clerk for thirty years, and is now engaged in farming, a resident of Brookville, Florida; Mrs. T. M. Simmons, widow of Captain Felix Simmons, and living in Newport, Arkansas.

Walter Terry Saxon in 1856 graduated from the Miltary Institute of the state of Alabama. During 1860-61 he worked as a surveyor in Florida, and in the latter year raised a company for the Confederate army. He was elected captain of Company C. of the Third Florida Regiment. His company was known as the Hernando Guards. He was with the army of Tennessee under General Bragg, Joseph Johnston and General Hood. During the Buell and Bragg raids through Kentucky, he was wounded at Perryville, and it was supposed that his wound was a mortal one, a bullet having passed through his chest. He was well cared for by the physicians and nurses at Bardstown, Kentucky, and recovered and was exchanged at Vicksburg in time to participate and lead his company at the Battle of Murfreesboro. He was then ordered into Mississippi under Joseph Johnston, to relieve Vicksburg, and on July 12, 1863, after the surrender of Vicksburg, was at the Battle of Jackson, Mississippi. On that day he commanded a skirmish line of Breckenridge's Division, and had the credit of capturing about four hundred Federal troops, all of whom were Germans and unable to speak a word of English. Later Captain Saxon participated at the great battle of Chickamauga, and then in quick succession followed the battles of Missionary Ridge, Dalton, Resaca, Ringgold, New Hope Church, and at the last named he was again wounded, though he rejoined his command in time to fight at Atlanta. On August 30, 1864, the command fell back from Atlanta, to Jonesboro, Georgia, where he was again wounded through the hip. At Decatur, Alabama, he joined Hood on his march into Tennessee, and was at the battle of Franklin, Tennessee. On account of his many wounds he had to retire from that battle. In April, 1865, having recuperated, he reported for duty just three days before the surrender of General Joseph Johnston, on the twenty-sixth of April, 1865.

Captain Saxon after the war returned to his home in Brooksville, Florida, and in the fall of 1866 was elected a representative from Hernando and Sumpter county, Florida, and spent two terms in the state legislature. That was during the era of reconstruction, and he took a very prominent part. In 1868-69, he raised a company of Ku Klux Klan, and operated in southern Florida. It was chiefly owing to his activities during reconstruction days that he was obliged to leave Florida, and he sought a home in Texas in 1873. In that year he located at Hamilton, and is now one of the oldest residents of this town. He was soon appointed deputy county surveyor, and in 1877 was elected to the office of county surveyor. As already stated, with the exception of one term of two years, he has held the office up to the present time, for a period of thirty-four years in the aggregate.

Captain Saxon has long been a loyal Democrat, and has done much for the good of the party. Captain Saxon is also affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having held all the official chairs of his lodge.

On June 11, 1864, in Auburn, Alabama, Captain Saxon married Miss Sue B. Simmons, a daughter of Col. Holman F. and Eliza Simmons of Alabama. Her father was a planter and contractor, and before the war owned a large number of slaves. Captain Saxon and wife have two living children: Troup Saxon, now living in Oklahoma; Bessie married Mr. Charles Camp, and they reside in Oklahoma City.

WILLIAM A. BUTLER. For more than twenty years Mr. Butler was actively identified with the stock raising industry of west Texas, and in recent years has been a well known citizen of Brownwood where he has served in various official capacities, and at the present time is engaged in the feed and grain business in that city. During the early days of the range cattle industry he rode horseback over practically all of Texas, Oklahoma, Southern Kansas and Wyoming, and from that varied experience in different parts of the west came to the conclusion that central west Texas was the best of all regions for wholesome living and profitable industry. Though he has lived in Texas since he was five years old, his regret is that he was not born in the state, since he is an ardent lover of Texas and all its interests and people.

William A. Butler was born near Knoxville, Tennessee, January 1, 1862. His parents were Thomas A. and Nannie A. Butler, his father having been a farmer in Tennessee, but in 1867 came to Texas and located near Fort Worth, continuing as a farmer and stock raiser in Tarrant county, until he retired. His latter years were spent in the city of Fort Worth, where he died in January, 1907. When the war broke out between the states he enlisted from Tennessee as a private in the Confederate army, and was promoted for gallant and efficient service to the rank of major in his regiment. He was at the front throughout most of the war and fought in many of its important battles. The mother died about 1906, and of the seven children, two boys and five girls, William A., is next to the oldest.

The schools and opportunities for education in Tarrant county during the sixties and seventies were limited, and Mr. Butler has become a well informed business man and citizen largely as a result of his own efforts, and private study. He took up the practical work of life when he became a cowboy, and began riding herds along the great cattle trails leading out of Texas into Kansas over a distance of from five hundred to six hundred miles. In 1884 he moved to Brown county, and has been connected with the citizenship of this portion of Texas for nearly thirty years. He continued in the cattle business with headquarters in Brown county for about twenty years. In 1882 cattle sold at prices from twenty to twenty-five dollars a head, and in 1893 he saw the price of such live stock drop to from three to five dollars a head. That was due largely to the drought, and also of course to the hard times which hit the country so severely about that year. Since then cattle have steadily risen in price and the same grade of stock which sold twenty years ago at five dollars would now bring from thirty to forty dollars. In 1905 Mr. Butler disposed of his interests in the cattle business, and in 1906 was appointed superintendent of the water works at Brownwood. For three terms of six years he served as marshal of Brownwood, and for a similar period was assessor and tax collector of the city. Since May 6, 1913, he has given all his time to the seed and grain business in Brownwood. Mr. Butler has always been an active worker for Democratic principles, and is an admirer of the present national administration. He is affiliated with the Masonic Order and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, also of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. His first marriage occurred in 1886 to Miss Eva Booth of Tarrant county, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Madison Booth. Her father was a farmer and also one of the old-time surveyors of north Texas, and both he and his wife are now deceased. Mr. Butler had two children by his first wife, who died in 1900. In 1906 he married Mrs. Nancy Hughes of Brownwood. She is a daughter of Joseph Martin, now deceased, formerly a resident of San Marcos. Her mother is still living and has her home with Mr. and Mrs. Butler in Brownwood, aged about sixty-seven years. Mr. Butler's sons are Duke, born in November, 1888, and now married and manager of the Magnolia Oil Company at Brownwood; and Earl, who was born in 1894, and is bookkeeper for his father.

JAMES J. KASTER. One of the progressive citizens who has found in El Paso ample scope for the gaining of definite success along normal lines of business enterprise and who has made the best of the opportunities presented, is Mr. Kaster, who is here a citizen of prominence and influence and one firmly entrenched in popular confidence and esteem. His status in the community is such as to render specially consonant his representation within the pages of this history of the state of his adoption.

Mr. Kaster was born near Independence, Jackson county, Missouri, on the 4th of April, 1878, and is a son of James J. and Sarah Elizabeth (McAllister) Kaster, the former a native of Iowa and the latter of Indiana. James J. Kaster, Sr., became one of the extensive agriculturists and sheepgrowers of Jackson county, Missouri, where he was the owner of a large and valuable landed estate and was a citizen of prominence and influence. He was a gallant soldier of the Union in the Civil war, in which he served as second lieutenant in a regiment of Iowa volunteer infantry, with which command he continued on active duty until the close of the war. He was a scion of one of the sterling pioneer families of Iowa, where he was born in the year 1831, and he passed the closing years of his life on his old homestead in Jackson county, Missouri, where he died in 1885. His widow now resides at Independence, that county, at the age of seventy-four years and secure in the affectionate regard of all who know her. Of the seven children two are deceased; Earl T. is president of the Union National Bank, at Union, Oregon; Birdie is the wife of George Kolle, of Castle Rock, Colorado; Thomas T. is a prominent jeweler in Kansas City, Kansas; James J., of this review, is the next in order of birth; and Mayme.

James J. Kaster gained his early education in the public schools of his native county, where he supplemented this training by a course in Woodland College, at Independence, the judicial center of the county. At the age of twenty-one years Mr. Kaster went to Mexico, where he remained five years, in the capacity of captain of the great ranch known as Hacienda de los Rinias, owned by the firm of Nelson & Weller, of Kansas City, Missouri. On this extensive cattle ranch Mr. Kaster had the general supervision of the work of the Mexican employes and also the safeguarding of the health of the live stock. He reverts with satisfaction to his experience in this connection, especially by reason of the fact that incidentally he learned to speak with fluency the beautiful Spanish language.

In 1898 Mr. Kaster returned to Kansas City for a visit and shortly afterward he went to the city of Chicago, where he entered the Chicago College of Embalming. In this institution he completed the prescribed course and was graduated in 1899, and in the autumn of that year he came to Texas and established his home in El Paso, where he purchased the interest of Frank Carr, in the undertaking firm of Carr & Nagley. Soon afterward the business was incorporated with a capital stock of fifty thousand dollars. Mr. Kaster became president and general manager of the company and today he is virtually the owner of the entire business, which is the leading one of the kind in El Paso, with thoroughly metropolitan equipment and service. A large and complete stock is carried at all times and the company own their own hearses, carriages and horses, and their splendid modern building, in the heart of the city's business district, was erected at a cost of nearly six thousand dollars. In the building is a fine chapel, in which funeral services are held, and every department of the service is seemly and effective. This company is the only one in the entire southwest to utilize an automobile hearse.

Mr. Kaster has shown his abiding faith in the great future of El Paso by making judicious investments in real estate. He owns at the present time a large block of desirable residence lots in El Paso and is adding to his real estate holdings whenever desirable investments offer. His fine home, a center of gracious hospitality, is located at 1106 Arizona street, in the Golden Hill district, one of the most attractive residence sections of the city. Mr. Kaster is a stockholder in the company operating the chemical-fiber works in El Paso, is the owner of extensive lands in Presidio county, and is one of the active and valued members of the El Paso Chamber of Commerce.

In politics, though never ambitious for public office, Mr. Kaster accords unwavering allegiance to the Democratic party and his civic loyalty is shown by his giving his influence and tangible support to measures and undertakings projected for the general good of the community. He is a director of the El Paso Automobile Club, is chancellor of the local lodge of the Knights of Pythias, and for twelve years he has held official position in the El Paso lodge of the Benevolent & Protective Order of Elks, besides which he is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

On the 1st of September, 1901, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Kaster to Miss Maude Lafferty, of Altoona, Pennsylvania, and they have two children,—James J., Jr., and a representative of the fourth generation to bear this personal name; and John L.

JAMES THOMAS DAVIS. A resident of Tom Green county since 1901, and formerly a rancher in this county, Mr. Davis is now the active manager of the West Texas Cold Storage & Ice Company of San Angelo, and by his energy and progressive management has done much to make that an important local institution in this city.

James Thomas Davis was born in McLennan county, Texas, December 24, 1878, a son of Zach and Fanny C. Davis, of San Angelo. Grandfather Davis was a soldier in the Confederate army, going throughout the struggle, and from his home state of Missouri its members were scattered about the Civil war time, and found homes in different states of the Union. On the mother's side James T. Davis is of Irish descent, and the Martins are well known in McLennan county and different parts of the state. Zach Davis came to Texas from Missouri about the Civil war time at the age of twelve years, and lived in McLennan county, and was a stock farmer until 1901, in which year he sold out and moved to San Angelo. There he was engaged in ranching, having his headquarters in Polk county, north of San Angelo, and is still one of the prosperous and substantial stockmen of west Texas.

James T. Davis, who was the second of eight children, received his education in McLennan county in the public schools, and his first regular occupation was assisting his father on the ranch in McLennan county. He moved out to Tom Green county in 1901, and was engaged in farming in that county until September, 1908. He then left the ranch, and entered business affairs in the city of San Angelo, since which time he has become manager of the West Texas Cold Storage & Ice Company. This plant, which supplies most of the local trade, produces fifteen tons of ice every day and provides facilities for ten tons of cold storage. About fifteen men are employed in the operation of the business.

In politics Mr. Davis has done what he could to promote the welfare of the Democratic party, though he has had no ambition for office. He is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Modern Woodmen of America, and the Loyal Order of Moose. He belongs to the Chamber of Commerce and the Young Men's Business Club of San Angelo. In religious affairs he and his wife worship with the Southern Baptist Church of San Angelo.

On Christmas Day of 1898 he married Miss Lou O. Wills, of McLennan county, a daughter of John N. and Sarah Wills, both of whom are now living on the old homestead in McLennan county. Mr. Wills came to Texas during the early sixties and has been a substantial rancher and for several terms served as county commissioner in McLennan county. The two children of Mr. and Mrs. Davis are Cecil Thomas Davis, twelve years of age, and in the public schools, and Miss Lou Nora, aged nine and also in school.

GEORGE H. BOYNTON. Since the beginning of Texas journalism on the banks of the Brazos River, with the old Texas Register nearly eighty years ago, there have been hundreds and perhaps thousands of more or less ephemeral publications of all kinds and sorts. The average lifetime of a newspaper is very short, and it is only the exceptionally enterprising and very hardy journals that continue to flourish more than a few years from their birth. A continuous and successful publication throughout a quarter of a century is almost extraordinary, and it is probable that there are only one or two dozen such papers in the history of the Texas press. For these reasons there is special interest attaching to the Hamilton Herald, which has been regularly published at Hamilton since the centennial year in 1876. It is no doubt one of the oldest papers in western Texas, and stands as one of the very few in the entire state which have prospered steadily under one name and almost under one family proprietorship for more than thirty-five years. The Herald came into the ownership of the Boynton family soon after it was established, and three generations of that name have contributed to its success, so that the Boyntons properly are to be classified as among the most successful newspaper men in the state.

Mr. George H. Boynton, the present proprietor and publisher of the Hamilton Herald, is a son of the late C. M. Boynton, who conducted the Herald for many years, while a son of George H. is now an active member of the Herald staff. George H. Boynton was born in Bourbon county, Kentucky, September 5, 1865, a son of C. M. and Sarah L. (Irvin) Boynton. The Boynton family came originally from Canada, and its members are scattered over different parts of the United States, four of the original families having located in Texas. They are of English and Scotch descent. C. M. Boynton and wife came to Texas in 1875, locating in Hamilton. He was a school teacher in Kentucky for a number of years, and in 1877 bought the Hamilton Herald, which had been established the previous year. He continued as its editor until his death, on March 8, 1901. His wife died January 4, 1902. There were six children, three sons and three daughters, of whom George H. was the second son.

George H. Boynton, who was ten years of age when he came to Texas, received most of his education in the public schools in Hamilton, later spent two years as a student in the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio, where he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Science in 1885. Returning home he became actively identified with the management of the Herald, and worked in every department of the establishment until his father's death, when he assumed entire charge. The success of the Herald may be attributed not only to an exceptionally strong business management, but also to its steadfast editorial policy, independent, yet public-spirited, and its columns have always been open to rational opinion and to all the news that was news. It has steadily advocated the betterment of civic and moral and industrial conditions in county, state and nation, and has consistently maintained its support of the Democratic party. It has for years enjoyed the largest circulation in Hamilton county and adjacent parts of western Texas, and among its subscribers have been many of the leading public men of the state. Among the names which appear on the subscription list are those of the late Judge A. W. Terrell, Governor L. S. Ross, Marion Martin, Governor T. M. Campbell, Senators Culberson and Bailey, and many others who have been conspicuous in the public life of the state. The editorial opinions of the Herald have had a generous quotation in other papers of the state and the southwest.

Mr. Boynton himself has been a vigorous Democrat, was a member of the State Democratic Executive Committee, in 1908, and his paper has supported the nominees of his party, whether local, state or national. At the same time it is to be stated that the Herald has always believed in the gold standard principle as advocated by President Cleveland, and has held to that belief through all party changes.

Mr. Boynton is affiliated with the Masonic Order, and the Knights of Pythias and the Maccabees, and has filled all the official chairs in the lodge of the Knights of Pythias. He belongs to the Young Men's Business Club of Hamilton, and is a member of the Christian church, having for a number of years been an elder in that church.

C. M. Boynton

On October 4, 1887, in Hamilton, Mr. Boynton married Miss Donella Crews, a daughter of Dr. L. and Helen Crews of Hamilton. Her father came from Georgia to Texas in 1875. For some years he practiced medicine, and served as a surgeon in the southern army during the war. After his removal to Hamilton he took up the practice of medicine and so continued until his death, about 1905. Mrs. Crews, the mother, is still living, at the age of eighty-two. The brothers of Dr. Crews, Charles, was a general in the Confederate army, and another, Fleming Crews, served as a captain in the same war.

Mr. and Mrs. Boynton have three children, one daughter and two sons. Eleanor, born September 3, 1888, is the wife of Bert Perry of Waco. Her husband is connected with the First National Bank of Waco; Charles Leonidas, born December 30, 1892, is now assisting in the publication of the Hamilton Herald; George Harry, the youngest, was born June 3, 1898, and is now attending school.

Hamilton county and west Texas in general have no more vigorous advocate of the natural resources and possibilities of the country than Mr. Boynton, whose long residence itself attests his faith in the country. He has been very successful as a newspaper man, and is now proprietor of one of the best equipped establishments of its kind in western Texas. He owns his own office building, a two-story stone structure, twenty-five by eighty-five feet. This building was erected several years ago, and embedded in the cement in one of the south pillars supporting the front of the building is an iron pipe containing a copy of the first issue of the Herald, printed some thirty-seven years ago, and also a copy of an issue of 1910. Throughout his business career Mr. Boynton has enjoyed the full confidence of the community, and is one of the most influential and highly respected men of Hamilton county.

S. Z. PARK. A well known contractor and builder of San Saba, S. Z. Park has been a resident of that city since 1911, has gained a solid foothold in the business activities of the community, and his thorough experience in his profession and his public spirit have made him an important factor in the city.

S. Z. Park was born June 12, 1881, in Lexington, Tennessee, a son of D. H. Park, a substantial farmer, who now lives in Henderson county, Tennessee, where for many years he has followed his regular activities as an agriculturist. There were five children in the family, and S. Z. Park was the third.

Educated in the public schools of Tennessee and Georgia, with higher training at Christian College in Henderson, Tennessee, graduating with the degree B. A. in 1902, Mr. Park was for several years in educational work, being employed two terms as an instructor in the noted Add-Ran College at Thorpe Springs, Texas, and afterwards followed commercial lines about four years at Granbury. In 1907 he engaged in a general contracting business at Granbury, and continued successfully there until moving to San Saba in 1911. In his work he has directed a number of the better class of buildings in San Saba and vicinity, and has the best of business affiliations.

Mr. Park has always been a Democrat, working for the advancement of the party but never as an office seeker. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Masonic Order, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Woodmen of the World.

On October 1, 1905, Mr. Park married at Granbury, Texas, a daughter of C. W. Glenn, for many years a prominent merchant of Granbury, but now retired. Mr. and Mrs. Park have two children: Sidney Z. and Dabney Glenn. The family are members of the Missionary Baptist church, and in this connection it should be stated that the paternal grandfather of Mr. Park was a Baptist minister, serving in Tennessee for many years.

CAPTAIN B. B. PADDOCK. If the city of Fort Worth wished to express through the character of one citizen the spirit and ideals which have actuated its progress and development during the past forty years, no one man could so broadly and fully represent the city as Captain B. B. Paddock. Ever since locating in Fort Worth in 1872, when it was a mere village on the hill overlooking the Trinity and out on the western frontier, Captain Paddock has exhibited that kind of public spirit which constantly plans for community welfare and is prodigal of personal time, energy and means in getting the plans carried out. The friend who writes these lines of biography and appreciation knows as a matter of fact that there is hardly a citizen of consequence in all north or west Texas who is unacquainted with the personality and work of Captain Paddock, and who has not a kindly admiration for both what he has done and for what he is.

While the late Peter Smith is regarded as "the father of Fort Worth," it has been given to Captain Paddock to foster the child through its village and city development and to live to witness in later times the fine fruition of the plans and enterprise that engaged his earlier associate.

Captain B. B. Paddock was born in Cleveland, Ohio, January 22, 1844, a son of Boardman and Margaret (Buckley) Paddock. His father, who was a farmer, in the following year moved to Wisconsin, where Captain Paddock was reared till the age of fifteen. While Captain Paddock impresses one as a man of broad knowledge and thorough education, he was indebted neither to school nor college for his early training, and as a matter of fact has gained his knowledge of both books and men by self-tuition and varied experience. His boyhood was spent on the northwestern frontier, chiefly in lumber camps and among the Indians, and in 1861 he went to Mississippi and volunteered in the Confederate army in Colonel Wirt Adams Cavalry Regiment of that state. Bravery and gallantry in active service gave him promotion on July 2, 1862, to the rank of captain, and he was put in command of a company of scouts, being the youngest commissioned officer in the Confederate army. His service took him into Alabama, east Tennessee and east Louisiana, and the Yazoo valley was the scene of his most dangerous and daring exploits. The capture by him and his company in 1864 of a federal gunboat on the Yazoo river was a few years ago made the subject of an interesting article in the Philadelphia Public Ledger. When first appointed chief of scouts his company consisted of forty-eight picked men, but he afterwards recruited it to one hundred and ten. Notwithstanding the fact that this troop was in every engagement of its regiment and a number of pitched battles, not a man had blood drawn throughout the time of actual hostilities, although several of the men were killed in a battle which took place in Alabama in the latter part of April, 1865, before the combatants of either side were apprised of Lee's surrender and the end of the war. In the course of his army career Captain Paddock had five horses shot from under him, and after one engagement his clothes showed twenty-seven holes punctured by bullets. He and his men came to have the reputation of bearing charmed lives, and this feeling prompted them to unusual deeds of daring. This troop was the last under fire east of the Mississippi, and Captain Paddock has preserved what he believes to have been the last Confederate flag to be swung to the breeze in battle. One other distinction which Captain Paddock's modesty seldom allows to be mentioned is that his own soldierhood and achievement have furnished the basis in part for the fiction narrative built up by George W.

Cable in one of his most interesting novels, "The Cavalier."

After the war Captain Paddock settled at Fayette, Mississippi, and while working for his support studied under a private tutor, took up law and was admitted to the bar. He practiced with considerable success for eight years, but finding that his temperament was unsuited for the career of a lawyer, he abandoned it for journalism. In October, 1872, Captain Paddock moved from Mississippi to Texas, settling in Fort Worth. At that time Fort Worth was a frontier town on the north-west edge of the rapidly advancing wave of settlement. The first railroad did not reach the town for nearly four years, and Captain Paddock was a leader among those who sustained the faith and helped carry out the plans which in a few years made Fort Worth a city. He founded the Fort Worth Democrat, and edited and published that paper for ten years, until it was merged with the Gazette, of which he was managing editor for two years. After that he was paying teller of the First National Bank two years, and resigned in order to promote the construction of the Fort Worth & Rio Grande railway. Through his efforts this road, opening up the great cattle and farming districts southwest of Fort Worth, was financed and built to Brownwood, a distance of one hundred and forty-two miles. Captain Paddock was president of the company for five years. He then turned his attention to the promotion of a railroad to run northwest from Fort Worth, but did not succeed in this enterprise. While his work as a railroad builder added one important line to those radiating from Fort Worth, it is possible to say that no one man by the influence of his newspaper and his personal efforts did more to promote Fort Worth as a railway center, and his enthusiasm has been one of the mainstays of the city in its times of depression as well as prosperity. Captain Paddock was for a number of years engaged in the investment securities business, and on December 31, 1909, formally retired.

Politically Captain Paddock is a sound money Democrat of the Grover Cleveland type, and was a presidential elector on the Palmer and Buckner ticket in 1896. He was elected mayor of Fort Worth in 1892 and served successively for eight years, or four terms. He was a member of the Texas legislature in 1881-83, and is one of the present representatives from Tarrant county, his term being for 1913-15. He was one of the organizers of the Fort Worth Board of Trade, and for a number of years was its secretary.

Seldom has a citizen been so honored in his lifetime as Captain Paddock. In 1910 the Fort Worth Chamber of Commerce, in recognition of the services rendered the city in various ways, made him "honorary president for life of the chamber." In the words of the Fort Worth Star "the action of the executive committee regarding Captain Paddock is, perhaps, the most signal honor that has ever been conferred upon a citizen of Fort Worth. Secretary of the Board of Trade during the years when Fort Worth made its greatest strides, he was permitted to resign from the post only a few years ago, when he declared the time had come for him to pay some attention to his own business affairs. At that time he was jokingly declared the 'official town loafer,' with power to prevent anyone else in Fort Worth from loafing. He will retain this power as honorary president of the Board of Trade.

"He has been one of the few men to live to see their dreams realized. In his mind years ago he pictured Fort Worth as the center of a group of great railway systems and the center of the cattle industry of the southwest. There was but little then to base the dream upon, but the convergence of cattle trails at the spot 'where the panther laid down.' With the cooperation of other pioneers, with keen sight, he soon witnessed the extension of the Texas & Pacific to Fort Worth and in turn the other great systems that have now reached the city. His views of a great packing center have also been realized during his life, the record of the Fort Worth market with greater receipts for its age than Chicago as a market, Kansas City or St. Louis, showing the keenness of his town building views. Interurbans, factories and wholesale houses, all have sprung up as he pictured them in his mind, and in the columns of the Fort Worth Democrat, the first paper to introduce Associated Press reports to the city. He has even given the popular name to the city. In response to the gibe of a Dallas paper that it owed its origin to being the place where the panther laid down, he placed the panther at the masthead of the Democrat and dubbed Fort Worth the Panther City."

In February, 1913, as another recognition of his work for the public, the county commissioners of Tarrant county christened a million dollar bridge across the river at Fort Worth the "Paddock Viaduct." Captain Paddock was one of the originators of the Fort Worth Spring Palace, that attracted national attention to Fort Worth. He was president and general manager of this institution in 1889-90. It has been regarded as the most unique structure for entertainment and exposition purposes ever erected. The Palace was destroyed by fire June 29, 1890, when seven thousand people were in the building, and only one life was lost. Captain Paddock was chiefly instrumental in securing the location of the Masonic Widows and Orphans Home in this city, and in that as in every other enterprise for the general welfare has cooperated to the fullest extent. Captain Paddock is a Knight Templar Mason and Shriner, a member of the Knights of Pythias, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, being past chancellor of the Knights of Pythias senior past master of the Fort Worth Masonic Lodge and past exalted ruler of the Elks. He also belongs to the Fort Worth Club. While not a member of any church he attends and contributes to the support of the Presbyterian denomination, and has aided in construction of almost, if not quite, every church in the city. He has also lent the influence of his good citizenship and his means to the founding and support of the Public Library, the Y. M. C. A., the Auditorium, the Coliseum and all other public buildings of like character.

Captain Paddock was married at Fayette, Mississippi December 10, 1867, to Miss Emmie Harper. Their children are: Mary Hermine, born March 3, 1869, and died August 22, 1870; Wirt A. Paddock, born May 9, 1870; William B. Paddock, born February 7, 1873; and Virgile Paddock, born June 7, 1877.

J. WILLARD CROTTY. It would seem that in the great and growing commonwealth of Texas there is something in the very atmosphere that produces a class of strong virile men, who rapidly assume responsibilities and achieve success that in other sections come to men only after a lifetime of earnest effort. A case in point is found in the career of J. Willard Crotty, of Dallas, who at the early age of thirty years is a wealthy and successful capitalist, the promoter and builder of the interurban line from this city to Greenville, and prominently identified with numerous other large projects. Mr. Crotty was born in the city of Denver, Colorado and was brought in 1889, when five years of age, to Dallas, where he was reared and went to the public schools. While still a mere youth he went to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he engaged in newspaper work, becoming an advertising solicitor on one of the large dailies of that city. Subsequently he worked into the advertising department of a number of newspapers not only of that city, but of every section in the United States and into Canada and Mexico, an experience which proved a fine training for his future career, as it brought him into contact with the brightest minds and the biggest figures in the business world. Returning to his home in Dallas in 1910, he began his career as a promoter and financier that, notwithstanding his youth, has placed him in the front rank of successful men who accomplish big things. He has already laid the foundation for a fortune; his success may be deemed truly remarkable.

J. B. Crotty

Mr. Crotty promoted and financed the Eastern Texas Traction Company, of which he is active vice president and general manager, and of which Forrest E. White is president. This is an interurban electric line extending from Dallas to Greenville, a distance of fifty-three miles, through one of the richest and most densely settled sections of Texas. It is now (the summer of 1914) under construction, and will be in operation about February, 1915. Another large enterprise of great importance promoted and consummated by Mr. Crotty is a $200,000 hotel building to be completed in 1915, located on the corner of Main and Martin streets, fifty feet front on the former street, and 110 feet on the latter. Mr. Crotty and his associates obtained a lease on this piece of ground, located in the very heart of Dallas' business district, in June, 1914, for a period of ninety-nine years, which will involve an expenditure of nearly $2,000,000 before its expiration. It will be a commercial hotel of the highest class and will be conducted by an operating company that will be organized by the time the structure is completed.

Mr. Crotty is also president of the Greyhound Gravel Company, capitalized at $100,000, which owns 3,000,000 yards of gravel in Dallas county, near Irving. He has also organized and is president or other official of about sixteen real estate and investment companies, with capitals ranging from $10,000 to $50,000 each, which own valuable property interests in Dallas and the vicinity. Mr. Crotty is widely and prominently known in fraternal circles, being a life member of Dallas Commandery, Knights Templar, and at the time he was made such was the youngest man so honored in the United States. He is also a thirty-second degree Scottish Rite Mason and a Shriner, and belongs to fourteen other orders.

Mr. Crotty was married in Dallas to Miss Amanda Miller Noland, and they have two sons: Calvin Harrison and Willard.

M. FULTON. For more than thirty years a practicing attorney in West Central Texas, M. Fulton recently located at Mason, the historic old county seat of Mason county. As a lawyer, he has gained a high place in his profession and has served as assistant to the judge of the supreme court of Oklahoma, and several times has served as district judge of the Thirty-third district of Texas. His public service has been of an especially worthy nature, in every way characteristic of the man, and such as to win for him the high regard of the public and add to his professional honors as well.

Born on the 8th day of November, 1846, in West Virginia, M. Fulton is a son of David and Dorothy Fulton, formerly of West Virginia. They came to Texas in about 1875, settling on a Denton county farm, where the father continued in agricultural activities until his death in 1906. The mother passed away in 1900, with a family of eight children, comprising six sons and two daughters. Mr. Fulton, the oldest of the family, received such educational advantages as the schools of his day provided in Texas. His ambition led him to make the best of such opportunities as were at hand, and when he was yet in his teens he took up the study of law with Tom Tipton of Bloomington, Illinois, a member of congress at that time. Mr. Fulton gained admission to the bar in 1880, securing his certificate at Austin, and he inaugurated his practice at Denton, continuing there in a successful legal work for six years, and then establishing himself at old Fort Mason, Mason county, Texas. He was nominated for Congress at New Braunfels in 1898, but declined the nomination because of other interests, and upon his recommendation, J. T. Sladon was appointed to take his place. Mr. Fulton long held important interests in Oklahoma, and on returning to Texas in 1912 settled at once in San Saba. In 1913 he again took up his residence in Mason. While in Oklahoma he was appointed assistant to the judge of the supreme court of Oklahoma, and on several occasions has served as district judge of the Thirty-third district of Texas.

Aside from his legal interests and activities Mr. Fulton has taken some notice of other enterprises in his communities, and was a director of the First National Bank of Mason for several years. A Democrat, he has given what aid he reasonably could to his party, without being a politician, and has usually declined to hold office. A Mason, he has affiliations with the Ancient Arabic Order of the Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, and is a member of the Christian church.

In 1885 he was married to Miss Lee Anna Bigerstaff, of Denton, Texas, a daughter of Elijah Bigerstaff, who long served as county surveyor of Denton county. He was a soldier in the Confederate army, passing through the war unscathed, and lived in Denton county for many years until his death. After the death of his first wife Mr. Denton married Miss Ida G. Blunt, in July, 1912. She is a member of the well known Chisholm family of North Carolina and her grandfather was a member of the Continental Congress from North Carolina. Three children were born of the first marriage, and none of the second. They are named as follows: John, who was graduated from the law department in the University of Texas in 1911, and who is now engaged in practice in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; the two daughters, Margaret and Eleanor Fulton, are living in Oklahoma City.

The Fulton family is one of pure Irish extraction, the great-grandparents of Mr. Fulton having come from Ireland and settled in Pennsylvania. Others of the name settled in Virginia, and still others located in the Northwest Territory. Today the family is widespread and well known, and wherever they are found they may be reckoned with the exponents of good citizenship.

JOHN H. McLEAN. A quarter century of successful law practice has been the chief feature of the career of John H. McLean, and with the exception of about one year his home and practice have been in Llano county. Among the local bar Mr. McLean is regarded as the leader, both by reason of his long experience and by his exceptional ability and skill.

Born in Parker county, Texas, July 24, 1862, he was obliged to give much of his youth to hard work in order to help support his mother and sisters. During his youth he worked on a ranch, spending his days in riding and in the hard labor of such employment. He was a determined student, and disciplined himself so vigorously that he not only passed the entrance examinations to the law department of the State University, but within a year after matriculating at the university was graduated with high honors. After such a beginning it is not strange that Mr. McLean has made a splendid success in practice.

John H. McLean was a son of Captain Hiram H. and Ollie (Barber) McLean. His father, a native of Georgia, when a young man came to Texas, and was likewise a lawyer by profession, and belonged to the Weatherford bar during its palmy days. When the war came on he enlisted in a Texas regiment, organized his own company, going out as a lieutenant, and was promoted to the rank of captain. He saw much arduous service in many engagements, and it was during his soldier career while on a forced march, that he contracted pneumonia, which eventually brought on consumption and terminated his life in 1869, when only thirty-three years of age. His wife was a native of Alabama, and they were married in Texas. They were both devout members of the Methodist church, and her death occurred in 1880 when about thirty-eight years of age and their remains are resting side by side near Weatherford. Of the three children, John H. was the second and only son. His sisters are Mrs. Georgia Spears, a resident of San Benito; and Mrs. Lutie Watkins, of Llano.

With the exception of about two years during which time he was traveling, Mr. McLean has been a life-long resident of Texas. As a boy he attended schools until he was about fourteen when he had to quit in order to enter the ranks of wage earners. He also earned money between the ages of eleven and fourteen, and until the death of his mother in 1880 he contributed regularly to the support of her and his sisters. He went on a cattle ranch at the age of fourteen, and in 1884 was made deputy county and district clerk. During his two years in that office he formed the determination to study law. Finally resigning he went to Weatherford and began the study of law—mostly in the woods—and it was during that time that he studied and prepared himself for a university course. He was graduated from the law department of the University of Texas, in 1888, and began the practice of law at Columbus. After a brief while in that city he came to Llano in 1889 and has since enjoyed what is generally regarded as the best practice in this county.

At San Antonio, April 21, 1896, he married Miss Minnie Button, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Button, of the state of Ohio. Five children, four sons and one daughter, have been born to their marriage, namely: Juan Harold, Glenn S. (deceased), Heber H., Minnie Belle, and William B. Mr. McLean and wife are both active members in the Llano Methodist church, and he is one of the leaders in the Sunday school department. Fraternally he has taken all the degrees of the York Rite Masonry, and is past commander of the Knights Templars. He is also affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, and is past chancellor of his Lodge. The Commercial Club of Llano numbers him among its members, and in politics he is an Independent Democrat, though a prominent factor in political affairs. Mr. McLean takes much pleasure in hunting, which is perhaps his chief diversion. He enjoys good music and reading.

DANIEL MORGAN CLOWER. Now retired from the varied and interesting activities which employed him for a period of nearly sixty years. Daniel Morgan Clower is distinguished as a pioneer in the field of electrical appliances. He came to Texas during the war as a telegraph operator in the service of the Confederate government, was the man who did most of the practical work in setting up the first telephone service of Dallas more than thirty years ago, helped install the first electric lighting system, and for his long and useful services the telephone company recently retired him on a pension.

Daniel Morgan Clower was born in Shelby county, Alabama, May 12, 1835. While he was a schoolboy in his native county two men visited the little Alabama village where the Clowers lived and advertised a demonstration of the workings of the telegraph instrument, then regarded more as a curiosity than as a practical thing. This demonstration so incited the interest of the boy spectator that it subsequently gave the bent to his entire career. In 1850, when he was fifteen years of age, his parents moved to Louisiana, and in that state he followed the trade of watch maker. When the telegraph company established an office in the town Mr. Clower was given the job of operator and for a time combined the vocation of watch maker and receiver and sender of telegraphic messages. After his marriage in 1854 he spent six years in Arkansas, and in 1860 moved to Farmersville, Louisiana. In the winter of 1862 Mr. Clower joined the army of the Confederacy, and was assigned to the telegraph service, receiving the pay of a captain. It was in this service that he was sent to Texas and for two and a half years was one of the official telegraph operators at Hempstead. He sent messages from the Hempstead headquarters to army commanders in Louisiana and in all parts of Texas. Soon after the war Mr. Clower located at Bryan, engaged in the mercantile business, and in the late '60s moved out to the frontier at Comanche, where he was also a merchant. For several years Comanche was one of the typical west Texas towns, and members of the Clower family witnessed the last Indian raids in that section of the state.

In 1877 Mr. Clower and family removed from Comanche to Dallas, where for a time he was in the cotton business, but in 1880 or 1881 became the pioneer telephone man of Dallas, cutting the poles and stringing the wires for the first line in Dallas. The first telephone pole in Dallas was erected where the Slaughter building stands, on August 2, 1882. The first long distance line out of Dallas was built to Lancaster. Mr. Clower has had a personal acquaintance among all the pioneer telegraph and telephone men of the United States, and for many years has known Theodore N. Vail, the head of the great Bell telephone system. He became division superintendent of the first Dallas telephone company, and subsequently was intrusted with the work of constructing the Fort Worth and other exchanges in North Texas. About 1884 Mr. Clower resigned from the telephone company to engage in electrical contracting. That was about the time the first electric arc lights were installed in the country, and Mr. Clower put in the first arc light in Dallas and also the first electric lights at the Dallas State Fair grounds. His business as an electrical contractor continued for a few years, part of the time as member of the firm of Clower, Harris & Company. About 1893 he returned to his original work in the telephone business, and for several years had charge of the contract department for the telephone company in Dallas. As his age advanced he was given lighter duties, and for a few years before his retirement was in the collection department. On January 1, 1914, he retired entirely from active duties, and in honor of his long service the company granted him a liberal pension.

In the early days, particularly in west Texas, Mr. Clower was noted as a hunter, and took part in the Buffalo hunting which during the '70s practically exterminated the American bison on the Texas prairies. He has shot wild game in all the prominent hunting grounds of the state, has always been a traveler, and though nearly eighty years of age attended the Jacksonville reunion of Confederate veterans in 1914.

In the present year of 1914 occurred one of those impressive events in family history which have an interest for many people outside the home circle. This was the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of the wedding of Mr. and Mrs. D. M. Clower. They were married at a little village in Arkansas on March 23, 1854. Both were natives of Shelby county, Alabama, and Mrs. Clower, whose maiden name was Ellender Nelson, was born April 13, 1835. They grew up in the same community and were youthful sweethearts before the Nelson family moved to Arkansas in 1849, and the Clowers to Louisiana in 1850. Although separated by fifty miles, Mr. Clower as frequent as possible drove over the roads from Louisiana to the home of Miss Nelson in Union county, Arkansas, and when he was nineteen years of age was married and settled down to a few years' residence in Arkansas. Mr. and Mrs. Clower have four living children. John M. Clower, who lives at Cleburne, is engaged in the jewelry business; W. M. Clower is at the head of the Clower Electric Company of Dallas; Mrs. Annie Dechman lives in Jacksonville, Florida; and Mrs. Maude Clower Patterson lives with her parents in Dallas.

Walter M. Clower, a son of this venerable couple, was born in Bryan in 1871. He finished his education in the Dallas high school, being a student under Professor Morgan, for many years at the head of the Dallas high school. He also took a business course in

Mr. & Mrs. C. M. C. C.

Lawrence's Commercial College. For several years he has been one of the prominent electrical contractors of Dallas, in business under the name of the W. M. Clower Electrical Company. Mr. Clower is a director of the National Association of Electrical Contractors, and was a delegate to the annual convention of that body in Detroit in July, 1914. He was married in Dallas to Miss Jennie McIlhenny, daughter of S. E. McIlhenny, one of the prominent pioneer citizens of Dallas and of Texas. To their marriage have been born four children: Eugene, Ruth Ellen, Genevieve and William.

CAPT. JOHN W. WOMACK. Forty-one of the seventy-one years of the life of Capt. John W. Womack have been passed in Texas, and during his residence he has been engaged in a variety of pursuits, all connected with the agricultural and commercial development of the great Lone Star state. He is a veteran of the Civil War, through which he fought valiantly and won promotion, and his subsequent career has been one of sturdy endeavor and successful accomplishments. Since coming to San Antonio, in 1891, he has been engaged principally as a business contractor and paint manufacturer, activities in which he has won well-deserved success. Captain Womack was born in Butler county, Alabama, in 1843, and is a son of John M. and Elizabeth (Watts) Womack, both of whom belonged to pioneer families, their parents having fought the Indians in Butler county. John M. Womack was born in Georgia, where his family was also prominently known, while Mrs. Womack was entitled to claim membership in a distinguished family, her brother, Tom Watts, being governor of Alabama in the days prior to the outbreak of the war between the South and the North.

John W. Womack was reared in Butler county on his father's plantation, and never left the home place until the war broke out. With great reluctance his father allowed him to enlist in the Confederate army, advising him, however, at the time of his departure, never to "get shot from behind." He was a brave and courageous youth and hardly needed the inspiration of this advice, sound though it may have been. During his four years of service he was wounded four times, three times by bullets and once by a sabre thrust on the head, and all these injuries were received "from in front" and while in the midst of hard fighting. Early in April, 1861, Captain Womack enlisted in his home county of Butler, in Company F, and was later placed in a regiment known as the Eighteenth Alabama, although its members had enlisted as early as had those in regiments which received the first numbers. His first day's fighting occurred at the two-day battle of Shiloh, following which came the bloody engagement at Corinth. Following this latter struggle, his command was sent to Mobile to do provost duty, where it remained until the spring of 1862, and his company then went to Tennessee, whence it campaigned with Johnston to Georgia and the great battles that were contested in the northern part of that state. At the battle of Kennesaw Mountain, in the midst of a grilling artillery fire from the enemy, the young private grasped a shell that had dropped among a group of his fighting companions, several of whom had been killed, and, throwing it backwards over his head while the burning fuse was almost at the exploding point, got it at a safe distance before the explosion occurred, thus saving the lives of many men. For this dare-devil act of bravery he was at once promoted by General Holtzlaw, his commander, from a private to a captaincy, something rarely done in army life and only in such notable cases as this. He was placed in command of the Whitworth Guns, a company of sharpshooters, this appointment being singularly appropriate in view of the fact that Captain Womack in his youth had been widely known as an expert rifle shot. With his company he took part in the many days of fearful fighting at Atlanta, as well as in the battle of Jonesboro, and then started back toward Nashville with General Hood's army and took part with his command in all the battles en route, including the great and sanguinary conflict at Franklin. Later, returning southward with his command, the organization was captured outright just before reaching Franklin and taken prisoners to Camp Chase, Ohio, the capture occurring December 17, 1864. Captain Womack was kept a prisoner there for something more than four months, and was then sent to the South to be exchanged, going to New Orleans and thence to Vicksburg. By this time, however, the war had come to a close, and Captain Womack was paroled in June, 1865, at Vicksburg.

Returning to his home in Butler county, Alabama, Captain Womack made an effort to recuperate from the misfortunes of war by farming. He continued to be so engaged until 1873, in which year he came to Texas to visit some relatives who lived at Fairfield, in Freestone county. He immediately recognized the opportunities and advantages of this country, soon made up his mind to remain, and has continued to be a resident of Texas ever since. He was married first in Freestone county to Miss Bettie Harris, who passed away, however, after only four months and twenty days of married life. Subsequently, Captain Womack was married in the same county to Miss M. E. Speed, the daughter of Capt. Washington Speed, of Mississippi, who commanded a company from that state in the Civil War and who removed to Freestone county, Texas, after the close of that struggle.

Captain Womack remained in Freestone county until 1885, when he removed to Brownwood and there engaged successfully in merchandising. From that point he made removal to Corsicana, Navarro county, where he passed eight years, and then located at Austin, the state capital. That city continued to be his home for some ten years, and in 1891 he brought his family to San Antonio, where he has since made his residence. For some time he owned and operated a large ranch in Uvalde county, but this was traded for his present farm of 200 acres in Wilson county, thirty miles southeast of San Antonio. For several years past his main business has been as a building contractor and a paint manufacturer. Although he has passed man's allotted "Three-score and ten" Captain Womack still attends to the daily routine of his duties and takes a keen and alert interest in matters of importance as they affect his community. He bears the reputation of a man of the strictest integrity, and in the wide acquaintance which he has formed through the long years in which he has made Texas his home, he numbers many warm and appreciative friends.

Captain Womack is a member of the United Confederate Veterans and has been a member of the Baptist church since he was sixteen years of age. Mrs. Womack has also enjoyed communion with this church since her early girlhood. Their union has been blessed and their fine home made happy by three children: Miss Daisy Dell, E. J. and Miss Zella. The first-named is a graduate with honors of the University of Texas, is a teacher in the San Antonio public schools, and is a young lady of exceptional intellectual attainments and worthy ambitions.

CHARLES W. MCFARLING, M. D. Some of the ablest and best equipped members of the medical profession are found in different sections of West Texas, and one of these is Dr. McFarling of Tulia, who has been a resident of that place since 1910.

Charles W. McFarling is a native Texan, born in Lamar county, April 24, 1872. He was the ninth of eleven children, born to John and Priscilla (Hurley) McFarling, both of whom were born in Mississippi, in which state they were married. The father was a farmer and planter, and after the Civil war moved to Texas. He spent four years in the Confederate army under General Lee, and in several battles was wounded, though never seriously. From the time of his removal to Texas until his death he was a resident of Lamar county. His death occurred April 16, 1912, at the age of eighty-three years. The mother died in Lamar county at Pleasant Grove in 1880, at the age of forty-five.

Dr. McFarling as a boy attended the country school and the East Texas Normal school in Hunt county. For his professional training he entered the medical college of the University of Tennessee, where he was graduated M. D. in 1890. Dr. McFarling believes in keeping up with the procession in his work, and after his regular course in medicine he attended post graduate courses in the New Orleans Polyclinic. Dr. McFarling began his practice in Denton county, where he remained from 1894, for ten years. He then spent two years in practice at Hereford, and was practicing medicine in Fort Worth for a similar period. In 1910 he came out to Swisher county, locating at Tulia, where he has since enjoyed a large practice. He has been city health and county physician from 1910 to the present time. He has membership in the State Medical Society. Fraternally the doctor is affiliated with the Masonic Order through the Royal Arch degrees, the Woodmen of the World, the Modern Woodmen of America, the Yeomen, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. His church is the Baptist.

At Shannon, Mississippi, in February, 1895, Mr. McFarling married Miss Minnie Lee Lepede, daughter of D. H. Lepede. Her parents are still living and have their home at Mount Pleasant. The children of the doctor and wife include: Louise, born in Denton county, August, 1896; Eleanor, born in 1903; Weldon, born at Hereford in 1906; Haydon, born at Hereford in 1908; Elizabeth, born at Fort Worth in 1910. Dr. McFarling and family occupy a home of their own in Tulia, and they are all highly esteemed people of this community.

GEORGE ERNEST LOCKHART. District attorney of Lynn county, Mr. Lockhart is a progressive young lawyer, who in his earlier days fought and labored hard to win entrance to the bar and by the quality of his past performance gives promise of a brilliant professional career.

George Ernest Lockhart was born December 31, 1881, in Hood county, Texas, a son of J. C. R. Lockhart, a native of Georgia, and of Scotch-Irish stock. The father came to Texas during the later sixties, settling in Navarro county. He was a Baptist minister by profession and followed religious work from the age of sixteen until the time of his death in his eighty-ninth year. He died at Stephenville, Texas, September 9, 1911, one of the most venerable men in the service of his church. The maiden name of his wife was Lucretia Driver, who was born in Alabama, where she was married. Her death occurred in January, 1912, at the age of seventy-two. They were the parents of twelve children.

George E. Lockhart attained his early education in the public schools of Erath, Scurry and Bosque counties, to the age of eighteen. His first professional activities were in teaching school, and he spent four terms as a school master. During that work he took up and carried on the study of law privately and was admitted to practice July 27, 1909. He began his career in Gomez, in Terrell county, where he remained in practice until December, 1910. He then came out to Lynn county, where he soon established a good clientage, and in 1912 was elected to the office of district attorney. In politics he is a Democrat, and has been loyal to his party from the beginning of his career.

Fraternally he is affiliated with the Masonic Order in both the Blue Lodge and the Royal Arch Chapters, and also with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and Tahoka Camp of the Woodmen of the World. In Terrell county, December 18, 1910, Mr. Lockhart married Mrs. Luella Key, a native of Alabama. Their one child is Mary Lucretia, born December 9, 1912, at Tahoka.

Mr. Lockhart owns his home in Takoha, and considerable land in the western part of the state.

DR. ELAM PORTER MILLER JOHNSON was born at Tusculumbia, Alabama, in 1821, and died at Marshall, Texas in 1888.

Dr. Johnson was one of the pioneer physicians and distinguished citizens of Marshall. His life record is of more than passing interest, standing out prominently as it does, among the biographies of other leading Texans.

It was in 1851 that Dr. Johnson came to Texas, his removal hither being from his native State, Alabama. His first settlement was at Jefferson. A year later, in 1852, he removed to Marshall, Harrison county, which remained his home during the rest of his life. While preparing himself for his profession he had the advantage of the best training this country afforded. He attended Bellevue Hospital Medical College of New York, Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, and Tulane University Medical College of New Orleans. His high professional rank in the State is indicated by the fact that he was for several years president of the State Medical Association. To him belongs the distinction of being the first physician to promulgate the theory that mosquitoes cause malarial and yellow fever infection. He wrote an article on this subject that was read before the State Medical Association in 1874. During the Civil war he held a position of confidence under the Confederate government, in which position he made extensive trips to various parts of the country, both North and South. After the war closed he made a trip to Camp Douglas, Chicago, and brought home for burial the bodies of fourteen Confederate soldiers who had died there. This is mentioned merely as an incident among numberless others that might be given, to show the Doctor's great humanitarian qualities. He entered heart and soul into the cause of the South, although he was against secession and against slavery. He never owned slaves, but he hired many negroes to work on his plantation near Marshall, to whom he paid wages. His home was a noted center of hospitality both before and after the war, and for many years there was seldom a day passed without guests present. He was especially kind and indulgent to the old Confederate soldiers, who loved to gather at his home; indeed his kindness and generosity seemed boundless, and he was truly one of the noble characters of this earth. In innumerable cases where he gave medical attention, no bill ever was presented.

Dr. Johnson was of Scotch ancestry, and his own life and that of his children bear out the best traditions of the race. He was large physically and all of his sons are large, not one of them weighing less than one hundred seventy-five pounds. And Dr. Johnson's family was remarkable. When he was only fifteen years of age, he and Miss Eliza Stevenson, aged fourteen years, were united in marriage, and they became the parents of seventeen children. Three children died in infancy, three others died after they were grown, and eleven are still living, as follows: W. Oscar Johnson, Mrs. Kittie Craig, Mrs. O. L. Bassano, Albert S. Johnson, James Johnson, Mrs. W. T. Cox, Mrs. Hettie B. Johnson, Mrs. Verona Stone, Rev. M. C. Johnson, Mrs. Ida Robertson, and L. H. Johnson. The mother of this family died in 1890. She, too, was a native of Tusculumbia, Alabama.

Albert Sidney Johnson, one of the above named sons, was born on his father's plantation adjoining the town of Marshall, November 10, 1852, and was reared and educated here. For a number of years he has been identified with railroad work, now holding the position of storekeeper and electrician for the entire Texas & Pacific system. He has been twice married, first to Miss Alice H. Mann, and after her death to her sister, Miss Lenora Mann, his present companion. He has four children, all by his first wife, namely: Lillian

ELAM M. P. JOHNSON

May, wife of Dr. W. E. Ratliff; E. P. M. Johnson, Miss Ethel Johnson, and Sydney Johnson.

FELIX A. BURRUS. A banker and lumberman, Felix A. Burrus has been closely identified with the lumber business of San Augustine since the advent of the railroad in the county. The Burrus family settled in this vicinity more than seventy years ago, during the era of the Texas Republic, and the name has always been associated with honorable business enterprise, and worthy citizenship.

Felix A. Burrus was born at San Augustine in 1856, his birthplace having been within three hundred yards of his present attractive and tasteful home in the eastern section of the city. His parents were Anthony Asbury and Texana Carolina (Lovell) Burrus. His father, a native of Tennessee, moved to San Augustine, in eastern Texas, in 1841. For about a year his home was on what is known as the Alvis place, two miles east of San Augustine. After that he located in town, and entered into business as a merchant, and was so engaged for many years. While living in Tennessee, he was known as an expert building mechanic, and was especially skillful in the construction of water-mills. His death occurred July 28, 1898, at the age of eighty-seven. A few years after locating in Texas, he enlisted for service in the war with Mexico, and served with the American army throughout that conflict, afterwards drawing a pension for his service. During the war between the states, he was enrolling officer for the Confederacy at San Augustine.

Felix A. Burrus was reared and educated at San Augustine, and for his first experience worked as an employe several years in the store of the late Col. W. S. Blount in San Augustine. When E. A. Blount succeeded to the business in 1890, following upon his father's death, Mr. Burrus continued with the store's management, and afterwards engaged in lumber mill operation. In 1913 he disposed of all his interests in lumbering. In the meantime, in 1912, the Commercial Guaranty State Bank in San Augustine had been organized and its directors chose him as president. This bank, although young, has made a splendid success, and is one of the solid and well managed institutions in East Texas.

In 1881 Mr. Burrus married Miss Annie J. Crouch, who was born in San Augustine. Her father, the late William Crouch, was one of the earliest American settlers at San Augustine, and for a period of about eighteen years held the office of county clerk. The five children of Mr. and Mrs. Burrus are: Laura Asbury, Annie Texie, Eugene Anthony, Itasca Blount, and Ophelia Burrus.

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD. Within the brief space of fifteen years since leaving college and his admission to the bar, Morris Sheppard has made a record of rapid rise in politics that has been a source of wonder and admiration to veterans not only in this state but in the nation. The second youngest member of the United States senate, his youth has not served to disparage his evident ability and power of leadership, and in his almost continuous service in the exacting sessions since he took his seat his work and influence have been such as to gain frequent comment among the well informed observers at Washington on his undoubted insight into political and economic questions, his influence among his associates, and his growing value and power as a national representative of the people.

Senator Sheppard is a fortunate man. He is fortunate in being the son of a distinguished father, whom he succeeded in Congress, fortunate in his choice of a profession, fortunate as to the state which was his birthplace, and the fortune that has followed his own career he has rendered in double service to the state and people he represents.

Morris Sheppard was born in Titus county, Texas, though his birthplace is now in a new county named Morris. The date of his birth was May 28, 1875. His parents, Judge John L. and Alice (Eddins) Sheppard, are both deceased. The lineage is old southern stock, with early residence in the Carolinas, and includes soldiers of the Revolution and later wars of the nation. The grandfather, John T. Sheppard, was an Alabama planter. After his death his widow, Amanda (Morris) Sheppard, whose father was a clergyman, moved to Texas with her son John L., then six years old. Thus the distinguished career of the latter may be claimed as a Texas product. Largely by self-training he entered the legal profession, made it the means of extended service and personal honor, and for a number of years stood in the front rank of the bar in northeast Texas. In 1899 he moved his residence from Pittsburg in Camp county to Texarkana, which was his home until his death. His first official place was that of district attorney, followed by a term on the district bench, and then in 1898 the first district sent him as its representative to Congress. He was re-elected in 1900, and death came to him near the close of his second term in October, 1902. He had already received a nomination which was the equivalent of election for a third term. His personality, his resourcefulness as a lawyer, and his political prestige caused his loss to be keenly felt not only in his state but in the councils of the nation.

Judge Sheppard was married at Mount Vernon, Franklin county, to Miss Alice Eddins, who is also deceased. They were survived by four sons and three daughters, Senator Sheppard being the oldest; Walter Clifton, the next oldest son, a graduate of the University of Texas, is now assistant corporation counsel of New York city; John L. Sheppard, who also was educated in the Texas state university, is trial lawyer for the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company; Dr. Paul, a graduate of the University of the South at Sewanee, Tennessee, is assistant superintendent of the North Texas Asylum for the Insane at Terrell; while the daughters are Mrs. William F. Skillman, of Sulphur Springs, Texas; Mrs. Bryant Heard, of Lynchburg, Virginia; and Mrs. Cullen Thomas, of Dallas.

Senator Sheppard grew up in the villages of Daingerfield in Morris county and Pittsburg in Camp county, went to school with other boys in that piney woods district, then entered the University of Texas and remained until awarded the degree Bachelor of Arts in 1895. Obtaining the position of night watchman in the state capitol building in order to defray his own expenses, he continued in the law department until graduating LL. B. in 1897, and then had a year of post-graduate work in the law school of Yale, which gave him the LL. M. in 1898. On his return to Texas his name appeared as junior in the firm Sheppard, Jones & Sheppard, with his father the senior partner, and in 1899 they moved from Pittsburg to a broader field at Texarkana. There are many attorneys in that section of Texas who bear witness to Morris Sheppard's legal scholarship and keenness in the handling of technical and abstruse cases. On entering Congress in 1902 he closed his law office and withdrew from the practice altogether.

The death of his honored father in the fall of 1902 placed the mantle of the elder upon the son, and when he entered the house of representatives in December, 1902, he was the youngest but one among the three hundred odd members of that body. In Congress he found himself in a congenial sphere, was a hard student, won the confidence of his seniors, and did work that justified his continued service. The people of his district were more than satisfied, and signified it by returning him in 1904, 1906, 1908 and in 1910. With nearly ten years of legislative experience, with recognized rank among the house leaders, and a reputation over the state at large, he at once became a formidable candidate for promotion to the senate when Joseph W. Bailey resigned in 1912. Against two strong opposition candidates, his name received a plurality of choice at the Democratic primaries on July 27th, and he was elected by the Legislature in January, 1913. He was also elected to fill out Senator Bailey's unexpired term and took his seat late in January. He co-operated with his Democratic colleagues in giving the present administration its effective working majority for the splendid legislative and executive program that has since been carried out. Seldom have such distinguished honors come so rapidly to any American citizen. Incidentally, it should be noted that in the fifty-eighth Congress he was the youngest Democrat in either the senate or house.

Senator Sheppard is a Mason, in both York and Scottish Rite and also of the Mystic Shrine, belongs to the Knights of Pythias, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, Knights of the Modern Maccabees, Improved Order of Red Men, Odd Fellows, Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, Woodmen of the World, Phi Beta Kappa and the Kappa Alpha college fraternity. Since 1899 he has been sovereign banker of the Woodmen of the World. His church is the Methodist Episcopal, South. Senator Sheppard married at Texarkana Miss Lucile Sanderson. Their daughter Janet was born January 5, 1911.

HON. JONATHAN DAVENPORT RUDD. Pioneer citizen, prominent politician, successful planter, now living retired. These few words outline the life history of Jonathan Davenport Rudd. To go more into detail, we record that Jonathan Davenport Rudd was born in Newberry District, South Carolina, February 17, 1840.

When he was an infant his mother died, and he was only sixteen when Death bereft him of a father's care. From his father he inherited twenty-five or thirty negroes. These he brought with him to Texas in 1857, being then only seventeen years of age. Arrived here, he settled in Harrison county, about three miles south of Waskom, and engaged in agricultural pursuits, and this continued his principal occupation until he retired from active life in 1910, when he disposed of most of his landed estate and removed to Waskom. During all those years he had lived on the plantation (enlarged by subsequent purchase) where he first settled in 1857.

Mr. Rudd is universally known as Major Rudd, although he was a Colonel on the staffs of both Governors Hogg and Culbertson. As a soldier of the Confederacy he acquired the rank of Lieutenant of his company. At the beginning of the war, he enlisted in Company G, Fourteenth Texas Cavalry, Ector's Brigade, and served under Generals Johnston, Bragg and Hood in the Army of Tennessee. He was severely wounded in the face by a bullet at the battle of Altoona Mountain, Georgia. He made a splendid record as a fearless and efficient soldier and officer, and was one of the thirteen who came back out of the 141 in his company who went into the war from Panola county. Only six of the thirteen are now alive.

After the war, Major Rudd resumed active operations on his plantation, which he brought to a high degree of efficiency and production. In agriculture and stock raising he was a progressive and became a leader of those industries in East Texas. In addition to cotton planting, he branched out extensively into stock raising, and was a pioneer in the breeding of blooded horses and cattle. He brought the second herd of registered Jerseys to Texas, and for several years they were the leaders in the State. He served for some time as vice president of the Jersey Association of Texas. Major Rudd also owned a number of horses of faultless lineage, including some pacers of the Hal Pointer strain, that ranked among the fastest in America. His stock farm was a model in every particular.

Perhaps the most useful, as it certainly was the most eventful and stirring, period of Major Rudd's life was that following the war, in the reconstruction times, which was particularly bitter and tragic for the good citizens of Harrison county. No man in the county did more than Major Rudd to overthrow the infamous scalawag rule that burdened the people with debt and inflicted upon them in the most humiliating from the curse of "carpetbag" misgovernment and official graft and corruption. And no man since the overthrow of the republic regime has done more toward securing for the people the blessings assured by that victory. His efforts in this direction began in 1873, and did not end until 1880, in which year the Citizens Party, representing the respectable white votes of the county, came into complete control of all local affairs. The existing incident of the fall election of 1873, when Gen. Walter P. Lane, Gen. Hawthorne and Major Rudd were appointed as a committee, and cleared the way to the polls for the white voters, is well remembered. He was also one of the leaders in organizing the Taxpayers Association which rendered it impossible for scalawag, elected by negro votes, to fill a bond. Major Rudd was a member in the organization of the Citizen's Party, the first meeting of which was called at Marshall, the county seat, and which was attended by twenty-nine citizens besides himself. For the brave and determined stand he took in the defense and protection of the better element of his race, he was more than once threatened and was frequently in danger of his life.

From 1878 to 1880, Major Rudd served as a member of the County Commissioners Court; he was Tax Assessor of the County from 1880 to 1882, and from that year until elected to the legislature in 1890 he served his people almost continuously as a member of the Commissioners Court and did his share toward putting the county in a healthy financial condition. When first elected to the Commissioners Court in 1878, county scrip was worth only fifteen cents on the dollar; when he retired from that court it was one hundred cents on the dollar.

In 1890 he was elected a member of the 22nd legislature of Texas, to represent his district in the house and he was re-elected three times. In this position he continued to render useful services to the public throughout his four terms, and acquitted himself well and honorably as a State legislator, leaving a record of which he may well be proud. In waging his battles, Major Rudd has never occupied an equivocal position or sacrificed principles to expediency.

He is a Knights Templar Mason and a Shriner.

In 1865 Major Rudd and Miss Leonora T. Hill were married. Mrs. Rudd was born in Newberry District, South Carolina, of a family that was neighbor to the Rudds, and she and her future husband were rocked in the same cradle. She attended the Moravian Girls' Seminary at Salem, North Carolina, and at the age of fourteen, in 1854 she came to Harrison county, Texas with her parents, their settlement being in the same neighborhood to which young Rudd came in 1857, and where, later, they were married and began housekeeping. Mrs. Rudd is a charming woman of rare capacity and intelligence. After coming to Texas she finished her education in Mansfield, (La.) Seminary. She was a brave and noble helpmeet for her husband during the troublous reconstruction days, and during the following years of peace, happiness and plenty she has been the typical matron of the old-fashioned Southern home. Their plantation, known as Bermuda Farm, was a noted place of entertainment for a number of years, maintaining under Mrs. Rudd's kindly and efficient management, the large and generous hospitality for which the cultured country gentlemen of Harrison county were famed before the war.

ARTEMAS R. ROBERTS. If there is one thing more than another of which the citizens of Waco are proud, it is the magnificent twenty-two-story building built by the American Life Insurance Company. There is no other skyscraper in Texas or the South like it. It is a splendid home for the great life insurance company, which occupies a portion of its space, while all the other offices are taken by tenants comprising the cream of Waco's professional and commercial leaders.

It has been well said that "an institution is but the lengthened shadow of a man." The Amicable Life Building and the Amicable Life Company both stand as a concrete monument to the man whose ambition, whose civic zeal, and whose marvelous executive resourcefulness, has created and made possible the insurance organization of which he is the head. In ability as an actuary and executive and by practical achievement, Artemas R. Roberts has become one of the best known leaders in the insurance field in America. His has been in many respects a typical American success, having its beginning under the spur and hardship and near-poverty.

His early fight with circumstances only stimulated his ambition, gave him the zest of achievement, and few men have been so successful in creating a permanent business institution, capable of such important service and with such an aggregate strength of resources, as the Amicable Life Insurance Company of Texas.

Artemas R. Roberts was born in the state of Missouri August 24, 1864. When he was a child his father died, and in addition to other circumstances that militated against him came an illness that practically crippled him and shut out many of the attractive avenues which life presents to more favored youth. His early life was spent in comparative poverty, and in 1877 he came with his mother and sister to Alvarado, Texas. After graduating from the Alvarado schools he finished his course in 1884 in the Sam Houston State Normal school at Huntsville.

Like many successful men, his career began as a school teacher, but by some fortunate destiny was soon diverted into the insurance business. He wrote his first policy as a field agent in 1885, and is now in his thirtieth year in the business, and has been through the profession from field agent, as district manager for the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, at Dallas, as an actuary, as an executive and general agent, and is today the dean of Texas insurance men, none of his contemporaries in the state having been so long and consecutively engaged in this particular field. In the many years since he began Mr. Roberts proved his ability to get business, to build up a permanent and sustained patronage, and to manage a large staff of men under him. While the practical side of insurance has been his chief concern, Mr. Roberts is one of the most thorough students and best informed men on the general subject of life insurance in the entire country. It is said that his library of insurance statistics and literature is the most complete of its kind in the United States.

The success of Mr. Roberts first as a field agent, then as a district manager, as general agent, was only a progressive course towards his final and greatest achievement as the founder of the Amicable Life of Waco, which he organized April 2, 1910, and which began business at once, and in three years made a record probably unsurpassed in the field of life insurance in the United States. In order to illustrate what the Amicable Life has accomplished during the first two years of its business life, some matter will be quoted of a somewhat technical nature from an article in the Insurance Advocate, descriptive of the Amicable's position at the end of its third year in business.

"The company began business April 2, 1910, with admitted assets of $474,657.50. On December 31 of that year its assets had grown to $823,258.38, which was an increase in nine months' time of $348,600.88. A further increase was noted on December 31, 1911, when the assets had grown to $1,369,388.76. On December 31, last (1912) another growth of assets was shown, the figures being $1,769,449.71. On April 1, 1913, the assets had become $1,780,400.33.

"It is not only in admitted assets that the Waco Company is entitled to consideration. The paid-for insurance in force, which was $1,830,206 on December 31, 1910, had grown to $5,544,706 on December 31, 1911. On December 31, 1912, it had more than doubled, viz., had grown to $12,674,411. Since that time, in a three months' period, the insurance in force has taken another leap, and on April 1, was $14,232,638. The insurance written in 1910 amounted to $1,830,206, while that written a year later was $4,363,000. In 1912, however, the business was doubled, the figures being $9,015,955.

"During the year 1912 the insurance in force on the paid-for basis increased to $7,129,705, a ratio of increase equal to 128.5 per cent. The admitted assets increased $400,060.95, a ratio of increase of 29.2 per cent., and the premium income increased by $258,990.66, a ratio of increase equal to 129 per cent. even. It is a fact that for every dollar of legal reserve required by the laws of Texas to be held for the protection of policy holders, the Amicable had on January 1, 1913, admitted assets amounting to $10.75, or more than ten times the amount required by law.

"An interesting fact concerns the insurance in force held by the Waco company. A comparison of the Amicable with six of the most prominent life insurance companies doing business in the United States showed that the Amicable did a larger amount of business in its first thirty-six months of life than did any of them in that period. The same test was applied to admitted assets which showed that at the end of thirty-six months of existence the Amicable had $1,780,040 of admitted assets, as against the nearest competitor for the same amount of time, whose figures were $595,505. In fact the Amicable at the end of its three year period had almost twice as much admitted assets as was had by the six companies mentioned combined. It is also a fact that as compared with six prominent life insurance companies of this country having the largest surplus on January 13, 1913, the Amicable increased its surplus during the three year period more than twice as rapidly as had all these six companies combined. This should satisfy any one of the growth and energy displayed by the executive officers of the Waco company.

"There is no question that the man makes the company. This has been particularly true in the case of the Amicable, for the unusual progress which this company has made would not have been possible had the leadership of the Amicable Life of Texas been in less skillful hands. The company in Texas alone during the month of April wrote business amounting to $1,048,000. This shows how much the institution is appreciated in its home state. President Roberts, who is the founder of the company and is now the president and actuary, is one of the most experienced life insurance men in the United States."

The erection of a building as the home office of the Amicable Life and a structure which would be a credit to its home city, had for a long time been one of the cherished plans of Mr. Roberts. It was a plan of such far-drawn pretentiousness that those who were not possessed of a proper understanding of Mr. Roberts' ability to accomplish great things and persistency in carrying out his projects were inclined to regard it as a dream or a promoter's boast. But the Amicable Life building began to take form not long after the founding of the company, and for more than a year it has stood with its twenty-two stories overtopping every other structure in the city, and several stories higher than any similar building in the entire state. The ground dimensions of the Amicable building are 50x108 feet, and its situation is on the most eligible site in Waco, and hardly had the building been opened for tenants before practically every office was occupied, and the monumental structure has been a profitable investment from the beginning.

Artemas R. Roberts was married at Palestine, Texas, to Leila Doyle, a daughter of Captain C. C. Doyle. Their home is at the corner of Twenty-fifth and Coland streets in Waco. Mr. Roberts affiliates with the Knights of Pythias, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, is a Democrat, and a member of the Baptist church. With a rare personality and forcefulness as a business man, he combines a charm of manner which has gained him friends all over the southwest, and it is no idle statement to say that Artemas R. Roberts is today one of the greatest men in Texas commerce and citizenship.

JOHN R. CLAY. A resident of the State of Texas since boyhood, when, in 1867, his father brought the family over the line from Arkansas and established a home in Lamar county, John R. Clay has become a leading stockman of Terrell, breeding mules and jacks, and is standing as the largest dealer in the latter in the State. He was born in Jackson county, Arkansas, June 11, 1858, a son of Lackington Randolph Clay, who grew up in that locality from a child, and whose father settled there in 1836, from Newton county, Georgia. Lackington Randolph Clay was born in that county in Georgia, in 1826, a son of Maston Clay, and a grandson of the English founder of this family, who settled in Virginia, in which State Maston Clay was born about the year 1796.

Maston Clay, the grandfather of John R. Clay, married Lydia Paschal, who died in Arkansas in 1866, at the age of sixty-one years, having survived her husband some twenty-eight years. They came West from Georgia with their slaves and teams, and settled in the wilderness of Jackson county, Arkansas, beginning their citizenship with the admission of the State. Mr. Clay died in 1838 and left his widow and children to fight the adverse conditions of a new country and to enter modestly into the history-making epoch of the pioneer days of that Commonwealth. Their children were as follows: Lackington Randolph; Sarah, who married William Brazile and is deceased; Eaton B., who died at Terrell, Texas; Fannie, who married C. H. Bennett, of Mineral Wells, Texas; Henry, who died at Walnut Ridge, Texas; and Lydia, who became Mrs. John Arnold and died at Terrell.

Lackington Randolph Clay came to mature years with a very ordinary education and lent a hand toward the work of making a home for the family in the heavy forests of Jackson county, Arkansas. When a young man he was elected sheriff and tax collector of his county, and was serving in this capacity while the war between the States was going on, thus missing the conflict himself. His father was a Whig and it is believed that Union sentiments were dominant in the family upon the issues of the war. At any rate, Lackington R. Clay never trained with the Democrats in his brief connection with community affairs after the war, and gave his time to personal matters of a strenuous character while he lived in Texas. He came to this State in 1867 by caravan of twenty-four wagons, with other families, passed through Terrell, where he made an effort to acquire a certain piece of property, but failing moved into Ellis county, and there, learning of the approach of yellow fever, diverted north and settled at Paris. He engaged in merchandising there, purchased a tanyard, owned freighting teams operating between that point and Jefferson and speculated in land and loaned money, demonstrating himself to be a phenomenal success as a money maker. He died March 28, 1871, cutting short a career which gave evidence of marked ability and many-sidedness in his capacity as a citizen. He maintained himself in harmony with the Missionary Baptist church, and with the Masonic fraternity. Lackington R. Clay married Adelia Robinson, a daughter of William Robinson, who came out of Tennessee into Arkansas, with his six brothers, driving their stock, walking their negroes, hauling their ferry-boat for passing streams and hewing their way through the wooded country of the Arkansas valleys to where they settled in Jackson county. There they opened farms and prospered and their posterity became some of the financiers of the Commonwealth.

William Robinson was one of seven brothers who, as young men, married seven Logan sisters in Indiana, and subsequently moved to Tennessee, where they engaged in the brick-making and contracting business and as such made the brick out of which the first State Capitol of Tennessee was built. The brothers carried on their affairs as partners all their lives, and their settlement in Arkansas made an indelible impression upon the citizenship of the State. Mrs. Clay was born in Tennessee, April 1, 1826, and passed away in Texas, in 1906. Her children were as follows: Fannie, who married Joseph Martin and resides in Dallas, Texas; John R., a resident of Terrell; Hettie Ann, who became Mrs. M. R. Buckner, of Dallas; and Mollie, who married Percy D. Preston, and resides in St. Louis, Missouri.

John R. Clay was a child of nine years when he came to Texas, and was reared to manhood at Paris. He was sent to Roanoke College, Salem, Virginia, and after completing his studies at the age of twenty years embarked upon his business career as a cotton buyer in Paris for Frank Fitzhugh. After a few years he embarked in the cotton business on his own account, but subsequently entered the employ of Martin, Weis & Fitzhugh, one of the noted brokerage firms of North Texas, for which he came to Terrell in 1882. When his employers failed in business, he turned his attention to the breeding of jacks and mules and has spent thirteen years in building up a State-wide reputation in the business. He has sold more jacks in Texas than any other man, and his place of business, "The Tennessee Jack Farm," is known all over the Southwest.

Mr. Clay's attention to politics has ever been that of an interested citizen. He attends State conventions and congressional or other local meetings or assemblages for the nomination of legislative candidates, and was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention at Chicago, in 1896, when he sat near William Jennings Bryan when that statesman won the presidential nomination for himself with his famous "Crown of Thorns and Cross of Gold" speech. He is a member of the Christian church and has been in attendance upon important councils of his church as a delegate both in Texas and elsewhere. Mr. Clay has decided opinions upon moral questions, is a close Bible student, and has a good command of language—and it may be added in passing, does not use language that is bad. A man of large mold, strongly built, and clean and neat in person, he is a familiar figure on the streets of Terrell. His popularity is attested by his numerous friends. He has kept away from social or fraternal alliances which so often wreck family ties, but holds membership in the Knights of Pythias.

On November 9, 1880, Mr. Clay was married near Terrell, Texas, to Miss Minnie Eudora Martin, a daughter of B. L. Martin, who came to Texas from Tennessee in 1875. One child has been born to this union: Nell, who married Allen S. May, of Terrell, and has two children: Dorothy and Allen S., Jr.

COLONEL JOHN HENRY BROOCKS. Old San Augustine county, the center of so much culture and achievement from the early days to the present, produced no finer character, whether as soldier or private citizen, than Col. John Henry Broocks. His father before him possessed the virtues of the true pioneer, while the Colonel's sons have been distinguished in the law, politics and business, so that seldom is honor paid where honor is due more fittingly than in a biographical tribute to the late Colonel Broocks and his family.

A veteran of three wars, to all of which he went from San Augustine county, Col. John Henry Broocks was born near Columbia, Tennessee, October 12, 1829. His father, General Travis Green Broocks, brought his family to San Augustine county, Texas, in 1838, locating in the town of San Augustine. Travis Green Broocks was commander in chief of an army of about one thousand men whose intervention and mediation in the troubles between the so called regulators and moderators," in Shelby County during the decade of the forties, resulted in the eradication of this notorious feudism and civil warfare. General Broocks' command also from time to time was called upon to give battle to the Indians and he was a fine type of the frontier soldier in early days. It was under this pioneer settler and soldier in some of those troubles that Col. John Henry Brooks received his first military experience. He attended school at the old Wesleyan College in San Augustine until he was past sixteen years of age. In 1846 he went to the Mexican war in Captain O. M. Wheeler's Company, and served in the army of General Taylor. For about three months he was stationed at Brownsville on the Rio Grande and fought in the battle of Monterey. On returning from Mexico he engaged in merchandising at San Augustine, and so continued until 1852. Then, in a party of about forty other young men from San Augustine, he went west to the California gold fields, making the trip by way of the Isthmus of Panama. In California, instead of mining, he turned his attention to the more profitable business of supplying the miners and citizens with merchandise, and his previous experience along that line in Texas enabled him to reap a considerable fortune while there. His young brother James A. Brooks, afterwards a captain in the Confederate army, was also on the California expedition, and they remained on the Pacific coast two and a half years. After his return to San Augustine Colonel Brooks was married in July, 1854, to Miss Elizabeth Jerome Polk. The proceeds of his California venture he invested in land and negroes, established a fine plantation, which is still owned by the family, four and one-half miles east of San Augustine.

It was Colonel Brooks' record during the long terrible war between the states that gave him lasting reputation as one of the gallant defenders of the Southland. On the breaking out of the war in 1861 he raised a company and on the banks of the Red River while on the march to North Arkansas he was again made its captain. This company subsequently became Company C in Whitfield's Texas Legion, and together with the Third, the Sixth and the Ninth Texas Regiments of Cavalry composed Ross' Brigade. Captain Brooks served with Whitfield's command in a number of skirmishes around Springfield, Missouri, against the Kansas jay hawkers under Jim Lane, and also fought the noted Indian Chief, Opotheyholo, the veteran head of the Creek Indians. On the sixth and the seventh of March, 1862, his command went into the battle of Elk Horn, or Pea Ridge as it was sometimes called, dismounted by choice. Later a re-organization was effected when J. W. Whitfield was made colonel of the First Texas Legion, and Captain Brooks was put in command of Company C, comprising about one hundred and fifty men. The regiment was dismounted at Desare, Arkansas, and the horses were sent back to Texas. Soon after the re-organization, the Legion was transferred, with all of Price's army and Van Dorn's forces to the field of Shiloh, but it will be recalled that Van Dorn was unable to arrive in time to reinforce the Confederates, and the battle of Shiloh had been fought and lost before Captain Brooks reached the scene. After Shiloh his command went to Corinth, was engaged in some skirmishing there, and spent the summer in Tupelo and along the Mobile and Ohio railroad, most of the time being spent in drilling. On September 19, 1862, they participated in the hard fought battle of Iuka, and Captain Brooks' troop had a part in the capture of an entire federal battery, (the 10th Ohio) and destroyed the guns before they were recaptured. Later, on October 8th, he participated in what was called Van Dorn's battle, because that general had instigated the attack. After that they went into South-western Mississippi and participated in Van Dorn's raid on Holly Springs, where they nearly succeeded in capturing General Grant. In the meantime Captain Brooks' command had been remounted. During the various operations of Bragg's and Van Dorn's armies in Northern Mississippi and Tennessee in the fall of 1862 Captain Brooks and his company were usually on duty.

In the meantime Captain Brooks had been promoted to the rank of Major. This promotion was a record of a brief order written by General Louis Hebert, commanding the Second Brigade of the First Division of the army of the west, and dated July 21, 1862.

In the spring of 1863 Major Brooks was with Van Dorn in Tennessee and in the battle of Thompson Station where a number of his comrades from San Augustine, including Capt. Jas. A. Brooks, a brother of Major Brooks fell. It was also immediately after this battle that Gen. Van Dorn was killed. Though the loss of confederate men was heavy, they defeated the enemy, capturing the entire force, together with a large amount of munitions, and it was during a second charge up a hill that Capt. James A. Brooks was mortally wounded. He lingered several days and died in Columbia, Tennessee, his father's old home.

During the fall of the year 1863, Major Brooks was engaged in fighting a federal fleet on the Yazoo River. Afterwards he was ordered to follow Sherman on a march to Meridian, but never overtook him. He was then order to reinforce General Forest, who was pressed by a superior force coming from Memphis to form a junction with Sherman at Meridian. However, Forrest defeated Sturgis before Major Brooks arrived and Major Brooks was ordered back to Yazoo City.

In the spring of 1864 Major Brooks' forces were ordered to join Jos. E. Johnston at Rome, Georgia. About the beginning of this campaign he was promoted to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel, and was with Johnston on all the terrific campaign comprising one hundred days' fighting from the battle of Chickamanga to the fall of Atlanta during the summer and early fall of 1864. After the surrender of Atlanta General Hood superseded Johnston, a move which was regarded unfavorably in many quarters. Colonel Brooks had seen arduous service throughout the Atlantic campaign, and his forces suffered great losses during the Kilpatrick and McCook raids around Atlanta and also at the battle of Lovejoy Station. Colonel Brooks after the fall of Atlanta was made acting colonel, and though before the close of the war he was regularly commissioned colonel, the commission did not go into effect before hostilities came to an end. He was with Hood's army in Tennessee after Sherman had begun his march to the sea, and was present in the battle of Franklin, it being one of the hardest fought battles of the entire war. The early months of 1865 were spent in Mississippi in the vicinity of Vicksburg, and there was still a good deal of heavy fighting. On the 9th of April, 1865, General Lee surrendered, and that practically ended the war. On May 15th at Canton, Mississippi, the troops including Colonel Brooks' command were paroled and soon afterwards found their way home.

This is but a mere outline of a military experience which for length and severity of service had few parallels in the war. Colonel Brooks with the ending of hostilities returned to his plantation near San Augustine, and in later years retired and moved into the town of that name. His long and honorable career came to a close on April 16, 1901, and he was buried with Masonic honors. The late Colonel Brooks was a born leader of men, absolutely fearless, stood on a high plane intellectually, and possessed the attributes that go with the best type of manhood. He was a devoted husband and father, and old comrades in arms, his descendants, and all who had the favor of his acquaintance, will long cherish his memory. For the greater part of his life he followed the business of a planter, and gave personal supervision to his estate. He also bought and sold a large amount of land in different parts of Texas, but he was not a real estate operator in the ordinary sense of the term.

The wife of Colonel Brooks, Elizabeth Jerome Polk, was a daughter of John and Cynthia (Polk), and belonged to the famous Polk family of Tennessee, she being a second cousin of President James K. Polk. Colonel Brooks and wife reared four children, (four of their children having died in infancy), as follows: Mrs. George C. Greer of Beaumont, the mother of three promising sons, Lewis V., John B. and George J. Greer; John H. Brooks II; the late congressman M. L. Brooks; and Benjamin C. Brooks.

To the many distinctions associated with the family name in East Texas through two preceding generations, John Henry Brooks II, of Beaumont and San Augustine, has contributed much by his own able career, both as a lawyer and a man of affairs. Born on his grandfather's plantation, four and a-half miles east of San Augustine in San Augustine county, March 15, 1862, he was reared in his native county, studied law there, and was admitted to the bar at Hemphill, the county seat of Sabine County in 1889. For several years he has maintained an office at Beaumont for transacting his legal and other business, although his home is still in San Augustine. Though he is a member of the Texas bar, he no longer engages in active practice, since all his time is taken up by his extensive property interests. With associates, he is the owner of a large and valuable tract of timbered land in Santo Domingo in the West Indies. This land is being developed by the building of a railroad and other extensive improvements, the establishment of saw mills for working up the great bodies of timber, and the tracts owned by this syndicate are also very rich in agricultural and mineral resources.

During the campaign of 1912, John H. Brooks was a candidate against four others for the nomination as congressman in the second congressional district. He was defeated, but it is worth while to recall an appreciation of his candidacy and his personal character as written by Mr. June C. Harris and published in the Nacogdoches Redland Herald in March, 1912. The greater part of this article is extracted as follows: "John Brooks is known throughout the length and breadth of the second congressional district. His friends are of that loyal kind that only great and noble characters make and keep. John Brooks is not an orator; he is a thinker, not a politician, but a statesman. In the matter of intellect he ranks easily with men like Culbertson and Gore—and possesses the force and energy of Joe Bailey. He never courts public applause, but bends his energies to genuine service, forgetting that he may receive praise or censure for his pains. A man strikingly of the John H. Reagan type. * * * If the people knew John H. Brooks for his real worth, it would not be necessary for him to do or say else than signify his willingness to serve them. * * * is the pleasure of the writer to know his life's history, and were it reduced to writing would furnish a book which every lover of the beautiful in character would enjoy reading and teaching. He is a man in every sense the word implies, and if he is elected to congress the people will make no mistake, for their interests will be in safe hands. While his self-sacrificing nature, characterized by his efforts to assist his afflicted parents, in rearing and educating his sister and younger brothers, prevented him from securing a college education, his contact with men, beginning with the plow, and ascending step by step until he attained prominence as a lawyer, and later as a business man of large transactions, has fitted him with an education rarely attained by men of East Texas. He has lived all his life in this congressional district, and no man knows its needs better than he. He has always been a consistent Democrat, and if this in addition to ability, political, social, industrial honesty, and all-round manly constancy count for anything, he is the man to elect to congress."

Mr. John H. Brooks was married in San Augustine in 1906 to Mrs. Laura Allen Brooks, a widow of his brother, B. C. Brooks, and they have one child, a daughter, Elizabeth Jerome, age six years.

The late Moses L. Brooks, second son of Colonel John

H. Brooks, died May 27, 1908. He was one of the distinguished citizens of Texas, and had represented his district in Congress, and was still in the prime of life and the height of his power and favor as a lawyer and public man. He was born in San Augustine county, November 1, 1864, entered the University of Texas in 1889, graduating in 1891, LL. B. He began the practice of law at San Augustine, and in 1892 was elected to the Twenty-third Legislature. In 1893 he moved to Beaumont, where he was a member of the firm of Brooks, Greer & Brooks, and in the following year was elected district attorney. In 1900 came further honors in the political field when he was strongly urged for the office of district judge, but on account of the death of his brother Benjamin C. Brooks he withdrew his candidacy and returned to San Augustine, where he was soon afterwards chosen representative from the second district to the fifty-ninth Congress. After the close of his congressional term, Mr. Brooks hoping to regain his health, engaged in farming near San Augustine and lived there until his death. He never married.

The youngest of the children of Colonel John H. Brooks (who reached manhood), was Benjamin C. Brooks, who lost his life in San Augustine, June 3, 1900, in his thirty-fourth year. He left a wife and three children: Ara Frances, Benjamin C. and Eugenia Allen Brooks, the last having been born five months after her father's death. Ben, as he was called by his friends, was a Christian gentleman and in every sense of the word measured fully up to the family standard.

EUGENE J. PETERSON. Now one of the executive officers and stockholders of the Consumers Ice & Cold Storage Company of El Paso, Mr. Peterson came to El Paso some fifteen years ago and entered the employ of this concern in a minor capacity. The business itself at that time was established on a very small scale, and it has been his privilege to witness and at the same time bear a very important part in promoting the great growth and success of this enterprise until it is now one of the largest concerns of the kind in west Texas. Mr. Peterson has had an interesting and varied career and has gained an independent position in business after beginning life as a poor man, and with only the skill of his hands as his capital.

Eugene J. Peterson was born at Manitowoc, Wisconsin, April 24, 1864, a son of Lorenzo D. and Mattie Augusta Peterson. His father was from Sweden and his mother of German parentage. The father, who for many years was a farmer in Wisconsin, was one of the early settlers of that state, having emigrated thither from New York State. His death occurred about 1890, at the old home in Wisconsin. The mother is still living and makes her home at Muskegon, Michigan, with her oldest son, Albert Peterson. There were nine children in the family and the only two now living are the Muskegon citizen just mentioned and Mr. Eugene J. of El Paso.

As a boy in the country he attained such education as the district school of his neighborhood afforded, and after exhausting those opportunities, he educated himself largely by practical experience in business and by contact with men and affairs. His first practical work was in a machine shop at Muskegon, Michigan, where he was employed as an apprentice for about five years and at the most received a salary of $1.25 per day. After completing his apprenticeship he became a stationary engineer at Muskegon and continued there in that occupation for about two years. In 1892 he went west to Portland, Oregon, where he continued to work at his trade and at the same time learned the ice manufacturing business. With this varied equipment and experience, he came in 1908 to El Paso, where he entered the employ of the Consumers Ice & Cold Storage Company. This company at that time was a small plant with a capacity of fifteen tons of ice per day. Since then, during his connection with the concern, it has grown to a plant of one hundred and thirty tons daily capacity, and its product is now distributed throughout the city of El Paso and over a large vicinity in this district.

In politics Mr. Peterson has always been a loyal Democrat. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Elks and was brought up in the faith of the Baptist church and is a steady member of that faith. On January 27, 1885, at Muskegon, Michigan, he married Miss Hattie Buffing, a daughter of Philip and Hattie Buffing of Muskegon. Two sons and one daughter were born to their marriage, named Walter Marion, Henry, and Gussie, the daughter being three years old.

JOHN B. SCHMITZ. Over the state at large this prominent business man of Denton is best known as a Republican leader who at various times in the last twenty years has accepted place on the state ticket of that party and has made the forlorn fight for Republican success in a state where the dominant influence has always been with the Democracy. At Denton Mr. Schmitz is one of the ablest business men, has for thirty-five years successfully handled a large and growing enterprise as a furniture dealer, and is known to every citizen of the town as the efficient and popular postmaster, being now in his second term of service.

A fine representative of the sturdy German-American stock in America, John B. Schmitz was born September 18, 1858, at Durand in Winnebago county, Illinois, a son of John and Mary A. Schmitz. Both parents were natives of Germany, lived in the Rhine Province near the city of Cologne and in 1852 emigrated to America, first settling in Peru, Illinois. The father was a dealer in harness and saddlery and at the close of the Civil war located in Mendota, Illinois, and continued his business affairs until 1897. He then retired and died in the following year, while his widow survived until February, 1913. There were nine children in the family, five sons and four daughters, and the Denton merchant is the oldest of the family. Besides himself he has a brother, J. Edward Schmitz, who is a resident of Dallas and General Agent for the American LaFrance Fire Engine Company; also a sister, Mrs. Charles West-erhausen, whose husband is foreman mechanic with the Santa Fe Railroad Company at Dallas and three other sisters, Mrs. Emma M. Ellingen and Mrs. Elizabeth Eiton, living at Mendota, Illinois, and Mrs. Catherine Ziebarth, of Ottawa, Illinois.

The early career of John B. Schmitz was spent in Illinois, with an education in the public schools of that state, and a preparation for a business career in the Bryant & Stratton Business College of Chicago. His first business experience was acquired as an employee in a large wholesale furniture establishment at Chicago, and on January 10, 1878, he arrived in Texas and after a brief stay in Dallas moved to Denton. That was more than thirty-five years ago, and his prosperity as a merchant in the furniture and house equipment line was solidly established within a few years after he became connected with the Denton community.

His services in behalf of the Republican party have been of an important character. During the campaign of 1896, when there were two factions of the Republicans in Texas, Mr. Schmitz was chairman of the Plenary Committee of his wing of the party which succeeded in adjusting the differences between the two wings during the state convention at Dallas. During the campaign his influence was one of the chief factors in reconciling and consolidating the Republican ranks, and as a result Texas during that year gave to Mr. McKinley the largest vote ever polled by a Republican candidate in the state. At a still earlier date Mr. Schmitz's name had been before the people of the state as a candidate on his party ticket. In 1890 he was candidate for the office of state treasurer, and had the satisfaction of leading the ticket in that campaign. Again in 1892 his name was placed on the ticket for the office of comptroller, and in 1894 he was nominated for governor on the reform Republican ticket, otherwise known as the "lily white ticket." During the past twenty years no impartial record of the Republican party in Texas could be written without frequent reference to Mr. Schmitz. He has repeatedly been county chairman and a committee man, active in local, state and national conventions. It was his high standing as a business man as well as his prominence in the party which caused his appointment as postmaster to be received with such general satisfaction, and his service in that office has been above criticism. President Roosevelt first confirmed him in the office on May 1, 1906, and his re-appointment came from President Taft on February 16, 1911. His four year term will expire in 1915. Mr. Schmitz for twelve years has been one of the school directors at Denton, and has lent a helping hand in every movement for the upbuilding of his community. He is also an active member of the Denton Chamber of Commerce, and affiliates with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, & the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

On Christmas Day of 1882 Mr. Schmitz was married at Mendota, Illinois, to Miss Emma Frances Meisenbach, a daughter of Franz Meisenbach, who died about 1892, was a merchant and prominent citizen of Mendota for many years. To the marriage of Mr. Schmitz and wife have been born seven children, and the six now living are: Miss Laura J. Schmitz, who lives at home; Mrs. Matilda Yone Miller, whose husband, Walter I. Miller, is a bookkeeper in Denton; Mrs. Emma Frances Floyd, wife of K. S. Floyd, a salesman in the Schmitz furniture store; John Franz Schmitz, managing salesman for his father; Miss Helen E. Schmitz, a student in the Denton high school; and Miss Hildegard Louise Schmitz, also a high school student.

WILLIAM A. BILLS. It may be said with all propriety that William A. Bills is the founder of the laundry industry in Paris. He identified himself with the business here when it was struggling for existence and placed it upon its feet, endowing it by his energies with the full vigor of its existence of recent years. In association with an experienced laundryman, he has been the first to make a financial success of the laundry business in Paris, and the history of the partnership to which he belongs shows an expansion of an order that reflects much credit upon the capabilities of the proprietors.

Born at Henderson, Kentucky, on January 11, 1867, William A. Bills is the son of James M. and Susan (Patton) Bills. The father, who died at Bonham, Texas, in 1910, was born at Lewisburg, Tennessee, in 1832, and from his native state he entered the Confederate army at the opening of the Rebellion, serving throughout the war. He saw much of active service, but was captured a number of times and spent some time in a Federal military prison. Following the war he was engaged in building activities as a brick contractor, and later located in Beardstown, Texas, there taking up farming. He subsequently moved to Bonham, and it was there that both he and his wife passed away, the latter in 1894. He was of English descent, and the representative of one of the oldest American families. Mrs. Bills, whose father was a farmer and a native of Virginia, became the mother of a goodly family, of whom the following yet survive: Daniel V., of Texas; one who married and located in New Mexico; Joseph R., of Hugo, Oklahoma; John W., of Arizona; William A., the subject of this review; and George F., of Paris.

William A. Bills accompanied his parents to Texas in 1876 when he was nine years old, and he left the farm at Beardstown with only a country school education to fit him for the business of life. He first secured independent employment as an operator in the machine shops of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company at Bonham, spending six months there, after which he came to Paris and went to work as a wagon boy for the Arctic Ice Company. The next season he had employment inside the house, and the next two seasons served as engineer of the plant. During the winter seasons of these years he worked in Little Rock as foreman of the boiler-room of an oil-mill.

Mr. Bill's laundry experience began with his exit from the ice factory. He went to work for the City Steam Laundry as wash-room man, but after two months of attention to business he determined to buy the plant in company with A. W. Blair, his present partner. He did so, and from then to the present time his progress has been continuous. The old frame building that housed the plant when he came into ownership soon gave way to the model brick structure, with its splendid equipment, the same becoming the parent of the Ideal Laundry of Paris, of the Mineral Wells Steam Laundry, and of the Model Steam Laundry, of Hugo, Oklahoma, all of which are operated under the ownership of Mr. Bills and his partner.

It is worthy of mention here that Mr. Bills has not confined his attention solely to laundry interests, but has taken an active interest in other enterprises and activities of import in the city. He is a director of the City National Bank of Paris and of the Paris and Mount Pleasant Railway Company, as well as of the Paris Board of Trade and of the Progressive Club of Paris. He served one term as Alderman of the Fourth ward of Paris, during which time the street railway was built. He is a Democrat, and fraternally is a member of the Knights of Pythias, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Modern Woodmen.

On Christmas day, 1889, Mr. Bills was married in Paris to Miss Susie Whitworth, a daughter of Mrs. Roe Whitworth, who came to Texas from the state of Tennessee. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Bills,—Eula, the wife of Joseph K. Shirley, of Wichita Falls, Texas; J. Lloyd and Lucile.

Mr. Bills is recognized as one of the most active business men in Paris today,—a position he has long occupied, and one that is only intensified with the passing years. He has a wholesome interest in practically every public enterprise launched in the city, and has a quiet word in about all affairs of a public nature. He may be found at frequent intervals on committees of general welfare, and is one of the most successful pacificators the city has ever known, in matters where public wrinkles require to be smoothed out. Diplomatic and far sighted, his many excellent qualities combine to produce a man whose influence is ever for the best good of his community, and as such he is eminently deserving of the confidence his city places in him.

WILLIAM A. BOWEN. What William A. Bowen is and what he has done is probably well known to the newspaper profession throughout the southwest, but the main facts of his career have a general interest which deserve some mention in this collection of Texan biographies. Mr. Bowen, whose home is at Arlington in Tarrant county, where he is editor and president of the company publishing the Arlington Journal, and is the editor and proprietor of the Farmers' Fireside Bulletin, has had a long and unusually active career as an editor, newspaper correspondent, orator, and man of affairs.

William A. Bowen was born at Bagdad, Santa Rosa county, Florida, April 14, 1856. His father was a man of enterprise and a soldier of two wars, and while the son inherited some of his characteristics he also began his experience as a boy, while his father was engaged in the stirring life of war times. Both his parents, Captain William A. and C. D. (Richards) Bowen, are now deceased. The former, who was a native of Westmoreland county, Virginia, was reared in Georgia, lived for several years in Florida, and in 1858 brought his family to a plantation in Montgomery county, Texas. Mr. Bowen came from a family which was distinguished for several centuries in England for public service and moral force, being an old Welsh family, and which, in the United States, since 1637, has played a prominent part in every crisis and in education and public life. On his mother's side his family was equally noted, his maternal grandmother being a sister of Commodore Oliver Hazzard Perry, who married Adolphus Richards and moved from Rhode Island to Alabama among the first settlers of that state. As a soldier during the Mexican war Captain William Bowen had passed through Texas and spent some time in the state. He was a Confederate soldier throughout the war and rendered some distinguished services.

At the Battle of Galveston, Capt. Wm. A. Bowen was pilot of the Confederate gunboat "Neptune," and he ran this boat into the port wheel of the Federal gunboat "Harriet Lane," thus disabling her, and preventing her from escaping with the "Bayou City," which had become foul with her grappling irons. The impact stove in the "Neptune's" bow, and Capt. Bowen turned her towards shallow water and kept her going as long as she would answer her wheel. This prevented the "Neptune," sinking in deep water with a lot of wounded and dead Confederates aboard. For this bravery and thoughtfulness Capt. Bowen was promoted to the command of the "Josiah H. Bell," the most substantial gunboat in the Texas Department of the Confederate navy, which command he held until the surrender of Lee at Appomattox. Captain Bowen died at Galveston in 1867.

Following the war the Bowen family established their home in Galveston, where the son William began his remarkably interesting career, filled with activity from early boyhood. He was with his father a great deal during the latter's service in the closing months of the war. At that time he was less than ten years of age, and during his teens was taken in as a printer's apprentice at the office of the old Galveston News when Willard Richardson was its editor.

In 1871, when fifteen years of age, Mr. Bowen came to Dallas, two years before the advent of the railroad. There he worked some time on the old Dallas Herald. Mr. Bowen may be credited with some pioneer newspaper enterprise in north Texas. In 1873, going to Decatur in Wise county, which was then on the frontier, where the Indian raids had the country in a state of alarm for fifteen years, he took charge of the Decatur Advance Guard, the first newspaper in the county. On August 27, 1874, he was a personal witness of the last great Indian tragedy in Wise county, the massacre of the entire Huff family, which occurred a short distance northeast of Decatur. During his newspaper work at Decatur Mr. Bowen taught a primary class in a school conducted by Professor H. M. Booth, and at the same time studied the higher branches, including latin, under Professor Booth.

For a man who started the practical business of life when still a child, Mr. Bowen deserves special credit for his diligence in supplying the deficiencies of an early education. In the fall of 1874 he went from Wise county to Montague in Montague county, and established the Montague News, in partnership with E. G. Crowell. They also printed the Henrietta Journal, the latter paper having no plant of its own. The fall of 1875 witnessed his entrance as a student at Southwestern University in Georgetown, and he continued attending that institution during 1875-76-77, teaching school during his vacation and also keeping up his newspaper work.

It was during this period of his career that Mr. Bowen made the acquaintance of Brick Pomeroy, editor of Pomeroy's Democrat of New York. Mr. Pomeroy had noticed Bowen's work as a correspondent and had given him much encouragement to continue his career in that line. Mr. Bowen had the advantage of having come under the favorable influence of several prominent men in his early youth. While on his way to Dallas in 1871 and during a brief stay at Waxahachie, he met Rev. Dr. F. A. Mood, the noted educator and founder of Southwestern University at Georgetown, upon whose advice the young printer subsequently became a student of Southwestern University.

W. A. Bowen,

During the summer of 1876 Mr. Bowen explored and reported his investigations of the granite and marble deposits in the vicinity of Burnet and Marble Falls in the capacity of correspondent for the Galveston News, in which paper his articles appeared. It is a fact worth noting that the State Capitol Commissioners in choosing the material for the great state house erected in 1882-85 made their decision in favor of the Texas granite on the strength of articles written by the Galveston News correspondent, who personally carried on a campaign of publicity in favor of the Texas material against the New Bedford blue stone, which had been tentatively selected by the commissioners.

Beginning in the fall of 1877 and continuing for two years, Mr. Bowen was principal of the high school at Elgin, Texas. This was followed by his return to newspaper work at Houston in 1880. In 1881 he was sent to Austin as staff correspondent of the Houston Post, then under the ownership of Gail Borden, the paper being edited by Professor T. J. Jerideau. His next employment was as political editor of the San Antonio Express, a position he resigned in 1886 in order to move to Chicago. There he was a reporter on the old Chicago Times, during the famous anarchy troubles and the greatest strikes of history, such as the C. B. & Q. Ry., the North and West Side Street car, the McCormick Reaper, the Pullman, and the Stockyards strikes and also was with the Tribune and the Herald. At St. Louis he was with the staff of the Globe-Democrat and the old Missouri Republican, now called the St. Louis Republic. Returning from St. Louis to Texas, he was connected with various state papers, and in the fall of 1905 left the Houston Post, returned to the St. Louis Republic, and his next venture in Texas journalism was as the purchaser of the Cameron Herald, which he published until 1908.

Mr. Bowen has been a writer of National note for many years; in addition to having been on the editorial staff of the leading daily papers in his own state, and in St. Louis and in Chicago, he has been a contributor to magazines and other periodicals, including such high class publications as The Youths' Companion. He has also written some continued stories in the nature of historical sketches. One, "Uncle Zeke's Speculation; a Story of War and Reconstruction Days in Texas," was published in book form and had a very large circulation. He is also the author of the historical work, "Why Two Methodist Episcopal Churches in the United States?" This work is the only one that has everything pertaining to this World-Famous question in one book.

Since 1908 Mr. Bowen has been a resident of Arlington in Tarrant county. For four years, after returning to Texas for the last time, he was field agent in the state for the Texas Christian Advocate. Mr. Bowen is now president and almost the sole owner of the Arlington Printing Company, who owns and publishes the Arlington Journal and is proprietor of the Farmers' Fireside Bulletin, of both of which publications he is editor. The Journal is strictly a local newspaper and is the only one of its kind in Tarrant county that uses all home print. It is widely known as a country weekly of the highest class. The Farmers' Fireside Bulletin is the official paper in Texas, Louisiana and Oklahoma of the Farmers Co-operative and Educational Union, an organization of great strength and membership in the south. In this paper Mr. Bowen carries on continually a campaign for every progressive measure and introduces every department of information that tends to the greater enlightenment of the farmer on all subjects that are of value to the advancement and improvement of rural life. These include not only advanced methods of farming, conservation of soil, grading up of stock, etc., but the commercial side of farming as well, the movements for better prices and better marketing facilities, and the organization of the farming industry along lines which have proved beneficial to other lines of business. Mr. Bowen is also much interested in and an advocate in his papers of better schools, particularly for the rural communities. There is no other farm paper that has as wide and useful a scope as the Farmers' Fireside Bulletin. For more than twenty-five years he has urged such concentration of rural schools as to give farming communities the same high school advantages as enjoyed by the cities, but especially coursed to better fit boys and girls for farm life. Because of his long and efficient work in this line, he is frequently consulted in mapping out campaigns for better rural schools by such men as Hon. T. M. Bralley, director of the department of extension of the University of Texas, and by Superintendent W. T. Doughty, of the department of education and other eminent educators. In line with his ambition for advancing the southwestern agricultural interests, Mr. Bowen plans to develop at Arlington a high-class demonstration farm. Personally, he is a practical stockman and understands the breeding and care of fine stock. In all of this work he is aided by his brother, Reuben D. Bowen of Paris, Texas, who is doing more to aid farmers than probably any one man in Texas. Mr. Bowen is the owner of a good farm of his own in Upshure county. He has a beautiful and comfortable home at Arlington.

At Bastrop, Texas, in 1877 occurred the marriage of Mr. Bowen and Miss Ada De Bardeleben, daughter of Dr. John F. De Bardeleben of Bastrop. Her father was a distinguished surgeon whose German ancestors were also of the medical profession, and had close relations to the nobility of Germany, through a line traced back for three hundred years. Mr. and Mrs. Bowen have only one daughter of their own, Merle, wife of Charles Batsell. However, their three adopted children receive the same care and affection as their own child, and are named Lily, Chester, and Mary Catharine.

E. J. NEATHERY, M. D. For more than thirty years identified with the profession of medicine and surgery at Sherman, Dr. Neathery has been specially prominent as a surgeon, has been a leading member of the staff of several local hospitals, and at this writing has just completed a sanitarium and hospital of his own at Sherman, an institution which will add a great deal to the many existing facilities of that north Texas metropolis. Few members of the profession have been better prepared by their varied experience and extended studies for successful practice than Dr. Neathery.

E. J. Neathery was born January 27, 1867, at Albany, Kentucky, a son of K. and P. J. (Hopkins) Neathery. Both parents were born in Kentucky, and came to Texas September 27, 1882, locating at Pilot Grove, in Grayson county. The father, who followed merchandising in Kentucky, engaged in farming and stock raising after coming to Texas, and is still living at his old home in Grayson county, at the advanced age of seventy-nine years. His first wife died, and he was married a second time, there being three children by the first marriage and five by the second. Dr. Neathery is the second among the children of the second wife.

Dr. Neathery, who is of Scotch-Irish ancestry on his father's side, and English on his mother's, received his early education chiefly in the public schools of Grayson county, being thirteen years of age when the family located here. Later he attended the Baylor College of Texas, and in 1891 graduated with M. D. from the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville. He was for ten years engaged in practice at Van Alstyne in Grayson county, and since 1901 has been in practice at Sherman.

Dr. Neathery is the type of physician who is never content with present achievements and has probably taken as many post-graduate courses in medicine and surgery as any physician of his age in the state. He has again and again attended schools in New York city, has taken three courses in Chicago, one at Philadelphia, and one at New Orleans. Besides his large general practice, Dr. Neathery has served as Captain and Assistant Surgeon of the Texas National Guard, and is now on the supernumerary list. He has had charge of the Frisco Hospital at Sherman for nine years, and has been on the staff of the St. Vincent Sanitarium of that city. On January 15, 1914, the Sherman Sanitarium was ready for occupancy, an institution built and founded by Dr. Neathery, and affording some of the finest facilities for private hospital practice and for the care of chronic patients.

Dr. Neathery has always voted the Republican ticket, but belongs to the Progressive branch of that party, and especially in state and local affairs often votes for the man rather than for the party ticket. He is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. In March, 1893 at Whitewright, Grayson county, Dr. Neathery married Miss May Batsell, a daughter of James Batsell, a merchant of Whitewright, who died about 1896. Dr. Neathery and wife have one child, a daughter aged nineteen, and a graduate of Lenox Hall at St. Louis. Dr. Neathery has lived in north Texas for thirty years and has seen the transformation which has changed this country from an exclusively cattle and grazing region to one of settled and permanent agriculture and with a large population and untold resources of production and commerce. In his time Sherman has grown from a small town of two thousand people to a prosperous city of about twenty thousand, with schools, colleges, and improvements which give it rank as one of the best centers of trade and culture in the southwest. Dr. Neathery has his offices in the Merchants and Planters Bank building and his home is at 723 S. Travis street.

ROYALL RICHARD WATKINS. One of the successful younger men of the Dallas bar, where his abilities have received well-merited recognition, is Royall Richard Watkins, who entered practice in this city in 1910 and has already been connected with much important legislation. Mr. Watkins was born at Athens, Henderson county, Texas, March 11, 1885, and is a son of Judge Albert Bacon and Laura (Murchison) Watkins.

Judge Albert Bacon Watkins was born August 4, 1857, at Kemp, Kaufman county, Texas, was educated at old Trinity University, at Tehuacana, Texas, where he was graduated in the class of 1877, and studied law and was admitted to the bar at Kaufman, Texas, in 1879. Shortly thereafter he removed to Athens, Texas and began the practice of law, and has resided at that place ever since, being widely known as one of the ablest members of the Lone Star bar. In 1892 he was appointed by Governor Hogg to the position of district judge of the Third Judicial District, composed of the counties of Houston, Anderson and Henderson, and after serving as such for one term resigned and resumed private practice. He is one of the distinguished Masons of the state, and had the honor of serving as grand master of the Grand Lodge of Texas, A. F. & A. M., in 1896 and 1897, he at that time being one of the youngest men to ever hold this position in Texas.

The paternal grandfather of Royall R. Watkins, Richard Overton Watkins, was born near Clarksville, on the Cumberland river, Tennessee, March 31, 1816. In 1833 he came to Texas with his father, Capt. Jesse Watkins, and family, locating first near Clarksville, in the Red river country, but a short time later removing to Nacogdoches. He was a minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian church, and had the distinction of being the first Protestant preacher to be ordained in the Republic of Texas, this occurring at a meeting of the presbytery at old Fort Houston. Reverend Watkins, was a minister all his active life, and died at Kemp, in 1897. His father, Capt. Jesse Watkins, was a friend and military associate of Gen. Sam Houston, under whom he had charge of negotiating treaties with the Indians in the early days of the Republic. In this service he met a soldier's death, in 1838, at the hands of a band of hostile Indians. Referring further to the life of Rev. Richard Overton Watkins, he was actively engaged in educational work in Texas, and was one of the early supporters of old Trinity University at Tehuacana, to which place he removed with his family in order to give his boys the benefit of attendance at that institution. When this was accomplished he returned to Kemp, after having donated liberally to Trinity University in land and houses for the accommodation of students. His wife before her marriage was Miss Amanda Polk, who was born at San Augustine, Texas, a member of the distinguished American family of that name. She was the daughter of John and Elizabeth (Allen) Polk, the former a son of Charles Polk, who was widely known as "Civil Charlie" Polk. The latter was born in Mecklenburg county, North Carolina, and he and his three brothers were the ones who raised the liberty pole at Charlotte, the night before the adoption of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, May 19, 1775. He was a soldier in the Continental line in the Revolutionary war, as was also his father, John Polk, the latter holding the rank of captain. "Civil Charlie" Polk was a pioneer from North Carolina to East Tennessee, where he lived for many years, and at a late age removed with his family to Texas, in 1840, settling at San Augustine, the family having ever since been prominent in East Texas. He died at San Augustine, Texas, at a ripe old age. Two older brothers of Judge A. B. Watkins—John Polk and Jesse—were Confederate soldiers from Texas.

Royall Richard Watkins was reared at Athens and prepared for college under Dr. W. H. Bruce, now president of the North Texas Normal College. He began attendance at Trinity University the first year it was at its present location, Waxahatchie, 1902, and spent two years in that institution, and then went to Yale University, where he was a student for two and one-half years in general academic work. He studied law in the law department of the University of Texas in 1907 and 1908, and passed the bar examinations and was admitted to practice in the latter year, and at once opened an office at Athens. There he continued until 1910, when he came to Dallas and began practice at the bar of this city. Mr. Watkins has taken some interest in politics, and was a member of the famous Texas delegation to the Democratic National Convention at Baltimore which nominated Woodrow Wilson in June, 1912. Fraternally, he is connected with the Masons, in which he has attained the Knights Templar and Scottish Rite degrees and is a Shriner, and has also the honor of membership in the Kappa Alpha fraternity, which is the only distinctly southern college order.

In 1911 Mr. Watkins was married at Austin to Miss Julia Myrick, and they have one child: Margaret.

RUFUS LEIGH HEFLIN. It will hardly be disputed that one of the foremost factors in the great Texas cotton industry has for many years been Mr. R. L. Heflin, whose name is one of current familiarity among practically all Texas cotton men, and particularly among all interested in cotton seed products, not only in this state but throughout the South and abroad. By residence and business activities Mr. Heflin has been longest identified with the city of Galveston, though he is almost equally well known in the northern part of the state, and has a home at Sherman.

There is sufficient authority in the actual facts to say that Mr. Heflin has done more to exploit and improve cotton seed products and give greater efficiency to the various organized interests engaged in that industry than any other man in Texas. It was Mr. Heflin who in 1896 took the lead in organizing the Texas Cotton Seed Crushers Association, and in 1898 assisted in organizing the Inter-State Cotton Seed Crushers Association. Mr. Heflin for several years served as vice president of the Texas Association, and accepted the presidency in 1908, and was vice president of the Inter-State Association in 1910 and elected president in 1911. While a pioneer in the exporting and manufacture of cotton seed products, Mr. Heflin's influence has extended far beyond the range of his individual interests, large as they are, and besides his official connection with the larger organization just mentioned, has used his efforts in every possible way to promote the interests of both producers and consumers of cotton seed products. A notable instance of his part in the great campaign of education on the value of cotton seed products was his address in 1909, while president of the Texas Association, before the Cattle Raisers Association, on the subject of the relation of cotton seed products to the cattle industry. This question was discussed so clearly and with such cogent arguments for the extended use of cotton seed products among stock raisers and dairymen that the convention had twenty thousand copies of the address printed for distribution, and later the Cotton Seed Oil Mill Association published a hundred thousand copies of the address, and it is one of the most widely distributed and read documents on the subject.

Before taking up the formal biographical details of his career, it will be appropriate to quote a few paragraphs from an issue of the Dallas Farm and Ranch of December 26, 1908, the proprietor of which journal, Mr. Frank P. Holland, has been a personal friend of Mr. Heflin since boyhood. As an introduction to his sketch Colonel Holland said: "To face the world at seventeen years without parents, assistance from friends or capital, is not a pleasant prospect for any lad. To overcome the natural obstacles which are in the way of the boy in such a situation; to rise to a place of high importance, becoming one of the determining personalities in a great industry, requires a man with that rare ability to quietly, steadfastly pursue a given purpose until its achievement becomes a veritable religion of life. Some one has written that all aspiration is prayer. Another has said that God always answers the prayers of the industrious man. Rufus L. Heflin, a Texas boy, aspired to become a dominant factor in southern business. To him was given industry and perseverance. He learned at an early period of his business career to say 'yes' and 'no' in a tone that implied the ultimatum, and his later career has demonstrated what a man can do for himself if he is able to make a quick, positive and level-headed decision.

"Before he was thirty years old, Mr. Heflin had begun to study the quintessentials of cotton seed products, and had foreseen the great industry that was destined to develop in the south, following the general knowledge that raw cotton seed contained many qualities so valuable that it would almost rival, in value and usefulness, the lint. So it happened that when in 1880 the manufacture of the seed began as a real industry, Mr. Heflin became a pioneer in it, and, while his beginning was as a small exporter from Galveston, he soon became known as a man who studied his work and shortly was recognized as an authority on anything pertaining to cotton seed products. Pursuing his efforts to become a thoroughly grounded man in his work, Mr. Heflin made a number of trips to Europe, visiting every country several times, and studied at first hand the needs of those markets."

Colonel Holland then analyzed the conditions of the industry during the 'eighties and early 'nineties, at which time cotton seed was considered almost valueless by most producers, and when the big oil mills built in Texas could get their raw material almost for nothing. The mills and crushers developed rapidly but without organization and before market prices had settled down to a stable basis. The great packing houses soon invaded the field, and their magnificent organization together with the work of the European buyers, enabled them to dictate the price of oil and the local interests were reduced to an almost hopeless condition.

"Mr. Heflin," continues Colonel Holland, "was one of the first to see the disadvantages under which the crude mills handled their business. He was actively instrumental in organizing the Texas Cotton Seed Crushers Association, and assisted in forming the Inter-State Cotton Seed Crushers Association. The aims of these associations are, to unite for fraternal and business purposes cotton seed crushers and persons engaged in allied interests, who are of good moral character; and especially to enlarge the markets for the sale of cotton seed products at home and abroad, and to develop and demonstrate the many economic and satisfactory purposes for which cotton seed products may be safely used; thus creating, enlarging and extending the demand therefor, to the end that both the manufacturer and the consumer may be materially benefited thereby."

In conclusion Colonel Holland pronounced Mr. Heflin as a recognized authority on all that pertained to the by-products of cotton, a position strongly re-enforced by his standing as head of several of the largest business corporations in the state for the manufacture of cotton seed products and also as head of the exporting business which he had established in Galveston more than thirty years ago.

Rufus Leigh Heflin was born in Raleigh, North Carolina, October 11, 1849. His parents were Rev. R. T. and Lucy Ann Heflin. His father was a Methodist minister was the first editor of the North Carolina Christian Advocate published at Raleigh, and on moving to Texas in 1861 became prominently identified with educational affairs, being president of the Female College in Huntsville, until his death during the yellow fever scourge in October, 1867. The same dread disease also took away his wife and oldest son, T. W. Heflin, who then twenty-one years of age, was professor of mathematics in the college at Huntsville. In the paternal line Mr. R. L. Heflin represents a well balanced ancestry, his grandmother's father having come from England, his grandfather's father from Germany, while in the maternal line the grandmother's father was a Scotchman and the grandfather's father was from Ireland.

When the yellow fever epidemic of 1867 invaded the family and took away the parents, R. L. Heflin was a sophomore in the Austin College in Huntsville, but was unable to continue his education further, and quit school and went to work to support and educate two sisters and two younger brothers. Beginning at the age of seventeen, he was for two years employed in the counting office of the wholesale and retail mercantile firm of A. M. Baker & Company, starting at forty dollars a month and when the firm retired from business was cashier and head bookkeeper at wages of one hundred and seventy-five dollars a month. During these two years Mr. Heflin studied architecture at night, and at nineteen began an employment which continued for two and a half years in another retail and jobbing house. His salary at first was a hundred and fifty dollars a month, and before Alston & Oliphant had dissolved partnership they were paying him two hundred and fifty dollars a month for his services. The firm then engaged in business at Galveston under the name of Gary & Oliphant, wholesale grocers and cotton merchants. On the dissolution of the partnership of Alston & Oliphant, Mr. Heflin was left in charge and wound up their business. During this period of two and a half years he employed his spare time in the study of surveying, under the direction of the county surveyor, and during the dull season of trade did considerable actual field work. From boyhood he had displayed a natural taste for mechanics, was proficient in mathematics, and it was this taste which led him to become a surveyor.

After his marriage in 1872 Mr. Heflin opened an office in Houston as financial agent for Ward, Dewey & Company, the lessees of the State Penitentiary. His salary was placed at three thousand dollars per year, and was later increased to four thousand eight hundred dollars. He remained with the firm three years, and after the lease had expired he returned to Huntsville and assisted his employers in winding up their business and disposing of their assets. In 1880 Mr. Heflin established himself at Galveston in the position of adjuster and credit man for the wholesale grocery house of Heidenheimer Brothers at a salary of two hundred dollars per month for the first six months, and four hundred dollars a month during the second half of the year, and for the next twelve months five hundred dollars a month. It was at that time that Mr. Heflin took up seriously the study of cotton seed products and instituted a thorough analysis of the food values of cotton seed as compared with other feed stuffs and foods both for animal and human uses. His investigations decided him to enter business for himself in the handling of cotton seed products. Soon afterward he opened an office and engaged in the exportation of such products and his business at Galveston in that line has been continued ever since. His knowledge of architecture, acquired during the days when he was a self-student, enabled him after the export season each year was over to take contracts for the building of oil mills, and in this line he has a record of having constructed about fifteen first-class mills in Texas, and in 1901, as the lowest bidder, received the contract for constructing the State Sugar Mill with a daily capacity of a thousand tons.

Mr. Heflin has been in the export business at Galveston since 1885, and during twelve years of this time maintained an office in New Orleans, through which he handles cotton seed products manufactured in that state, and also collected from Mississippi, Tennessee, Georgia and Alabama. The office at New Orleans was closed after deep water was obtained for Galveston. As an exporter of cotton seed products at Galveston, Mr. Heflin buys from mills all over Texas, Oklahoma and Arkansas, and each year handles on the average about one hundred thousand tons of cotton seed cake and meal, which is exported to Germany, England, France, Norway, Sweden and Denmark.

Mr. Heflin is president of the Sherman Cotton Oil Provision Company at Sherman, refiners and exporters of several well known commercial brands of cotton seed oil lards and oils, for cooking purposes. The Sherman Company buy and refine from 75,000 to 100,000 barrels of cotton seed oil annually, and converts it into products that are used in thousands of homes both in America and abroad.

Mr. Heflin is president of the Mundy Cotton Oil Company, with an oil mill in Mundy, Texas; of the Graham Cotton Oil Company, with a mill at Graham; and is the controlling stockholder in these companies, and also stockholder in the Bowie Cotton Oil Company of Bowie; the Wichita Falls Cotton Oil Company at Wichita Falls; the Farmers and Ginners Cotton Oil Company at Austin; the Rockwall Cotton Oil Company at Rockwall; and is president of the Mexia Quarry Company of Mexia and vice-president of the Anchor Milling Company at Galveston, besides various other interests.

Colonel Holland said of Mr. Heflin that he was as active as many men twenty years younger, and from the energy which he displays in looking after his extensive interests it is easy to believe that he is one of the busiest and hardest working men in the state. In spite of the incessant activities of a career of more than forty years, he retains splendid health, and has never been sick since the yellow fever epidemic of 1867. During the last two or three years Mr. Heflin has gradually turned over to his sons the detailed part of the Sherman and Galveston business, and now keeps his business headquarters about half the time in each city, only directing the policies of the corporations, and finding time to enjoy life and the liberal rewards which his career has created.

While, as the above sketch indicates, few men have better served the producing and general commercial population of Texas than Mr. Heflin, his service has been almost entirely through his business affairs, and not in a political or official way. He is a Democratic voter and a Methodist in religion. He assisted in building the Y. M. C. A. and the Elks Lodge building at Sherman, and belongs to each organization.

On June 12, 1872, at Huntsville, Mr. Heflin married Miss Kate Ewing Bush. Her father, John W. Bush, moved to Texas from Virginia in 1854, and for many years was a Huntsville merchant. Her mother was a Miss Ewing, a granddaughter of Alexander Campbell, the founder of the Christian church. Mr. and Mrs. Heflin's children are: Kate Bush, born April 29, 1877, and now Mrs. E. H. Young; Rufus Leigh Heflin Jr., born March 23, 1882, and now secretary and treasurer of the Sherman Cotton Oil Provision Company; Mattie Alston, born July 19, 1879, and wife of W. L. Nance; Nina Leonard, born December 19, 1885, the wife of D. W. Head; John Ewing, born May 28, 1888, died February, 1910; Edward Allan, born April 10, 1891, now living in Galveston; Frances Betts, born September 23, 1894. Besides these children Mr. and Mrs. Heflin have an adopted daughter, Katherine Ewing, born June 23, 1912.

SIMEON W. S. DUNCAN. No man in Dallas has enjoyed more of the distinctions of citizenship and distinguished public service than "Commodore" Duncan. A resident of Dallas more than forty years, now retired from an activity in private business affairs which long ago brought him ample prosperity, he is still the most prominent figure as he always has been, in all matters relating to the great project of Trinity River navigation. A commanding figure in the affairs of the north metropolis, the mere mention of his name is a sufficient introduction to the people of the state at large. The following brief recital of his career will serve to justify a tribute paid him by the late Judge Lindsley, the Dallas historian, who said: "Honored and loved by all, the Commodore has entered, as it were, into the immortality of his fame while still among his compatriots, whom he has served so long, so wisely and so well."

With a few additions and changes, the following article is taken chiefly from a sketch of Commodore Duncan written a few years ago by one who has long been acquainted with his activities and his influential character. Born in Hardin county, about ten miles south of Elizabethtown, Kentucky, October 22, 1848, Simeon W. S. Duncan is a son of James A. and Catherine (Daughter) Duncan. His father, a true southern gentleman from Virginia and of Scotch ancestry, in 1857 moved from Hardin county to Louisville, was a merchant in that city, and in 1870 moved with his family to Texas, and from Jefferson, in the eastern part of the state, went to Grayson county in 1873, and finally located in Dallas where his death occurred in 1892 at the age of sixty-six. He was survived by his widow, who was born in Kentucky in 1827 and who died in Dallas in 1913, at the age of eighty-six.

Simeon W. S. Duncan finished his education in the University of Kentucky at Lexington in 1868. He accompanied his parents to Texas in 1870, and in the following year came to Dallas, finding a place as bookkeeper with the pioneer mercantile firm of Clark & Bryan.

It was about this time that young Duncan did his first important service to Dallas. What this service was is best described in an article taken from a local newspaper and quoted in part as follows: "In Dallas in 1871 there was a mercantile firm, Clark & Bryan. This firm had a great big young fellow from Kentucky keeping books for it. He knew that the charter of the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific railroad required it to cross Trinity as near the thirty-second parallel of latitude as practicable and that this would take it to Corsicana. For this great east and west Trunk line to cross the Houston & Texas Central railroad at Corsicana would make that point a great city and kill Dallas's prospects of being a city. That young fellow was Sim Duncan, our own Commodore. He and W. J. Clark put their wits together, and devised a plan to bring the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific road through Dallas instead of Corsicana. No one knew the scheme but themselves. They wrote the people along the line of road that would run from Jefferson to Dallas and succeeded in having a convention in Dallas in the summer of 1871 which passed resolutions and pledged themselves to secure a charter and build a road from Jefferson to Dallas, and thence to Wichita. Sim Duncan made a map of the proposed route showing how desirable a one it was, and the scheme worked like a charm. The legislature met the following January, and a company having been organized a representative went to Austin to obtain a charter. In the meantime overtures were being made to the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific road to go through Dallas instead of Corsicana, and the agreement was that Dallas would abandon its proposed road—from Jefferson to Dallas—but would secure a charter to Wichita and help the Southern Pacific road to get its charter amended, the ostensible purpose of the change being to alter the name again. The name was changed to the Texas & Pacific, and instead of going through Tyler and Corsicana, as its thirty-second parallel of latitude-charter required it to do, the route was changed to cross the Houston and Texas Central railroad within one mile of Browder Spring. These Springs are in the Dallas City Park. Its engineers headed from Marshall straight for Dallas, and there was weeping and gnashing of teeth at Tyler and Corsicana."

In March, 1872, Mr. Duncan resigned his position as bookkeeper and took a contract to survey the town. He completed his work within three months, at about the time of the completion of the first railroad into the city, the Houston & Texas Central in July, 1872. From these surveys he made a map of the town, the first one of Dallas as it then existed, and from that time forward he was engaged in land business, abstracting of titles and in surveying and engineering, having served two terms as city engineer of Dallas during its earlier development. He was the pioneer abstractor of titles in northern Texas, and from 1872 until his retirement from business his private activities were concentrated along that line. He is known to have surveyed more land in Texas than any other man.

While his unselfish public spirit has been manifested in every important phase of Dallas' growth and development as a great city, Mr. Duncan is best known as the father of Trinity River navigation. In the late '80s, while casually investigating the railroad rates on certain commodities shipped to and from the city of Dallas, he discovered that, while Dallas was a great railroad center and that northern and central Texas was traversed and cobwebbed in all directions with numerous lines of railways, yet the freight rates charged upon the commerce of that section were higher than in any corresponding section in all the United States. The injustice of such an enormous tribute levied upon his state and city by these railroads impressed him strongly. He further discovered that hope of relief by legislation, through commissioners or other official action, was fallacious. This impressed him that a city of importance in northern or central Texas could never succeed with these handicaps; that no city could aspire to be great without a water transportation connecting with the coast. The navigation of the Trinity river offered the only relief from the freight rates and the only solution was a continuous and permanent water transportation by which Dallas could be made a great city. These same views were entertained by many other patriotic citizens of Dallas. The result of this agitation was that Mr. Duncan, in connection with Mr. C. A. Keating, T. W. Griffith, James Moroney and many others began an active campaign to secure the required results.

It was in recognition of Mr. Duncan's zealous, unselfish and untiring efforts to make the Trinity river a navigable stream that his appreciative fellow citizens have affectionately bestowed upon him the title of "Commodore Duncan." This great work of Mr. Duncan has been prosecuted with a vigor which has known no rest and in face of obstacles which would have appalled the bravest. In advance of the application made to congress for the appropriation necessary, he gathered his material, marshalled his facts and advanced his reasons in a series of great arguments, which when delivered and published became the text book of instruction in the improvement of the inland waterways of the United States. Every enterprise looking to the improvement of inland waterways is based upon the arguments marshalled by Mr. Duncan in his appeal to congress.

Its work has been prosecuted in the face of relentless opposition on the part of corporate interests and rival communities and the exasperating delays that beset every government undertaking. At one time a hostile board of engineers appointed by the secretary of war to investigate the improvement of the Trinity river reported that there was insufficient water supply; that the project was neither practicable, nor feasible or advisable, and strongly recommended that no money be appropriated for the improvement of the Trinity river. This failed to daunt the invincible spirit of Mr. Duncan. He took the report of the unfriendly board and gave to it a searching analysis and a thorough examination. He demonstrated that the conclusions arrived at by the board were based upon insufficient, false and faulty data, and by the most overwhelming demonstration proved that by the data relied upon even by the board itself, the improvement of the Trinity river was not only practicable and feasible, but was imperatively and absolutely necessary. As a result of persistent and continued efforts another board of expert engineers was appointed. At great length they examined the questions in controversy and at the end of six weeks reported that Mr. Duncan was sustained in all his conclusions, and further reported that the improvement of the Trinity river was practicable, feasible and desirable. Since then the question of the practicability of the improvement of the Trinity river has been closed. Nearly two million dollars has been provided and appropriated by the Federal government and expended and it is the hope of every citizen of Dallas and vicinity that Commodore Duncan may be a triumphant witness of the completion of a work which has absorbed his energies through so many years. It was chiefly due to the influence and the arguments of Mr. Duncan that the work of improvement was begun at Dallas instead of at the mouth of the Trinity, and he succeeded in having a new engineering district created with headquarters at Dallas.

In April, 1883, Commodore Duncan married Miss Denia Bullion. Their only child is Miss Josephine Duncan.

As a conclusion to this brief article may be quoted the exact words of the writer of the sketch from which the above material is chiefly drawn. "We have not the space to enumerate the many public enterprises with which Mr. Duncan has been identified since he came to Dallas. The great Viaduct spanning the Trinity River at Dallas stands as a monument to his energetic spirit in trying to make Dallas a great city. In September, 1909, more than fifty of the leading business men of Dallas presented to him the finest silver loving cup there is in Texas. On this cup is the following inscription: 'Presented to Commodore S. W. S. Duncan in appreciation of his great work in securing the viaduct for Greater Dallas.' He has been the soul and the animating spirit of many others. He may not excel in the graces and dilettante accomplishments of life, yet, like Themistocles, he can say 'While I cannot play the violin, I can make a village into a great city.' While Mr. Duncan has been blessed by nature with a great and massive mind, he is withal a man of modest worth. Not a word of his great achievements will ever be heard from him. A friend who has known him intimately for thirty years and who is familiar with his beneficent career writes and furnishes this meager sketch of his loyal and patriotic services to his city and state.

From the terraced height of sixty-five years, Mr. Duncan can look back upon a long, active life, honestly and honorably spent and starred with brilliant achievements. He is blessed with splendid health. His eye is not dim, nor is his natural force abated. In the life that stretches before him, he will march on to still other achievements for the good of his city, his trusting and admiring fellow citizens. When all is over and he boards that mysterious bark which touches at every man's port, he will leave behind him the respect and affection of all his fellow citizens. On the slab which marks his final resting place, there can be fittingly and truly inscribed 'Here lies one of the wisest, the noblest and best of men.' "

JOHN T. ROBINSON, M. D. Thirty-two of the forty years of Dr. John T. Robinson's professional career have been spent at Jacksboro, and during this time he has established a record for faithful devotion to his calling, strict adherence to its highest ideals and ethics and self-sacrificing service to his patients that has elevated him to the front rank among Jack county's physicians and surgeons. Moreover he has at all times displayed a public-spirited citizenship and a willingness to assume his full share of the responsibilities thereof, his influence always being on the side of moral, educational and religious advancement.

Doctor Robinson is a native of the Blue Grass state, born in Henry county, Kentucky, June 9, 1848, and is a son of F. M. and Frances J. (Ayner) Robinson, the former born in Alabama and the latter in Kentucky. The father, a farmer and stock raiser by vocation, brought the family to Texas in 1855, first locating in Collins county and subsequently moving to Denton county, where he continued to reside until his death in 1867. His demise was hastened by his army experiences, he having lost his health while serving in the Civil war as a private in the Fourteenth Texas Infantry, with which he served during nearly the entire period of the great struggle, participating in numerous engagements and establishing an admirable record for bravery and faithfulness to duty. The mother survived him many years, and passed away May 24, 1904. Of their two children, Doctor Robinson was the younger.

Private schools in Texas furnished Doctor Robinson with his early educational training, he having come to this state with his parents as a lad of seven years, and this was supplemented by attendance at the high school at Fort Worth, following which he pursued his medical course in the University of Louisville, Kentucky. After his graduation therefrom with the degree of Doctor of Medicine, in 1874, he began practice as a member of the Texas Rangers, but after a short period with that famous organization he settled down at Elizabeth, Denton county, where he remained until 1882. In that year he came to Jacksboro and opened an office, and here he has continued to remain in the enjoyment of an excellent professional business to the present time. At various times he has been honored by election and appointment to offices of responsibility and trust in the line of his profession, being a member of the board of medical examiners for eight years and county health officer of Jack county for an extended period. He belongs to the various organizations of his vocation, and is fraternally connected with the Knights of Pythias and the Masons. A Democrat in politics, he has steadfastly supported the policies and candidates of his party, and is a stalwart Wilson man. With his family, he attends the Christian church. Doctor Robinson believes that the community of Jacksboro is one of the most healthful in the state, there being but a minimum of malaria, while the city ranks second in standing in this section. He has witnessed its great growth and development during the last thirty years, and has contributed his full share to the progress which has made it one of the thriving cities of this part of Texas.

In January, 1878, at Pilot Point, Texas, Doctor Robinson was married to Miss Katy B. Brown, and to this union there have been born three sons and one daughter, namely: J. B., aged thirty-four years, engaged in the mining business in New Mexico; Mrs. Grizelle Buckner, of Bridgeport, Texas, wife of Dr. K. T. Buckner, a practicing physician of that place; Hugh T., who is a book-keeper and resides at Jacksboro; and Byron B., who is connected with a dry goods establishment at Jacksboro.

MRS. VIRGINIA K. JOHNSON. Perhaps no institution has done a better and more useful work in social service than the Virginia K. Johnson Home at Dallas. While it originated as an undertaking under the auspices of Christian women for the redemption and care of misguided and unfortunate girls in the city of Dallas, the work has been conducted with such ever widening circle of success that the Home is now recognized as one of the most conspicuous centers in the entire South in the great movement for the eradication of the social evil and the restitution of its victims. The founder and superintendent of the Home, whose name it bears, has for more than twenty years carried on her work with an enthusiasm and devotion worthy of the cause, and her ambition to make it a successful institution has been fully realized. It is supported by the M. E. Church South. While modern philanthropy and generosity can be appropriately directed through many channels, there is none that deserves more substantial support than the cause to which the Virginia K. Johnson Home is dedicated, and without any invidious discrimination it can be said that wealthy men and women can bestow their material prosperity on no worthier object than this Home for delinquent girls, regarded with so much pride among the benevolent institutions of Dallas.

Many articles of description and commendation have appeared in the public press regarding the Home, and the data for the following brief sketch are contained chiefly in recent issues of the Dallas News and an article by Dr. G. C. Rankin in the Texas Christian Advocate. At the time of the twenty-first anniversary of the Home the News said: "The work of sheltering girls who have taken their 'first step downward' was started by Mrs. Johnson and other christian women of Dallas in February, 1893. Now the institution has a magnificent brick building in the south part of Oak Cliff, well equipped with dormitories, hospital, baby bathroom, dining hall, class rooms and eighteen acres of ground, making a plant worth about one hundred thousand dollars. Sixty girls are now housed in the Home learning to cook and to sew, as well as receiving instruction in the literary branches. They range in age from twelve to twenty-two—many of them but children themselves—forced all too soon to know the faithlessness of humanity and the pangs and love of motherhood—motherhood mocked into shame. The Home has a capacity for seventy-five girls. The rooms are furnished exactly alike and are uniform in cleanliness and neatness. The classrooms are equipped with all the facilities of the up-to-date schoolroom. The sewing room is conducted under a competent director, the culinary and domestic science department is the peer of more famous institutions. Here the girls are instructed in the arts that may stand them in good stay as they begin their lives

new. The hospital department is the pride of the Home. In equipment it is the equal of any institution of its kind in Dallas, and in size it is ample to care for the needs of the institution.

"The results of the Virginia K. Johnson Home and School cannot be told in a schedule of hours or a curriculum. It is built into reclaimed lives, snatched from a hell on earth; it gleams from eyes changed from the sadness of scalding tears of disappointment to the clear light of hope and Christian living; it is proven by the straight and useful lives these girls live when they have finally gone forth from the holy influence of the Home and its patron saint, 'Mother' Johnson.

Not only does the Home provide for the life of the girl who comes to its sheltering arms with her load of grief and sorrow, but it provides for the little life that comes into the world in the maternity room in the hospital ward. The babies are all adopted into good homes, most of them by the time they are six months old, though none are taken away from the Home under that age. The foster parents give the baby their own family name and rear it as if it were their own. So attached do they become to the little ones that they use every precaution that the childish heart shall never be broken by learning in after years of its real origin. This is one of the many peculiar features that make the Virginia K. Johnson Home one of commanding, practical Christianity. To let the children grow up at the Home would be an unutterable unkindness to them for obvious reasons. 'Love sacrificeth all things for the thing it loves,' Mrs. Johnson tells the little mother as she cries aloud that she cannot let her baby go to strangers to be reared."

A quotation in part from Dr. Rankin's article will indicate some of the early steps in the progress of this institution and also an appreciation of its founder and superintendent. "She began this work more than twenty years ago on a small scale, under the auspices of the King's Daughters, and right well do we remember the unsightly house, in the outskirts of the city, she rented and crudely fitted up for this mammoth undertaking. It was not a popular movement and it required wonderful faith and hope and courage to go forward in the face of impending obstruction. But this noble woman never wavered. A few years later and she had prevailed upon Mrs. Ann Browder Cunningham to donate a plot of valuable ground on which to project a better place for the work in hand; and then she appealed with voice and pen to the good people of the State to help her place a suitable home on the site. After some years of sacrificing labor, the large two-story frame building took shape, and then through her efforts the church took hold of the matter and gave to her its endorsement. There she labored assiduously, amid hardships and burdens, until finally the Home Mission Society of the entire church took it over and her recognition became larger and broader.

"But this arrangement for a Home did not meet Mrs. Johnson's ideas of caring for the multiplied wards that came under her care and tuition. For when these unfortunates learned that there was one foster mother looking after them, they began to apply to her by the score for help in their distress. The city soon built up beyond the confines of the Home, and she longed for better facilities and larger accommodations. Her faith grew with the needs of her field, and she began a movement for something in keeping with the responsibility of her task; and with the aid of those now interested, she secured a fine plat of ground in the outskirts of Oak Cliff and set herself to the task of raising money to put upon it a large, well-equipped and modern structure, with perfect facilities for work of that character. To make a long story short, that structure, after some years of struggle, is there in its beauty and glory, a credit to the church and an inspiration to humanity.

Some little debt is still on it, but our 'Saint Virginia' is taxing her resources of body and soul to liquidate this and set the property free before she goes hence. Today all Methodism is proud of this connexional institution and its splendid work for a worthy, though neglected, class of womankind. Under its fostering care in the years past, with all its early handicaps, our 'Saint Virginia' has seen more than sixteen hundred blighted girls restored to their womanhood and sent forth to be useful members of society, and she has seen 850 innocent babes put into good Christian homes to be brought up with no knowledge of their unfortunate advent into this cold and selfish world. We do not overlook the fact that hundreds of others have done their humble part in making this institution what it is today, and we accord them their meed of praise. But our 'Saint Virginia' has excelled them all. The institution was born in her own heart and mind, and it has been nurtured by her toil and blood. Under God it is the creation of her faith and hope. And it stands there today as a monument to her self-sacrificing toil and persistent energy through all sorts of discouragement and under all sorts of struggle and gloomy forebodings." In addition to what others have said so well and so justly, it is hardly required to comment further. Mrs. Johnson's exceptional business ability is proved by the tact, diplomacy and persistence which she has shown in getting financial aid for the Home, not only from the Methodist church, but from wealthy citizens and from other church denominations, and also from various sections of the United States. Mrs. Johnson edits and publishes the King's Messenger, which is the official organ of the Home, and which enables her to get her work before a large public. Through her personal request to President Wilson, the latter issued an order to the Postmaster General exempting the King's Messenger from all restrictions as to the mailing of sample copies, and through this paper Mrs. Wilson has taken a personal interest in the Home. Mrs. Johnson has been honored by the endorsement of her work and by the encouragement of many other high officials in state and nation.

Mrs. Virginia K. Johnson is the widow of the late W. H. Johnson, a prominent lawyer of Dallas, who at one time served as city and county attorney. He was born in Richmond, Virginia, and Mrs. Johnson is a native of Lynchburg in the same state. Both, however, were reared in Pike county, Missouri, where their respective families moved, and Mr. and Mrs. Johnson came from Bowling Green, Missouri, to Dallas in 1883.

CHARLES R. RUSSELL. As superintendent of agents for the Two Republics Life Insurance Company, of El Paso, of which corporation he is also a stockholder and director, Mr. Russell has been a resident of this west Texas city for the past three years, and was previously identified with the life insurance business in Austin. While one of his ancestors was a distinguished soldier of the Republic of Texas, Mr. Russell himself belongs to a family long prominent in Georgia, which state was his own home and the center of his business activities until his removal to Texas five years ago.

Charles R. Russell was born and reared at Columbus, Muscogee county, Georgia. His father was the late honored and lamented Captain Charles R. Russell, a gallant soldier and officer in the Confederate service in the war between the States, whose record as a soldier and whose sterling character and practical achievements made him conspicuous in his home state of Georgia. He left the University of Georgia when a young man to accept the post of assistant secretary of the treasury of the United States under Hon. Howell Cobb, who was secretary of the treasury under President Buchanan. A short time before the outbreak of the war and after Georgia seceded from the Union, Captain Russell promptly resigned his federal office and returned to his home state, there organizing a company that was among the first to enter the Confederate army in 1861. At the battle of Atlanta the gallant and intrepid Neil Habersham fell in his arms, only a short time after Joseph Habersham, his brother, had given up his life on the same field, and who likewise fell near Captain Russell. Others sacrificed their lives in this great battle, brave and loyal sons of the Confederacy, but no two deaths stirred a deeper feeling of loss and sympathy than those of the Habersham brothers. At the close of the war Captain Russell held the rank of colonel, having been promoted to that office after both the major and colonel of his regiment had been killed in battle, and his own was a record of fine efficiency and loyalty as a regimental officer in the Confederate army. Captain Charles R. Russell married Anna Robison, a daughter of Dr. A. I. Robison, who was long a physician and surgeon at Columbus, Georgia, and a Scotsman of the McNeill clan. Members of the Robison family were pioneers and soldiers of Texas who contributed to the establishment of the Republic, and for this reason Mr. Russell of El Paso has a loyalty to the State of his adoption greater than his length of residence would naturally produce.

At Columbus Charles R. Russell spent his early youth, and attended the Park Hall Academy, then under the direction of Professor James J. Slade, and was a student there until he entered the University of Georgia. Graduating from the university with the degree Bachelor of Arts, Mr. Russell took up the study of law in the offices of McNeill & Levy, one of the leading law firms of Columbus, and continued with the firm for several years after his admission to the bar. He then set up an office of his own in Columbus and in a short time had gained a successful practice.

While looking after the interests of a growing legal practice, Mr. Russell also interested himself in public affairs and was one of the active Democrats of his district. His party elected him for several terms to the state legislature, and his legislative record includes the chairmanship of several important committees, and his name is associated with the authorship of valuable legislation still on the Georgia statutes. While a member of the Georgia legislature there appeared in a leading Georgia newspaper an editorial written by Rev. Sam Small, containing the following comments and appreciation: "In the present general assembly the grand old county of Muscogee is represented by Hon. Charles R. Russell, who is serving his first term as a member. Muscogee did well when she turned to the Russell clan for another of its able sons to represent her public interests in legislation. The state at large has not forgotten but will hold in endeared remembrance those two strong, loyal, fearless patriots, the brothers 'Jim' Russell and 'Charlie' Russell, who so long and so splendidly illustrated the chivalry and Georgianism of Muscogee. They fought for Georgia on crimson fields of battle, their courage never failed, their lips never ceased to protest, and their strength stood steadfast by the mother state. In the son and nephew they have endowed Muscogee with a scion of promising powers. Like them he is chivalrous and aggressive. Like them he wears the rose above his heart and the thistle on his sword arm. In his first session-work he made himself conspicuous for both modesty and intelligence, winning the confidence of his colleagues."

Other public service which he rendered during his residence in Georgia was as a representative of that state at the National Conference for ballot reform, held in New York City in 1906, under the auspices of the Civic Federation. With the exception of the late Hon. A. W. Terrell of Texas, he was the only southern member invited to read a paper and discuss the election laws before the session of this important conference. He also had the distinction of being elected secretary of the chief committee of the conference, which is an organization of national scope. As a prominent Georgia Democrat, Mr. Russell was for several years chairman of a Democratic executive committee. In 1907 he was designated by the Governor of Georgia as orator to respond for the state to the speech of President Roosevelt at the Jamestown exposition, and for his services rendered as Georgia commissioner to the exposition was presented with a commemorative medal by the state of Virginia. In 1908 President Roosevelt selected Mr. Russell for a consulship but at the same time General Clement A. Evans, then chairman of the Georgia prison commission, had appointed Mr. Russell a special representative of that body, and the opportunities for service to his home state caused him to decline the consulship. His work in behalf of the Georgia prison Commission continued for about one year and was marked by effective service. A short time after resigning that office he removed from the state, and in April, 1909, took up his residence in the city of Austin, Texas.

At Austin Mr. Russell formed a partnership with William L. Gilfillan under the name of Gilfillan & Russell, as a general life insurance agency and as district managers for the Great Southern Life Insurance Company. His record in the insurance field is perhaps familiar to most Texas representatives of that business. In a short time after beginning business in Texas he had qualified as a member of the One Hundred Thousand Dollar Club, an insurance organization, and on April 21, 1911, the anniversary of the battle of San Jacinto was distinguished by the election as the first president of that club, a recognition that came from the fact that he had written the largest amount of insurance among all the members of the organization within a specified time. Under the rules of the club no person can serve as president more than one term. The day of his election to the presidency was further celebrated by an excursion for the members of the organization down the Houston ship channel to the San Jacinto battle grounds where members and invited guests contributed to the celebration of a day which is always formally observed in Texas. It should be mentioned that on the San Jacinto battlefield, April 21, 1836, Mr. Russell's great-uncle was one of the Texas soldiers who actually captured General Santa Anna, whom he escorted as a prisoner to General Sam Houston. On returning from the battle ground to Houston, the members of the club and their guests, including a number of prominent Texans, prolonged the celebration by a fine banquet in the Rice Hotel.

In May, 1911, Mr. Russell accepted the position of superintendent of agents of the Two Republics Life Insurance Company and since then his headquarters and home has been in El Paso. He is a director in the Security Trust and Savings Bank, a stockholder in the Rio Grande Valley Bank and Trust Company, and in the Texas Bank and Trust Company.

Since coming to Texas Mr. Russell has continued his steady support of the Democratic party and the principles for which it stands. He is a member of various fraternal and social organizations, among them being the various Masonic bodies, and also the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Elks. For a number of years he has been very interested in Masonry, and possesses several jewels given him as marks of regard by his brethren in his home state and city. He represented Georgia at the session of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine held in Chicago in 1907.

Mr. Russell is a prominent member of the Georgia Society in El Paso.

PHILEMON BURGESS HUNT. Few Texans have had a career so filled with the spice and excitement of adventure, with varied service in the army, in various posts under the Federal government, and in business as Colonel Hunt, the former collector of Internal Revenue in the Dallas District and now living largely retired in that city. Colonel Hunt has been a resident of Texas nearly thirty years, having established himself as a rancher in West Texas after a long and eventful service beginning with the Civil war and continuing through official activities in various states of the South and in old Indian Territory.

J. B. Mearns

Philemon Burgess Hunt was born on his father's farm near Bryan Station, seven miles from Lexington, Fayette county, Kentucky, October 11, 1837. His parents were Gavine Drummond and Katherine Amelia (Burgess) Hunt. Among his ancestors were the Drummonds, a historic Scotch family directly descended from the Earl of Perth. Grandfather George Hunt was born on the Yadkin river in North Carolina, a son of Colonel Jonathan Hunt, who gained his title by brilliant service in the Revolutionary war. George Hunt when a young man moved to New Jersey, and married a daughter of Gavine Drummond. Their son, Gavine Drummond Hunt, was born in Monmouth county, New Jersey, December 2, 1794, his mother dying five days later, and in 1800 the father and son moved to the rich blue grass region of Fayette county, Kentucky.

It was on the old Kentucky homestead near Lexington that Philemon B. Hunt was reared and he acquired most of his education in that locality. Taking up his residence at Lexington, before the outbreak of the Civil war he was for some time deputy clerk of Fayette county. At the beginning of hostilities he was a member of the famous Lexington Chasseurs, a local military company incorporated with the Kentucky State Guards. Colonel Hunt's record in the Civil war is succinctly told by Colonel R. M. Kelly, of Louisville, Kentucky, who commanded the Fourth Kentucky Regiment after the resignation of Colonel Hunt. Colonel Kelly's sketch follows: "The military career of Colonel Philemon Burgess Hunt began on the first Monday in August, 1861. When Lieutenant William Nelson of the United States Navy, afterwards Major General Nelson, came to Kentucky with authority from Mr. Lincoln to organize three Regiments of Infantry and one of Cavalry, he selected as field officers for one of the regiments, afterwards known as the Fourth Kentucky Infantry, Speed S. Fry, afterwards Brigadier General, as colonel, John T. Croxton, afterwards Brigadier and Brevet Major General, as lieutenant colonel, and P. B. Hunt as major. Major Hunt had become an excellent drill master by his service in the Lexington Chasseurs, a crack company of the active state militia commanded by Captain S. D. Bruce, afterwards colonel of the Twentieth Kentucky Infantry, and was of great service in making the regiment what it became, one of the best drilled and disciplined of Kentucky regiments.

"In the organization of the army of the Ohio, the regiment was assigned to the first Division commanded by General George H. Thomas, and under that great commander helped to win the victory of Mill Springs on the 19th of January, 1862. For gallantry in that action Major Hunt was promoted to be lieutenant colonel. He participated with his regiment in the siege of Corinth, during which it engaged in a number of skirmishes, in an expedition to the Bear River Bridge under General Sherman, in the marches through Tennessee and to Louisville and then in the Perryville campaign and the march back to Gallatin, Tennessee, from which point on Christmas Eve, 1862, he went with the regiment to head off a raid by General John H. Morgan, with whose rear guard the regiment had a sharp skirmish at Rolling Fork, Kentucky, where Colonel Hunt's horse was seriously wounded. Taking cars at Lebanon Junction the regiment was transported to Nashville, and at once moved under General D. S. Stanley down the Cumberland to head off the raid of Forrest, after which the regiment was stationed at La Vergne, Tennessee, till the beginning of the Tullahoma Campaign, during which it skirmished at Hoover's Gap, Concord Church and Tullahoma.

"In the reorganization of the army, after the battle of Stone River, the regiment had been assigned with the Division to which it was attached, to the Fourteenth Army Corps, and about this time Colonel Croxton having been assigned to the command of the brigade, Lieutenant Colonel Hunt took command of the regiment. He was never on any detached duty during his service, always attentive and soldierly in the discharge of his duty and as regimental commander while he was always exacting in requiring discipline, he was untiring in looking after the comforts of his men and getting all they were entitled to. No commander was ever more popular with his men, or more thoroughly enjoyed their confidence. After the short rest following the Tullahoma Campaign, that which resulted in the battle of Chickamauga began. Croxton's brigade had the honor of opening that battle for the Union side, and about noon of that day, while in command and gallantly heading his regiment, Lieutenant Colonel Hunt was severely wounded, being shot through the left knee and had to be moved from the field. Only his own determination, backed by Dr. Arter, regimental surgeon of the Thirty-first Ohio, prevented the doctors, who insisted that his chances of life would be better, from cutting off his leg. His convalescence was slow, and, his wound unfitting him for further service, he resigned to the great regret of his comrades on April 13, 1864."

As illustrative of the remarkable freaks often played by shot and shell in battle, it may be stated that the bullet which put the colonel out of commission entered his horse's shoulder, where it remained until his death twenty-one years afterwards. The bullet was found and is now preserved by Colonel Hunt as one of his most interesting war relics, while the horse which bore this charmed life was taken to his family residence at Lexington, Kentucky, and used for twenty-one years after the war for various domestic purposes. Naturally, the household became deeply attached to the animal.

After a short experience as a cotton planter in Mississippi Colonel Hunt returned to Lexington, where he was appointed cashier in the office of the collector of internal revenue, and in 1874 President Grant appointed him supervisor of internal revenue for the district including Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. His appointment was confirmed January 9, 1875, and he was granted permission to locate his office at Lexington Kentucky. It was during his term of office in this position that the notorious rascality of the whisky ring was exposed throughout the county, but throughout the long investigation conducted by the government and the congressional authorities Colonel Hunt's name not only remained untarnished, but his services in unearthing and exposing the operations of those who had defrauded the government were of the most efficient character. Colonel Hunt's characteristic attributes of honor and honesty which have marked the entire course of his public career were particularly conspicuous in those days of wholesale corruption, and he was one of four men intrusted to Benjamin H. Bristow, secretary of the treasury, with the secrets of the investigation. His work was largely centered at New Orleans, and he closed the distilleries of that city about the time the raids were made upon the St. Louis establishments.

Concerning this interesting phase of Colonel Hunt's career it will be interesting to quote in part from an article written by John T. Gunn and published a few years ago in a paper at Lexington, Kentucky. "On the 26th of February, he left his office at Lexington for Mississippi to consolidate the three collector's districts of that state into two. While on the train he was approached by a New Orleans distiller who made a proposition to him. He stated in the proposition 'that he had paid Supervisor Hunt's predecessor from his distillery alone one thousand dollars per month, that the other distillers in New Orleans paid him their proportion, aggregating twelve to fourteen thousand dollars per month, and that he came with full authority to make the same contract with him.' This is quoted from a public government document published in June, 1876, being a report of the investigation of the Federal officers of Louisiana. In making this proposition the distiller gave Supervisor Hunt valuable information which enabled him to be of great service to Secretary Bristow in his war on the whisky ring.

"Supervisor Hunt went to Washington and with General Bristow had a long conference with General Grant, the result of which was that he was given full authority to use his own judgment in making war on the whisky ring in New Orleans. He could not find material in New Orleans that he was willing to trust. He made his selection from men who were already in the internal revenue service in Kentucky and Tennessee. These men he placed over the distilleries at New Orleans, being satisfied that every pound of grain would be weighed and that every pint of whisky would be gauged. In five days running, the distillery showed it was making too much whisky, and that it was unfolding a tale about its previous work. The yield of a particular distillery had been about 2.60 gallons per bushel for the season, but with honest storekeepers and gaugers, in running five days, yield was 3.90 gallons per bushel, showing that as the distiller mashed 500 bushel per day, at least one gallon per bushel had been stolen prior to that time, or $450 per day in revenue. Honorable Bluford Wilson, solicitor of the treasury, who was giving special attention to the work going on at St. Louis, told Superintendent Hunt that when they were ready to make a strike in St. Louis, the distillery referred to as running thirteen days stopped of its own accord, giving notice to the collector that the pipes were leaking and they wanted to make repairs. The pipes were never repaired and the distillery did not attempt to run any more. It did not want to run with honest officials over it."

In 1878 President Hayes appointed Colonel Hunt as United States Indian agent, with headquarters at Fort Sill and Anadarko in old Indian Territory. This was his office for eight years. Among the noteworthy reforms inaugurated in that time was the founding of a freighting system conducted by the Indians themselves instead of by the white men, thus not only furnishing them with employment by which they could earn money, but to a large extent protecting their supplies and making useful men of them. As is shown by the annual report of the commissioner of Indian affairs for the year 1885, in August of that year Colonel Hunt recommended to the Indian Department that the government wards be settled upon land in severalty, and that after the government had purchased of the Indians their surplus lands they be sold to actual settlers. This was the first time such a suggestion had ever appeared in print, and as Senator Dawes afterwards conferred with Colonel Hunt before drafting the bill which was made the basis of the plan finally adopted by the government in the disposal of Indian lands, it will be seen how great is the latter's credit in the matter.

When Colonel Hunt moved to Texas in 1885 he located at Graham, the noted center of the Texas cattle industry, and there began the raising of live stock, especially the breeding of shorthorn cattle. Colonel Hunt still owns and operates the fine stock farm and ranch near Graham, and is now engaged almost exclusively in the breeding of registered Jersey cattle. In 1892, while serving as cashier of the First National Bank of Graham, President Harrison appointed Mr. Hunt United States Marshal for the northern district of Texas. The duties of this office caused him to move to Dallas, but after two years in the office he returned to his ranch in Young county. In 1897 President McKinley appointed him collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Texas with headquarters at Dallas, and by successive re-appointments Colonel Hunt occupied that office until his resignation on October 1, 1912.

Colonel Hunt has long been a prominent member of the Military order of the Loyal Legion and of the Grand Army of the Republic. Perhaps in no better way than his broad and liberal spirit been shown than in his services in behalf of the survivors of both the Union and Confederate armies. He has served as department commander of Texas for the Grand Army of the Republic, and it was partly at his suggestion that the Chickamunga Society was formed, composed of the surviving participants of that battle, whether they fought in the Union or Confederate army. Colonel Hunt was honored by the Society as president, and both through these organizations and as a private citizen has in numberless ways displayed his tolerant spirit and fellow sympathy with all old soldiers, irrespective of the flag under which they fought. Probably personal matters influenced him in this respect, since at the outbreak of the war two of his brothers, George Warfield and Albert Gallatin Hunt, both enlisted in the Confederate service, while he and a younger brother, G. Drummond, went into the Union army. His younger brother who was adjutant in the Third Kentucky regiment, was mortally wounded while leading a charge of that command at the battle of Missionary Ridge, November 29, 1863. Captain George W. Hunt, who died at his home in Dallas in November, 1913, served as acting adjutant general under General B. W. Duke and rendered efficient service for the Southern cause under General Morgan. Captain A. G. Hunt, who was also a Dallas citizen and died in March, 1910, was a lieutenant in Colonel Cluke's Kentucky Regiment, and a member of General Morgan's dashing raiders. During the invasion of southern Ohio by Forrest's men, he was captured at Bluffington's Island while crossing the Ohio river, and was taken to Camp Douglas, Chicago, from which he managed to escape and rejoined the Confederate army.

Colonel Hunt cast his first presidential vote in 1860 for Bell and Everett, and since the war has been a staunch Republican. In 1896 he was an elector at large for Texas on the McKinley ticket. He has always paid much interest to education; and has served as president of the Board of Trustees of Austin College at Sherman. He is a ruling elder of the Presbyterian church.

In 1879 Colonel Hunt married Margaret Scott Gallagher, daughter of Charles and Winnie (Scott) Gallagher, and while she was born in Kentucky she was reared in New Orleans. Mrs. Hunt's mother was a lineal descendant of Captain Matthew Scott on the paternal, and of Lieutenant Isaac Webb on the maternal side, both of whom were officers in the Revolutionary war. Mrs. Hunt on the strength of this lineage has for a number of years been an active member of the Jane Douglas Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution at Dallas. To their marriage has been born one son, G. Drummond Hunt, who was educated in the University of Texas, graduating both from the academic and law courses, and is now one of Dallas' prominent lawyers.

There are two prominent young Texans named G. Drummond Hunt, one of them the son and the other the nephew of Colonel Hunt. The nephew, who is the son of the late Captain A. G. Hunt, was born in Lexington Kentucky, in 1879, acquired a part of his education in that town, and coming to Dallas with his father was also a student in the schools of that city. In 1897 he entered the office of his uncle, Colonel Hunt, as chief deputy internal revenue collector, and three years of hard work gave him a highly creditable record for efficiency in his duties. After being out of the service for a few years he returned to his former position under his uncle in Dallas in 1907, and has since that time been continuously connected with the internal revenue service. Under the present national administration there was a realignment of the various internal revenue districts in Texas, and the Dallas territory is now under the jurisdiction of Judge Walker, the present collector of internal revenues, whose headquarters are at Austin. Mr. Hunt is division deputy under Judge Walker, and in charge of a division that embraces Dallas and a considerable scope of adjacent territory. Though a young man, he has already established a reputation among government officials as a most capable, efficient and industrious officer. His ability is particularly prominent in the matter of securing evidence and preparing the papers covering cases for presentation to the United States District Attorney, and has frequently been complimented by the district attorney for such assistance. A notable case illustrating his success in this branch of the work occurred at Dallas in June, 1914, when Mr. Hunt investigated and worked up the evidence and laid the foundation for the government's suit against a prominent liquor firm in Dallas for shipping liquor into restricted territory in eastern Oklahoma. The prosecution in this case resulted in sending certain employees of the firm to the penitentiary.

JOHN BARTLETT TOWNS. The Towns family has a long and honorable record of industry, military service, business enterprise and public spirited citizenship in the state of Texas. Their material fortune has been built up in the course of thirty years, by farming and merchandising in Navarro county. John Bartlett Towns of a younger generation in this state, is a farmer and merchant of Powell, and has lived in Navarro county since childhood.

His father was the later William J. Towns, who brought his family from Trinity county to Navarro county in 1881, spending one year near Blooming Grove, and in 1882 came to the community of Powell, two miles west of which he purchased a farm, in which vicinity he spent his remaining years. Captain William J. Towns was a leading figure in the citizenship of the Powell neighborhood. He was born near Atlanta, Georgia, December 3, 1837, and was a son of a slave-holding planter, John B. Towns, who migrated to Texas at an early date, and settled in Polk county, where he died before the outbreak of the war among the states. John B. Towns was a Virginian by birth. A man of considerable education, the late William J. Towns maintained himself abreast of the times in the matter of current events, worshiped as a member of the Christian church, and was a Blue Lodge Mason, and a Democrat without aspiration for political service. He is remembered as a large man physically, weighing two hundred pounds, was industrious and a good citizen without being in any sense conspicuous, and never sought public note other than that which his worth as a citizen naturally brought him.

Captain Towns won his title by honorable military service. He entered the Confederate army in 1861, and was soon commissioned Captain of Company B of the Fourth Texas Regiment under Col. John B. Hood. His command formed a part of the army of Northern Virginia, commanded by General Lee, and for a time his regiment was a part of Stonewall Jackson's famous Legions. He took part in the first battle of Manassas, Seven Pines, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, Chancellorsville, Cold Harbor, and in the final stand of the Confederate hope at Appomattox, where he surrendered with the few thousand veterans still sustaining the "lost cause." Save for a wound from a piece of shell he passed through the storm of war without harm, and a single scar testified to his service while fighting with a deadly determination as a matter of daily experience.

Some time before the war, Captain Towns was married in Trinity County to Miss Tabitha Evans, a daughter of J. T. Evans from Alabama. Mrs. Towns died at Powell at the age of sixty-three, and Captain Towns passed away January 19, 1912. Their children were: Dr. James R. Towns of Trinity, Texas; William T. of Hico, Texas; Mrs. Alice Wilson of Powell, Texas; Mrs. Ella Chester of Beaumont, Texas; John B.; Thomas G., of Powell; Mrs. Mary Halsey of Austin.

When Captain Towns came to the Powell community he was of the industrious poor, having been reduced and greatly injured financially by the drought of 1881. Their settlement upon a rich black-land farm was fortunate for him, as he prospered and steadily returned to a condition of independence as a cotton and grain raiser, and acquired a large amount of land and brought several hundred acres of it under cultivation. His capacity as a business man is suggested by the valuable estate he left, and by the history of his various financial transactions for the thirty years he lived at Powell.

John B. Towns has lived in the rich agricultural community of Powell since a boy of eleven years. He was born in Trinity county, Texas, February 3, 1871. His education came from the country schools, and when fourteen years old he went to work for himself. He found a place in the lumbering region of southeast Texas, where he soon became commissary clerk for W. T. Carter and Brother, the well known lumber firm of Texas, and the city of Houston, and was there employed for ten years. Returning to Powell, with his experience and accumulation of capital, he engaged in merchandising and farming, and also did much dealing and trading in farm lands. His store has been developed until it is now known as the Powell Company, of which he is president, and this is the leading mercantile house of Powell. Mr. Towns also owns four hundred and twelve acres of land, adjoining the townsite, all in cultivation and devoted to the prevailing crops of the section.

He has added to the development as a builder, and is a partner in the Whitesell Brick and Lumber Company. Mr. Towns never participated in politics, though a regular Democratic voter, and fraternally is, like his father, affiliated with the Blue Lodge of Masonry. On December 30, 1896, Mr. Towns married Miss Lettie Moncrief, a daughter of E. L. Moncrief, who came to Texas from near Montgomery, Alabama, in the decade of the seventies, settling at Ennis, where Mrs. Towns was born. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Towns are: William, Barnes, Robert, Lela, and John B., Jr.

HON. PHIL H. CLEMENTS. A resident of Texas since 1877, Phil H. Clements has been engaged in the land and insurance business at Goldthwaite for more than a quarter of a century. Essentially a business man, he has participated actively in the upbuilding of the community, and through his signal services in public office has contributed materially to his community's welfare. His career, commenced in an Indiana country school-room, has been one of constant progress, and at all times has been marked by the utmost fidelity to the duties of citizenship. Mr. Clements was born February 8, 1854, at Lebanon, Indiana, and is a son of W. H. and Elizabeth Clements, natives of Kentucky. They were the parents of nine children, of whom Phil H. was the second son. He received his early education in the public schools of his native place, and like other farmers' sons of his day and locality spent the summer months in assisting his father in the work of the home place. In 1873, when nineteen years of age, he entered Eureka College, at Eureka, Illinois, and following his graduation therefrom was engaged in teaching school in Indiana for four years. He came to Texas in 1877 and located at Williams Ranch in Brown, now Mills county, and continued to follow the vocation of educator, and in 1884, prior to the organization of Mills county, was elected a member of the board of county commissioners of Brown county. In 1887, at the time of Mills county's organization, he became the first county clerk, and subsequently was elected a county commissioner. In 1894 he was elected county judge, an office which he served very acceptably for one term. In the meantime he had continued his land and insurance business, and in this field is known as one of the best-informed men in Mills county. During the Twenty-sixth, Twenty-seventh and Thirtieth sessions of the Texas State Legislature, Mr. Clements served as a member of those bodies and made a reputation as one of the active and influential workers thereof, serving on important committees and being able to take care of the interests of his constituents. Always a Democrat, he still stands high in the counsels of his party, and now holds a commission as postmaster of Goldthwaite. He is popular fraternally as a member of the Lodge and Chapter of the Masonic order, and his religious connection is with the Presbyterian church. Mr. Clements is of German and Scotch descent, and retains his ancestors' qualities of industry, perseverance and honorable dealing. Many families of the name are to be found in Indiana and Kentucky, and prior to the war between the North and the South the Clements were slave-holders, as is evidenced by a printed advertisement, now in Mr. Clements' possession, which was issued by his great-grandfather, a Kentucky planter, and which sets forth the excellencies of "eight likely young negroes."

Mr. Clements was married June 27, 1877, at Lebanon, Indiana, to Miss Mary E. Goodwin, daughter of Enoch and Mary (Rodgers) Goodwin, the former of whom was engaged in mercantile pursuits at Lebanon for many years. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Clements: Earl, who saw service in the Spanish war and who is married and engaged in the drug business at Goldthwaite; Duke, who is assistant postmaster; and Mrs. T. T. Nichols, the wife of a well-known farmer and stockraiser of Mills county. Mr. Clements has ever been an enthusiastic booster of Mills county, and to use his own language considers it "the best all-the-year-round section of Texas."

JULIUS W. LORENTZEN. Lane & Lorentzen, merchandise brokers at El Paso, are one of the successful firms of West Texas, and their trade in grocery specialties and staples extends throughout the towns of west Texas and also into New Mexico and Arizona.

Julius W. Lorentzen who was born at Detroit, Michigan, August 14, 1880, a son of John and Dora Lorentzen, began his responsible career when a boy, earning his way through school, and came to El Paso about eleven years ago. As a young man he attended the Detroit public schools, was also educated in the Detroit College of Law, but this knowledge has been applied to his business affairs and he has never practiced as an attorney. After leaving law school at the age of twenty-three he came to El Paso, and for the first year was employed at a salary with a merchandise brokerage firm. He then bought out the establishment, and is now the active manager of Lane & Lorentzen.

On November 5, 1907, at El Paso he married Miss Ada Lane, daughter of Nathan D. Lane. They have two children, Julia and John Nathan. Mr. Lorentzen is affiliated with the Elks, is a Republican, is vice president and for four years was the first secretary and treasurer of the local post of the Travelers Protective Association, and as a loyal El Paso citizen is always ready to work for any movement that promises benefit to the community.

DANIEL GLOVER FISHER. At one time a newsboy running on the Houston & Texas Central railway, later taking up more responsible work in railroading, Mr.

Fisher while a comparatively young man is a veteran in transportation affairs, and is assistant general manager of the Southern Traction Company and the Texas Traction Company, and is thus an operating official of the interurban line that during the past ten years has begun to spread out in all directions about Dallas.

Mr. Fisher is a Texas man and belongs to a family with some interesting associations in this state. He was born at Navasota in Grimes county in 1876, a son of Dan A. and Margaret A. (Creagor) Fisher. The Creagor family is one of the oldest American names in Texas. Mr. Fisher's mother was born in Bosque county, Texas, and is now living in Dallas. His Grandmother Creagor was a remarkable character and one whose name deserves mention in history. While she could neither read nor write, by her own efforts she reared a family and became the owner of valuable property. She was a native of Texas, her parents having been among the pioneers and coming to the province of Texas previous to 1830, when it was a Mexican province. As a girl she lived at old Washington on the Brazos, where the Declaration of Independence was drawn up and signed, and subsequently lived at Houston about the time that city was founded as the first capital of the Republic. Subsequently she lived at various places northwest of Houston, beginning with the building of the Houston & Texas Central railroad, before the war. She conducted hotels and lodging houses at Millican and other points in keeping with the progress of construction of the road, which finally reached its terminus in 1872 in Dallas. At Dallas this pioneer woman is still remembered by many of the older settlers on account of her splendid native talents and her lovable qualities.

Dan A. Fisher, father of Daniel G., was born at Covington, Tennessee, and came to Texas locating in Grimes county before the war. In Tennessee his people had been friends and associates of Sam Houston before the latter came to Texas. Dan A. Fisher went from Tennessee to serve in the Mexican war, passed through Texas, and fighting with the army of General Scott in its brilliant campaign up to and including the capture of the city of Mexico. He was also in the Confederate army during the Civil war and was badly wounded in battle. By occupation he was first a farmer and stockman, but as the Houston & Texas Central railroad was built from Houston north he became identified with railroading, and was agent for the company at Navasota, and in various ways associated with the early history of the road. A notable character in the older Fisher's family was his maternal uncle, Captain Dunham, who was a member of the ill-fated Mier expedition from Texas to Mexico in 1848. While all the participants in that venture have received their due meed of fame, the unselfishness which prompted Captain Dunham's death makes his fate one of peculiar interest and honor. After the members of this expedition, it will be recalled, had crossed the Rio Grande they were captured by Mexican forces, and a portion of them condemned to execution. The method of selecting those who should pay the extreme penalty was the drawing of lots, with black and white beans. Those drawing the black beans suffered death, while those who drew the white were spared. Captain Dunham drew a white bean, but exchanged it voluntarily with a comrade from Tennessee, who had a wife and family at home. Captain Dunham was himself a bachelor and considered his life worth less than that of his comrade. He was accordingly shot, while his companion finally reached home in safety.

Daniel Glover Fisher grew up in Navasota, as a boy attended school there, and early in life began making his own way. His service as a newsboy on the Houston & Texas Central railroad enabled him to earn a living and gave him practical insight into the conditions necessary for success. Subsequently he applied himself to the learning of shorthand, and that brought him better positions in the railroad field. He was employed in the office of the Santa Fe at Cleburne, and from there went to the office of the chief clerk of the Houston & Texas Central at Ennis. Since 1903 Mr. Fisher has had his home in Dallas. In that city he became associated with J. F. Strickland and R. B. Stichter, the latter two being the builders of the interurban line from Dallas to Sherman and Denison, under the corporate name of Texas Traction Company, and subsequently of the interurban lines to Waco and Corsicana, under the name Southern Traction Company. Mr. Fisher has been identified with these interurban railway interests since construction work was begun by them in 1908. The two companies have since constructed and put in operation about two hundred miles of interurban railway, and the interests are operated under what is known as the Strickland-Goodwin Management Association of which Mr. Fisher is assistant general manager.

In May, 1914, Mr. Fisher was elected president of the Southwestern Electrical and Gas Association, composed of companies operating electric lines, electric light plants, gas plants and water works systems in Texas. Mr. Fisher is also a director of the Dallas Ad League and editor of its official organ "O.K.'d Copy." His literary contributions to this little publication have attracted wide reading. Mr. Fisher is also a director of the Rotary Club, and originated in Dallas the Good Fellows Club, which under his direction at Christmas in 1913 distributed gifts and toys to more than five hundred children in Dallas. Mr. Fisher takes a great interest in philanthropic movements, especially in behalf of the juvenile, and has devoted himself unselfishly to such causes so far as his business interests would permit.

HOKE LAFAYETTE PROBST. That honesty can bring success in these days of trickery and sharp dealing, is often doubted, especially by those who have suffered at the hands of the dishonest business man, but the story of the life of H. L. Propst of Merkel, Texas, shows how one man by honest methods succeeded in rising from a poor man to one of independent means, and from a position of no importance in the business world to one of prominence and influence. Mr. Propst has had to fight for what he has obtained. He has worked hard and unceasingly with the determination to let nothing keep him from the goal which he had set for himself. He is now one of the most successful merchants in Merkel, in addition to being a prominent farmer, and the owner of one of the finest farms in this section.

Hoke Lafayette Propst was born in Rowan county, North Carolina, on the 12th of October, 1866. His ancestors came from Germany and were early settlers in the United States. It was some time during the latter part of the eighteenth century and prior to the Revolutionary war that Jacob Propst and his brother Conrad came from Germany and settled in the American colonies. Jacob settled in Pennsylvania near Pittsburg, and Conrad drifted south, finally settling in the Carolinas. Jacob Propst and his family were prominent in the Revolution and Conrad and his sons took part in the early Indian wars and in other ways contributed to the building up of the communities where they located. It is from Conrad that H. L. Propst is descended. The latter is the son of Eli and Amelia Elizabeth (House) Propst, both of whom were born in North Carolina. During the Civil war Eli Propst served as a captain in the Confederate army, fighting throughout the entire war, and receiving a wound in one engagement. He was a farmer in Rowan county and before the Civil war was a slave owner. He lived in this locality until his death, being a successful man and one of the most respected citizens of the county. He and his wife are buried in the old private cemetery on their farm. Of the ten children born to Eli and Amelia Propst only five are living. In addition to H. L. Propst, these are: Henry Alexander Propst, who is a prominent and successful farmer of Jones county, Texas; Emma, who married the Reverend C. A. Brown, of China Grove, Rowan county, North Carolina; Florence, who became the wife of Henderson Lyerby, of Rowan county, and Rosa Propst, who also lives in Rowan county.

Hoke L. Propst received his education in Rowan county, attending the public schools until he was seventeen years of age. He then left school and for a time assisted his father on the farm. When he was twenty-four years of age he determined to start out for himself and so on the 7th of December, 1890, he found himself in Abilene, Texas. Having grown up during the lean years following the war when money was scarce, he could not prepare himself for a profession or trade and the only thing he knew how to do was to farm, but he knew that thoroughly. He therefore went to work on a farm near Abilene at twenty dollars a month. He was thus occupied for two and a half years, saving his money with the thrift inherited from his German ancestors. In 1893 he was married but he continued working on the farm as a farm hand for a year longer and then he found himself with enough money to purchase a farm of his own. He bought a farm of one hundred and sixty acres which he cultivated until 1898, during which year he removed to Abilene where he found employment. After living there for several months he again moved, this time to Merkel, where he engaged in the grocery business. Six months later he sold out his business to advantage and determined to go back to farming. He purchased three hundred and twenty acres of fine land in Taylor county and for two years was engaged in its cultivation. He then bought an additional one hundred and sixty acres with the profits of his two years' work. He placed the whole four hundred and eighty acres in cotton and corn and was very successful, raising crops remarkable both for quantity and quality. In 1906 he bought another one hundred and sixty acres, making a complete section of land, all of which was entirely paid for and which is now all under cultivation.

In 1906 Mr. Propst removed with his family to Merkel but he continued his farming enterprises. Two years later he entered the mercantile business as one of the firm of the Anchor Hardware Company. He remained with this firm for two years and then sold his interests and returned to the farm. He remained on the farm until October, 1912, when he re-entered business as a member of the Crown Hardware Company, a firm which he organized in company with W. D. Hutchinson and G. M. Cauthan. This firm of young business men has built up a flourishing trade, and their splendid business success is undoubtedly due to their modern mercantile methods and to the honesty and sincerity of their business methods. Mr. Propst is now ranked as one of the leading business men of the town and his judgment is often consulted in business matters.

Mr. Propst was married in 1893 to Miss Emma Winter, who was born in Texas, a daughter of Sam and Bell (Swier) Winter. Mr. and Mrs. Propst having no children of their own have adopted an orphan child and given him their name. This boy, Roy Lafayette Propst, has become the center of their life and it is their greatest desire to rear and educate him and care for him as though he were their very own.

JAMES E. KING. Sheriff of Hall county by virtue of his election in 1912, Mr. King is one of the stalwart and progressive citizens of Memphis, and has been known to the people of this vicinity for many years, and esteemed in accordance with his qualifications both as a business man and citizen.

James E. King was born in Palmersville, Texas, January 24, 1880, the second of ten children, six sons and four daughters, born to Benjamin F. and Laura (Dickey) King. The founder of the King family was his great-grandfather, who came from Ireland and settled in North Carolina. The great-grandfather was Joe King of North Carolina. Benjamin F. King was also born in North Carolina, and moved to Texas in 1869, settling in Collin county at Farmersville, where he was a farmer, stock raiser, and also a merchant. In January, 1892, he moved out to Hall county, and for the past six years up to 1912, was justice of the peace of precinct No. 1 at Memphis. He was one of the first alderman in the town of Farmersville. In politics he was a Democrat, and a member of the Baptist church. The parents were married in Farmersville, Collin county, in 1877, and the mother was a daughter of James Dickey, a veteran of the Civil war who died in the federal prison in Camp Morton at Indianapolis. Mrs. King came to Texas in 1872.

James E. King had his early education in the schools of Farmersville and at Memphis, and also at Baylor University, to the age of twenty-one. His early life was spent on the farm, and in 1906, he became one of the teachers of Hall county. After one term of teaching in a country school, he was employed in the mercantile house of John B. King, now deceased, his older brother. After one year in the drug business he took a clerkship in a general merchandise store which he followed for two years. For four years he served as deputy to Sheriff Lon Burson, was for two years deputy sheriff under R. Eddleman, and in November, 1912, was elected for the regular term as sheriff of Ohio county.

In recent years Mr. King has been one of the influential men in the Democratic party in this part of the state. He has taken all the degrees of the York Rite Masonry, including the chapter and commandery, and is also a member of the Mystic Shrine. He belongs to the Memphis Commercial Club.

FRANCIS T. WOODWARD. The prosperity of the present and future of Texas is so intimately intertwined with the good roads movement that it is a distinction of no little importance to be called the pioneer advocate and worker for good roads in this state. Such is the honor which is freely paid to Francis T. Woodward of Dallas, a well known business man and secretary of the County Judges and Commissioners Association of Texas.

Mr. Woodward, who was born in Baltimore, Maryland, in 1862, was reared in his native city and came to Texas in 1881, began his experience in this state in Limestone county as a worker on a ranch. His early years spent in this state give him the insight into the basic principles underlying the necessity for good roads and for an adequate system of laws and administrative co-operation such as would be efficient toward the building and maintenance of such highways. At that time in Texas there was scarcely any effort, except here and there and of an individual nature, for the construction of permanent highways. It was his work on a ranch that brought Mr. Woodward to the viewpoint where he could perceive the splendid benefits which would accrue to the farmer in particular from better roads. For thirty years or more he has been an enthusiast for permanent roads, and has seen the gradual development of this sentiment until now a number of counties in Texas have as fine country roads as are to be seen anywhere in the United States. As a young man Mr. Woodward rode the bicycle a great deal, and helped to promote and was an officer of an association of bicycle riders in Texas. At a meeting of this association in the spring of 1894 it was decided that the next meeting in the fall of the same year should be held at Dallas during the state fair. When they met in October the members conceived the idea of getting the county judges interested in the organization in order to commit them to the good roads movement. Accordingly the county judges of the counties in central and north Texas were invited to attend a meeting called for convention at Dallas in December of the same year.

It was Mr. Woodward who issued the call for this meeting, and those who assembled at Dallas in December, 1894, perfected an organization known as the County Judges Association of Texas, of which Mr. Woodward, though not a judge himself, was made secretary. It is this organization more than any other one party that has brought to bear an effective service for good roads in Texas down to the present time. Within a year or two the organization was expanded to include the entire state of Texas, and an amendment was made to include the county commissioners as well as the county judges as members. At the present time two meetings of the organization are held every year, and it has become one of the most useful and efficient bodies of the state, every member being an enthusiast for all improvements that are essentially within the jurisdiction of county judges and commissioners, and that means particularly good roads.

Mr. Woodward has been secretary of the association since its organization. The rules provide that no one not a county judge or county commissioner shall be a member or take part in the proceedings, but an exception was made in the case of Mr. Woodward, and an appropriate honor paid to him for his successful efforts in organizing the association, so that he has been unanimously re-elected a member and secretary at each successive election of officers. Mr. Woodward is truly the pioneer good roads man of Texas, and has been such continuously longer than any other.

His business interests in addition are in connection with good roads. Ever since he came to Dallas early in the '90s he has handled good roads machinery. He is Texas representative of the Russell Grader Manufacturing Company of Minneapolis, and represents a general line of good roads machinery put out by other manufacturers. Through his business and his public service Mr. Woodward enjoys a large acquaintance and has many friends in many different quarters of the state.

Mr. Woodward married at New Orleans Miss Lucile Chilton Williams of Mansfield, Louisiana. As her name indicates she is a member of the distinguished Chilton and Morgan families of Alabama, and is a second cousin to ex-Senator Horace Chilton of Dallas. The three children of their marriage are: Evelyn, Fay and Francis T. Jr.

HENRY C. SHELTON. Recognizing the fact that in the journalistic field there is plenty of room for men with brains and vim, Henry C. Shelton, editor and publisher of the Rotan Advance, of Rotan, Texas, early chose for his calling the newspaper business, with what degree of success is shown in the prosperity which his publication now enjoys and the support which it is receiving from the citizens of this community. Like many of his journalistic brethren in the Southwest, Mr. Shelton commenced his career in a humble capacity, and through years of experience and practical training has worked his way to a position of prominence in his chosen field of activity. He was born in Pickens county, Alabama, July 21, 1879, and is a son of John W. and Sally (Randall) Shelton.

John W. Shelton was a Mississippian, and in early life removed to Alabama, where he was married, subsequently coming to Texas in 1879 and locating at Cleburne, where for many years he was engaged in mercantile pursuits. He is now living a retired life, enjoying the fruits of his long years of industrious labor. During the Civil War, Mr. Shelton served in the Confederate army, as a member of an Alabama regiment, and participated in numerous engagements, in one of which he was slightly wounded. He is a member of the Methodist church, and for a number of years has been prominent in Masonry. Mr. Shelton was married in Alabama to Miss Sally Randall, a native of that State, who died in 1882, when about thirty-five years of age, and was buried in Milam county, Texas. Like her husband she was a member of the Methodist church and a devout Christian woman. There were five children born to Mr. and Mrs. Shelton, of whom Henry C. was the youngest.

Henry C. Shelton was an infant when brought to Texas by his parents, and his early education was somewhat limited, although self-study in later years, and a keen observation of men and things, have made him an exceptionally well-informed man. He was fifteen years of age when he began his real battle with life, at that time accepting a position in a printing office, where he learned the trade. From that time to the present he has followed newspaper work almost continuously, and during these years has been connected with a number of the leading journals all over the Lone Star State, in numerous capacities. He made his first venture on his own account in 1902, when he established the Odessa Times, of which he disposed one year later to establish the Hamlin Herald, which he continued to publish for a like period. Mr. Shelton came to Rotan in 1907, and secured employment on the Rotan Advance, which he purchased in 1909. A well-equipped job printing office is operated, and here Mr. Shelton does work that compares favorably with that of the big city establishments. Through the untiring efforts of its editor and publisher the Advance has increased steadily in public favor, and the citizens of Rotan and the surrounding country are showing the appreciation of Mr. Shelton's work by supporting him liberally. Himself a Democrat, Mr. Shelton has built up his paper on the fundamental principles of that great party, and it is recognized as an organ of no mean ability. Through his paper he expresses his confidence in the future of his adopted locality, and is one of Rotan's most enthusiastic "boosters."

Mr. Shelton was married at Roby, Fisher county, Texas, February 16, 1904, to Miss Stella Hooper, daughter of Ed Hooper, ex-sheriff of this county, and three children have been born to this union, as follows: Claude W., who is deceased; and Hooper and Ouida. Mr. and Mrs. Shelton are consistent members of the Methodist church. He has been a friend of progress and education, and since 1912 has been a working member of the school board. He is a student of men and affairs, is fond of a good lecture, and like all virile men of the West takes pleasure in baseball and kindred sports. His numerous friends testify to his wide-spread popularity.

WILLIAM C. IRVIN. The old Texas cattle range is a thing of the past. The old cattle trails, so crowded during the seventies and eighties, have lost their identity and fenced highways and railroads have come in their stead. Even the great stock ranches, with their thousands of acres enclosed with wire, are the more conspicuous because their number is yearly decreasing, and their great area is being subdivided and broken up into more convenient farming portions. With all these changes, many of the old-time cattlemen are being called away over the trails which have no backward track. Among those who recently departed on the trail to the Great Beyond, one of the best known was the late William C. Irvin, who died at his home in San Antonio, May 15, 1907. Mr. Irvin was perhaps best known throughout Southern and Southwestern Texas as the one-time owner of the noted Irvin ranch, which originally comprised sixty thousand acres of land in LaSalle county. While that ranch still preserves its identity and is one of the largest ranch domains in the southwestern part of the state, it too has been affected by the extension of settlement, railroad building, and other changes which have been so impressive in all the old cattle country.

Representing one of the old families of Texas, the late William C. Irvin was born at Seguin, Guadalupe county, in 1846, a son of J. A. and Sarah (Tom) Irvin. His father, who was a native of Alabama, was a Texas pioneer of the year 1838, and from his original settlement in Washington county subsequently moved to Guadalupe county and lived the life of a planter and stockman there until his death in 1865. A still older family is that of the mother, the Toms, which was identified with the early history of Tennessee, and was established in the South previous to the independence of Texas. Several of its members became distinguished in early Texas and in the annals of border Indian warfare. Sarah Tom's brother, Captain J. F. Tom, came to Texas when it was a province of Mexico, fought and was wounded in the battle of San Jacinto, which accomplished independence for this state. He subsequently was a vigorous leader of a company of Rangers in Indian warfare and also during the Civil war.

Besides the late William C. Irvin, one of his sisters, Mrs. N. R. Wallace, is deceased, and four sisters still living are: Mrs. Ann Elizabeth Dewees and Miss Tommie Irvin, of San Antonio; and Mrs. Alice Peeler and Mrs. John Campbell of Campbellton.

Reared in Guadalupe county, William C. Irvin had the environment of the frontier for his early training school, and nineteen years of age at the time of his father's death, and soon afterwards losing his elder brother, the responsibilities of home and family management devolved upon him. His life from boyhood was largely spent in the saddle, developing the expertness of the old-time cowboy, and for more than forty years he was closely identified with all the phases of Texas cattle life. Mr. Irvin began making trips over the old Chisholm trail soon after it was opened in 1870, and his experiences and activities led him all over the cattle country from the Rio Grande to the Canadian border. He had the vicissitudes of all Texas cattle men, but his shrewd ability as a business man, his concentration of effort, his buoyancy in face of defeat, and the many years of consecutive industry eventually won him a place among the larger and more fortunate figures in the industry. It is said that Mr. Irvin made seven trips over the old cattle trail to the north, and finally in 1875 established a ranch at Seymour in Baylor county in the northwestern part of the state and operated there on a large scale for several years. On leaving northwestern Texas Mr. Irvin established the well known Irvin ranch in LaSalle county, where his possessions eventually comprised sixty thousand acres of land, lying east of Cotulla and reaching almost to the limits of that town. About the beginning of the present century settlers began occupying that region, with a resulting subdivision of the large ranch holdings, and Mr. Irvin before his death had sold ten thousand acres for colonization purposes, and the reduction of the original area has since continued. Mrs. William C. Irvin now owns thirty-two thousand acres of the original ranch, but the main line of the San Antonio, Uvalde & Gulf Railroad is now built alongside the land, a station is to be established there, and it will be a matter of only a few years until smaller farms will further encroach upon the original tract. Before his death Mr. Irvin had become one of the wealthiest stockmen of Texas. With increasing years, and the accumulation of a generous competence, he turned over most of the responsibilities of business management to his son, and spent much of his time in his home at San Antonio, where he died.

William C. Irvin was married in Seguin to Miss Medina Dewees. The Dewees family was one of the most prominent in the early history of southwestern Texas, and Mrs. Irvin is one of a number of its representatives still to be found in the state. Mr. and Mrs. Irvin became the parents of two sons and four daughters: Jourdan J.; Eugene; Mrs. Mabel Wilson; Grace, who is the wife of Lytle Gosling of San Antonio; Mrs. Dr. S. T. Lowry; and Miss Clara Irvin.

A worthy successor of his father, and now closely identified with the modern livestock business of Texas, Jourdan J. Irvin was born at Seguin, Guadalupe county, Texas. He grew up in the cattle business, though with the advantages of modern schools, and has successfully directed his efforts along the lines which were laid down by his honored father. He and his brother Eugene were in active charge of their father's ranch for several years. More recently Jourdan J. Irvin has been established in the livestock commission business in San Antonio, and is now the Southwestern representative for the well known firm of Clay, Robinson & Company. His office is in the Cattlemen's Exchange, and his home is at 2001 Main avenue.

Mr. Irvin married Miss Edna Barlow of Cotulla. Their four children are: Edwina, Helen, Barlow and Margret.

WILLIAM BOOKER FEATHERSTONE. An old and honored Texas family is represented by this well known Cleburne lawyer, and public leader, who has for more than thirty years practiced his profession in that city, and is not only one of the oldest members of the local bar, but in his attainments one of its most successful.

William Booker Featherstone was born at Boston, Bowie county, Texas, March 18, 1856. His father, W. B. Featherstone, was born in Amelia county, Virginia, in 1818, and, after graduating from the University of Virginia, taught school in the city of Lynchburg for a number of years. After marrying Miss Melvina Talbot, he emigrated to Texas in the latter part of the forties, and settled at what is now known as old Boston in Bowie county. He was a Baptist preacher, as well as an educator. From Boston he removed to Tyler, Texas, where he served as president of the Texas Baptist College, but when the war broke out between the North and the South he resigned his position as president of that institution and joined the Confederate army, going into battle and bearing arms in defense of the Southland. After the war was over, he returned home, and in 1869 moved to Ladonia, Fannin county, where he was elected president of the Ladonia Male and Female College. In 1872 he established his home at Cleburne in Johnson county, where he served as president of the Cleburne Male and Female College, until he died on the 18th of March, 1878, at the age of sixty years. As a result of his marriage with Miss Malvina Talbot there were born: Charles Henry Featherstone, who enlisted in the Confederate service, and was killed at the battle of Raymond, Mississippi, in 1862; Bettie Featherstone, who is married and lives at Fort Smith, Arkansas; Virginia Featherstone, who died as Mrs. McWhorter, in 1883; Susie, who became Mrs. J. N. Long and died in 1899; and William Booker Featherstone, the Cleburne lawyer. Mrs. Melvina (Talbot) Featherstone died in 1857, and in 1858 the senior Featherstone married Miss Ann Peek, a daughter of a Texas pioneer who then resided in Red River county. By the second marriage the following children were born: Charles H. Featherstone, now deceased; Mollie Featherstone, now Mrs. W. P. Towers; Mattie Featherstone, now Mrs. William Clark; Effie Featherstone, and Mercer Featherstone, all residents of Oak Cliff in Dallas county.

William Booker Featherstone graduated from the Cleburne Male and Female College, in 1875. His studies for the law were carried on in Cleburne in the law office of Bledsoe, Bledsoe & English, and he was admitted to the bar on the fourth day of July, 1877. Since that date he has practiced his profession continuously in Cleburne, and having made a specialty of the criminal law has won great distinction as an advocate at the bar.

In 1881 Mr. Featherstone married Miss Stella Lockett, daughter of R. W. Lockett, a prominent Baptist minister. To their marriage have been born the following family: Eddie Lou Featherstone, now Mrs. J. Gould Hill, who lives in Cleburne; Stella S. Featherstone, now Mrs.

George W. Henderson, a resident of Houston; Winfrey B. Featherstone, of Cleburne; Charles H. Featherstone, of Cleburne; William D. Featherstone, Talbot Q. Featherstone, Albert H. Featherstone and Mary Williams Featherstone, all of Cleburne. There are also six grandchildren, as follows: Marguerite Featherstone Hill, Stella Gould Hill, and Elizabeth Hill, and Eddie Lake Henderson, Martha Melvina Henderson and George William Henderson.

Mr. Featherstone served his county for six years as county and district attorney. He was a candidate for congressman at large from his native state, on the Democratic ticket in 1912, but failed of election. His platform of principles in that campaign were: In opposition to the doctrine of free raw material; in opposition to the initiative referendum and recall; in opposition to state wide prohibition. In favor of—The election of United States senators by direct vote of the people; the election of the president by direct vote of the people; local self government, which he specially emphasized; and in general was distinctly opposed to any doctrine destructive of the old and tried principles of representative government. Mr. Featherstone is a fluent speaker, an orator of unusual gifts, and has distinguished himself on many occasions on the stump and public platform. Outside of his home state perhaps the most noteworthy occasions at which his oratorical powers were displayed was in the delivery of his splendid address on the life of General Robert E. Lee before the "Society of the Army & Navy of the Confederate States in the State of Maryland" at Hotel Kernan in the city of Baltimore on January 19, 1911. The occasion was a celebration of the one hundred and fourth anniversary of General Lee's birth. Many tributes were paid by the audience and by the public press to Mr. Featherstone's address at that gathering, and his reputation as a public speaker is now one of much more than local limits.

L. B. Woods, M. D. The medical profession is one that has attracted to it men of unusual ability since the founding of civilization. It is a calling that brings out the best qualities of which an individual is possessed, developing him so that he is able to cope with opportunities that arise in his life or in those about him. It is one which offers a particularly wide field for the ambitious youth of today, giving its followers as it does opportunities to display ability and intellectual gifts, and one who has already gained something more than a local reputation in Jacksboro; is Dr. L. B. Woods, a rising young physician and surgeon, who through his zeal, knowledge and natural talent has won the confidence of the people of his adopted community and made a place for himself in the ranks of his honored calling.

Doctor Woods was born May 17, 1887, at Bogata, Red River county, Texas, and is a son of O. R. and Jane (Wood) Woods, the former a native of Alabama and the latter of South Carolina. His father came to Texas with the grandfather, who was of Irish descent, at an early day, the family settling in Red River county, where O. R. Woods grew up amid pioneer surroundings and received a limited education in the primitive schools. When the Civil War broke out, his sympathies were with the South, as he was a slave owner, and he enlisted in the Confederate army, fighting throughout the period of the war and participating in a number of hard-fought engagements. When the struggle closed with Lee's surrender at Appomattox, he returned to the peaceful duties of civic life, and has continued to be engaged in farming and stock raising on the old homestead place to the present time. Since the death of his first wife, in 1892, he has been married a second time, and his second wife still survives. By his first union there were nine children, as follows: W. A. Woods, who is a pharmacist of Perrin, Texas; Dr. J. E., a successful practicing physician and surgeon of Perrin; R. L., who is engaged in farming in the vicinity of Jolntown, Texas; D. R., a student in the Southern Methodist University, at Dallas; Mrs. W. H. Hamilton, the wife of a well-known farmer of Bogata; Mrs. W. H. Bridger, wife of a prosperous agriculturist of Jolntown; Mrs. James Childress, wife of a successful farmer and stockman of Jolntown; and Mrs. C. W. Alums, wife of a prosperous lumberman of that place; and Dr. L. B., of this review.

The early education of Dr. L. B. Woods was secured in the public schools in the vicinity of his father's homestead in Red River county, and his boyhood was passed in the pursuits connected with the development of the range and farm. He early displayed a predilection for a professional career, and accordingly, after some preparation, entered the Southern Methodist University, at Dallas, where he took a medical course and was graduated in May, 1911, with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. His first practical experience in the practice of his calling was at St. Paul's Sanitarium, Dallas, as house physician, but in June, 1912, he came to Jacksboro, where he has since maintained his residence and office, and where he is now in the enjoyment of a lucrative and representative practice. He has been a close student, and spends much of his time in personal research and investigation, subscribes to the leading journals of his profession, and belongs to the various organizations of his calling, thus keeping himself fully abreast of the constant progress and advancement being made in the field of medicine and surgery. He has made a place for himself in the ranks of medicine, by his strict adherence to the ethics of the vocation, and by instilling confidence in the minds of the people of his community is rapidly gaining prestige. The Doctor has always been a Democrat and has worked faithfully for the best interests of his party, although he has not found time to enter the field of politics as a seeker for personal preferment. Fraternally he is a Mason, in which he has attained the Chapter degree, and a member of the Knights of the Maccabees. He was reared in the faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and has remained true to its teachings.

On September 4, 1911, at Gibtown, Jack county, Texas, Doctor Woods was united in marriage with Miss Clara Walters, a daughter of J. H. Walters, a druggist of Jacksboro. One son has come to this union, born July 21, 1913.

DAVID LETOT. The peaceful and remunerative pursuits of agriculture fortunately claim the time and attention of many of the solid and practical men of the United States, particularly in Texas, and thereby a feeling of general confidence is spread over the country even when war's alarms are on every side and many of the public activities in different sections are curtailed. If farming and stock raising continue leading industries, a country has within itself the elements of prosperity. In Dallas county reside members of her old families, many of them retaining all or parts of the farms secured many years ago by their pioneering ancestors and in David Letot is found a member of this class. He was born at Kankakee, Illinois, in 1862, and is a son of Clement and Nathalia (Bernard) Letot, and a grandson of Sylvian Letot.

Clement Letot was born in the province of Burgundy, France, in 1829, in the beautiful and picturesque village which lies at the confluence of the Loire and Sonne rivers, historic ground which yet shows evidence of the Roman invasion. In 1851, at the age of twenty-two years, he came to America with the family, his father, Sylvian Letot, locating first near Ottawa, Illinois, a section of the state in which other French pioneers had settled. The Letots became farmers, and later made judicious investments in the rich lands that constitute the famous corn belt of Illinois. It was a great change in the life of Sylvian Letot, for he had been a French soldier in the last years of the Napoleonic regime in France, and that the military spirit never left him was shown by his enlisting, in his old age, in Illinois, for service under General Grant and was wounded in a battle in Kentucky, in the war between the states. It is an interesting fact that in both of the wars referred to, he was an orderly sergeant, and he received medals of honor for efficiency as such from both Napoleon and General Grant. In 1873 Clement Letot, having sold out his substantial property interests in Kankakee county, Illinois, where he had lived for some years, came to Dallas county, Texas, and bought from the Erray brothers, a section and a half of land out of what was known as the Shelley survey, and enough additional land out of the Matthews place to make about 1100 acres all in one body, which is located nine miles northwest of the Dallas county court house at Dallas. The creek known as Joe's Branch runs through a part of this place. For this land he paid about $13 per acre and it is valued at present approximately at $200 per acre. Mr. Letot improved this land, making of it a fine farm, and continued to live on it until his death, which occurred in 1906. The larger part is still owned by his children.

Clement Letot married Nathalia Bernard, who was a native of Alsace, France. Her father was one of the early French pioneers in the vicinity of Ottawa, Illinois. Ten children were born to Clement Letot and his wife, four of whom survive: David, Oliver, Martha and Marie, the last named being the wife of David Andrews, of Fort Worth, Texas. When the Denison branch of the M. K. & T. Railway was built through this part of the county from Dallas, a station was established and named Letot, in honor of the pioneer settler of this neighborhood. Mr. Letot was not only a first class farmer, but a successful business man as well in other directions. He established a grist mill and conducted a cotton gin on his place for many years. He took much interest in public affairs and was postmaster at Letot for quite a long period. Typically French, he was of a sunny, optimistic nature and enjoyed the pleasures and good things of life but not to the exclusion of others, for he built a commodious residence on his place, in which his family was reared in almost luxury and where hospitality was enjoyed by many friends.

David Letot received educational training in boyhood and since reaching young manhood has been engaged in general farming, owning 150 acres of his father's original homestead. This land has a fine location, fronting as it does on the Letot and Farmers Branch turnpike road it is right in the path of the great advance in land values that have become so noticeable in the country lying north of Dallas. He grows wheat, oats, cotton and corn and raises all his own stock, not much extra effort being required, perhaps, to raise for market.

In 1905 Mr. Letot was married to Miss Cora White, who is a daughter of the late Andrew White. The father of Mrs. Letot was born in Georgia, from which state he moved to Texas, probably in the late fifties, and settled first in McLennan county, removing from there to Cooke county. During the war between the states, Mr. White was a soldier in the Confederate army, belonging to the division commanded by the late General Cabell.

JOHN A. SANDERS. Now living retired at Pine Hill after a long and varied career as a Confederate soldier, a farmer, and a merchant, John A. Sanders represents a family established in Rusk county sixty years ago, and the name was always significant of business enterprise and civic and personal worth. Mr. Sanders was about nine years old when the family located on the Henderson Road two miles from Pine Hill in 1853.

John A. Sanders was born in Talbott county, Georgia,

June 3, 1844, a son of Jack Sanders and a grandson of Thomas Sanders. Thomas Sanders was of North Carolina stock, early settled in the vicinity of Macon, Georgia, where he farmed, and died there. He was the father of ten sons and two daughters, and of those now remembered the names were: Brit, Canby, Alexander, Jack, James, and Washington. Jack Sanders was born in Upton county, Georgia, died near Pine Hill, Texas, in 1878, at the age of seventy. On moving to Texas, he brought his slaves from the old Georgia plantation, and came across the country by wagon, in company with the Harpers, who settled about Mount Enterprise, and with the Zuber and Lewis families, who settled in the same locality. Jack Sanders cleared up some three hundred acres of land before he died. His participation in public affairs was as a private citizen. He never held office, and was in favor of the Union, though his sons went into the Confederate army. His church was the Baptist. Jack Sanders married Betsy Shadel, and her death occurred in 1885. Her children were George, who died in Hill county, Texas; Lizzie, who married Frank Freeman, and died at Mount Enterprise; Zack, who lives near Hope, Arkansas; William, of Hill county, Texas; Thomas, of Hill County; John A.; Amanada, who married W. D. Smith and lives at Mount Enterprise.

John A. Sanders had a country schooling in Texas, and was seventeen years old when in 1861 he went into the Confederate army. His enlistment was in Company C of the Fifteenth Texas Cavalry, under Captain John White, and Col. Andrews. His regiment was in Kirby Smith's Corps, and after his first fight at Elkhorn the regiment went to the east side of the Mississippi, participated at Corinth, Richmond, Kentucky, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, and at the last-named battle Mr. Sanders was captured, and was confined for eighteen months in the Federal prison at Camp Douglas in Chicago. His exchange was effected at Richmond, Virginia, and on hunting up his command it was found to be located at Mobile, Alabama. However, though the battle at Spanish Fort on that bay occurred after he rejoined his command, he did not participate, inasmuch as he had taken a furlough and gone home, and did not afterwards return to the front. Following the war Mr. Sanders engaged in farming in the old home community, and was thus actively employed until 1894. In that year he became associated with his son in the mercantile business at Pine Hill, and continued to sell goods some ten or twelve years, when his health caused his retirement.

Mr. Sanders has always been a Democrat, though never a candidate for office, and has been delegate to local conventions. He and his family are Methodists in religious affiliation. In December, 1867, Mr. Sanders married Miss Livie Berry, a daughter of Henry Berry, and Matilda (Nobles) Berry, who came to Texas from North Carolina, and were farmers. Mrs. Sanders, who was one of six children, died in 1872. Her children were: Arthur M., a merchant at Pine Hill, whose career is sketched in following paragraphs; Dr. Horace, also a merchant at Pine Hill; and Eva, who married Thomas Buckner, and died at Pine Hill. Mr. Sanders married for his second wife Miss Sallie Clemens, a daughter of Thomas Clemens of Timpson. After a married life of five years she passed away in 1879, and on January 31, 1889, occurred the marriage of John A. Sanders and Miss Martha Ann Allison, a daughter of Thomas G. Allison, who came from Williamson county, Tennessee, and who married Mary Thompson. Mrs. Sanders is one of a large family of children, named as follows: James, John, William, Mrs. Sanders, Gus, Thomas, Mamie, and Samuel. John and Thomas are deceased, and William disappeared many years ago.

ARTHUR MILTON SANDERS. In the business activities of Pine Hill and vicinity during the last two decades, the career of Arthur M. Sanders has been such as to place him in the front rank of Texas men of affairs. He is a noteworthy example of that energy and enterprise which are never balked by obstacles, and which make use of present opportunities as stepping stones to higher things. An accident in boyhood deprived him of one arm, and while that changed the character of his activities, so far as any one might judge, it did not stunt the extent of his achievements and may actually have proved a stimulus to his career.

A son of John A. Sanders, the retired merchant, whose career and family history have been given above, Arthur Milton Sanders was born on the old Sanders homestead in Rusk County, October 15, 1869. While growing up he was a student of the country schools, and finished his schooling as a student in Keechi Academy in Louisiana. At the age of fourteen, an accident at a cotton gin caused the loss of his right arm, and he prepared himself for other work than the labor of a farm. At the age of seventeen he began teaching country school in Rusk county, and continued in the vicinity of Pine Hill for four years. Leaving the schoolroom, his services were accepted as clerk by W. D. Smith in Pine Hill, and a year later he opened up a store under the name of A. M. Sanders, his stock being worth about one thousand dollars. In 1889 Mr. Sanders bought a cheap frame building, in what is known as "Old Town," as headquarters for his store, and continued to sell goods there until the railroad was put through Pine Hill, when he moved to the new townsite and was one of the first to erect a store building. That structure housed his goods until 1913, when it was replaced with a handsome brick store building, forty by one hundred and twenty-five feet, equipped with bracket fixtures, and since occupying these quarters he has arranged his large and varied stock in departments, dry goods, clothing, ready-to-wear goods, and groceries. The value of his stock runs between thirty-five thousand and fifty thousand dollars. Near his general store stands a warehouse forty by sixty feet, in which is carried that portion of his stock for the accommodation of a small jobbing business.

Important as have his mercantile accomplishments been, they are not chief in importance. The profits of his store he has invested in land, until he owns five thousand acres, has erected about fifty buildings of various descriptions, on this broad estate, and has three thousand acres under cultivation, requiring the services of a large number of families, in his farming operations. Every year about fifteen hundred acres are planted to cotton, and as much more in corn.

Nor does this enumerate all his business connections. Mr. Sanders owns one-third of the stock of the State Bank of Pine Hill, two-thirds of the stock in the Pine Hill Mercantile Company, one of the important business concerns there, and a half interest in the Rusk Drug Company. All of his varied holdings are the outgrowth of his original investment of one thousand dollars at "Old Town" twenty-two years ago.

Mr. Sanders has not attempted any active practice in politics. He votes his ticket as a Democrat, and as a Prohibitionist, and when Prohibition matters are an issue, he is ready to share time from his business to win a victory for that cause. He is an active member of the Methodist church, and practices the old biblical teachings in regard to giving one-tenth or a tithe of his yearly income to the cause of Christian work. Fraternally his membership is with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Woodmen of the World.

Mr. Sanders in December, 1889, married Ada Kirksey, her father, John M. Kirksey, who married a Miss Langston, coming to Texas from Alabama. Mrs. Sanders is one of seven children. To their marriage have been born the following: Gilbert, Verne, Herman, Ray, Drennan, Arthur, Annie, and Addie.

J. W. Ardoin

SERAND ARDOIN

MIRANDA M. (WOODRUFF) ARDOIN

THEODORE WOODRUFF ARDOIN. Representing the successful business and public spirited citizenship of El Paso, Mr. Ardoin is himself probably one of the best known residents of this western city, and is also a member of a family which has been prominently identified with this section of Texas since its pioneer days, back in the early eighties. They have been for generations prominent as southern planters and representatives of what has long been popularly known as the aristocratic element in southern society.

El Paso is now the home of the venerable Serand Ardoin, father of the business man above named. Serand Ardoin is a native of Saint Landry parish, Louisiana, where he was born September 28, 1834, and descends from a prominent French family that were among the first settlers of Canada and subsequently emigrated after the English occupation and settled in Louisiana. By way of the Mississippi river at the age of twenty-one Serand Ardoin moved to Texas, and settled in Gonzales county. At that time he was unable to speak a word of English. Engaging in the cattle business, he managed the vast herds of such men as Charles Braches and Robert Gelgorn with marked success, and at the beginning of the war between the states had a large amount of property, all of which was dissipated at its close. Serand Ardoin was for four years a Confederate soldier, serving with Hood's Fourth Texas Brigade, and laid down his arms at the final surrender of Lee's army at Appomattox. Returning home, he had to start anew to make a home for his family, which then consisted of four children, and later the children increased to twelve in number, of whom four died. There are now thirty-eight grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren of Serand Ardoin and wife. After the war for many years Serand Ardoin was engaged in an extensive cattle business and farming in Gonzales county, but with the extension of the first railroad line and the opening up and settlement of western Texas in the early eighties sold out his interests in that county and moved to the vicinity of El Paso. He was in active business at Pecos City and vicinity until his retirement in 1898, and has since enjoyed all the comforts afforded by material means and by the devotion of a family of loving children in El Paso. Both he and his wife were devout members of the First Baptist church of that city.

Serand Ardoin married Miss Miranda M. Woodruff, whose family is one of the oldest and historically one of the most prominent in Texas. Miranda Woodruff is a sister of Mrs. Anson Jones, whose husband's name will always be perpetuated in Texas history as the last president of the Republic. Miss Woodruff was born in Texas, and her father was Rev. John Woodruff, a Baptist minister and a settler in Texas for a number of years before the Mexican war. Under the Texas regime he was the first clerk of the district of which Houston became the judicial center, some time before Harris county was carved out according to its present limits. In the year 1835 Rev. John Woodruff settled in Brazoria county, marrying Mrs. Sarah Smith, a widow, who had emigrated from Arkansas with the Stephen F. Austin Colony. She had four children by her former marriage, the elder of whom, Mary, afterwards became the wife of Anson Jones, the last President of the Republic of Texas. Of this second marriage were born four daughters, the second of which was Mrs. Miranda (Woodruff) Ardoin. Only one sister survives, Mrs. Julia (Woodruff) Kern of Kansas City, Missouri. Only a little while later the war cloud of approaching Mexican invasion and domination began to darken the horizon of these colonists, and after the siege and capture of the Alamo, and the massacre of Fannin and his men, one division of Santa Anna's army advanced to within six miles of the Woodruff home. Then came the long flight before the foe toward the distant Sabine, an ox team transporting the bedding and other possessions. While camped as refugees at Clear Creek further retreat was cut off by the army of Santa Anna, and while there the party heard the booming of the noted "Twin Sisters" and the rattle of musketry during the afternoon of April 21, when the battle of San Jacinto was fought. John Woodruff and his boys were at the time cutting wood, had started home, and encountered a bunch of Mexicans retreating from the battlefield. The fleeing Mexicans at once fell upon their knees and exclaimed "Me no Alamo, Me no Goliad." This was the first tiding of the good news that General Houston had won a victory and forever put an end to Mexican rule in Texas. After the news of the victory had been confirmed, the Woodruffs returned to their desolated home and began over again the pioneer fight with hardships. Before a house had been built in Houston, which was platted in 1836 and soon afterwards designated as the capital of the Republic, Mr. Woodruff and family moved to that locality in the fall of 1836 and camped beside Buffalo Bayou where not even a tent indicated the city that in the years of his mature lifetime the Rev. Mr. Woodruff saw become the leading city of Texas. It is a matter of history deserving repetition that in the shades of a grove on the south side of the Bayou, on benches sawed by a whipsaw, the first church services were held there by members of the Woodruff family.

It was in the old home at Houston that Miranda (Woodruff) Ardoin was born April 13, 1839. After the capital of the Republic had been removed to the far frontier city of Austin, the Woodruff family lived for several years there. The city was still on the outmost verge of civilization, Indians often approached up to its very palisades, scalping people in the suburbs at almost every full moon, and capturing prisoners, among them children, whose fate was worse than death. The entire time of their residence in Austin was within the shadow of the danger of savage massacre. Rev. John Woodruff had a notable career both as a pioneer and as a minister of the Gospel, and it was while delivering a sermon in the pulpit that death came to him.

Mrs. Serand Ardoin, who is now living in El Paso at the good old age of seventy-five, has herself witnessed many phases of the pioneer life of Texas. As a mother and neighbor in the early days of her residence in Gonzales county in West Texas, her fine traits of character were manifested in thousands of kindly acts of benevolence and charity. Her neighbors were accustomed to send miles for her to come to them in sickness, and the calls upon her were as numerous and as sympathetic as if she had been a regular practitioner. Both Mr. and Mrs. Serand Ardoin are still living, hearty and hale, with their children in El Paso. The family of eight children who grew to maturity are named as follows: Charles W. Ardoin, the oldest son, who is a prominent dairy farmer and owner of a model farm in El Paso county; Edgar, who is associated with the Ardoin Central Market Company at El Paso; Julia, wife of Edward O. Lochausen, a pioneer stockraiser and among the best known stockmen of West Texas, has a family of thirteen living children; Annie, the wife of William Staffer of Los Angeles, California; Theodore W.; Mollie E., wife of Isa L. Barlow, a railway official with the Pecos Valley Southern Railway Company at Balmorhea, Texas; Eli S., who is a prominent valley farmer in the Rio Grande valley and a land owner with extensive possessions near Juarez, Mexico; and Cromwell B., who is connected with the J. H. Nations Meat & Supply Company.

Theodore W. Ardoin, who was born in Gonzales county, Texas, January 17, 1873, began his schooling in that county, and subsequently continued in the Baylor University at Waco, and in the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Mesilla Park, New Mexico, and finally after much thrifty saving and hard effort, attained the means to complete a thorough course in the Gem City Business College at Quincy, Illinois. Though for many years he has been in a prosperous situation as a business man, Mr. Ardoin began his active career without either finances or influence, and has really made everything which he possesses as a result of his individual efforts and energy. At the start of his practical career he had to work, for the first eighteen months after leaving college the savings from his earnings all went to pay debts which he had incurred in order to secure a better than ordinary education in preparation for life. Twenty-two years of age on the completion of his college course, he found a situation with J. H. Nations, a cousin, in conducting a wholesale and retail meat business at El Paso. Subsequently he was promoted to manager of the business and remained twelve years with that concern. During that time in a subordinate capacity he acquired a thorough knowledge of the meat business and laid a solid foundation in general business experience. In 1903 Mr. Ardoin established a retail meat market of his own in El Paso, and from the very beginning enjoyed a large trade and soon built up a concern which as a growing business was in itself a valuable capital.

In addition to his market business, Mr. Ardoin turned his attention to a special line of manufacture. This was the manufacture of candy and conducting a retail confectionery business. He now has two of the finest and best equipped establishments of this kind in El Paso, and his name is associated with what is best in all popular confections and meat. The two stores adjoin each other at 218 and 220 San Antonio Street. Mr. Ardoin is also an extensive owner of El Paso county farm lands and city real estate. He is the owner of the only public abattoir in El Paso. This is a splendidly equipped establishment, with all the appliances for expeditious killing and handling of livestock.

In politics Mr. Ardoin supports the Democratic party. His fraternal society is the Elks, and he is a member of the First Baptist church of El Paso.

ELI SANFORD ARDOIN. A son of Serand and Miranda (Woodruff) Ardoin, Texas pioneers whose sketches are given above, Eli Sanford Ardoin was born January 15, 1876, in Gonzales County, Texas. Coming west with his parents in 1884, was educated in west Texas, and is among the interesting young generation that is "doing things" in West Texas.

His early association with such prominent West Texas cattle men as J. H. Nations and W. H. Fenchler has gained for him the reputation of a progressive cattle dealer and an alfalfa farmer. Eli, as he is known, is able to speak the Spanish language, as the old saying goes, "Like a Native." His ease in conversing with Mexicans on the Mexican Border has given him a decided advantage over others in trading for Mexican cattle, etc.

He is known on the Rio Grande by the Mexicans as Don Ilario. These Mexicans will postpone their sales for weeks until they can consult with him. Mr. Ardoin and his brother Theodore for years run a cattle ranch forty-four miles below El Paso on the Rio Grande River. The ranch site was, in the early days of Texas, known as the old QUIEN SABE (Who Knows) Ranch. The Ardoin brothers sold out their cattle interest several years ago, but still own several thousand acres of this valuable land and a portion of this will be under irrigation as soon as the great Elephant Butte irrigation project has been completed.

The Ranch of the old Quien Sabe Cattle Co., thirty-five years ago, had a peculiar brand, which was something like two C's converged one into the other, making it a very hard brand for even the oldest cattlemen to read. Therefore it derived the name "Quien Sabe" (who knows). There is much early history connected with the Old Quien Sabe ranch, and it is as well remembered by old settlers, as is the Old Chisolm Ranch and Chisolm Trail near Roswell, New Mexico. Ranches bordering on the International line with Mexico, have had their history with cattle rustlers and Indians. Raids would be made on the Texas side and stock of all kinds rustled across the river. Mexicans would never return to tell the tale if overtaken by the Quien Sabes. Today this ranch is almost on the outskirts of the thrifty City of El Paso, Texas, which has a population of 65,000.

He was for eight years in partnership with his brother and he sold out and bought a fine irrigated farm in the State of Chihuahua, Mexico, seven miles from El Paso, and below Juarez, where he has developed the finest stand of alfalfa in the entire Rio Grande Valley. He is also associated with J. Francis Coles in the stock raising business near Ysleta, Texas.

On February 25, 1913, Mr. Ardoin bought a fine home and estate in Highland Park, and he and his family have since made this their regular home. He was married on December 31, 1901, to Miss Clara Stripling. They are the parents of four children, namely: Aileen, Clara Ruth, Ollie and Leona Ardoin.

GEORGE HOUSTON TURNER, M. D. One of the leading representatives of the medical profession in Nacogdoches county, Dr. George Houston Turner has been engaged in the practice of his calling at Garrison for more than ten years, and with strong intellectual endowments, a laudable ambition and resolute purpose, has achieved success and won the favorable criticism of his professional brethren as well as of the public. Dr. Turner is a native Texan, born at Mount Enterprise, Rusk county, June 24, 1872, and is a son of Romulus G. W. and Virginia Elizabeth (Pierce) Turner.

The Turner family is of English origin, the great-great-grandfather of Dr. Turner having been born in England. John Turner, the grandfather of Dr. Turner, was a farmer by vocation and spent his entire life in Marion county, Georgia, where he died. Romulus G. W. Turner was born January 11, 1838, in Marion county, Georgia, was there given ordinary educational advantages, and in 1849 migrated to Mount Enterprise, Texas, where he passed the greater part of his active life, now being retired. He married Virginia Elizabeth Pierce, a daughter of Jesse Pierce, a farmer who spent his life in Georgia. Mrs. Turner died in June, 1911, having been the mother of the following children: Jesse, a resident of Long Branch, engaged in farming; Alma, who married M. J. McCormack, of Long Branch; Gaines V., a well-known attorney of Fort Worth, Texas; Lula, the wife of Dr. C. A. Wallace, of Houston, Texas; George Houston; Lillie, who became the wife of William Wallace, of Mount Enterprise, Texas; and Mollie, who is a resident of Houston. During the war between the South and the North, Romulus G. W. Turner entered the Confederate army, in which he continued to serve as a teamster during the closing years of the struggle. He was successful in his business operations because of his sterling integrity and tireless industry, and won the confidence and respect of those with whom he came into contact.

George Houston Turner spent the first twenty years of his life on the home farm, and received his public and high school education at Nacogdoches. For fourteen months he was engaged in teaching in the schools of Panola county, and in 1889 took up the study of medicine, which he had determined upon as his field of endeavor. Entering Louisville Medical College, he was graduated with his degree from that Kentucky institution in 1892, and at once located in practice at Clayton, Panola county, where he remained for nine years. After spending one year at Shepherd, Texas, he went to Galveston and entered the University of Texas for special laboratory work, and after six months thus passed came to Nacogdoches and practiced eight months and in 1903 came to Garrison, which has since been the scene of his endeavors and successes. Dr. Turner has not given up his professional studies and for the past eight years has been attending the New Orleans Polytechnic. He is a member of the Nacogdoches County Medical Society and of the Texas State Medical Association, and is at this time local surgeon for the Houston East and West Texas Railway Company. His knowledge of the science of medicine is comprehensive and accurate for he has always been a close student of the profession and has kept in touch with the progress and improvement which have marked its advance. Fraternally, he is connected with the Knights of Pythias, the Elks, the Woodmen and the Maccabees, in all of which he has numerous friends.

On November 21, 1892, Dr. Turner was united in marriage with Miss Della McLendon, a daughter of Rev. J. F. McLendon, a Baptist minister from Alabama, and a resident of Clayton, Texas. His wife was Miss Josie Holmes, and they became the parents of the following children: Mrs. Florence Martin, of Wealder, Texas; Mrs. Ida Haiston, of Timpson; Henry, of Clayton; Mrs. Turner; Walter, of Clayton; Ollie, the wife of Dr. J. F. Haiston, of Timpson; Mrs. Maud McComichael, a teacher of Canadian, Texas; Minna, of Timpson, also a teacher; and Monnie, who is the wife of Frank Summers.

Five children have been born to Dr. and Mrs. Turner, namely: Bonnie, who is the wife of Harry Condell and has twins,—Joy and Joyce; Ouida; Emma Riche, Joy and Virginia.

MOSES L. ARRINGTON. Now well established in the practice of law at Granbury, Moses L. Arrington is the youngest member of the Hood County bar, but has demonstrated his practical ability on many occasions, and has made an excellent beginning of his career.

Moses L. Arrington was born April 9, 1884, in Hood county, on the Brazos River. His parents are J. T. and Jennie Arrington, both native Texans, and the father also a native of Hood county. The mother was of Dutch stock. Grandfather Arrington came to Texas from Indiana, in the times of early settlement, and had a plantation and worked it with slaves before the war. He was a member of the fifteenth Texas Cavalry during the war but was discharged in 1862, on account of old age. J. C. Arrington was for many years a stock man, and several years ago sold out and is now identified with the Barker Hardware & Implement Company of Granbury. He became the father of three children, of whom the Granbury attorney is the oldest. The latter as a boy attended the public schools of Hood county, and for one term was a student in the Granbury College. During 1910 he studied law in the State University and later studied law with Judge Dean of Granbury. He was admitted to the bar in 1910 at Texarkana, returning at once to Granbury, where he has practiced with interesting prestige to the present time.

Mr. Arrington has always supported the Democratic interests, and has taken part as a speaker in several of the campaigns. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Woodmen of the World, and his church is the Presbyterian. He believes in and has many arguments to support his convictions that Hood county is the equal of any part of the southwest in material resources and climatic advantages, and even in his time he has witnessed many remarkable changes in social and industrial conditions. Mr. Arrington often pursues his favorite sport of hunting and fishing, and is one of the popular younger group of citizens in Granbury.

THOMAS B. PATTERSON. The real estate enterprise which is more than a brokerage office and which is a factor in the permanent prosperity and development of the community is well exemplified in the case of Thomas B. Patterson of Hillsboro, whose connection with business affairs in that locality has been continuous for the past forty years.

Born in Adair county, Kentucky, June 11, 1859, Thomas B. Patterson was a son of Balart H., who was born in North Carolina in 1805, was a farmer, an occupation which he combined with the operation of grist mills, until his death in 1865. The mother's name was Louise Lloyd, who was born in Cumberland county, Kentucky, in 1818, and died in 1900. Their eleven children are as follows: Martha, Dira, John, Milton, Aaron, Lizzie, Thomas B., Jackson B. and three that died in infancy.

Thomas B. Patterson grew up in the state of Kentucky, attended the public schools until he was sixteen years of age, and as his boyhood was spent on a farm he had his first practical experience in the vocation of agriculture. He remained in Kentucky until 1870, and in that year came to Texas with two years in Fannin County. Moving to Hillsboro in 1872, Mr. Patterson engaged in the grocery business three years, and then turned his attention to dealing in horses and mules. That is the line in which he has been identified the longest time and by which he is best known to the people of a large territory. In 1909 he gave up that business and opened a real estate office, in which he has been equally successful.

At Hillsboro on September 14, 1884, Mr. Patterson married Flora Turk, a daughter of T. C. and Elizabeth (Traylor) Turk. Her father had the distinction of raising the first bale of cotton in Hill county after the war. Mrs. Patterson died June 13, 1907, and left to Mr. Patterson a step-daughter, Ruby. Mr. Patterson affiliates with the Woodmen of the World, is a Democrat in politics, a Methodist in religion and is a member of the Board of Trade. He owns a pleasant residence, and his place is one of substantial influence in the locality.

HON. HORACE W. VAUGHAN. The First District's representative in the Congress which since April, 1913, has been continuously at work on a legislative program that seems likely to go down in history as unprecedented in scope and importance, is Hon. Horace W. Vaughan. Mr. Vaughan, who was elected as a successor to the seat vacated by Morris Sheppard on the latter's promotion to the senate in November, 1912, has long been a prominent member of the Northeast Texas bar, and went to Washington not only with a broad training and experience as a successful lawyer, but also with an official record of service in the state senate and as district attorney.

Horace W. Vaughan was born in Marion county, Texas, December 2, 1867, during the temporary residence of his parents in that county, George T. and Tippah (Leary) Vaughan. His father was a native of Pike county, Missouri, and his mother of Arkansas. They came to Texas in 1866, and their first home was in Cass county. George T. Vaughan, a man of unusual intellectual training, was a teacher in the public schools for several years, both in Cass and Marion counties. He was admitted to the bar in Missouri before the war, and resumed the practice at Linden, the county seat of Cass county. For many years he was one of the valued members of the East Texas bar. He removed to Texarkana in 1886, and lived there till his death in 1907.

Horace W. Vaughan attended the Linden public schools, and took up the study of law under his father until admitted to the bar in 1885. In January of the following year he moved to Texarkana, and that city has been his home and center of professional activity for upwards of thirty years. While building up a private clientage various official honors came to him in a rising scale until he was sent to Congress. In 1890 he was elected city attorney and filled the office seven years, in 1898 was chosen county attorney of Bowie county, and by re-election was in office for eight years. In 1906 he was elected district attorney. These offices were all in direct line with his profession, and his ability as a lawyer was joined with his fidelity to the public interests in making his service one of great value to the people. After two years as district attorney Mr. Vaughan entered the state senate, having been elected in 1910, and served in the regular and special sessions of the Thirty-second and Thirty-third legislatures. In those sessions he was recognized as a leader, and among the important legislation to which he gave his support were the measures in favor of local option and state-wide prohibition and he also introduced and gave his active support to a bill for court procedure reform, in harmony with the policies suggested and defined by the American Bar Association. At the special session of 1911 Mr. Vaughan was chairman of the senate investigating committee which conducted the investigation of the expenditure and alleged illegalities in connection with the state election on the prohibition question in that year.

In 1912 Mr. Vaughan became an aspirant for the nomination for congress in the First District, and the primaries of July 27th placed his name on the Democratic ticket, and thus assured his election in the following November. Mr. Vaughan has sat in the house of representatives since the beginning of the special session in 1913, and though a new member his name has several times been mentioned in the Metropolitan Daily in connection with various legislative and general congressional work. Mr. Vaughan was married in Cass county, Texas, to Miss Pearl Lockett. Their three children are Mrs. Aileen Epper, R. L. and Annie Jean.

CARL VENTH. The present head of the Musical Conservatory of the Polytechnic College at Fort Worth is happily distinguished in the world of music and art; with a secure position and hold upon the intangible attributes of artistic fame. At Fort Worth Mr. Venth has already laid the foundation and is carrying out his plans to make a music school of the highest class, the only one of its kind in the southwest, and in addition to his own personality and prestige has associated with him as teachers a corps of other notable artists.

Carl Venth's life and work are not provincial in character, and as he himself has known the world of music and musicians by close personal contact, so likewise is his own reputation not restricted to any one locality. Carl Venth was born at Cologne, Germany, February 16, 1860, son of Carl and Baroness Fredericka von (Turkowitz) Venth. His father was a violinist, and his mother likewise possessed musical talent. The son entered Cologne Conservatory in 1876, and studied violin with Georg Japha and composition with Ferdinand Hiller. In 1878 he became a pupil of Henry Wieniawski and August Dupont at Brussels, and in the same year was made concertmaster at the Flemish Opera House in Brussels. His first concert tour was made in 1879 through Holland, and he then went to Paris as concertmaster of the Opera Comique.

Carl Venth has had an American career since 1880. His first public appearance was in Boston at the Bay State concerts with Rive King. During the following year he made a tour of the various states as far west as St. Louis, and then became concertmaster at Rudolph Bial's concerts in New York. From 1884 to 1888 Mr. Venth was a member of the Metropolitan Opera House orchestra under Leopold Damrosch and Anton Seidl. This was followed by the organization of the Venth Violin school in Brooklyn. In 1889 he became leader of the orchestral concerts with the Seidl Orchestra and in 1890 organized the Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra. These two organizations made the first attempt at Sunday night symphony concerts in Brooklyn. The Venth Quartet was formed in 1891. In 1896 he became leader of the Euterpe Orchestral Society and did work as conductor with minor organizations. In 1897 Mr. Venth was elected conductor of the Brooklyn Maennerchor. For a number of years he has been a member of the Manuscript Society. In 1906 Mr. Venth went to the St. Paul Symphonie Orchestra as concertmaster, but in the following year returned to New York and organized the Venth Trio, which still exists under the name of Philharmonic Trio. For three years Mr. Venth was director of the violin department of the Kidd-Key Conservatory at Sherman, Texas, and in 1910 gave the first Sherman musical festival. In 1912 he became director of the Frohsinn male chorus at Dallas, in the same year conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of Dallas. In 1913 he became conductor of the Harmony Club at Fort Worth, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra in the same city and conductor of the Choral Club also of Fort Worth. During 1913 he also served as president of the Teachers Association of Fort Worth and in 1914 was conductor of the Dallas Saengerfest and in 1914 became director of the Conservatory of Texas Women's College at Fort Worth.

Mr. Venth has appeared before audiences as a soloist in practically all the large cities of the United States as well as of France, Germany, Belgium and Holland. His acquaintance and personal associations with the great names of modern music include such celebrities as Joachim, Rubinstein, Clara Schumann, Wieniawski, Massenet, Godard, Grieg, Svendsen, Sinding and Bruch, and on the other hand there is probably not a musician of any standing in the United States who is not familiar with the name, the activities and compositions of Carl Venth. Since the beginning of his American residence he has had about two thousand pupils, and in all parts of the country.

As a composer Carl Venth is known through many published works and through the performance of many from manuscript. Some of the best known, and which received their first presentation in New York, are as follows: Forest Scenes, Suite for orchestra, under Anton Seidl; Cantata "The Resurrection;" Song Cycle, Hiawatha's Wooing; Song Cycle, "Myth Voices;" besides string quartets, sonatas and various instrumental compositions and arrangements.

Mr. Venth now has his home in Fort Worth, where his presence is regarded as a valuable asset to that city's higher culture. Mr. Venth was married July 13, 1899, to Cathinka Finch Myhr of Christiania, Norway.

PROF. ROBERT F. DAVIS. For many years Prof. Davis has been connected with educational work along various lines, and for some years past he has been identified with the Draughon's Business College of El Paso, in which he is a part owner. This school, one of the most complete and modern of its kind, was first established here in 1906, and is the oldest business college but one in the city. The management of the local college maintain a similar establishment under the same name in Douglas, Arizona, and both are carrying on a worthy work in the preparation of young men and women for useful and lucrative positions in the business and commercial fields.

Prof. Davis is a native Texan, born in Greenwood, West county, this state, on March 17, 1878. He is the son of D. F. and Perline (Allen) Davis, both natives of Illinois. The father came to Texas in 1870 and settled in Wise county, where he still lives. He engaged in farming and stockraising, and that enterprise has been one that has brought him a generous measure of worldly success and prosperity. He is a veteran of the Civil war, having served in an Illinois company for two years, and his politics are those of a staunch Republican. An honest Christian gentleman, he has long enjoyed the highest regard and esteem of his fellows, and has a prominent place in the community that has so long represented his home. His wife still lives. They were the parents of four children, all living.

schools of Greenwood, and in 1896 he was graduated from the high school of that place. The East Texas Normal College added not a little to his literary training, and he was graduated therefrom in the year 1903 with the degree of B. S. His first work after his graduation from college was in teaching in the public schools of Montague county, in Texas, where he was engaged for a year, followed by a year at Childress, Texas. He then spent four years in the East Texas Normal College in the capacity of tutor, after which he removed to Oklahoma and settled in Hastings, where he took charge of the Southwestern Academy. He continued there for three years, then removed to El Paso, where he became identified with the Draughton's Business College. He has been thus connected for the past four years, and the school has made an appreciable advance under his added influence and system, occupying a leading place among business educational institutions of the state.

Mr. Davis is a member of the Knights Templar body of the Masonic order, and politically he maintains an independent attitude, directing his support in those channels where he feels that duty directs him. He is regarded as one of the successful young men of the city, is socially popular, and enjoys the high regard and esteem of all who come in contact with him, either in his capacity as an educator or as a man.

ALEXANDER STUART WALKER. In the larger affairs of the bench and bar, in public affairs generally, few named have more distinctive association in Texas during the last half century than that of Walker. The late Alexander S. Walker, Sr., rose to a seat on the Supreme bench, and for forty years stood almost continuously in some public relation to his community and state. His son Alexander S. Walker, Jr., also gained a notable position at the bar while he remained in active practice, and has recently taken an office, for which his attainments and experiences are a guarantee of able service, as United States Internal Revenue Collector for Texas.

The late Judge Alexander Stuart Walker, who was a native of Virginia, graduated from Hanover College, Indiana, and on coming to Texas about 1853 settled first in Harris county, and from there moved to Georgetown in Williamson county, where he took up the practice of law. Subsequently he moved to Austin and it was in that city he gained his chief distinctions and did his most important work. At Austin he was in partnership with Col. M. H. Bowers until the latter's death, and then became associated in practice with the late Judge A. W. Terrell. During the war between the states, after a brief service in the Confederate army, he was obliged to return to Williamson county for the reason that during his absence he had been elected District Attorney for that district and returned to fill an office which was fraught with peculiar responsibilities at that time. Later he was elected Judge of the District court, and from that, owing to his splendid ability and standing in the profession was elevated to a position as judge on the Commission of Appeals. His service on Commission of Appeals was followed by his promotion to a place as associate justice in the Supreme court of Texas. When he retired from the Supreme Bench he became official reporter to the Supreme court of Texas, and continued to discharge those duties until his death in 1896. The late Judge Walker was one of those brilliant and capable men who have gone to make up the roster of the Texas Bench and Bar. He gained success and gave splendid service to his state through hard work, a rugged native ability, and a thorough honesty and integrity. In 1873 he served as chairman of the Democratic executive committee when Richard Coke was elected governor, and when the state was redeemed from the Republican and carpet-bag administration.

The late Judge Walker married Anna Wilbarger. Through her another distinguished family is introduced into this brief sketch. Her father was Mathias Wilbarger, one of the early settlers and pioneers of Travis and Williamson counties. He came from Missouri, was a surveyor by profession, and had many personal adventures with the Indians and in the wild and adventuresome life of the frontier. He was a cousin to the noted Wilbarger of Bastrop county, who was scalped by the Indians within a few miles of Austin, and whose fame as an Indian fighter has given his career a distinct place in the early annals of Texas, and in the northwestern part of the state a county is named in his honor. Mathias Wilbarger died at Georgetown in 1854. His daughter, Mrs. Judge Walker, died in 1865. The Walker family is of Scotch-Irish descent. The late Judge Walker was born and lived at Walker's Creek in Rockbridge county, Virginia, until he was nine or ten years old, and the family had lived in that and other parts of Virginia from the early colonial days.

Alexander Stuart Walker, Jr., a son of Judge Alexander S. and Anna (Wilbarger) Walker, was born at Georgetown in Williamson county November 27, 1865. The Georgetown public schools afforded him his early training, and he also attended the South Western University at Georgetown, and later the Washington and Lee University in Lexington, Virginia. He was one of the first students in law at the University of Texas, where he graduated in 1886 with the degree LL. B. His practice as a lawyer began at Austin with T. W. Gregory and Judge A. W. Terrell, under the firm name of Terrell, Walker & Gregory. He practiced with that firm until about 1890, and then was alone until 1891, when he took up his duties by appointment as County attorney of Travis county and was elected and served a regular term in that office in 1892. In 1896 came his election as county judge of Travis county, and by re-election in 1898 he served until 1900. In the latter year, practically retiring from the law, he moved to Williamson county, and employed his energies in farming and ranching until September, 1913. He was then recalled into active public affairs by appointment as United States Internal Revenue Collector for Texas, with office in Austin.

Mr. Walker is a member of the University Club, of the Austin Press Club, and the Presbyterian church. In 1888 he married Miss Katherine Pendleton Waggener, who was born in Kentucky and is a daughter of Dr. Leslie Waggener, a former president of the University of Texas. Frances Pendleton Walker, the firstborn to Mr. and Mrs. Walker, graduated from the Miss Whitis School at Austin, from the University of Texas, taking high honors in both institutions, and was a member of the Phi Beta Kappa, an honor only acquired by those whose scholastic record in the university was of the very highest. At the outset of a brilliant young womanhood she died December 18, 1913, at the age of twenty-four. Alexander Stuart Walker, Jr., the third to bear the honored name, is now a student in the University of Texas.

DANIEL T. BENCHOFF, district and county clerk of Menard county, Texas, since November, 1912, is a life-long resident of the state, born in Concho county, on May 31, 1887. He has been connected with business affairs in these parts since 1906, when he went to work as a clerk in his father's store, later identifying himself with banking interests in which he continued until he assumed his present duties. Mr. Benchoff is one of the rising young men of the county, and that he will make a success of his future is already assured.

The parents of Mr. Benchoff are D. G. and Mary Benchoff, the father born in Pennsylvania and the mother in Ireland. They came to Texas in about the year 1880. The father was a farmer of German ancestry, and the mother of Irish parentage and ancestry, so that the strains of both German and Celtic blood flow in the veins of Mr. Benchoff. The family is one that is well represented in the state of Pennsylvania, where many of the name are prominently connected with the farming industry of the state, while the majority of the mother's family is still in Ireland. She was a Mary Connolly, of a good, old Irish family, well known in Ireland, and with numerous representatives of the name on this side as well. It was in about 1880 when D. G. Benchoff settled in Eden, Concha county, this state, and there he became prominent as a merchant and sheepman. In 1897 he came to Menard county and here continued his mercantile enterprise, and in that business he is still active and prosperous. Both he and his good wife are living here and they have many friends in the town and throughout the county. Eight children were born to them,—four boys and the same number of girls, and of that goodly family Daniel T. of this review is the oldest.

Daniel T. Benchoff received his early education in the public schools, followed by his attendance at St. Edwards College at Austin, and in June, 1906, he was graduated with the degree of M. A. He left school to return home and identify himself with his father's business in Menard, and after a brief service there, he entered the Bank of Menard as a bookkeeper, continuing so until 1911, when he became a teller in the First National Bank of Menard. His appointment to the office of district and county clerk of Menard county came in November, 1912, and he resigned his position with the First National to assume the duties of his new position.

A Democrat, Mr. Benchoff has given good service to the party, and is regarded as one of the able younger men of the organization in this county. He is a member of the Pretorians, and his churchly relations are maintained as a member of the Roman Catholic Church.

On August 28, 1907, Mr. Benchoff was married in Menard to Miss Maud M. Bevans, of Menard, and a daughter of William Bevans, of this place. He is a banker and a prominent stockman of the county, well known and prominent. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Benchoff: Mary Ernestine, William David and Margaret Louise, aged six, four and two years, respectively.

VERY REV. ROBERT M. NOLAN, DEAN. The pastor of St. Patrick's Catholic church at Fort Worth is a thorough churchman, devoted to his parish, and has made a splendid record for the development of its material and spiritual welfare. At the same time Father Nolan has exhibited an ability, not a too common trait among the clergy, to mingle socially with all classes of citizenship, and is probably one of the most popular men in the city of Fort Worth either in business or civic circles. Father Nolan has the gift of fluent speech, tells stories with much humor, and has the faculty of combining the serious and the gay in a very effective manner. He is chaplain of the Ad Men's Club. Father Nolan is also a devotee of the national pastime of baseball and hundreds of citizens who are not members of his church, or communicants of his faith know and esteem Father Nolan.

Rev. Robert M. Nolan was born at Junction City, Dickinson County, Kansas, August 20, 1874, a son of Patrick and Margaret (Hedion) Nolan, both of Ireland, who came to America in 1848. Patrick Nolan was what was known in those days as a young Irishman, and had to flee his native land because of his political convictions and activities. Father Nolan was reared in his native state, was educated at St. Mary's, and at Atchison, graduating from St. Benedict's College in 1891 with the degree of A. B. He had worked his way through this college and had created for himself many of the opportunities which would otherwise have been denied him. His parents were poor, possessed a great deal of pride, however, and were people of strict honor and integrity. After his graduation, Father Nolan taught at St. Benedict's College for five years, this being a result of a compact under which he had entered the college and had studied there until graduation. On June 4, 1898, in the cathedral at New Orleans, he was ordained by Archbishop Chappelle, and in the same year came to Texas, which has been his field of priestly work ever since.

His first charge was at Weatherford, in St. Stephens church, where he remained in charge for two and a half years. From Weatherford he was transferred to St. Mary's at Gainesville, where he was pastor for eight years, and in that time built up the church and made it one of the strongest in north Texas. At the same time he established the school of Notre Dame at Gainesville. After his successful career there he was transferred to St. Patrick's church in Fort Worth, and has been executive and spiritual head of this parish since January 1, 1907. In this time he has built the splendid parish house which was sadly needed, and has developed the parish school, which now has an average daily attendance of over four hundred. This school is conducted by the sisters of St. Mary under his jurisdiction. The mother home of the sisters of St. Mary is at Lockport, New York, and this order was the first to enter Texas.

HON. CHARLES ROGAN. With thirty years of active membership in the Texas bar, Hon. Charles Rogan has distinguished himself as a scholarly and able lawyer and has been honored with a number of responsible positions in county and state public affairs. Left an orphan at an early age, he started out to win his own fortune in the world. By hard work and with the goal of his ambition steadily before him, he paid his way through college and university, and when he took up the practice of law he possessed a scholastic equipment second to none.

Charles Rogan was born February 3, 1858, at Ripley, Mississippi, a son of John H. and Mary (Wood) Rogan. Grandfather James Rogan emigrated from Ireland in 1807, first locating in Virginia. Both grandfather and father were farmers by occupation. In 1861 John N. Rogan and wife moved to Texas, and two weeks later the former enlisted in the Confederate army, and at the end of six months' service died of pneumonia while in camp in Arkansas.

Charles Rogan graduated from the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas in 1881, and in June, 1883, was graduated from the Harvard Law School.

For the past twenty-five years Mr. Rogan has been engaged in an extended general practice of the law, the first fifteen years of which was at Brownwood and the remainder of the time at Austin, Texas. Other than professional honors also came to him, and he filled with credit the offices of City Attorney, County Attorney, County Judge, and was a member of the Twenty-second Legislature. In 1899 Mr. Rogan moved to Austin to accept appointment as Commissioner of the General Land Office of Texas. In 1901 he was again chosen for the same office and administered the position for two terms.

On December 1, 1885, Mr. Rogan married Miss Frances V. Stewart, whose Scotch and German ancestors fought in the Revolutionary war. To their marriage have been born five children, namely: Octavia Fry, James Stewart, Lena Sayers, Mary Lou and Mildred Charles. James Stewart is now teller in the American National Bank of Austin, while the three older girls have all graduated from the University of Texas, and Mildred, eleven years of age, is now in grammar school. Mr. Rogan affiliates with Austin Lodge No. 12, A. F. & A. M., with the Royal Arch Chapter and the Knights Templar Commandery and with Ben Hur Temple of Shriners of Austin. He and his family are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

THOMAS G. T. KENDALL. To write the personal biography of some of the leading citizens of Dallas, is to turn back a page of Texas history and recall the days prior, during and following the war between the states, when very different conditions from the present prevailed in many sections, when permanent settlers were fewer, when but a limited number of railroads had laid their shining lines of steel across the teeming, virgin prairies, and when law, order, civilization and culture became the public heritage through such earnest and capable men as Thomas G. T. Kendall, whose term of residence at Dallas has reached the half century mark. Although retired from the active practice of his profession he is the Nestor of the bar here, being the oldest lawyer in this city, having outlived all others who began practice at the same time.

Thomas G. T. Kendall was born at Evergreen, Conecuh county, Alabama, August 18, 1834, and is a son of Thomas and Caroline A. (Smith) Kendall. Thomas Kendall was born in Georgia, and his wife was a daughter of John Godbold Smith, of South Carolina. When a youth Thomas G. T. Kendall went to Arkansas and located at first on a plantation near Camden, then in Ouachita, now Columbia county, and while attending school in Alabama, in 1856, he joined the late Col. Jeff Bufford and went with him to Kansas. He remained there during the stirring times in that Territory until December, when he joined the notorious Col. H. T. Titus and together with General C. R. Wheat, Maj. William Moon and Billie West, after recruiting three battalions, left New Orleans in January, 1857, under command of the late Col. S. A. Lockridge, for Nicaragua to join "The Grey-eyed Man of Destiny," General Wm. Walker. Arriving at Gray Town, they procured transportation and began the ascension of the San Juan river with varying success until they reached Saltillo, a strongly fortified position, and after engaging the enemy for several days had finally to fall back, abandoning the expedition, and finally returning to their homes. Later removing to Magnolia, Columbia county, Mr. Kendall there became a man of importance, studied law and was admitted to the bar, and became mayor of the town. He there also became a member of a volunteer cavalry company, and it was with this company that he entered the Confederate service when hostilities began between the North and South. In the spring of 1862 he helped to organize a second company, known as Company C, Nineteenth Arkansas Infantry, which became a part of General Albert Rust's brigade, and this service took him east of the Mississippi river, into Tennessee and Mississippi. In May, 1862, while with his regiment at Corinth, Mississippi, he contracted rheumatism in so serious a form that he resigned and went home and shortly afterward was appointed by General Hinman, to the position of agent for the purchase of ordnance supplies for the Trans Mississippi department, and was in the quartermaster and commissary department in Arkansas until the spring of 1864. He was then sent by Major N. S. Hill, General Price's chief commissary, to Dallas, where he engaged in buying and transporting horses, cattle, food and supplies for the Confederate army. In this position he reported to Captain John T. Fisher, and his duties took him over a large stretch of Texas territory, but he continued to make Dallas his headquarters. When the war closed it found him with a bunch of cattle, near Comanche, Texas.

Mr. Kendall returned then to Dallas and at first, for a time, engaged in teaching school, at Grapevine Springs, Dallas county. In 1866 he opened a law office in Dallas and in 1867 was elected county attorney, under a constitution which the Texans had adopted for themselves, but his tenure of office was short, he being removed by the reconstructionists. He resumed the practice of law and served six years as a justice of the peace. In 1872 Judge Kendall engaged in the real estate business as a member of the firm of Kendall and Blades, and operated successfully as such, especially during what was called the "boom" which followed the completion of the Texas & Pacific and the Houston & Texas Central railroads into Dallas. Some time after this Judge Kendall purchased and improved a stock ranch, northwest of Dallas and lying just beyond what is now the city limits, which he still owns and on which he made his home for several years. This land he secured for $10 an acre and is now a valuable piece of property containing 220 acres, adjoining the Colonel Hughes place. Its close proximity to Dallas makes it a desirable property in every way, while each year adds to its money value.

Judge Kendall was married at Dallas to Miss Helen Spottswood Scott, who is a daughter of the late Dr. Roy B. and Lucy Ann (Holcombe) Scott, and a granddaughter of Thomas H. Holcombe, once a distinguished lawyer of Lynchburg, Virginia, and a great-granddaughter, on the paternal side, of Governor Spottswood of Virginia. Mrs. Kendall was born at Lynchburg but was brought in 1857 to Dallas by her parents, who were among the early pioneers of Dallas county, locating twelve miles north of Dallas on what is now the Preston road. In addition to having a plantation, Dr. Scott was engaged actively in the practice of medicine and during the war served in the Confederate army for a time as surgeon on General Gano's staff. Judge and Mrs. Kendall have five children: Miss Mary Camilla, Thomas Beverly, Lucy Halcombe, wife of St. Clair Favrot, of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, Mrs. Helen Spottswood Pearce, of Belcher, Louisiana, and Harry Ogden Kendall.

Judge Kendall is a greatly esteemed and respected citizen. Since 1894, when he was elected and served as a member of the board of aldermen, he has accepted no public office but his interest in all that pertains to Dallas has never slackened. World wide movements and the stirring events marking the rapid passing of the years of the twentieth century find in him an intelligent, and alert watcher, but it is in more local matters that he takes the most interest and pleasure, following closely all that affects the United Confederate Veterans, of which organization he has long been a member. Well might he write a history, and it would be of more than passing interest, of Dallas county and of the days between 1861 and 1865 west of the Mississippi river, for he is an authority on these subjects.

A. B. ROBERT, M. D. A physician who has made his home in El Paso since 1911 and is well known throughout this section of Texas and in Mexico, in which country he has spent the greater portion of his career as a physician, Dr. Robert is the son of a physician, one who was a surgeon of the Confederate army during the Civil war, and the father and son together have conferred honor and credit upon the profession during a period of fully half a century.

A. B. Robert was born at Troy, Alabama, September 2, 1863, the youngest in a family of ten children, six of whom are living, born to W. H. and Barbara Melva (Skinner) Robert, both parents having been born in Georgia. The father came to Alabama as a young man and gained prominence as a physician at Troy. Subsequently he moved to Texas. During the war he was surgeon of a regiment in the southern army, and he continued his practice at Greenville, Texas, for many years, until death in 1901 at the age of eighty-four years. He and his wife were married in Alabama and the mother passed away in January, 1907, at the age of eighty-six.

Dr. A. B. Robert attended school at Whiterock, Texas, and at Mexia, took a college course, and then entered the Missouri Medical College at St. Louis, where he was graduated M. D. in 1885. He subsequently took a special course of lectures in the New York Ophthalmic and Aural Institute. Returning to Greenville, he practiced there for one year, then removed to El Paso, where he was in practice for one year, and subsequently transferred his residence and professional activities to Casas Grandes, Mexico, which was his home for seventeen years. Since 1911 he has returned to El Paso and has built up a fine practice in this city. During his residence at Casas Grandes he served as city physician for ten years, and was examiner for the New York Life Insurance Company, the Equitable and the La Mexican Life Insurance Company, and for twelve years was railway surgeon for the Mexican Northwestern Railway. In politics the doctor is Democratic. He has membership in the eastern Texas Medical Association. His church was formerly the Presbyterian and is now the Methodist.

On August 13, 1900, Dr. Robert married Miss Josefa Dours, of Casas Grandes, a daughter of Juan and Carolina (Older) Dours, her mother still being a resident of Casas Grandes. Five children were born to their union, namely: Barbara, born at Casas Grandes, Mexico, in 1901, now attending school in El Paso; Augustus B., born at Casas Grandes in 1902, and also a student in the El Paso schools; Josephine, born in 1904 at Casas Grandes and a young school girl. William Henry, born in Casas Grandes in 1909, died in October, 1910, and Natalia, born in El Paso, Texas, in 1913, died in infancy. Dr. Robert owns a large ranch in Mexico, and has acquired valuable real estate in El Paso, including his beautiful home at 1702 Montana street. He is fond of all manner of outdoor life, delights in the sports afield, and enjoys a thoroughly successful position in his profession and citizenship.

PORTER M. TRAVIS. Now secretary and treasurer of the People's Trust Company of Dallas, Porter M. Travis has been identified with banking affairs in Texas since his first business experience, and before taking his present position was a state bank examiner. Mr. Travis enjoys the possession of a name which naturally excites curiosity as to his earlier family connections. Mr. William Barrett Travis, the leader of the Texas forces in the defense of the Alamo in 1835-36, gave the name a prestige which will always make it notable in Texas history. There is no direct relationship between the Dallas man and the hero of the Alamo, except that they both come from the same family, originating in Virginia, and which produced not only Colonel Travis of Texas history, but many men notable in military affairs, in the professions, and in the business and civic life of different states of the Union. The family are prominent in Georgia, also in states north of the Ohio river, and have long been identified with Tennessee, where Mr. Travis' immediate family were located.

Porter M. Travis was born in the city of Nashville, Tennessee, in 1883. His parents were George T. and Letitia Jeannette (Turner) Travis. His father, who died some years ago, was born at Stony Point, the old Travis homestead, near Tullahoma, Tennessee. The youngest of nine children, he was himself too young to enter the service of the Confederacy during the war between the states, but five of his brothers joined the Confederate army and served throughout the war, rendering valiant service to the cause. One of these brothers was Colonel Jim M. Travis, who is still living in Middle Tennessee, and besides his prominence as an old soldier has been a state senator, and for a number of years was a prominent figure in Tennessee politics. Another brother who was a Confederate soldier was Rev. Rufus Travis, who served with the rank of chaplain in the army, and later became prominent in the church. William Barrett Travis, another of these brothers, was a merchant for a number of years. George W. Travis, the father, prior to his death lived at Nashville, and was one of the successful real estate men of that city. On the mother's side there is also some interesting genealogy. Mrs. Letitia J. Travis is still living and was born in Middle Tennessee. Her father was William Turner, and her mother belonged to the Hawkins family. It is through her mother that she is a direct descendant of Sir John Hawkins, the famous naval commander and sea fighter of the time of Queen Elizabeth in England. He was given a royal grant of land in Virginia, and his descendants gained prominence in Colonial American history. The Hawkins family at one time owned the site of Trinity church in New York city.

From Tennessee Mrs. Travis moved her family to California, spent some years in that state, and in 1840 located in Dallas. Porter M. Travis, who was eleven years old when the family came to Dallas, had attended school in the west and in Dallas was a pupil of Professor Malcolmson in the old Central Academy of that city. At an early age he became identified with banking, and has practically grown up in that business. For six years he was connected with banks in Terrell and during the administration of Governor Campbell served as state bank examiner. On his return to Dallas in 1912, he became secretary and treasurer of the People's Trust Company, a highly successful financial institution which makes a specialty of financing farming operations through loans and mortgages.

Mr. Travis was for a number of years an active member of the Texas National Guard, resigning with the rank of captain in 1910. He enlisted at Dallas as a private in Company G, Fourth Infantry, in 1900. Later his membership was transferred to Company C, of the Third Infantry at Terrell, and he became quartermaster sergeant of the company. Subsequently came his promotion to second lieutenant and finally to captain of Company C, which was a part of Major Roach's battalion in the regiment commanded by Colonel Towne. Mr. Travis is a Mason, having taken different degrees in the York Rite, and thirty-two degrees in the Scottish Rite, and is a member of Hella Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Dallas. At Sherman, Texas, in 1909, he married Miss Laura M. Saul, who was a graduate from the State University of Texas in the class of 1906. They have one son, Porter M. Travis, Jr.

CAPT. ROBERT H. BRUCE, of Texarkana, Texas, was born and reared in this state and in many ways has been prominently identified with its interests.

He was born in Hunt county in 1867, with a mixture of Northern and Southern blood in his veins, his father, S. R. Bruce, having been born and reared in Vermont, and his mother, Catherine (Reeves) Bruce, in Oglethorpe, Georgia.

S. R. Bruce left the New England States before the Civil war and came to Texas, settling in Gonzales county. Having centered his interests in this locality, it was natural for him, in the strife between the North and the South, to ally himself with the latter. Accordingly he enlisted in the Confederate service, and as a member of that famous organization known as Terry's Texas Rangers, served with distinction throughout the war. At the close of hostilities, he took up his residence in Hunt county. Subsequently he removed to Mineola, Wood county, where he became president of the Bank of Mineola, and where he spent the rest of his life engaged in banking. His death occurred at that place, and his widow still resides there.

Thus Robert H. was reared at Mineola. He was educated in the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Bryan, Texas, and in a private school at Ashford, New York, after which he was taken into his father's bank as assistant cashier, a position he filled until 1890. The next three years he was commercial agent for the I. & G. N. R. R. In 1893 he engaged in contracting, furnishing ties, gravel and crushed rock to the Santa Fe Railroad in Oklahoma and Indian Territory, and in this line of work was occupied until the breaking out of the Spanish American war in 1898. Then, through the influence of Mark Hanna, he received a commission as Captain of troop M, First United States Volunteer Cavalry (Rough Riders), under Colonel Wood and Lieutenant Colonel Roosevelt. With this command he rendezvoused at San Antonio, and from there was sent to Cuba, where he was in active service until July 1st, when he was sent back home to do recruiting service. The close of hostilities shortly afterward, however, made this work unnecessary, and he returned to his home at Mineola. Next we find him at Kansas City, where he was variously employed until 1901. That year he accepted a position in the Department of Justice at Washington, which he filled until 1903. Then returning to Texas, he was made superintendent of the Orange & Northwestern Railroad at Orange. When that road was sold to the Frisco system in 1906, Captain Bruce went to Mexico to look after the timber interests of the Litcher-Moore Lumber Co., and was in Mexico two years. Coming back to Texas, he again turned his attention to railroad business. Two years and a half later he took up his residence at Texarkana and accepted the position as manager for the Tilson Sand & Gravel Company, which in September, 1912, was changed to the Texarkana Sand & Gravel Company, with which he is still identified as manager. In January, 1913, he again entered the oil-producing business, and is now operating in Texas and Oklahoma, with a varying degree of success. In his various business ventures Captain Bruce has made and lost fortunes. At the time of the opening of the Beaumont oil field, he was extensively interested in oil operations.

W. M. Davis

Captain Bruce has always taken an enthusiastic interest in military affairs, and has had the honor to serve as colonel on the staff of three of the governors of Texas—Ross, Hogg and Culberson.

He was married at Longview, Texas, to Miss Mittie F. Brown of that place, daughter of the late B. W. Brown, a prominent pioneer citizen; and they are the parents of three children: Mrs. May De Eddins, Mrs. Carrie Flewellyn and Ingram C. Bruce.

ROY ANDERSON. The dexterous manipulation of the chisel has at all times commanded a liberal share of wonder and admiration; it has preserved to us the beauty of antiquity, has marked the resting place of our dearest and most beloved friends, and has made the home of their mortal remains a garden of art and loveliness; it has also contributed to the beautifying of our cities, the adornment of our public parks, and to the perpetuating of the memory of the great and good. In this connection it is with pleasure that here is presented a brief sketch of Roy Anderson, proprietor and owner of the Brownwood Marble and Granite Works, at Brownwood, who as a born marble cutter has won his way to recognition and fame. Mr. Anderson was born September 19, 1857, in Maury county, Tennessee, and is a son of Frank and Jeanette (Thompson) Anderson.

The father of Mr. Anderson was born in Virginia, from whence he removed to Tennessee in young manhood, and there was married. He became a prominent railroad contractor and builder and died at the age of sixty-seven years, at Gatesville, Texas, while engaged in erecting depots and other buildings on the line of the Cotton Belt Railroad. His wife, a native of Tennessee, passed away in 1876, while a resident of Independence, Kansas. They were the parents of seven children, of whom four are deceased, while those living are: John D., who came to Texas in 1884, and is now acting in the capacity of Postmaster at Miles; James B., who is now a resident of Corpus Christi, Texas; and Roy.

Roy Anderson was educated in the country schools of Howard county, Kansas, and at the age of fifteen years began to learn the trade of marble cutter. On completing his apprenticeship he traveled all over the Western States as a journeyman, and as such came to Paris, Texas, in 1882, here becoming foreman in the marble works of John

A. Guthrie. Mr. Anderson continued in the same position for five years, and then moved to Eldora, Kansas, where he first engaged in business on his own account. Three years later he disposed of his interests there, and came to Paris again, resuming his former position as foreman for Mr. Guthrie, and at the close of the year 1888 resigned and went to San Antonio, where he again engaged in business on his own account. Subsequently, Mr. Anderson sold his property there and went to Ballinger, Texas, that place being his home and field of business endeavor until 1891. In that year, realizing the advantages and opportunities offered by Brownwood, he came to this city, and entered business in a modest manner, but his enterprise has grown to large proportions and he now employs from five to ten skilled mechanics and four traveling salesmen, the business of the company being drawn from all over this part of the State. This plant is the most thoroughly equipped of any in Central or Western Texas and is equipped to do every kind of marble or granite work. An artist of true genius, Mr. Anderson's love for the picturesque and beautiful asserts itself in every detail of his business, and evidence of his skill may be found in every cemetery and public park in the vicinity of which he or his representatives are known. The greater part of his attention is given to his work along this line, but he has also invested in farming lands, and has a fine stock farm in Brown county, which is in charge of his son, Frank, and where he is engaged in breeding White-faced cattle. Mr. Anderson is an enthusiastic automobilist, owns a modern make of car, and finds that it is not only a source of great enjoyment in taking pleasure trips, but also helps him exceedingly in his own business affairs. His handsome residence is located in Brownwood. Mr. Anderson is a man of energy, progress and public spirit, and at all times is ready to assist in forwarding movements for the benefit of his community.

While a resident of Paris, Texas, in 1882, Mr. Anderson was united in marriage with Miss Mattie Brosius, of that city, daughter of George W. Brosius. Five interesting children have been born to this union, of whom Mr. Anderson has every reason to be proud: Irma, who became the wife of Will H. Simmons, a successful ranchman of Brown county; Avis, who became the wife of John H. Simmons, brother of Will H. Simmons, a resident of Brownwood; Frank, twenty-one years of age, who is conducting his father's stock farm in Brown county; Edward, nineteen years old, who is a student of Daniel Baker College, Brownwood; and Paul, seventeen years old, who is attending the Brownwood High school.

In his political views, Mr. Anderson is a Democrat, but he has never sought public office as he has never cared for the doubtful and passing honors of the political arena. He has taken some interest in fraternal work, being a Royal Arch Mason and a member of the Woodmen of the World, and has a number of friends in both orders. With his family, he attends the Methodist church.

JOSEPH ALLEN BIRDWELL, M. D. Since his graduation from Louisville Medical College in 1891, Dr. Birdwell has been in the active practice of his profession in Texas, and his home has been at Overton since 1900. A prosperous business has come to him, both in his profession and as a merchant, and he stands high in the esteem of the entire community.

Joseph Allen Birdwell, who was born in Rusk county, at Mount Enterprise, April 23, 1860, represents one of the oldest Texas families, their record in this state going back to the early years of the Republic. Dr. Birdwell is a son of John C. Birdwell, and a grandson of Col. Allen Birdwell. The founder of the family was Col. Allen Birdwell, who settled three miles south of Mount Enterprise some time in the thirties, at the year of Independence, and previous to 1840. He was one of the big planters and slave holders in that portion of Texas, the owner of about one thousand acres of land, and highly prosperous until he lost his slaves as a result of the war. He was born in Mississippi in 1805 and died in Rusk county in 1898 at the age of ninety-three. He had a fair education, was a man whose activity went beyond his immediate home, served in the legislature, representing Rusk county twice, was the leader and practically the founder of the Baptist Missionary church in his county, was a Democrat in politics, and belonged to the Masonic Order. Col. Birdwell first married Miss Ross, and their children were: Caroline, who married a Mr. Kirkpatrick; Emeline, who married a Mr. McBride; John C.; William, who died in the Federal prison at Chicago during the Civil war; Charles, who saw service as a Confederate and died soon after the war; James, who moved to Houston county, and left a family there at his death; Benjamin, who died at Mount Enterprise; George P., who was one of the early teachers in his part of the state and now lives in Troup. For his second wife Col. Birdwell married Jane Verno, and their children were: Joel; Beldina, Mrs. James Sutton, a noted musician and music writer, who spent her life in Texas, and died at Houston; Henry, a resident of San Angelo; Allen, who met an accidental death while a school boy; Addie, whose husband, John Abe March, was one of the merchants of his time, and died at San Angelo; Jennie, who married Joe Bishop, a druggist of San Angelo.

John C. Birdwell was born in Mississippi in 1825, was a boy when he came to Texas, grew up in the vicinity of Nacogdoches, and soon after the outbreak of the war between the states enlisted, served with the Trans-Mississippi Department, and was wounded by a splinter struck from a tree by a shell. He was captured at Arkansas Post by the Union Troops, taken to the Federal Prison in Chicago, was finally liberated and returned home and died from the effects of his previous wound on January 18, 1867. His business career was spent as a farmer, and in a tanyard at Linn Flat, in Nacogdoches, where he died. John C. Birdwell married Adeline B. Cunningham, who was born in 1830, and now lives at Trawick, formerly Linn Flats. Mrs. Birdwell is a daughter of Rev. Jeremiah and Jane Cunningham, her father a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, and also a blacksmith, who lived at Mount Enterprise, and from there moved to Corsicana, where he died. There were twelve children in the Cunningham family. John C. Birdwell and wife had the following children: James P. of Trawick; Jeremiah C., who died at Nacogdoches; Lurinda Ross, who died unmarried at Corsicana; Paulina Jane, who married B. T. Burk, of Sacul, Texas; Dr. Joseph A.; John C., of Trawick; Addie A., who lives with her mother on the old homestead.

Dr. Birdwell grew up on a farm, had meagre advantages, and has practically educated himself, since all his training and preparation for his profession came after he was twenty-seven years of age. After two years as a student in Rock Hill Institute in Rush county, in 1889 he entered the Louisville Medical College, where he was graduated M. D. February 24, 1891. His practice as a physician began in Houston county at Neches. This was followed by ten years at old London in Rusk county, and since 1900 his home and practice have been centered at Overton. In 1896 Dr. Birdwell, who is always progressive and a student in his profession, took a post-graduate course in the New Orleans Polyclinic. He is a member of the County Medical Society, and the State Medical Society. Dr. Birdwell at Overton built a brick building in which he conducted a drug business under the name of the Overton Cash Drug Store. He has also added to the substantial improvements of the time by the erection of a comfortable residence. But Dr. Birdwell has in recent years suffered loss by two fires. His barn and its contents burned on the 4th of May, 1907, at about 12:30 A. M., entailing a loss of about $1,200.00 with no insurance. On the 6th day of January, 1914, at about 6 A. M., his drug store, the Overton Cash Drug Store, burned, entailing a loss of $6,000.00, partly covered by insurance.

This took him out of business and placed him in hard circumstances, but as he is still active he will resume operations again in a short time.

Dr. Birdwell's family history begins with his marriage in Nacogdoches county, March 20, 1891, to Miss Ada Dawson, whose father was James M. Dawson, a farmer. Dr. Birdwell and wife have the following children: Oren G., Bernice L., Glenn D., Leroy, Allie Myrrl, Lona Linn, James Weldon, and Maxine. Dr. Birdwell is well known in fraternal circles, having affiliation with the Masonic Lodge, the Knights of Pythias, and the Woodmen of the World, and his church is the Methodist.

JOHN ALLEN THOMPSON. In the business and financial field few Texans have gone further or accomplished more than John Allen Thompson, president of the Corsicana National Bank, and officer in several industrial and financial enterprises of central Texas. His chief characteristic seems to be commercial achievement on a large scale. Mr. Thompson is a big man physically, as well as in business, and has never lacked the energy and the mental resources necessary for large accomplishments. When it is recalled that about twenty-five years ago he was a farm hand and a tenant, his career of success seems almost phenomenal.

A resident of Texas since May, 1884, when he came here from Lee county, Mississippi, John Allen Thompson was born in Marion county, Alabama, December 1, 1866. His grandfather was William Thompson of Marion county, a large slaveholder and farmer along the Tombigbee River. His plantation was the site for an old-time tavern, of which he was the genial landlord in the days before the war. His life was protracted to the great age of ninety-five and he died some fifteen or twenty years ago. In early days he was a Whig, and that continued to be the family politics until after the war.

Alexander Thompson, father of the Corsicana banker, died at Smithville, Mississippi, in 1893, at the age of seventy-five. He was born in Alabama, and received a liberal education for his time, using his training when a young man to teach school. Many of his later years were spent as a farmer or merchant, and he sometimes combined both occupations. During the war he enlisted and served as a private from Marion county in the Confederate army. Alexander Thompson married Elizabeth Allen, a daughter of Rev. Hardy Allen, a Methodist minister who went to Mississippi from Alabama in 1869, and spent the rest of his life there. Mrs. Alexander Thompson now lives at Corsicana with her son and is seventy-eight years of age. Her two children are: William S. Thompson, of Italy, Texas; and John Allen.

John Allen Thompson had only a common school education. Reared on a farm he had no business experience and little knowledge of the outside world until eighteen years of age, when he determined to run away from home in Mississippi and manage his own affairs. Coming to Ellis county, Texas, he hired his services to Jimmie Murphy on the Getzendanner farm. The next year found him in Kaufman county, and his independent career started as a farm tenant near Elmo. There on December 15, 1887, he was married and established himself on a limited scale in the cattle business. After accumulating a little property he came to Navarro county, locating near Rice, and continued as a tenant until his removal to Albany in northwest Texas. The alluring prospects set forth by a land speculator had attracted him to that region, but after one year, characterized by dry weather, and unceasing battle with arid conditions he returned to the black land belt.

At that time was made his first big deal. It was a contract to buy on credit a tract of twelve hundred acres of land, at sixteen dollars an acre. With a sixth of his new purchase under cultivation, Mr. Thompson started with enthusiasm upon a career of farming which marks the positive advance towards independence in his career. Cattle raising was an important factor in his farm operations, he also cultivated many broad acres, and continued to improve with buildings and otherwise until his prosperity was assured, according to the standards of a country neighborhood.

That was only the beginning of his business career, however. Before giving up the management of the farm, Mr. Thompson had added four hundred acres to it, and has always been largely interested in farm lands and agricultural activities in this section of Texas. When he turned his personal supervision to a store which he had acquired in the village of Rice, he exhibited an enterprise and success equal to his farming. Mr. Thompson built and operated a gin in Rice and was a leading spirit in the organization of and became president of the first bank there in 1902. That bank is now called the Planters and Merchants Bank. In 1904 all the interests which he had acquired in Rice, comprising farms, gin, store and bank, were disposed of, and since then his field of operation has been in Corsicana, though his business field has never been limited by any one city.

In 1906 Mr. Thompson organized the First State Bank of Corsicana, with a capital stock of fifty thousand dollars. On its organization the directors elected him president. His banking career in Corsicana has since been marked by several changes. In 1900 he exchanged his interest in the First State Bank for a controlling interest in the Corsicana National Bank, becoming president of the latter concern, in which office he still remains. The capital of the Corsicana National Bank is one hundred thousand dollars, and its surplus is two hundred thousand, while thirty thousand dollars of undivided profits are on hand. Since he took the management of the bank the institution has paid back to the stockholders their original investment and the surplus has been increased by one hundred thousand dollars. His connection with the Corsicana National is only the beginning of a brief summary of the enterprises with which Mr. Thompson is related. He is president of the Corsicana Brick Company; is vice president of the Corsicana Cotton Mill; is a stockholder and director in the Southern Traction Company; stockholder and director in the S. A. Pace Wholesale Grocery Company of Corsicana; owns a controlling interest in the First State Bank of Emhouse, having organized that institution in 1909; is a director of the First State Bank of Rice; president of the First State Bank at Richland; president of the First State Bank of Sweetman; vice president of the First State Bank of Powell. Moreover, he and his family own controlling interest in several of these institutions.

A Democrat, he absorbed his principles from those promulgated by the late James Hogg. In recent years he has served in state conventions at Waco and Austin. His church is the Methodist, and his fraternity is the Masonic, in which he has taken the Royal Arch degrees. Mr. Thompson married Miss Maud Fleetwood, a daughter of H. K. and Emma (Long) Fleetwood. Mr. and Mrs. Fleetwood were both previously married, and each had one child by the first marriage. Mrs. Thompson is one of three children of her parents. Mr. and Mrs. Thompson have the following children: Albarta, wife of J. S. Eubank, cashier of the Corsicana National Bank, and the mother of two children, Jesse Shane Jr. and Mary Albarta; Robert M. is cashier of the First State Bank of Sweetman, Texas, and was educated in the Virginia Military Institute; Roy is a student in the Texas State University; John A. Jr., William and Mary Louise are the three younger children.

WILLIAM J. ZICKEFOOSE. Although he has been a resident of Liberty county for only something over two years, William J. Zickefoose is already known as one of the substantial and progressive agriculturists of his locality, and a citizen in whom trust may be placed to perform his share of the responsibilities of citizenship. He is a native of Greenbriar county, West Virginia, and was born March 11, 1862, a son of Sampson and Nancy (Harrah) Zickefoose.

The grandfather of Mr. Zickefoose was one of three brothers who came to the United States from Germany and settled in Pennsylvania, from whence the grandfather moved to Greenbriar county, West Virginia (then Virginia), and died there at the home of his son Sampson. Among his children were: Joseph, Sampson, Wesley and George. Sampson Zickefoose was a West Virginian by birth, a farmer and stockraiser by occupation, and an honest, industrious man. He did not participate in the Civil war, kept aloof from politics except to vote the Republican ticket, had no active connection with a religious body and belonged to no fraternal order. He died in Coffey county, Kansas, in September, 1890, at the age of seventy-two years. Mr. Zickefoose married Miss Nancy Harrah, daughter of a farmer of Greenbriar county, and she died at Keystone, Oklahoma, having been the mother of the following children: Marshal, of Major county, Oklahoma; Thomas A., of Keystone, Oklahoma; Henry P., of the state of Washington; Andrew, who is engaged in farming at Liberty; Mary, who married Byron Holmes, of Riverside, Kansas; Jennie, the wife of O. P. Freese, of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; Charles M., of Keystone, Oklahoma; William J., of this review; and Lewis, a resident of Seadrift, Texas.

William J. Zickefoose began life as a farmer in Republic county, Kansas. He had left Virginia with his parents as a lad of thirteen years for Ross county, Ohio, where the family spent four years, and his education was secured in a desultory fashion, partly in Virginia, partly in Ohio, and the remainder in Kansas, all in the public schools. When western Kansas was being settled, he went to Ness county and settled a timber claim and was there during the famous and disastrous period of drouth which practically depopulated that section of the Sunflower state. He settled next in Coffey county, Kansas, about the time he married, and subsequently returned to Ness county, and when the "Strip" country of Oklahoma opened, he made the "run" from Cushing, Oklahoma, for a claim. His experience with Oklahoma dated from about the time he made the race for a claim. Although he failed to get located at that time, he was favorably impressed with the Oklahoma country, and accordingly went back home and loaded his effects into two wagons, which he drove into Pawnee county, and on the way there found a claim near the site on which Keystone was subsequently located. He used the logs he found on the place, logs put there by some settler who had taken the land for speculation and had not even filed on the property, and Mr. Zickefoose built a small cabin, a frontier home which housed his family for two years. He remained on the claim, proved it up, and brought practically all of it under cultivation, but left it after fourteen years of residence and moved to Keystone, where he took an active part in the mercantile business. He and a brother had previously opened a store, and he did business as a merchant two years. He handled stock in connection with his other ventures for many years, and when he disposed of his store he purchased an interest in the Keystone State Bank, and a year later was made its cashier; and was associated with it until he came to Texas.

While connected with this institution an incident occurred which will always be remembered by the citizens of Keystone. One Jordan, a resident of that country, located at Cleveland, and a Cherokee planned to rob the Keystone Bank and took into his confidence a white man. The robbery was planned to take place at two o'clock in the afternoon, and Jordan was to hold up the cashier, while his confederate was to guard the outside of the building. The "pal" was on guard, according to agreement, at the appearance of Jordan, but he had divulged the plans to the citizens and all were ready to receive the Cherokee. When he called on the teller of the bank, at four o'clock, to "throw up his hands," the latter dropped to the floor and the sheriff of the county appeared and fired at the robber, but missed, and himself dropped to the floor of the bank, behind the stove. The robber emptied his gun at the hiding place of the sheriff, and backed out of the bank loading his pistol, but when he reached the outside, the watchers poured a hot fire into him, and nineteen bullet-holes were afterward counted in his body, one being from the weapon of his supposed "pal."

Mr. Zickefoose was also in the lumber business at Keystone and sold out when he decided to move to Texas. As a citizen he was deputy sheriff of the county for six years and also held the appointment of quarantine line inspector for three years by appointment of Governor Ferguson and subsequently was made livestock inspector for Oklahoma and held it twelve years, or up to the time he left the state. He came to crave a warmer climate than that offered by Oklahoma and began to search for it and for cheap and fertile lands besides. Accordingly, he made a tour of inspection of Southeastern Texas, and into old Mexico, and across to Houston and vicinity, finally finding the locality of Liberty to provide those elements of which he was in search. He looked over the lands here, but their cheapness at that time made him believe they were worthless, and he decided to wait until summer, when he could look for himself at the growing crops. He visited this section in 1911 and purchased a tract of land in partnership with his brother, Andrew, for ten dollars an acre, and in the following year moved his family here.

Mr. Zickefoose's farm comprises 300 acres under cultivation, and his experience with the country has amply justified his investment and removal here. He handles stock here as a shipper and shipped the first load of stock ever sent out of Liberty, although the town has been here for upwards of three-quarters of a century. He inspired sentiment for shipping pens here and the railroad company put in pens and provided facilities for handling stock, and he has since been sending produce to the Fort Worth markets. He was one of the organizers of the Liberty State Bank and is a director and vice-president thereof.

Mr. Zickefoose was married in Republic county, Kansas, March 29, 1888, to Miss Nellie Rice, a daughter of Jacob and Mary (Walton) Rice. Mr. Rice was a carpenter during all of his vigorous life and died in Republic county, Kansas. He was a native of Pennsylvania and came to the West from Allegheny county. His children to grow to maturity were: Ida, who married James Baker, and resides at Freeport, Illinois; Adella, who married Phillip Tingstrom and resides at Scandia, Kansas; John, who has been lost to the family ever since going to old Mexico; and Mrs. Zickefoose, the youngest, who was born December 29, 1871. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Zickefoose are as follows: Harry, of Speerville, Kansas, operator for the Santa Fe Railway Company; Gertrude, who married Treave Smelser, of Keystone, Oklahoma; Pearl, who married Will Duncan, of Liberty, Texas; and Bertha, Clarence, Willa and Kenneth, all residing at home with their parents. The only association to which Mr. Zickefoose ever belonged was the Anti-Horsethief Association of Oklahoma, an organization extremely necessary to hold animals enough in the country to carry on farming and other industries at that time.

SAMUEL BURK BURNETT. Known in these latter days as dean of Texas cattlemen, Burk Burnett is a notable figure surviving out of the glorious past of Texas cattle history and continuing to exercise an influence undiminished in this modern age of stock farming, wire fences and thoroughbred cattle. Mr. Burnett, whose career began with headquarters in a rough shack on the west Texas prairies, now has a finely equipped office in the First National Bank Building of Fort Worth, and directs his various interests by telephone and telegraph where once his messengers were the old-time Texas cowboys. He is treasurer of the Cassidy-Southwestern Commission Company at Fort Worth, is president of the National Feeders & Breeders Association, is treasurer of the Texas Cattle Raisers Association, president of the Ardmore Oil Milling & Gin Company, of Ardmore, Oklahoma, and has many other connections with financial and business life in the southwest. His career is a valuable document for Texas history, and in the following paragraphs will be traced concisely, showing the principal incidents and steps of progress since he started out as a cow puncher fifty years ago.

Born in Bates county, Missouri, January 1, 1849, on a farm, Samuel Burk Burnett had practically no opportunities in his boyhood for acquiring what is commonly regarded as an education, that is a familiarity with the language arts. As an offset to this he had all the fun and danger incident to frontier life, and the ability to meet the exigencies of such existence was a training quite as important as any he could ever have derived from books and school masters.

From the start he developed self-reliance and physical courage and with these and such schooling as was furnished him, which was in the aggregate not more than one year throughout all his school days, he has won his success in life. In Bates county, Missouri, and in other parts of that state during the years before the Civil war existed some of the most intolerable social conditions to be found in any of the border states. Rufins and jayhawkers kept the entire region of the borders in a reign of terror, and peaceable, industrious and law-abiding citizens were almost in constant peril of not only property, but their lives. Samuel Burk Burnett recalls as one of the most vivid of his early experiences the destruction of his father's home during one of the raids of these outlaws, and shortly after that event he accompanied his father and other members of the family on the long journey through the Indian Territory to Texas, as a country more blessed with that quiet which is so necessary to prosperity and industry. The family located on Denton Creek, and Samuel Burk Burnett still owns the old home which his father founded there more than fifty years ago.

His early years up to his majority were spent on the home place, and during much of the time he was engaged in managing his father's stock. In the meantime the Civil war had begun and had been fought to a conclusion and Mr. Burnett was old enough to appreciate the harshness and the privations of that period. In 1866, he obtained a job at fifty dollars a month with Wiley Robins, in the cattle outfit, and was engaged in driving a bunch of cattle over the Chisholm trails into Kansas and the north. The following year he took seventeen hundred head of cattle owned by his father over the same trail up to the northern market. He was in charge of an outfit of ten men, and at that time was regarded as the youngest man on the trail in charge of a bunch of cattle. While in the Osage country the Indians stampeded their horses, and succeeded in stealing all of them except one pony for each man. In order to save the ponies for emergencies that might arise during the night time, when it was necessary to make a quick mount, the men walked all day leading their ponies, but with all the trouble to contend with, they finally brought the stock safely to the destination, Mr. Burnett sold the cattle, and returned home with the proceeds intact. That was a mission whose accomplishment required nerve and exceptional executive talents. What words of praise the father bestowed upon his son for his success are not known, but he did give the young man an interest in the cattle which had just been marketed and also a share in the cattle still on the range in compensation for his work during and after the Civil war.

This was the start of Mr. Burnett on his career as a cattleman. He soon branched out for himself, and one of his first independent accomplishments was to get married. He married Miss Ruth B. Lloyd, a daughter of Captain M. B. Lloyd, known everywhere through north Texas as an old-time cattleman himself and later as a Fort Worth banker. The three children of their marriage are: Thomas L. Burnett, Francis M. and Annie V. The son Thomas is now stationed on the world-famous ranch 6666 in Wichita county.

After his marriage Mr. Burnett followed the bent of his inclination, and developed his interest in the cattle business, buying the four sixes brand (6666) of cattle, which he held on the range for several years. In 1873 he started with eleven hundred head of cattle for Wichita, Kansas, where he arrived in safety, just in time to receive the full weight of the financial panic, which in that year blighted business all over the country. To employ Mr. Burnett's own language—"There I was, with a bunch of cattle on my hands that I could neither sell nor give away, but my expenses going on just the same, eating off the heads of several steers a day. I saw that that would not do, so I dropped back to the Osage Reservation, and wintered there, trading and operating as best I could, and I finally sold out in the fall of 1874, having a year's age on the cattle. I did very well, and returned home with ten thousand dollars profit from my delay and bad market."

In the winter of 1874 Mr. Burnett bought twenty-three hundred steers on the Nueces and Rio Grande Rivers. This purchase marked an innovation in the range cattle industry. Mr. Burnett was the first man to buy a bunch of all-steer cattle to hold and fatten for the market. He drove them up to the Big Wichita, fifteen miles from Wichita Falls, to the location of the present 6666 Ranch. He had as neighbors in that vicinity such well known cattle men as the Halsells, Waggoners, Curtises and others. All of these were quick to see the advantage and adopt the plan of buying steers and feeding them. At that time the Big Wichita was the frontier, and noted for its Indian raids, although the blow given by General McKenzie in 1874 to the Comanches and Kiowas had done much to bring a safer condition of affairs.

In 1881 occurred the drought that reduced western Texas to the condition of a desert, and the 6666 brand was then taken to the Red River. Later Mr. Burnett obtained a lease and put under fence some three hundred thousand acres of land in the Comanche and Kiowa Reservation in southwestern Oklahoma. Soon after locating on the Big Wichita, Mr. Burnett began improving his stock, substituting Durhams for the old style Longhorn, and later introduced the Hereford strains, until eventually all the stock in his herd was up to a high grade. For more than twenty years now his herds have averaged at the highest standard of market condition, and on all his ranches, he probably has not a sample of the old style Texas steer.

Of his early life on the old 6666 Ranch, Mr. Burnett refers to the hardships, the personal dangers, and the success which finally came and brought him ease and comfort as matters of course incident to the life, and the best of big-hearted westerners, his modesty is one of the strongest traits of his character. During his early residence on the Big Wichita, he had a few neighbors situated at distances of ten or twelve miles and the nearest town was Henrietta. The lumber for his house was hauled from Fort Worth, a distance of one hundred and twenty-five miles and was the first sawed timber ever taken into that country. Some years ago Mr. Burnett, in an interview for publication, gave out the following reminiscences concerning his experience in the Wichita district: "It is surprising to one who was acquainted with its former state to note the splendid change and rapid advance time and civilization have produced in Wichita Falls section. I recollect as distinctly as if it were yesterday, when I drove my first herd of cattle to that territory. My journey terminated in the vicinity of the present location of Wichita Falls. It would be hard to imagine a lonelier or more desolate region than that which I encountered in that locality many years ago. At that time it was nothing more than a boundless stretch of plain and forest, given over entirely to the roving redskins, and scarcely less wild buffaloes. Why, at one time the buffaloes became so numerous and threatened me with so much injury to my cattle that I actually had a Mexican employe of mine to follow me around with a large seamless sack filled with cartridges in order to facilitate the more rapid slaughter of these animals. On this occasion we killed over three hundred buffaloes before we succeeded in driving them from our herd. You could then buy land throughout the section for twenty-five cents per acre, and the whole space of ground to be covered by the flourishing little city of Wichita Falls could be had for a mere nothing. You can very easily form some idea as to the advance of land in that neighborhood, when I tell you that the Fort Worth & Denver City Railroad actually crosses what was formerly my front yard, running between my well and cabin."

Since those early experiences, and as already noted, Mr. Burnett has more and more modernized his transactions, until at the present time he sits behind the desk in a finely equipped office, and like a general plans and supervises from the big cattle city of Texas his many varied enterprises. He is a director in several banks. He is the largest stockholder in the First National Bank of Fort Worth, also a director therein; and now (1914) thirty-eight years since it was organized, the only survivor among the original stockholders. He is the sole owner of three hundred and sixty thousand acres of land located in Wichita, Carson and King counties. He also has lands in Mexico. Seven years ago he bought the famous Dixon Creek Ranch of one hundred and seven thousand acres, and now has it stocked with high grade cattle and horses. Mr. Burnett is one of the largest breeders of fine Hereford stock in Texas, and has a number of prize winners. He also owns much stock in oil mills throughout Texas and Oklahoma. Mr. Burnett was one of the organizers of the Texas Cattle Raisers Association, and since its inception has been a member of the executive committee, the only man to have served on this committee from the beginning to the present time and is one of the vice presidents. Both for what he has accomplished and for what he is, Samuel Burk Burnett is one of the strong and most notable figures of modern Texas industrialism.

ALFRED WOHLLEB. One of the thriving business industries of Cameron, which, having its inception in a modest venture, has enjoyed a steady and consistent growth until it is now a prosperous enterprise, is the delicatessen and restaurant of Alfred Wohlleb. The proprietor, a man of business ability and good judgment, has been located at Cameron since 1897, and at all times has displayed his willingness to promote the general welfare in every possible way. Mr. Wohlleb was born in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, August 28, 1868, and is a son of Seraphine and Augusta (Jeckel) Wohlleb.

Seraphine Wohlleb was born at Baden, Germany, in 1840, and as a young man came to the United States. He became a gin man and farmer, and was also engaged in working at the trade of blacksmith, and during the Civil war served valiantly as a soldier in the Union army.

When he received his honorable discharge he returned to his home at Cincinnati, Ohio, and in 1869 came to Texas, first settling in Austin county, and in 1883 coming to Milam county, where his death occurred in 1914. He was an industrious and energetic business man and a sterling citizen, and enjoyed the respect and esteem of those who knew him. Mrs. Wohlleb was born in Germany, about 1844, and was a child of seven years when brought to the United States by her parents. She passed away in 1909, having been the mother of seven children, of whom four are living: Alfred, Josephine, Augusta and Clem.

Alfred Wohlleb was an infant when brought to Austin county, Texas, and there he attended the public schools until fourteen years of age. He was reared on his father's farm and also worked in the gin business until 1897, when he came to Cameron and established himself in the delicatessen business, also opening a restaurant for light meals, and in both ventures has since met with decided success. At this time he is a stockholder in the Texas Fidelity and Bonding Company and the National Insurance and Trust Company of Waco, and in addition to his comfortable residence and modern place of business owns a one-fourth interest in 234 acres of improved farming land in Milam county. Aside from his business, he has engaged in farming and the gin business, and as in his other enterprises has secured success from his well-directed efforts.

Mr. Wohlleb was married January 8, 1895, in Milam county, to Miss Wilhelmina Falkenberger, who was born in Germany and came to the United States in 1891. They have been the parents of nine children, of whom six survive: August, Alfred, Jr., Rudolph, Anne, Minnie and Walter. Mr. Wohlleb is a popular member of the Sons of Herman. He is independent in his political views, voting rather for the man than the party, and with his family attends the Catholic church.

CAPTAIN CICERO SMITH. While the activities of the late Captain Cicero Smith were long identified with the varied practical affairs of a number of North and East Texas communities, it was with a peculiar sense of bereavement that the city of Mineral Wells regarded his death on February 2, 1914. For fourteen years that city had been his home, though his business interests were widely distributed, and it was an expression of the common sorrow of the city that with his passing went one who had ever been a builder and exponent of progress and enlightenment.

His career shows him to have been a remarkable man, successful in business, loyal in his patriotic impulses, and with the even balance of powers which make character as important as practical achievements. Cicero Smith was born April 27, 1845, at Lafayette, Walker county, Georgia, and was sixty-nine at the time of his death. His parents were Jesse T. and Nancy E. (Kight) Smith, who moved to Texas in 1871, settling in Cass county, where the father died in 1876.

Reared as a farm boy, at the age of sixteen, after only a meager education, he went from home to enter the Confederate army, being at the time of frail physique and weighing only ninety pounds. Entering the Second Georgia Battalion, and transferred to the Fourth Georgia Cavalry in 1862, he was taken prisoner near Nashville October 12, 1862, made his escape in twenty-nine days, was present at Chickamauga, and in the Atlanta campaign from Dalton until the fall of that city, after which he was with General Joe Wheeler's cavalry on its raid and continued on duty in Tennessee and North Georgia until the close of hostilities.

Soon after the war, in 1866, when twenty-one, Captain Smith came to Texas to win his fortunes. The first six years were spent as a farmer in Panola county, and his activities were then transferred to Cass county and to the field in which he made his chief success—lumbering. In 1883 he established a mill at Queen City, and later, to get the benefit of railroad transportation, moved his headquarters to Forest Home, and in 1886 to Logansport, Louisiana. Two years later the old town of Teneha in Shelby county, in the long-leaf pine district, became the seat of his principal mill, and after three years he built a mill at Boren in Panola county. Along with the manufacture of lumber, Mr. Smith developed an extensive wholesale and retail business, and was the founder and for many years president of the Cicero Smith Lumber Company, with yards in a number of North and West Texas towns and also in Oklahoma. About nine years before his death he retired from the manufacturing field.

On taking up his residence in Mineral Wells in 1900, Mr. Smith founded the First National Bank, and besides serving as president of that institution was also president of the Graham National Bank, vice president of the Western National Bank at Fort Worth, and owned extensive interests in lumbering and mining properties. His resources of capital and enterprise were employed along purely commercial lines in such a way as to constitute a lasting benefit to the city where he spent his declining years, and especially to promote its welfare as a resort. One example of his efforts in this direction was his help in giving Mineral Wells its fine city water works.

Captain Smith has been a devout member of the Baptist church since 1867, and church and practical religion gave to him a means of expression for the fine benevolence and sympathy which were among his most prominent characteristics. In time everyone came to know and esteem him for his generosity, but his philanthropies were always performed with the utmost freedom from ostentation. He possessed the true nobility of simplicity. His sympathy and genuine fellow feeling for the less fortunate found illustration at Mineral Wells, where he not only supported from his private means a small Baptist church whose members could not keep it going, but he also attended that church regularly in preference to the more pretentious religious homes of that city. Many widows and orphans know through him the real meaning of charity, and at Christmas time in particular he opened his heart and purse for the benefit of all within the scope of his acquaintance. He was a most loving and devoted father, and bestowed upon his children all that wealth and affection could give them. In his later years his widow's sister, Mrs. Nora Lawson, kept house for him. He is survived by the following children: J. W. Smith, Mrs. E. A. Davis, Mrs. L. E. Patterson, Sidney Smith, Julius Smith, Cicero Smith, Jr., Esther and Susie Smith.

Of this family the only one now engaged in lumber manufacturing is Sidney Smith, of Fort Worth. Though comparatively a young man, he has long been active in this field, having started to assist his father when ten years old, and since then has known every phase of both the manufacturing and distributing departments of the industry. He was born in Panola county, went with the family to Cass county, later at Logansport, Louisiana, then in Shelby county, and finally returned to Panola county, where Sidney Smith now has a large mill and is one of the chief operators in the lumber woods of that district. His business office and residence are at Fort Worth, which has been his home since 1905, and he operates under the title Sidney Smith, Lumber.

BALLARD M. BURGER. One of the prominent and wealthy business men of Dallas is Ballard M. Burger, postmaster of the city, and among the most popular and highly esteemed men of the community. He is a native son of Texas, born in Lamar county, on September 22, 1859, and his parents were Col. Young and Mary A. (Bell) Burger. The parents were among the early pioneers of the state, and something in detail concerning them and their lives is not out of keeping with the spirit and purpose of this brief biographical review. Here follows an outline of their lives.

Col. Young Burgher came first to Texas in the days when it was yet a Republic, the year 1840 or 1841 marking his advent into the country. He settled in what is now Lamar county, near what is today the flourishing city of Paris, but in that day not a house or building of any sort graced the plain. He was a native son of Kentucky, but went to Tennessee in his youth and came thence to Texas in the year mentioned, stopping on his way to Texas in Arkansas and there spending one year in farming activities. He eventually brought up in Texas, and here he settled down to general farming and ranching in the region of what is now Paris. He was thus occupied for a good many years, and when the trouble between the North and the South materialized, he was given a Colonel's commission in the Confederate army, serving through the war with especial gallantry. He later saw much service as an Indian fighter on the Texas frontier, and he was distinguished in this service as a daring soldier and most efficient officer. In 1876 Col. Burgher removed with his family from the Lamar county region to Fannin county, locating at Honey Grove for the purpose of affording his children certain educational advantages and facilities that were not available in their former abode. He continued to reside at Honey Grove with his family until his death, which occurred in January, 1913.

Col. Burgher was a well-known and prominent character in North and Northeast Texas, and enjoyed the esteem and friendship of many of the prominent citizens of that section of the State, both in private and public life. Among these might be mentioned his personal and especial friend, Senator David Culberson, father of the present Senator Charles A. Culberson.

The wife of Colonel Burgher was Mary A. Bell, as has already been noted, and she was born and reared in Alabama, coming to Texas with her father in the year 1837. The family settled in Cherokee county, and some years later she married Mr. Burgher in Lamar county.

Ballard M. Burgher was reared on the Lamar county farm up to the time of the family removal to Honey Grove, and in the latter place he attended the well-known and popular private school of Professors Parks and Kendall. Later, when Prof. I. W. Clark took charge of the school, he enjoyed the instruction of that capable and worthy gentleman. Until 1890 Mr. Burgher continued to live in Honey Grove, at which time he removed to Dallas, and has here since resided. No sooner did he locate here than he began to manifest a lively interest in the business activities of the city, his first business venture being the establishing of a general insurance agency, to which he later added a real estate department. For several years this successful and enterprising concern has been conducted under the firm name of B. M. Burgher & Company, Real Estate, Loans and Insurance, with location at 111 Martin Street. Mr. Burgher through his efficiency as a financier and business man has accumulated a comfortable fortune since coming to Dallas, and he is rightfully numbered among the city's most substantial citizens. He is president of the Continental Savings & Loan Company and vice president of the Metropolitan Street Railway Company, two representative financial and industrial institutions of the city.

In addition to his numerous business activities and interests, Mr. Burgher was, through the recommendation of Senator Charles A. Culberson, appointed by President Wilson to the office of postmaster of Dallas, taking charge of the office on May 24, 1913. He was the first postmaster to be appointed in Texas, among the larger offices, under the Wilson administration. This honor came to Mr. Burgher as a total surprise, being wholly unsolicited on his part, and though he entered upon his duties without any preparation for the high office, he has proven himself in every emergency equal to the task and has thus far shown himself to be a capable and efficient officer. During the next three years the finest and largest postoffice building in Texas will be erected in Dallas, and it is Mr. Burgher's worthy aim and ambition to render every service within his power to further the interests of the city during his regime as postmaster. Dallas today has by far the largest postoffice business in the state, and Mr. Burgher is admitted by all to be directing its affairs with a skill and efficiency that has never been equaled in the administration of the office, and which has characterized his own private business affairs, with so satisfactory and pleasing results.

Mr. Burgher is a prominent Mason, with York Rite, Shriner and Scottish Rite affiliations. He is a member of the Oak Lawn Methodist Episcopal Church South, and in that connection it should be said that he is chairman of the Board of Trustees and of the Building Committee, as well as serving as superintendent of the Sunday School.

In Honey Grove Mr. Burgher was united in marriage with Miss Jessie Williams, who was born in Mississippi, and they have six children: Bird is the wife of W. W. Fisher, and the others are Ballard Y., Walter L., Cedric E., Robert S. and Laura H. Burgher.

ROBERT S. WILEY. Since 1908 Mr. Wiley has held the office of county assessor of Milam county, and his administration has been marked by scrupulous fidelity and by an efficiency that has gained to him unqualified popular commendation in his native county, of whose official activities he is a most able representative and he is one of the loyal and appreciative citizens of Cameron, the judicial center of the county.

Mr. Wiley was born on the San Saba river, in Milam county, Texas, and the date of his nativity was May 19, 1865, showing that he is a representative of a pioneer family of this favored section of the state. His father, Dr. Robert S. Wiley, an able physician and surgeon, was one of the first settlers of Milam county and was examining surgeon in the Confederate service during the period of the Civil war. He was killed by accident, in 1868, when the subject of this sketch was but three years of age. His wife, whose maiden name was Louise M. Kellough, was born in Washington county, Texas, in 1843, a member of a sterling pioneer family of the Lone Star State. After the death of her first husband Dr. Wiley, she became the wife of William Young, and she still resides in Milam county, her second husband, who was a carpenter and builder by vocation, having died in the late '80s. The children of the first union are Lynn, Sallie, Robert S. and Belle. By the second marriage Mrs. (Wiley) Young became the mother of eight children—Lane, Arthur, Minnie, Wallace, John, Fannie, Sharp and Vess.

He whose name introduces this sketch attended the schools of Milam county until he had attained to the age of sixteen years, and for the ensuing five years he was variously employed, turning his attention to whatever line of work that offered. He then engaged in farming on land which he inherited from his father's estate, and his place comprised forty-eight acres when he thus initiated operations in an independent way. He continued his active identification with agricultural pursuits and with the buying and selling of farm lands until his election to the office of county assessor, in 1908, when he removed to Cameron, the county seat, where by successive re-elections, he has since continued the incumbent of this office, in which he is a recognized authority as to land values in his native county. He still owns a one-half interest in 160 acres of well improved land in Milam county, and his property in Cameron includes his attractive residence. He served ten years as a member of the school board, is a stalwart supporter of the cause of the Democratic party, is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Woodmen of the World, and both he and his wife hold membership in the Christian church at Cameron.

On the 6th of August, 1891, Mr. Wiley wedded Miss Mattie Davidson, of San Gabriel, Milam county, and they have nine children: Edna, Ruth, Billie, K. G., Terry, Bessie, Kenneth, Gordon J. and Ralph. Miss Edna is giving special attention to the study of domestic science, and will devote her attention to teaching the same in 1915, after the completion of her own course in this important and interesting domain. The family home is known for its hospitality and good cheer and is a favored resort for a host of friends whom Mr. Wiley, his wife, and their children have gathered about them.

AMBERRY KNIGHT DOSS. When Amberry Knight Doss was admitted to the bar in June, 1903, he began the practice of his profession in Greenville, Texas, where he continued up to 1908, in that year coming to Runnels county where he has continued up to the present time in active practice, with headquarters in Ballinger. Here he has made a name for himself in professional circles and is recognized as one of the prosperous young attorneys of the county.

Mr. Doss was born in Nolanville, Tennessee, on February 19, 1872, and is the son of Rev. William Knight and Bell (Porter) Doss, both natives of Tennessee. The father has long served in the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and for thirty-five years belonged to the Tennessee conference of that church, prior to his coming to Texas in 1910. He first located in Cisco, Texas, soon after coming to Ballinger as pastor of the local Methodist Episcopal church, in which he is now serving. The mother, too, is living, and they have four living children, Amberry Knight Doss being the eldest of the four.

The early education of Mr. Doss was gained in the public schools of Tennessee, and he later attended Harvard Institute, at Mount Pleasant, Tennessee. He finished his studies at Vanderbilt University, there prosecuting his law course, and after his graduation in 1902 he came to Texas, locating in Greenville and furthering his law studies with R. L. Porter, and being admitted to the bar in the following year. In Greenville he continued his practice until 1908, and then came to Ballinger, where he has since carried on his professional work. In addition to his private practice he has taken a worthy part in public affairs, and served as city attorney from 1909 to 1913. A Democrat, he has given service in the party ranks and served as Chairman of the County Democratic Convention in the last presidential election, and was county delegate to the State Convention at Houston.

Mr. Doss is fraternally identified by his membership in the Knights of Pythias, in which he has held the office of chancellor commander, and he is a member of the Ballinger Club. He has long been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and is one of the stewards of the Ballinger church of that denomination.

On November 7, 1911, Mr. Doss was married to Miss Emily Jane Yeary, a daughter of James K. P. Yeary, and his wife, Nancy (Birkley) Yeary, both native Texans. The father of Mrs. Doss was a Confederate veteran, having served in many hard fought battles of the long civil conflict, passing through the entire course of the war and being several times wounded in action. He also served for some time as a Texas ranger, and is now engaged in ranching activities, in Tom Greene county, this state. The mother also is living.

Mr. and Mrs. Doss have one daughter, who was born on August 26, 1912.

ST. XAVIER'S ACADEMY. This institution was established in Genesee by the Sisters of St. Mary at practically the beginning of that city's existence, and only a short time after the first railway train had furnished an excuse for the building of a town at that point in North Texas. The sisters began their work on Gandy Street in 1872, and from the beginning were almost constantly cramped for quarters, owing to the rapid development of the city and the increasing number of pupils.

Accordingly in 1900 work on the present handsome academy building was begun and the structure was completed in 1901. It is an attractive three-story brick building surrounded with spacious grounds, and furnishes all the facilities necessary for instruction for living and for recreation, including class rooms, music rooms, auditorium, dormitory, recreation and dining halls, etc. St. Xavier's Academy is a high grade institution of education, conducted by the cultured and devout Sisters of St. Mary, and is an institution of which Denison is particularly proud, and is one of the best known schools of North Texas.

J. ROLL JOHNSON. Dallas city and county has special reason to honor J. Roll Johnson for his public spirited services in the office of sheriff. It is a familiar judgment that Mr. Johnson was the best sheriff Dallas county ever had, and is a widely known and greatly esteemed citizen. A member of a pioneer family in Dallas county, his early youth was spent in the exciting scenes and activities of war times, and a career as a farmer and stock man long ago brought him the substantial rewards of material success.

J. Roll Johnson was born in Georgetown, Scott County, Indiana, in 1848, a son of H. F. C. and Sidney (Brown) Johnson. His father, a native of Kentucky, lived in Indiana and subsequently at Mount Sterling in Brown county, Illinois, where his wife died and was buried. In 1858 the father brought his six children to Dallas county, locating two miles north of Lancaster in the southern part of the county, and there engaged in farming and stock raising. He was noted as a successful business manager and for that day and age was a man of large resources. Before the war his ranch house was surrounded by a number of slave quarters and he was typical of that substantial agricultural class which early settled Dallas county. Among many interesting facts that might be recorded of this pioneer resident, it is especially noteworthy that he brought the first thoroughbred horse to Dallas county—Gray Eagle, sired by Grigsby's Gray Eagle, who in turn was sired by the original Gray Eagle, one of the famous race horses that appeared on the New Orleans track in antebellum days. Mr. Johnson's Gray Eagle was exhibited at the first fair ever held in Dallas, in 1859, on ground located about where the residence of Colonel C. C. Slaughter now stands on Worth street. Gray Eagle was purchased by Mr. Johnson from a Mr. Grigsby, through a leather merchant at Galena, Illinois, and a few years later that quiet and somewhat obscure merchant had risen to foremost distinction as General U. S. Grant. After settling in Dallas county H. F. C. Johnson established an ox-cart trading business out of Lancaster. One of the most notable trips made in this connection was participated in by J. Roll Johnson, then sixteen years of age, and his older brother, J. Will Johnson, now of Henrietta, Texas. With a wagon train of six wagons and thirty-six yoke of cattle, and a number of negro slaves as helpers, they took a cargo of cotton bought in the Brazos valley all the way to the city of Mexico, where the cotton was sold for the remarkable price of $1.25 per pound. The train came back loaded with coffee and other supplies, and a large sum of money in gold. War time prices then prevailed all over the South, and as coffee was an extreme luxury it sold for a $1.50 per pound. The Maximilian invasion was then in progress in Mexico, and the two boys witnessed some thrilling scenes incident to that historic affair. H. F. C. Johnson died at Lancaster in August, 1865. Throughout the war he had served in the Confederate army rendering duty as first lieutenant in Captain Guy's Company, Stone's Regiment, Sull Ross' Brigade, first in Louisiana, Arkansas and Missouri, and later in Tennessee and Mississippi. Among the important engagements participated in by him were the battles of Corinth, Tupelo, Holly Springs and Pea Ridge. He was in every way a fine sample of a hardy pioneer and rugged business man of the early days, and his experiences before coming to Texas included a trip during the early '50s to the gold fields of California.

George W. Barrett on

The environment and some of the incidents in the life of J. Roll Johnson have already been indicated. Besides his work as a freighter, he early engaged in farming and stock raising, and his material prosperity has been built up on that basis. A successful man of affairs, he owns several extensive and fertile farms in Dallas county and much valuable city property in Dallas. For many years his home was in Lancaster and vicinity, but latterly he has been a resident of Dallas. His first election to the office of sheriff of Dallas county came in 1900, and was followed by re-election in 1902, but after two full terms he refused to become a candidate. In July, 1914, Mr. Johnson purchased and removed to an elegant home on Junius Heights, at the corner of Ridgeway and Viator streets, one of the choicest residence sections of Dallas.

Mr. Johnson has been married twice. His first wife was Miss Sallie Ritchey of Dallas county, daughter of J. L. Ritchey, who in his time was one of the most distinguished journalists of the South, and for a number of years editor of the old Dallas Herald and a colonel on Gen. James S. Rain's staff, Confederate army. The four children living from the first marriage are: Mrs. Sidney Owens, Mrs. Edna White, Mrs. Sallie C. Fair and Mrs. Winnie Davis Ayers. After the death of his first wife Mr. Johnson married Miss Alice Robey of Bosque county. There are five children by this union: F. Roll Johnson, Jr., James Robey Johnson, H. Frank C. Johnson, Robert E. L. Johnson, and Miss Genevieve Johnson.

T. C. POWERS. The residence in Mineral Wells of T. C. Powers covers a period of more than sixty years, during which time he has been a witness to and a participant in the wonderful changes which have transformed Palo Pinto county from a wide wilderness into a center of commercial, industrial and educational activity. Mr. Powers' career has been crowded by experiences of varied nature, and he is today one of the few surviving pioneers of what was at one time one of the most lawless sections of the Lone Star state. He was born in Bowling Green, Kentucky, November 1, 1841, and is a son of Richard Y. and Martha Ann (Clark) Powers. His father was of Irish-Indian stock, belonging to the family which traced its ancestry back to Pocahontas and John Rolfe, and served as a soldier in three wars, the Mexican, the Florida and the Black Hawk, and in each of these served as captain of a company. Prior to the war between the North and the South he was a slaveholder, but, on deciding to come to Texas, traded his slaves for cattle and brought the latter to Palo Pinto county. Here he engaged extensively in the cattle business, with which he continued to be successfully identified until his death in 1860. The mother died about the year 1883. There were two sons and two daughters in their family, T. C. being the third in order of birth.

The educational advantages of T. C. Powers were, to say the least, decidedly limited in his youth, as he never saw a schoolhouse or a church until he was a grown man. After his first marriage, he was taught to read, spell and write by his wife, and since that time broad experience, keen observation and close study have given him a wide fund of information on various subjects, and he may be termed a well-informed man. His first business venture was in dealing in cattle, and with this line he was associated for more than forty years in Palo Pinto county and those counties adjoining. At this time he is the senior of any man in Palo Pinto county by seven years. On his arrival here the country was bare and wild, there being but one house between Mineral Wells and Fort Worth. Buffalo were to be found in vast numbers, and Mr. Powers was a witness to the awful slaughter which practically wiped the great herds of this noble beast from the plains, by men who killed the animals only for the returns their hides would bring. Deers, bears, panthers, wolves and wild turkeys abounded, and the hostile Indian tribes were a constant menace to the whites. For seven years Mr. Powers was in the cattle business running from Texas to Kansas and the territory of Colorado, and during the great Indian raids of 1858 he bore a conspicuous part. These raids continued throughout the next twelve years, during which periods the Indians killed and scalped the whites and drove off large herds of cattle and horses. At one time about 16,000 head of cattle were recovered that had been captured in New Mexico, and in a number of battles which occurred in recapturing this stock the Mexicans sided with the Indians, but after the killing of a large number of Mexicans and Indians, as well as of five white men, the cattle and horses were safely returned to Texas and given back to their owners. During the war between the South and the North, Mr. Powers was a ranger under the noted Oliver Laing, and while acting in this capacity delivered large numbers of cattle to the Confederate army.

Mr. Powers has always been a staunch Democrat, working faithfully for the good of his party and doing much to advance the interests of its policies and candidates, although he has never sought office on his own account. He attended the election in 1857, the first in Palo Pinto county, held at John Hittson's home, under a large oak tree, at which there were but sixteen votes cast. He has been interested in fraternal work to some extent and enjoys membership in the Improved Order of Red Men, in which he is very popular. His religious faith is that of the Holiness church.

On January 12, 1871, Mr. Powers was married first to Miss Linie Shurley, a daughter of Zebadiah and Malinda Shurley, farming people of Parker county, Texas. Mrs. Powers died in 1902, and two years later Mr. Powers was married to Mrs. Jennie Williams, of Mineral Wells. In 1912 the second Mrs. Powers passed away, and Mr. Powers was then married to Mrs. M. E. Graham, of Mineral Wells. Mr. Powers has had four children: Miss May Cornelia, aged thirty-nine years; Joseph, born in 1874, who is the owner of an extensive ranch in Montana; Kate, who married A. Lancaster and lives at Weatherford, Texas; and Reta, who married William Turner, in the printing business at Weatherford.

It is given to but few men to take part in the wonderful growth and development of a section such as Mineral Wells has experienced during his residence here. In 1857 the city could boast of no houses or improvements; today it has handsome residences, substantial business buildings, churches and schools, and with a population of 8,000 souls is still growing in wealth. As the head of the flourishing enterprise operating under the style of the Central Market, Mr. Powers occupies an important and influential position in the business life of the city; as a public-spirited citizen, he has gained and retained the respect of all with whom he has come in contact.

ROBERT E. LEE YATER, M. D. Of a family that has been identified with Johnson county for the past forty years, Dr. Yater began the practice of his profession eight years ago, and is one of the most capable physicians and surgeons of Johnson county.

Robert E. Lee Yater was born in Tennessee, on Christmas Day of 1874. His father, William Yater, was born in Christian county, Kentucky, in 1826, was a farmer by occupation, and coming to Texas in 1878 continued his career of activity here until his death in 1892. The mother was Fannie B. Mills, who was born in Todd county, Kentucky, in 1834, and died in 1908. They had a large family of thirteen children, named as follows: Charles M., Alexander N., Wilkinson H., William M., John M., Tabbie B., Nannie, Robert L., Joel, T. Fanning, Kana M., Jimmie, Peter. Charles married May W. Burke, who died in 1892, and he then married Rosetta Abny, and he is the father of four children and practices medicine at Roswell, New Mexico. Alexander N. is deceased, as are also William M. and Joel. Wilkinson H. is a carpenter, and unmarried and living at Rio Vista, Texas. John M. married Etta Hooker, has twelve children, and is a farmer living at Hugo, Oklahoma. Tabbie B. married Dr. L. A. Colquitt, lives at Rio Vista, and is the mother of five children. Nannie married J. D. Taut, a minister, and their home is at Alamogordo, New Mexico, and they have six children. T. Fanning married Carza Nicholas, a physician of Rio Vista, and has one child. Kana M. is the wife of A. B. Gebhard, of Waco. Jimmie is the wife of W. R. Walker, a railroad man of Palestine, and they have two children.

Robert E. Lee Yater grew up in Johnson county, which has been his home since he was four years of age, attended the high school at Cleburne until he was eighteen and then had an interim of business experience, five years in a store at Cleburne. For his medical studies, he entered Baylor University, spent four years there and was graduated M. D. in 1906. His first three years of practice were passed at Cleburne, and he was then called to Dallas to take a chair of instruction at Baylor University Medical Department, where he remained for one year. Returning to Cleburne, he has since enjoyed a very successful practice as a physician and surgeon and has proved to be a man who gets the best possible results from all his efforts. Dr. Yater is a member of the Johnson County Medical Society, the State Medical Society, the Tri State Medical Association, the American Medical Association, the American Surgical Association, the North Texas and the Central Texas Medical Society. Dr. Yater is essentially a student, enjoys nothing more than research and laboratory work, and so far as the demands of his large practice allow, devotes much of his energy and time to his studies. He is a member and a deacon in the Christian church, and has fraternal affiliations with the Woodmen of the World. Dr. Yater owns his comfortable home at Cleburne, and on March 31, 1897, married Lottie Gebhard, a daughter of L. H. Gebhard of Grand View, Texas. They have one child, Minnie Lee.

WILLIAM CYRUS DAY. With a worthy career which had a notable beginning when a boy of seventeen as a freighter across the great western plains to Colorado, with several years of experience as a teacher in his native state of Illinois and elsewhere, for forty years a resident of Texas, engaged in teaching, merchandising, farming, and prominent in the public affairs of the different localities where he lived, and still later gaining prominence in the service of the state, particularly as superintendent of public buildings and grounds, Hon. William C. Day in 1913 became superintendent of the State Fish Hatchery at Dallas.

The State Fish Hatchery at Dallas is the product of the practical work of Mr. Day in co-operation with his chief, Colonel William G. Sterett, the fish, game and oyster commissioner of Texas. For several years it has been the dream of Colonel Sterett to establish a state preserve for the propagation of fish in order to stock the depleted waters of Texas streams. In 1913 when Mr. Day became superintendent of the new enterprise, a site of twenty acres was donated by the City of Dallas to the State of Texas and the construction of reservoirs and the other equipment was begun with money derived from the sale of sand and shell on the coast. Thirty-five thousand dollars has already (1914) been expended by the Commissioner. By 1914 the twenty-acre site had been transformed by the construction of a concrete reservoir, fourteen large ponds for fish, a shell road about the grounds, the planting of numerous shade trees, and the construction of a pump house and the other buildings, including the superintendent's bungalow and office. Already the fish ponds are filled with thousands of young fish of different kinds native to Texas waters, and in a short time the work will begin of transplanting from the fish hatchery to the waters where they are most needed.

William Cyrus Day was born in 1849 near Wyanett in Bureau county, Illinois, a son of John M. and Ellen (Beach) Day. His father, whose ancestors were New Jersey people, was a native of Indiana and a pioneer settler in Bureau county, Illinois. He hauled lumber from Chicago to build the first school house in that county, which was located on his farm near the town of Wyanett. Ellen (Beach) Day was a daughter of Cyrus W. Beach of New York state, who was a cousin of Cyrus W. Field.

William Cyrus Day, who was reared on a Bureau county farm, attended the district schools and during the war was a student in the public schools of St. Louis, where some relatives lived. A zest for adventure and for original work has always been characteristic of Mr. Day, and this was exemplified first at the age of seventeen, when, in 1866, he went out as a helper with a freighting train of ox wagons that journey from Illinois to Denver and Pike's Peak, in the period following the discovery of gold on the Peak. The train consisted of twenty-six wagons, with six yoke of cattle to each wagon, and a total of nearly four hundred head of oxen were taken along to supply fresh teams. Young Day walked almost the entire distance from the Middle West to the mountains, since the duties of driving made it necessary to walk alongside the teams the greater part of the way. The journey to Pike's Peak consumed sixty days, each wagon had sixty-five hundred pounds of freight, and the owners of the outfit received one hundred and forty dollars per ton for hauling it. The route was over the old Platte trail through Nebraska and along the south fork of that river to Denver. Much of the way led through hostile country, and there were several skirmishes with the Indians. The outfit was organized as a military camp, under command of a captain, and with arms furnished by the government, strict military discipline was maintained from the time they left the Missouri river until they reached their destination. Mr. Day returned east in December, 1867, accompanied by his brother, E. M. Day, who had gone out to Colorado before him. A portion of the journey to Omaha was made by train over the Union Pacific railroad, then under construction to the coast. From Omaha they returned to Bureau county by means of a new railroad only recently completed between Chicago and Council Bluffs. After this experience in the west Mr. Day taught school in Bureau county, also in Guthrie county, Iowa, and in Macon county, Missouri. Mr. Day was in Chicago at the time of the great fire of 1871.

Mr. Day on January 27, 1873, arrived in Freestone county and has been a resident of Texas ever since. The journey was made by way of Mobile, thence to New Orleans by steamer, and from New Orleans to Galveston on the famous old Morgan boat Josephine, which brought many other Texas pioneers. From the coast he journeyed as far as Mexia on the Houston & Texas Central railroad, which reached the city of Dallas in July, 1872. The experience and ability acquired as a teacher in the north gave him a regular vocation for five years in Freestone county, and he was made a member of the board of examiners for the county. In 1874 he taught a school in the neighborhood known as Brewer Prairie in Freestone county, at the site of the present thriving town of Teague. During his residence in Freestone county he was also elected and served as county surveyor and as county treasurer. From Freestone county he moved to Mexia, and for a time was a successful real estate dealer there. On leaving Mexia, Mr. Day went into northwest Texas, locating in the new country about Wichita Falls, and was engaged in farming and also established a store. This store was made the postoffice under the name Day and that name was also given to the railroad station. Day is six miles from Electra, which is now the center of the great gas fields of northwest Texas.

From Wichita county Mr. Day moved to Sunset in Montague county, and during his residence there served five years as county commissioner, justice of the peace and held one or two other minor offices, and also took up the study of law and was admitted to the bar in 1895. His active connections with practical affairs have kept him out of practice except for a short time.

After leaving Montague county Mr. Day was elected for more important duties under the state government. Going to Austin during the last year of Governor Culbertson's administration, he was employed in the work of making delinquent tax records for about forty counties in the state, with a force of ten or twelve men under him. These duties ended, Mr. Day was for a time a Hays county farmer, and in that as in other counties where he had lived was honored with public office, being a county commissioner. Upon the election of Thomas M. Campbell as governor in 1906, the governor appointed Mr. Day to the position of superintendent of public buildings and grounds, an office he filled during the four years of that administration. His services were marked by much practical accomplishment outside the usual routine of his official duties, and were such as to receive the highest commendation of state officials. It was Mr. Day who carried out the work of beautifying and making a public state park of the famous San Jacinto battle ground, a place which up to that time had been entirely neglected. Under direction of the state authorities he superintended the erection of the monument to General San Houston at the latter's burial place in Huntsville. The state capitol and grounds at Austin were also made more attractive by his work, and among other things he placed on the grounds several old cannon used by Texans in the wars, and some other relics of historic interest.

After the election of Governor Colquitt, Mr. Day became deputy fish and oyster commissioner under Colonel William G. Sterett, and in 1913, Colonel Sterett appointed him to his present position as superintendent of the State Fish Hatchery at Dallas.

Mr. Day has been three times married. His first wife was Miss Agnes Loader of Freestone county, and she left one son, William C. Day, Jr. The second marriage was with Miss Annie Adams, also of Freestone county, and at her death was left a son, J. A. Day. The present Mrs. Day was before her marriage Miss Lulu Gerald, who was born in Louisiana, but reared in Texas. They are the parents of six children: Mrs. Nellie Hamilton, Guy M. Day, S. C. Day, Walter S. Day, Julia Day, and Lulu Alice Day.

ARTHUR B. PURINTON. It is as a civil engineer and architect that Mr. Purinton has made his impress as a business and professional man in Texas, and at the age of twenty-eight he may be said to have only begun a career which for successful accomplishment has already measured up to a standard which would dignify a life much longer than his has been.

Arthur B. Purinton was born at Henrietta, Clay county, Texas, February 6, 1887. His father, William W. Purinton, who died in 1904, was a somewhat distinguished man in North Texas, and a pioneer land owner and developer in that section. He was born at Vassalborough, Maine, in 1834, during the war served in the Fifty-fourth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and later as major of the Eighteenth Volunteer Illinois Cavalry, had previously gone out to California and spent three or four years as a prospector, following the discovery in 1849, and about 1870 came to Texas. In the meantime he had been in the real estate and mercantile business, and in North Texas acquired vast tracts of land, and at one time was the owner of all the land on which the city of Denison now stands. He helped to lay out and plan that town, and a suburb of Denison bears his name and commemorates his early activities there. He also operated extensively in the Panhandle of this state, and made a record as an Indian fighter during the early days.

Samuel Purinton married Margaret Montgomery, who was born in Cole county, Illinois, in 1841, and died in 1887. They were the parents of seven children. Arthur Purinton received ample opportunities for an education. His experience has been a constant record of promotion and progress. After one year as a bank clerk at Fort Worth, he spent eight months with the engineering corps, engaged in plotting the course and the construction work of the Houston and Brazos Valley Railroad. For the next eight months he was with the company which proposed to put in an electric line between Fort Worth and Cleburne, serving in the capacity of assistant engineer. He was then assistant engineer to the Fort Worth City Engineer for six months, and was then given the important task of surveying and subdividing a very large tract of land in Pecos county. Four months were required to complete that work, after which he practiced as a general civil engineer and architect at Fort Worth until 1911. He was assistant chief engineer in locating the Crosbyton-Southplains Railway in 1911. In that year moving to Crystal, Texas, he was engaged in the engineering and newspaper business, continued in the same line at Big Wells, and in 1913 came to Cleburne, where he practiced successfully as an architect and civil engineer. In January, 1914, he was appointed to fill the position of county surveyor and was elected to that office in November, 1914.

On December 13, 1911, at Fort Worth, Mr. Purinton married Margaret Bishop, a daughter of R. B. and Julia Bishop, her father being vice president and general manager of the Reynolds Mortgage Company of Fort Worth. Mr. Purinton affiliates with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and he and his wife are members of the Presbyterian church. Though a young man, only recently started in his profession, he has accumulated some permanent property and owns seventy-five acres in Johnson county, and five city lots and a handsome residence in Fort Worth.

BUNYAN G. PRESTRIDGE, M. D. Representing an old and honored family of this state, Dr. Bunyan G. Prestridge has for thirty years practiced medicine at Alvarado, in Johnson county, and he and his family are among the most prominent people in that section. Bunyan G. Prestridge was born in Texas, April 11, 1858, a son of William A. and Ruth J. (Spears) Prestridge. His father was born in Alabama in 1835, was one of the early settlers at Alvarado in Johnson county, had an influential place in business and civic affairs there, and his principal business was as a druggist. He died September 24, 1908. His wife, who was born in Georgia, died April 29, 1895. Of their eight children three are still living: Bunyan G.; William A., who is a druggist at Alvarado and by his marriage to Carrie Clarke, has two children, Clarke and Willa; and Ila I., who married Charles Voss, a salesman, and has two children, Bunyan and Ruth.

Dr. B. G. Prestridge grew up in Texas, had a substantial early training in the schools of Alvarado, and for his professional career prepared at Nashville, Tennessee, and also at Tulane University in New Orleans, where he was graduated M. D. in 1883. Returning to Texas, he at once took up practice at Alvarado, and for thirty years has looked after a large and profitable general practice. Dr. Prestridge owns two sections of land in Deaf Smith county, and is a stockholder in the First National Bank of Alvarado. He also has an attractive residence in that city.

Dr. Prestridge affiliates with the Masonic Order, having taken the Royal Arch degrees, and also with the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World. He is a Democrat, and for ten years was secretary of the Board of Education at Alvarado. His church is the Baptist. Outside of his investments, he devotes all his time to the practice of medicine, and for recreation finds his chief diversion in fishing, hunting and other outdoor sports.

Dr. Prestridge on December 31, 1885, married Annie C. Wrigly, a daughter of Col. Joseph and Anna (Gagh) Wrigly. Her father earned his title in the Confederate army during the war, and for many years was a prominent cattleman and railroad contractor in Liberty county, Texas, and at the time of his death in 1903 was serving as mayor of Alvarado. Dr. Prestridge and wife have five children: Edith A., B. Gagh, Alma R., Kenneth K., and Archie D. The daughter Edith married J. O. Robinson, a farmer at Alvarado and has one child, Rachael A.; Alma R. married T. L. Dallas, a real estate man of Fort Worth; Kenneth is a student in the Agricultural and Mechanical College in the Civil Engineering Department; Archie, the youngest, still lives at home in Alvarado.

B. Gagh Prestridge, the son of Dr. Prestridge, is a young attorney and has already made a mark in his profession, being now assistant county attorney at Johnson county, located at Cleburne. While the law is his profession his tastes are literary, and he has gained no inconsiderable reputation as a writer of short stories. He began delving into literature as a producer when a boy at school, and many of his stories have been published. He owns one hundred and sixty acres of land in Lynn county, and is one of the younger leaders in affairs at Cleburne. He is a Democrat, a member of the Baptist church and affiliates with the Woodmen of the World. B. Gagh Prestridge married Vera Dell Morman, a daughter of William B. and Martha Ann (Davis) Morman of Alvarado, her father is a druggist in that city. This marriage was celebrated April 30, 1913.

DR. THOS. P. PIPKIN. Few men in the history of Annona and Red River county have lived lives of more complete usefulness than has Dr. Pipkin, who has made this region the scene of his activities since he took up the serious business of life. While he has not taken life too seriously, he has yet been serious in the performance of his duties, and has given a service whose character has been of the highest order in its every phase. As a physician, he has performed the dual office of a healer of the body and of the soul, for some of his best years were given to the ministry as a medical missionary. Considering his career from this viewpoint, it would be indeed difficult to form any adequate estimate of the extent of his service, but his position in the heart and minds of his fellow men in Red River county is a most secure one, and he needs no eulogy in a work that will find its chief distribution in the district wherein he has lived and labored so long.

Dr. Pipkin was born on the line of Bowie and Red River counties, on February 6, 1862, and is the son of Mark G. and Evelyn (Groom) Pipkin. Concerning the parents, it may be said that the father settled in this district in 1860, having migrated hither from Weekley county, Tennessee, his native place, where he was born on May 20, 1832. He had received a more liberal education than was ordinarily afforded to the youth of his time and station, and a few years of his early manhood were spent as a teacher. His later life was that of a country man, most of his time being devoted to the conduct of his farm, and the business of stock raising. Soon after he settled in Texas, the outbreak of the Rebellion caused him to enter the service of the Confederacy, and as a part of the Twenty-third Texas Cavalry, Col. Gould in command, he saw service in the Trans-Mississippi Department of the Confederate government. That regiment was a part of Gen. DeBray's Brigade, General Bee's Division and General Wharton's corps, and went to the coast of Texas in 1862, doing garrison duty at Velasco and Sabine Pass for several months, going thence to Louisiana and taking part there in some skirmishing and a little serious fighting with the cohorts of General Banks. They fought at Yellow Bayou and Morganza, and on every occasion conducted themselves as became a well organized fighting force. His protracted military service impaired the constitution of Mr. Pipkin, and his life, from the time of his discharge until his passing on June 20, 1878, was a gradual decline. He married Evelyn Groom, a daughter of Bright Groom of Weekley county, Tennessee, and she died in November, 1891, when she was sixty-seven years old. Mark G. Pipkin was the son of Isaac Pipkin, who died in early life, leaving four children, named as follows: Thomas, a resident of Texas county, Missouri; Mark G., who was the father of the subject; James; and a daughter who died in Texas county, Missouri. There were also two other children by a second marriage, William and Aleck Pipkin; both deceased.

T. P. Pipkin is the only child of his parents. He was reared under the wholesome influence of a devout Methodist family, whose teachings remained with him all his life, and it is safe to say, had much to do with the shaping and welding of his later existence. His home environment brought about his early acquaintance with the work of the farm, and he reached mature years so to speak, without familiarity with any other vocation. He attended the country schools regularly, and when he had finished with them entered the Honey Grove School, and finished his training in a private school under the direction of Hon. N. P. Doak, now a retired and well known attorney of Clarksville, Texas. Soon thereafter he began his medical studies, having determined some years before that he could best serve his fellows in that profession. He entered Louisville Medical College and from that institution was duly graduated in the spring of 1886. With the completion of his professional studies he began the practice of medicine in Red River county and carried on his work uninterruptedly until a desire for further study took him back to Louisville, Kentucky, where he pursued the course of study prescribed by the Kentucky School of Medicine, and was graduated in the spring of 1891. Within a few months he located in Dallas, Texas, and there spent the years 1892-3-4 in practice, leaving the city when his prosperity was at its height to enter upon a work that had called incessantly to him from his boyhood.

It may be said in this connection that Dr. Pipkin had been converted as a boy of sixteen, and from that time on he had been a potent factor in the work of the church in his community. He entered into the musical activities in connection with the church, and played an important part in the revivals and other services of the church for a number of years. The call to the ministry proved strong and tenacious, but the young man consistently resisted it, firm in the belief that he could better serve humanity in the medical profession, and his study and several years of active practice followed as a result of this well adhered to decision. But the spirit of service was destined to have its way with the young doctor, and his medical training and service seemed only another good and sufficient reason why he should enter the ministry as a missionary, and he finally made that decision, closed his office in Dallas and entered the Indian Missionary Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in 1894. His work for the church began with his ordination at Ardmore with a class of new ministers, Bishop Hargrove officiating. He thereupon became an itinerant pastor and worker among the White and Indians, and was stationed at Mansville, Comanche, Shawnee, Yukon, Hennessey, Enid and Perry, and concluded his service after seven years of personal sacrifice, in the hope that some good seed had fallen on fertile soil and would come forth and bear fruit in later years.

Once more resuming his profession, Dr. Pipkin took a post-graduate course in the Louisville Medical College in 1901, and located at Dallas again. Here he faced new conditions which ultimately caused his removal to Altus, Oklahoma, but he was there threatened with a break-down as the result of incipient pulmonary trouble, and he sought invigorating atmosphere of San Angelo, Texas, remaining there seven years. The successive thoughts of that section brought on strenuous times for an over-plus of medical men, and he wisely returned to East Texas and opened his office in Annona in March, 1912, where he has since conducted a thriving practice. The doctor has been a student all his life, and he is well fortified in his knowledge of his profession, neglecting no means of adding to his insight and understanding in the matter of his work. In addition to other post-graduate courses he has taken, Dr. Pipkin, while stationed at Altus, Oklahoma, took a course in the New Orleans Polyclinic, and his training has in every way been equal to the demands of a most capricious public. He also took a course in the New Orleans Polyclinic in the spring of 1914.

On April 1, 1886, Dr. Pipkin was married to Miss Mollie Gaines, the daughter of James A. Gaines, a native of Tennessee, and his wife, Angie R. (Farris) Gaines, a native of Texas. They were identified with the farming activities of their section of the state. Mrs. Pipkin is one of their five children, namely: Edward P., a druggist of Annona; H. Washington, of Avery, Texas; Mollie Pipkin; Walter, who died young; and John Q., of Austin, salesman for a drug house at Waco, Texas. Dr. and Mrs. Pipkin became the parents of five children, but one died in infancy unnamed; Mamie Pipkin, the only daughter, was a teacher of expression, and very successful in her work, which she followed up to the time of her marriage to Roy Garland, a son of Joe Garland, mention of whom is made elsewhere in this publication; Roger died in childhood; Raymond J. and Harold.

C. A. DOOSE. The record of achievement of C. A. Doose in the years of his connection with the business interests of Ballinger and Runnells county is one of absorbing interest, and places him most unquestionably among those men whose careers should find perpetuation in the pages of this historical and biographical work. His work has been one of the greatest magnitude, and one that has perhaps resulted in a greater good to the county in the way of growth and progress than may well be ascribed to any other one man. A man of the highest business integrity and one who enjoys the fullest confidence of the general public, he stands well to the forefront among the representative citizens of the county, and is properly regarded as one of the most prominent and successful men in Ballinger today. A straightforward account of his life, presenting only the more salient features of his altogether praiseworthy career, is here given.

C. A. Doose was born on the 4th day of February, 1875, in Hallettsville, Lavaca county, Texas, and he is a son of William and Anna K. Doose, both natives of Germany who emigrated from their Fatherland in early life, coming to Texas at once and settling in Hallettsville. He was a boot and shoeman and he engaged in that enterprise in Hallettsville, continuing there until March 27, 1884, when he came to Runnells City, remaining there until June 29, 1886. At that time he came to Ballinger, where he still resides. The Santa Fe road was then selling town lots for the present city, and Mr. Doose purchased property in the new location, engaged in his business as a boot and shoemaker, and here he still resides, active in his work and enjoying an excellent reputation in the community. Eight children were born to these worthy German parents, and of the number, he whose name initiates this review is the second born.

C. A. Doose received his early education in the schools of his native community, and he was still very young when he filled his first position. This was as assistant in the office of the county clerk, and his pay was ridiculously small in accordance with the demands made upon him. He was only thirteen years old, however, and the prejudice that still exists against paying a boy of that age the worth of his services held good when he was a boy. He performed his work before and after school hours, and when he was fifteen he had so far established a reputation for ability and energy, with business tact as well, that he was induced by J. N. Winters, a real estate dealer of Ballinger, to enter his employ. The salary he offered the boy was $12.50 a month, and his duties were very comprehensive indeed. He was first to reach the office and the last to leave it and he made himself generally useful. He did not consider himself badly treated, however, for he was there with the intention of thoroughly familiarizing himself with the real estate business as conducted by his employer, and with the further intention of getting a few new ideas on the subject, which he might apply then or in later years as he saw fit. That he did succeed in evolving new ideas in real estate manipulation, will be seen later, and how well they have redounded to the good of the county will also be noted.

The young man, or boy, as he would with more aptness be called, continued in his work and study from 1890 until May 1, 1895, and then he launched out in business for himself. He felt the time was ripe for him to set up a business of his own, and he lost no time in establishing himself as an operator in real estate. He was yet a minor, and the legal impediment which would prevent him from carrying on business independently had to be removed by authorized act of the courts before he might begin his operations. The record of that transaction may be seen today upon the records of Runnells county, and stand as a living witness to the early initiative of the youth, and the determination to succeed that have placed him where he stands today.

Mr. Doose began his business activities on a small scale, it is true, but he began them in a manner well calculated to insure a continued advance, for he had a theory that it was better to start at the bottom and climb up, than to begin at the top of the ladder, or even part way up, and have to climb down because of plans not properly laid, or other mismanagements. No backward steps may be charged to him in all the years of his business activity in the county. He has gone steadily forward to success and prosperity, and there are none to be found who will gainsay that statement.

In beginning business in Ballinger, Mr. Doose took into careful consideration the fact that the man who specializes along a certain line has a better chance to succeed than has the man who approaches his work along more general lines. He looked about him carefully and thoughtfully and he decided that the growth and progress of the county depended to a very great extent upon the subdivision of the large parcels of land then held in the county, so that the toilers might be given a greater opportunity for ultimate independence. In taking this stand he courted the displeasure of the large land holders, and drew upon himself their efforts to stay his enterprise, but none were successful. His early vision of the settlement of the county has been more than realized, and the success of his enterprise is emphasized in the marketing in 1908 of 54,000 bales of cotton in the city of Ballinger, surpassing the records of any other shipping point in the state, and giving Ballinger rank as the second cotton shipping point in the United States. All this has been accomplished in twenty years of labor on the part of Mr. Doose. As a result of this wholesale subdivision of lands in these parts, Mr. Doose has handled more than a quarter of a million of acres in this and adjoining counties, and land has advanced in value during his twenty-three years of activity from two dollars per acre to as high as twenty-five and fifty dollars, according to the quality and location. It does not require a stupendous mathematical ability to figure approximately what the labor of Mr. Doose has meant to the county in dollars and cents, but what it has meant in the other relations of life is a problem that may not be estimated in mere coin of the realm, and of which, indeed, no adequate idea may ever be reached.

In the real estate and mortgage departments of his business Mr. Doose has always made it a point to finance any legitimate business enterprise, and has in this wise induced men to locate in the county whose later business and industrial activities have been sources of great good to their communities.

While yet a boy, Mr. Doose planned that he would one day be the owner of a business of his own, and he outlined in his mind the sort of building he would have for the home of his enterprise. Today he owns the finest equipped building for similar business to be found anywhere in the country. It is a fine two story stone building, the interior equipment a marvel of its kind and with an immense fireproof vault, the largest, indeed, in the city. He is, according to the tax records of the county, one of the largest tax payers in the county, and he holds options on large estates throughout the central part of the state.

Few business enterprises aside from his own mammoth concerns have taken his interest, though it should be mentioned that he was president of the First National Bank of Ballinger for several years, until his own affairs assumed such proportions that he was no longer able to adequately attend to the duties of that office, when he resigned.

All his life Mr. Doose has been a Democrat of the progressive order, but he has had little time to devote to political activities in the community. Fraternally he is a member of the Knights of Pythias, the Elks and the Sons of Hermann. He is a charter member of the Ballinger Club, the preliminary meeting at which the plans for the organization were made being held in his offices. He is a member of the Presbyterian church, with his wife.

On May 15, 1901, Mr. Doose married Miss Emma Richardson, of Moody, Texas. She was a daughter of Mrs. Martha Richardson. Her father died years previous to the marriage of the daughter, while the mother still lives. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Doose, and on January 22, 1911, the young wife and mother died. In February, 1912, Mr. Doose was married a second time, when Miss Una V. Stacy became his wife. She is a daughter of M. J. and Lulu Stacy of Ballinger, where the father, who is a native born Texan, is engaged in the mercantile business.

THOMAS H. NELMS. A fine type of the old Southern plantation owner and long a useful citizen of southeastern Texas was the late Thomas Holland Nelms, whose career for many years was identified with Trinity county.

Thomas Holland Nelms, the oldest in a family of twelve children, was born in the state of Georgia in 1816. When he was six years old his parents moved to Alabama and settled on a farm near Marion in Perry county, and that was his home until the year of his majority. His father, Samuel Hardy Nelms, died in 1838, while Thomas was absent engaged in a business of his own. He immediately returned to his mother's home, took charge of the affairs of his father's estate, which had been depleted and dissipated, largely in the payment of security debts of friends.

He succeeded in paying all debts against the old homestead, maintained his mother in comfort, educated his brothers and sisters and made money for himself.

At the age of thirty years he was stricken with typhoid fever and lingered several weeks near the point of death. As a result he lost his eyesight, but partially regained it after his recovery.

In 1844, Thomas H. Nelms married Miss Martha Holley of Marion, Alabama, and to them were born ten children, all but the first having lived to middle age, and surviving their father are three sons and three daughters.

Thomas H. Nelms lived in Alabama until shortly before the war. He was elected to the office of tax collector of Perry county in 1853, in 1855 was made sheriff of the same county, and after holding that office two terms declined a continuation of the honor.

When Thomas H. Nelms moved to Texas in 1859 he brought with him one hundred and one slaves, twenty-six mules and ten horses, and with his family located on a large plantation which he had purchased on Tyler Prairie in Houston county. His life went quietly along the line of a planter until the war between the states began, when he volunteered for active service. At his examination at Tyler his services were rejected because of partial loss of his eyesight. Returning home to take active charge of his plantation, while his brothers and neighbors faced the enemy on the battle line, he himself contributed of his means, his time and his counsel toward the health, comfort and support of their wives and children.

In 1869 Mr. Nelms assisted in founding the town of Pennington in Trinity county. For many years Pennington was noted throughout the state as a center of education. Its chief institution was the Steele high school, which was established largely through the efforts of Mr. Nelms. Many of the state's most prominent business men, lawyers, physicians and preachers proudly claim that school as their alma mater.

It would be impossible in a brief sketch to describe the variety of his interest and service to his community. He co-operated with practically every movement for social and moral improvement, contributing freely and sometimes magnanimously to undertakings for human betterment. Early converted and taken into membership with the Missionary Baptist church, he remained all the rest of his life an active worker though not putting himself forward in official position.

Believing in education, he gave his children every opportunity that money could command, at the same time taking care that not one should be left to form habits of extravagance and idleness. A prominent feature of his own character was his industry, and in his constant work he set a splendid example for his children.

No better illustration of his character could be offered than the treatment accorded his slaves upon their emancipation. Holding their full confidence and esteem, he called them around him in consultation as soon as the news of the proclamation reached him and told them they were free. Reviewing their past relations, he offered to sell to each head of a family a tract of land at the usual prices on long payments and to all who did not wish to buy, he offered employment at living wages for the remainder of the crop year. In this manner he settled around him practically all his slaves, and today these people and their descendants are the happy owners of good farms sold them by Colonel Nelms. They not only love and revere his memory, but they would fight for any of his children.

EUGENE HILLIARD MORGAN, PH.M., M. D., is an old resident of Granbury, having located there when a boy about

THOMAS H. NELMS

1880. For eight or ten years he has been in the active practice of his profession as physician and surgeon, while during the earlier part of his career he was identified with the mercantile activities of the locality, especially with the drug trade.

Eugene Hilliard Morgan was born June 8, 1866, at Taladega, Alabama, a son of James Milton and Sarah J. Morgan of Alabama. His father was a farmer, and died a short time before the birth of his youngest son and child, Eugene H. There were four sons and two daughters, the latter being now deceased. The mother later married A. D. Argo of Alabama, and they moved to Texas about 1870, settling in Comanche county. The mother by her second union had five children, three sons and two daughters, and she is still living a venerable old woman whose home is in Oklahoma.

The doctor had his first education in the grammar and high schools of Texas. In 1880 he came to Granbury, when that was a small village, and he has a very intimate knowledge of those early years, largely through his apprenticeship with the Granbury Vidette, the pioneer newspaper of Hood county, and edited in those days by Garland and Crockett, the latter being a grandson of the famous Davy Crockett. The newspaper business did not prove the permanent field for the doctor's efforts and he soon took an apprenticeship as druggist with the firm of S. Davison & Company of Granbury. After three years he became clerk with a firm that was afterwards conducted by John Reichspetter and still later by S. J. Thrash. He continued with those men until 1894. Then he organized the Morgan Drug Company and conducted one of the best drug stores in Central Texas, being its manager until 1901. After that he became traveling representative for the Texas Drug Company of Dallas. Meanwhile, in 1890, Dr. Morgan had taken his first course in medicine and pharmacy in Chicago. In 1892 he took another course in the same departments in New York City, and during 1894 he traveled six months for a wholesale drug house of Philadelphia. In the fall of 1901, after selling his drug interests he entered Tulane University at New Orleans, taking the regular course in medicine, and at the same time acting as assistant to the professor of chemistry in that school. During 1902-03, his studies were continued in the medical department of Fort Worth University, and in 1903-04 he was in the medical department of the Southwestern University at Dallas. He graduated in medicine in the spring of 1904, with the degree of M. D., at the Southwestern University Medical College, Dallas, Texas, and the following two years were spent in a continuation of his studies both in medicine and pharmacy at Tulane University of New Orleans, Louisiana, where he graduated in medicine and pharmacy in 1906, receiving his degrees in both medicine and pharmacy. Taking the state examinations from the Texas board, he located for practice in his old home town of Granbury, and has since enjoyed a good business. Dr. Morgan served as county health officer in 1909 and 1910.

As to politics he has always been a good Democrat. His church is the Baptist. In 1896 Dr. Morgan married Miss Alice Bush, only daughter of F. C. and Mary Bush of Granbury. Her father was one of the early and very successful merchants of Granbury, and died in 1894. Her mother died in 1910. The two children of the doctor and wife are: Herbert Bush, sixteen years of age, and Grace, aged about fourteen, both attending the public schools of Granbury. The doctor has witnessed many remarkable changes in Hood county since he first became a resident in 1880, and now believes that no section of the southwest surpasses this locality for its natural resources, its splendid schools and churches, and the general morality of its citizens.

JUDGE J. H. ARNOLD. Since 1890 Judge Arnold has been in the practice of law at Gatesville, and with the exception of a few years has been almost continuously in public office. He is now a judge of the Fifty-Second Judicial District of Texas, and regarded as one of the ablest, fairest, and most efficient men on the district bench.

Judge Arnold was born May 9, 1869, in Brazos county, Texas, a son of Dr. H. S. and Mollie (Walker) Arnold. His father, a native of Maury county, Tennessee, but principally raised in Burleson county, Texas, was a physician, first in Mississippi and later in Texas. From the former state he enlisted for service in the Confederate army. He participated as a surgeon in thirty-two battles, and while in the performance of his duty at one battle was wounded by a ball through his shoulder. After the war he moved to Texas, locating in Brazos county. After practicing medicine there until 1871, he moved to Copperas Cove, in Coryell county, where he resided and worked at his profession until the time of his death. He was educated in the public school of Burleson county and attended the high school at Caldwell and was a graduate of New Orleans School of Medicine, class of 1889. With the exception of the three months sickness which terminated his life, his career was throughout a most active one, and he was seldom absent from duty whether as a soldier or as a physician. His death occurred July 10, 1913, at the age of seventy-six. His wife, who was born in Texas and is now living at the old home in Coryell county at the age of sixty-eight, was a daughter of William Walker, a pioneer Texan, and a member of Sam Houston's army, fighting for independence in the battle of San Jacinto. There were six children in the Arnold family, all of them sons, and the Judge is the second in order of birth.

J. H. Arnold grew up in Coryell county, where he attended the public schools, and also was a student in private institutions while getting ready for college. He entered the law department of the State University in 1888, and in 1890 was graduated LL. B. Admitted to the bar he has ever since lived at Gatesville, and so far as his official duties would permit has been busy with a large private practice.

In October, 1891, Judge Arnold was elected county attorney. He served altogether seven years in that office, including one appointive term and three terms of regular elective character. He voluntarily retired from the office in order to take up private practice, and so continued until 1903, in which year the Fifty-Second Judicial District was created including Comanche, Hamilton and Coryell counties. Governor S. W. T. Lanham appointed him district attorney, and after the first term he was elected by the people. His second term by election began about 1905, and continued to 1907. In 1908 he was appointed to a vacancy on the district bench by Governor T. M. Campbell, and has twice been elected to the same position since that time.

Judge Arnold has always been a staunch Democrat, has often spoken and worked for the good of the party, and is a satisfied and emphatic supporter of the present Wilson national administration. Fraternally the Judge is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, and the Woodmen of the World.

On August 1, 1894, in Hillsboro, Texas, he married Miss Ray Coffield, a daughter of Henry and Mattie (Wilson) Coffield. Her father was long an attorney at San Marcos, Texas, and a partner of Judge Ed. R. Cone, until his death. The Judge and wife have three children: Vivian, a young lady of twelve; J. H., Jr., aged five years; and Bryan, aged one year. Judge Arnold is delighted with the healthful climate of central Texas, and on account of the diversified products believes that no sections excels it for farming, stock raising, fruits and vegetables.

THOMAS OWEN MEACHAM. A talent for serving the people well has been the foundation for a great many business successes. It has been this talent, plus a close personal attention to the details of management which has made the firm of Clopton & Meacham among the most successful hotel proprietors and managers in the state of Texas. The Seibold Hotel on Seventh Street near Main has a reputation as a popular hotel and place to dine and lunch, and probably more prominent business and men of affairs gather under its roof from day to day regularly than in any other one spot in the city. The firm of Clopton & Meacham was formed in 1900 between Mr. J. C. Clopton and Thomas O. Meacham, in which year they bought the Hotel Seibold, and have since given their personal attention to their respective ends of the business, a fact which accounts largely for their success. The Hotel Seibold is now the readiest answer between any two or more men inquiring as to where they shall lunch or dine for the day, and it is the regular resort for business men, club men, travelers, cattlemen, lawyers and bankers.

Thomas Owen Meacham is known personally to every one of his guests, is a young man with an excellent business record. He was born at Memphis, Tennessee, December 25, 1877, a son of W. H. and Martha Ann (Brown) Meacham. The family moved to Texas in 1878, when he was one year old, locating four miles north of Fort Worth. The father died in 1891, and Thomas O. the oldest, yet only fourteen years of age, left to look after the family. Too much cannot be said in praise of him for the manner in which he provided for the dependent children, and through his own efforts largely reared his brothers and sisters, and at the same time advanced his own success in the world of business. He had some experience in hotel management before forming the present partnership, and since that time has given such close and able attention to the management as to place him in the front rank of Texas hotel men. The Hotel Seibold is a European hotel, and has all the modern facilities, electric elevators, one hundred and twenty-five rooms, nearly half of which have baths.

Mr. Meacham is an ardent lover of fishing and hunting, has membership in several of the fishing clubs owning private preserves and has many trophies caught or shot by himself. He has also been identified with public affairs, and served as chief deputy sheriff for three years in Tarrant county. Mr. Meacham married Miss McKillop, a daughter of J. C. McKillop of Clarendon, Donley county, Texas. They have no children.

FRANCIS M. DANNELLY. Aside from his own achievements, and they have been many, both in professional lines, in business and in literature, Dr. Francis M. Dannelly bears an honored and cherished name all over the South, his mother having been a versatile writer and a poetess of more than ordinary ability. He was born at Madison, Georgia, December 26, 1863, and is a son of Dr. F. Olin and Elizabeth Otis (Marshall) Dannelly.

Dr. F. Olin Dannelly was a prominent member of the medical profession in the South and numbered among his patients such men as Hon. Alexander H. Stephens and Senator Ben H. Hill. He served in the Confederate army during the Civil war with distinction as a surgeon, and shortly after its close removed with his family from Georgia to Baltimore, Maryland, in 1869, coming to Texas and settling at Waxahachie, in Ellis county. Subsequently the family returned to Baltimore and resided there for several years, Dr. F. Olin Dannelly dying in that city. He was a scholarly man and an occasional writer, making use of the nom de plume of Frank Vivien. He enjoyed the acquaintance and friendship of some of the most distinguished characters of his day in his native section and his treasured mementoes of them are many and one, preserved by his son, is a letter written by the great Georgian, Alexander H. Stephens, at Baltimore in 1868, commending the character and attainments of Dr. Dannelly in the highest terms. While serving as a surgeon as above noted, Dr. Dannelly was married at Madison, Georgia, to Elizabeth Otis Marshall. She was born at Monticello, Georgia, June 13, 1838, and in 1855 was graduated at the Madison Female college. She was of exceptional lineage, her mother having been a Grinnell and her maternal grandmother a Hazzard, the latter being a sister of the mother of Oliver Hazzard Perry, America's first great naval commander. After the death of her husband, Mrs. Dannelly returned to Texas, where she spent the remainder of her life, her death occurring March 21, 1896, at Gainesville, in Cooke county. She was a woman of culture and refinement and was gifted as a writer and productions from her pen appeared in various magazines and periodicals during many years, and additionally she published two volumes of poems, both well remembered, one being entitled "Cactus, or Thorns and Blossoms," a collection of satirical and miscellaneous verses, embracing temperance, religious and memorial subjects, and the other "Wayside Flowers," containing religious and miscellaneous poems. Many of these poems have been extensively copied, their fervent patriotism finding an echo in many hearts.

Francis M. Dannelly was schooled at Baltimore and was given all the advantages that could be had at that great educational center. Soon after he finished his education he returned to Texas, having come first to the state in 1869 with his parents, locating at Waxahachie and for a few years he practiced medicine in Ellis county and later in Hunt county but since coming to Dallas in 1894, has not been engaged in professional work. For ten years he was in the retail drug business and during that time, on account of his superior knowledge of chemistry and pharmacy, in 1889 was appointed a member of the first State Board of Pharmacy. His long experience and study of drugs and chemistry enabled him to get a quick foothold and he founded and until recent years was the proprietor of the Microline Company and a manufacturer of drugs and chemicals. With years his business grew and became one of the largest proprietary medicine plants in the country and several times Dr. Dannelly was compelled to enlarge his plant. As a manufacturer he was very successful but, having retired, no longer continues in that line of business, his present interests being mainly his stock farm and his many tracts of valuable city realty. He invested wisely and judiciously when he saw the opportunity, in Dallas property and its enhanced value has contributed to making his independent, while one of his most valuable resources is his home place, on which he has lived since February 1, 1909. It is a splendid stock farm, comprising 275 acres, lying five miles north of the city limits, on the Richardson turnpike and the Dallas-Sherman interurban, the railway having a station, Dannelly, on the place. The residence, a two-story structure, is finished according to modern taste and is equipped with every comfort and convenience, while its location, on an elevation is ideal facing the east and commanding a beautiful view of forest and rolling meadow. An artistic lake is one of the attractive features and an ornamental stone water tower at the rear of the residence gives the place a striking appearance. Dr. Dannelly raises registered Jersey cattle and registered horses for the saddle, in which industry he has met with his usual success and which furnishes him with pleasure and profit. Although now retired from active commercial and manufacturing interests, he maintains an office in the city for the transaction of business more directly private and there his friends often find him, the same capable, friendly and genial man they have known these many years.

Dr. Dannelly was married September 8, 1886, to Miss Nettie Louise Graber, who is a daughter of General and Mrs. H. W. Graber of Dallas. They have three sons: Henry G., Frank C. and Oliver Hazzard Perry. Dr. Dannelly has inherited his mother's literary ability and his father's scholarly style, and in leisure moments has written what is considered very creditable prose and verse which he publishes under the pen name of Frank Vivien Jr., a tribute of appreciation of his father.

DR. JAMES P. BLOUNT. It is in the field of banking that Dr. Blount is best known in the business community of North Texas, and has been a bank president at Denton for the past twenty-five years, being now at the head of the First Guaranty State Bank. Educated for medicine, and practicing that profession for several years, his ambitions and business talents led him aside from that work into a broader field of affairs, and for many years Dr. Blount has been one of the moulders of the commercial enterprise in his home city. His work in public affairs, and as a former member of the legislature, has also increased the appreciation and esteem in which he is held.

Dr. Blount belongs to the pioneer stock of Denton county. Though he was born in Carroll county, Mississippi, March 7, 1849, practically his entire life since early childhood has been spent in Denton county. His parents, Judge J. M. and Sophia (Caudle) Blount, in 1856 moved to Texas, and as a pioneer of Denton county Judge Blount had many prominent and useful relations with that locality. He assisted in laying out the town of Denton, and for many years was closely associated with and aiding in shaping the policy of the county's civil and business development, being elected to many positions of honor and trust. In 1866 Judge Blount was elected to the state senate, but went out of office with the Throckmorton administration, which was removed by the Federal Military authorities as an impediment to reconstruction. Judge Blount was a Mason, exemplified the principles of that order in his own life, was also a devoted member of the Baptist church, and his wife was a wholesome type of the true Christian pioneer woman. Judge Blount died February 22, 1899, while his wife had passed away February 5, 1869.

Across the boyhood days of Dr. Blount fell the shadow of the Civil war, and in the troubled times of that period he had little opportunity for gaining more than an ordinary academic education. At an early age he took up the study of medicine under his brother-in-law, Dr. G. W. Hughes, and for some years enjoyed a substantial practice in Denton county. Dr. Blount retired from his profession to accept the presidency of the First National Bank of Denton, and from his election in 1899 served until he resigned three years later, and with Major A. E. Graham and others organized in 1892 the Denton County National Bank. Of this institution Dr. Blount remained as president twenty years. In January, 1912, he left the Denton County National to take his present place as president of the First Guaranty State Bank. As a banker Dr. Blount has had the reputation of having conducted the three banks above mentioned along safe and conservative lines, and at the same time, in keeping with the progressive spirit that is everywhere manifested in Texas today, has made the institutions of the utmost service to the business community, consistent with the sound and safe principles of finance.

His judgment and ripeness of experience have brought him into a number of relations with the broader business organizations in his section of the state. He is vice-president of the new Dallas-Northwestern Interurban Railway, and his personal influence has counted much for the success of a number of local enterprises. Dr. Blount is a member of the National Geographical Society, of the State Historical Society, is vice-president of the Alamo Monument Association for Denton county, and for four years was on the Board of Regents of the College of Industrial Arts at Denton.

His part in politics deserves more than casual mention, and for many years he held positions of honor and trust in the city of Denton, and was elected to represent the Twenty-sixth District in the nineteenth legislature. While at Austin he made himself a factor in much constructive legislation during that session. The biographer of the nineteenth legislature said of him: "Dr. Blount made a bold, hard-working, conservative representative. A man of firm mind, a true Democrat, he ever spoke and voted in the interest of the people, exercised a strong influence and helped enact some of the most important laws passed by the body of which he was a member. While in the legislature Dr. Blount was fitly chosen as chairman of the public health committee, and was also a member of the committee on constitutional amendments, on state affairs, and other important committees, and made himself useful not only as the representative of an individual district but in many matters concerning the state at large. Dr. Blount was a delegate from Texas to two national Democratic conventions. Fraternally his relations are with the Masonic Order, in which he has taken the Knight Templar degree.

Dr. Blount in April, 1869, married Miss Jessamine Kearby, the accomplished daughter of Judge E. P. Kearby. She was a sister of Senator J. G. Kearby and of Major Jerome C. Kearby. Mrs. Blount died June 28, 1900, leaving two sons, James G. and William Jerome, and a daughter, Eva Shelly. In September, 1910, Dr. Blount married Mrs. K. D. Fritzlen, long a resident of Denton county, and one of the most cultured members of Denton society. They have for several years resided in one of the beautiful homes of Denton.

WILL REYNOLDS. To control the vicious element which prevails to some extent in every community in the land, and to execute the full measure of punishment when the law has been defied, requires strong men, strong not only physically, but strong in character, in expedient and in efficiency. Sentimentalists may deplore the use of force and philanthropists may bestow fortunes to further medical investigations into the cause and cure of criminality, but the day has not yet dawned when the lock can be broken from prison doors or when peace loving communities can feel safe from invasion. Hence comes the necessity of the strong arm of the law in the office of sheriff, a courageous guardian who, on many occasions, has paid for his courage with his own life. Particularly well equipped for this important public office is Will Reynolds, sheriff-elect of Dallas county, Texas, who has been a continuous resident of Dallas since 1884. He was born on a farm near Winchester, Franklin county, Tennessee, and is a son of Pleasant David and Mahala (George) Reynolds, both of whom were natives of Tennessee and from that state moved to Dallas in 1891. Pleasant Reynolds, familiarly known as "Pleas" Reynolds, accompanied his father to Texas in early days, when only twenty-one years of age, and with his father saw much adventure, having many experiences with the Indians on what was then the frontier. Prior to the breaking out of the Civil War, they lived at Austin and the country adjacent. His mother survived to the unusual age of 102 years. Pleas Reynolds returned to Tennessee probably about 1860 as he was one of the first volunteers to enlist in the Confederate service from that state, joining the First Tennessee Infantry, in which he served all through the war.

Will Reynolds remained on a farm in Tennessee until he was sixteen years of age and then came to Dallas, alone, and here has continued to reside. He sought employment and found work in a brickyard, where he labored for nine days, and then secured a position in the flour mill of the Empire Milling Company, now the E. O. Stanard Company. Beginning with a wage of $1.50 a day, he so efficiently and faithfully performed the duties required of him that he was advanced step by step and when he retired from the company's employ he was filling the position of shipping clerk and receiving a salary of $75 per month. Mr. Reynolds shortly afterward embarked in the retail grocery and feed business, on McKinney avenue.

Mr. Reynolds married Miss Sallie Copeland, who is a daughter of Horace and Eleanor (Watson) Copeland, and a granddaughter of the late P. A. Watson, who was one of the earliest settlers near Arlington, in Tarrant county, having come there in 1854 from North Carolina, where he was born. Two of his sons, Jim A. and John H. Watson live at Arlington and still own the land three miles north of the town, on which their father settled sixty years ago. This is an interesting and historic section and on their land is a burying ground where many of the old pioneers of this part of Texas found a last resting place. The Watson family is widely known and has always been highly estimated for its sterling character. Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds have one son, Horace Wesley Reynolds.

For a number of years Sheriff Reynolds has been active in public affairs in Dallas county, his first official position being that of deputy constable, in which he served four years under Constable Henry Fanning, precinct No. 1, and was then elected constable of precinct No. 1, and served four years in that capacity. He had many friends who urged his candidacy for the office of sheriff of Dallas county, and in the campaigns of 1910 and 1912, he was defeated but by a very small majority, and in 1914 he won the race in the primaries over three very strong opponents and his election in the fall will be but a matter of form and he will assume the duties of an office for which he is admirably qualified on December 1, 1914. In his candidacy for this important office Mr. Reynolds received the support and encouragement of leading and influential business men and of the law abiding and respectable elements for he has proved himself a clean, honest, courageous and highly capable official.

Mr. Reynolds is a member of the Central Christian church. He is a Mason of high standing and has reached the thirty-second degree. Mrs. Reynolds is a member of the Central Presbyterian church.

JAMES S. BEARD. Consecutive effort and clearly defined purpose in the activities of life eventuate in the attaining of a full measure of success, but in tracing the career of one who has attained prominence and prosperity by his own efforts there comes into view the intrinsic individuality which made such accomplishment possible, and thus is granted an objective incentive and inspiration, while there is also enkindled a feeling of respect and admiration. Those qualities which have made James S. Beard one of the successful business men of Cameron have also granted him the opportunity of gaining the esteem and regard of his fellow-townsmen, for his career has been one of persistent effort and worthy accomplishments. He has been engaged in a number of business pursuits, and is now extensively engaged in dealing in all kinds of insurance.

Mr. Beard was born September 12, 1880, in Milam county, Texas, and is a son of James C. and Margaret (Springer) Beard. His father, born in Arkansas, in 1854, was brought to Texas in childhood, and early embarked in agricultural pursuits, in which he continued to be engaged until 1880, that year seeing his advent into the mercantile business. He now resides at Milano Junction, Milam county, is possessed of an ample competency, which he has gained through a life of industry and effort, and is known as one of his community's prominent and prosperous men. He married Margaret Springer, who was born in Texas, and she died in 1880, the mother of two children: A daughter who was born dead; and James S. Mr. Beard married for his second wife Miss A. White, who died in 1899, leaving one child, Raymond.

James S. Beard began his education in the old Sand Point country school, at Milano Junction, following which he attended the Milano public school, and later the public school at Cameron, this being supplemented by a thorough course in bookkeeping and stenography in a business college at Tyler, Texas. Thus he was well equipped to embark upon a career of his own, and particularly for a business career, but during the first year after graduating from the business college worked on a farm. He then came to Cameron and secured a position as clerk and bookkeeper, being thus employed until 1903, when he went to Houston, Texas, and was employed by the Bairy Company, and sent to Pawnee, Louisiana, to their lumber plant as bookkeeper and paymaster, as general office man. This he held until 1904, when he returned to Cameron and embarked in the real estate business as a bookkeeper, but in 1905, in partnership with T. A. Robinson, he was engaged at various occupations, principally in the line of clerical work. He continued as a bookkeeper, stenographer and cashier at various points in Louisiana and Texas until 1907, when he went to Calvert, Robertson county, and engaged in business on his own account as the proprietor of a meat market. After one year, however, he disposed of his interests and went to Gause, Milam county, as bookkeeper for J. R. Fame, but in 1913 again returned to Cameron, and in company with C. F. Johnson entered the insurance business, each having a half interest. Mr. Beard seems to possess that peculiar ability without which no man can expect to meet with success in his special line of endeavor. He has worked industriously and intelligently, steadily building up his business through straightforward and honorable methods and intelligently applying modern ways to his labors. He is progressive in spirit and a pleasant personality has done much to win him a greater volume of business, which is increasing steadily in its scope. His reputation is that of a man who has made his own way, fairly and squarely, and, having made it, is ready and eager to assist others upon the road to success.

Mr. Beard was married October 30, 1904, at the home of the bride at Old Tranville, Robertson county, Texas, to Miss Aline Thomas, a daughter of S. B. Thomas, of that place, and to this union there has come one son: Loring. Mr. Beard is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which he has many friends, and for two years was affiliated with Tom Campbell's Rifles, a military organization. He has been a life-long member of the Baptist church, in which he is serving as deacon at this time, and has been actively interested in its various movements. He has never cared for public office, but is a good citizen, and has displayed a commendable willingness to aid other earnest and public-spirited men in the accomplishment of those methods best calculated to benefit the community. His various ventures have proven successful, and he has shown the confidence in which he holds the future of the community by investing his means in real estate, being the owner of four vacant lots in Cameron, three acres and a residence at Gause, Milam county, and 200 acres of improved farming land at old Nashville, on the Brazos. Primarily a home man, he finds his greatest pleasure there, and his residence is always hospitably open to his numerous friends.

EUGENE L. HARRIS. A well known member of the El Paso bar, Mr. Eugene L. Harris, is a young attorney whose accomplishments and individual influence have already given him a high position in his profession and he is a fine representative of the modern type of young men whose ambitions are centered not so much upon the selfish acquirements as upon the utilization in the best possible manner of many opportunities for serving the public welfare.

Eugene L. Harris was born in Ysleta, Texas, December 1, 1887, a son of William J. and Emelie (Schutz) Harris. The father, who was born in Paris, Tennessee, and came to Texas when a young man, is now living virtually retired in El Paso after a long and successful career as a rancher and railroad contractor. He is also very prominent in the Masonic Order. The mother was born in Germany, and was married after coming to Texas.

Eugene L. Harris

Mr. E. L. Harris is a grand-nephew of former Senator and former Governor Isham G. Harris, of Tennessee.

The only son of his parents, Mr. Harris has spent practically all his years in his native state, attaining his early education in the public schools at Ysleta, and the high school at El Paso. Subsequently he entered the University of Texas at Austin, where he pursued the regular course, and graduated from the law department in 1911. On being admitted to the bar he came to El Paso and established his office here and has since been rising rapidly into prominence as an attorney.

During the years between his early schooling and his college days, Mr. Harris earned money by selling newspapers and in several other ways in time of juvenile activity. His father was well-to-do, and the son was under no compulsion to make his own way, but it was his nature to be engaged in useful activities, rather than the harum-scarum life which many youths affect, consequently he usually had his mind and energy directed to something worth while even when a boy. It has always been his nature to be exceedingly plain and democratic himself and to promote a simple democracy wherever possible. For this reason as a member of the state legislature, he has recently introduced an anti-fraternity bill, directed against the fraternal organizations of the public schools of this state. Educators throughout the country who have given serious attention to this matter are all in accord with the conviction that the public school fraternity has no proper place and that it should be abolished. Mr. Harris favors all the church denominations, though he affiliates with no special one. Fraternally he has attained to the thirty-second degree of Scottish Rite Masonry, and is a member of the Commandery and Mystic Shrine. He is also affiliated with the Elks and is a member of the El Paso County Bar Association. In politics, since college days, he has taken an active interest in Democratic organizations, and was elected to the legislature by that party. As a representative from western Texas, he has been insistent in bringing to the attention of the legislature of this great fundamentally agricultural state the needs and acquirements of the mineral regions in the west. He was one of the authors of the new mining law which was recently enacted by the state legislature. Throughout his university career Mr. Harris has been an enthusiastic supporter of all college activities, was for four years university chief yell leader and had considerable part in the University publications, having served as editor-in-chief of the university paper. Outdoor sports and the fine arts all receive his liberal interest and support. His father owns a splendid ranch in Callahan county, and during his frequent visits to this he secured many opportunities for the outdoor recreations which he has always craved.

In two different years, at the university, he was chosen to represent the institution in the inter-collegiate debate.

HON. JAMES T. W. LOE. A former member of the legislature and of a pioneer Texas family, James T. W. Loe has for many years been a resident of Dallas, and is especially well known over the state through his prominence in labor circles. Mr. Loe is a citizen of broad and varied qualifications, knows men and conditions, has exhibited great fidelity to his social and civic obligations, and has a name and reputation that extends much beyond the boundaries of his home city.

James T. W. Loe was born in Lavaca county, Texas, September 14, 1850, a son of Joseph Stephen and Nancy Haney (Warner) Loe. His father, a native of South Carolina and reared in Marion county, Mississippi, after his marriage moved to Texas in 1849, and was one of the early American settlers of Lavaca county. By occupation he was a farmer and stockman, and during the Civil war was honored with the office of sheriff of Lavaca county for two terms. His wife was born and reared in Washington Parish, Louisiana.

James T. W. Loe grew up on a farm in southwest Texas, attended local schools, and about the close of the war became an apprentice in the office of the Columbus Times in Colorado county. After learning the printer's trade he went to LaGrange and joined the staff of the State Rights Democrat, but in a few years it proved that his health could not stand the confinement of a printing shop, and he returned to the farm in Lavaca county. About 1871 Mr. Loe went to Fayette county, was married there, and subsequently moving to Caldwell county taught school. About 1875 he moved to Austin, learned the carpenter's trade, and that has been his regular vocation ever since, and he has done considerable work as a carpenter contractor.

In 1878 Mr. Loe was elected a member of the Sixteenth legislature, and represented a district comprising portions of Travis and Blanco counties. His work in the legislature gave him an added reputation in Travis county and an acquaintance with prominent men all over the state. On leaving Austin in 1886 Mr. Loe moved to Dallas, and that city has since been his home.

For many years Mr. Loe has been a prominent leader in labor circles. He was a member of the old Knights of Labor, which preceded the present organization of the American Federation of Labor. While living in Austin he was president of Local Assembly No. 2182 Knights of Labor, which had over four hundred members in Austin at that time. In Dallas Mr. Loe is president of Local Union No. 198, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America. This is the largest local union in the state of Texas, with a membership between thirteen hundred and fourteen hundred. Mr. Loe is held in the highest esteem for his ability as a leader and his devotion to and the service he has rendered the cause of union labor.

In the state campaign of 1914 Mr. Loe, at the earnest solicitation of many friends, became a candidate for Lieutenant Governor, and announced his candidacy upon a platform advocating a number of highly commendable measures. Although he is himself a working man and allied with and a friend of the working classes, Mr. Loe's platform is a document which attests in every sentence his breadth of mind and his interest in the welfare of Texas as a whole regardless of class or industry. The educational system, farm life, taxation, transportation, the general betterment of conditions everywhere as far as can be brought about by legislation, were brought out intelligently by him in his campaign. He advocated particularly the building up of the industrial activities of Texas through its factories and railways, with the view of making a larger product both for labor and the product of the farms and the extension of the present great railway systems to every part of the state where there are none now, especially that every county seat town should have railroad facilities, either steam or interurban.

Mr. Loe married Miss Nellie Lewis of Fayette county, and their two children are a daughter and son: Lola, wife of R. H. Lee; and Ben Loe, of Dallas.

HON. JOHN MITCHEL RIEGER is a member of the bar and for four years has been judge of Comanche county. His earlier career was identified with educational work in this state, and among his former pupils he has a great many warm admirers. He belongs to the class of men who make their start in the world without advantages except those which they themselves secure, and by earnest effort and straightforward conduct in every relation finally reach positions of influence where they perform large service to a community. Judge Rieger belongs to an old family, and his father was one of the prominent pioneer physicians of northwest Texas.

John Mitchel Rieger was born in Freestone county, Texas, in 1868, the oldest in a family of four children still living, whose parents were Dr. John R. and Anna (Mitchel) Rieger. His father was a native of Kentucky and his mother of Arkansas, and the one of German descent and the other of Scotch-Irish lineage. Dr. Rieger came out to Texas in 1859, settling in Parker county, which was his residence until the close of the war, and then began the practice of medicine in what was still a frontier community in Brazos county. Mention should be made of his specially important service to his fellow citizens during the yellow fever epidemic at Millican in Brazos county in 1866-68. From that county he moved his family to Freestone county, continued practice there until 1876, and then established a residence in Hamilton county, where he lived until his death in 1901. During the war Dr. Rieger served as a private in the Nineteenth Texas Regiment. His death occurred when he was sixty-seven years of age, and his life was one of useful service which brought him the highest respect in his community and he was esteemed as a scholar and gentleman. Dr. Rieger was married in 1860, after coming to Texas; and his widow now lives at the old home in Hamilton county. The children besides Judge Rieger are: Albert C., Walton T. and Jewel, wife of Doss Richardson of Indian Gap, Texas.

John Mitchel Rieger spent his boyhood in Freestone and Hamilton counties, had limited educational advantages in the local schools, and then entered Add-Ran College at Thorp Spring in Hood county, a notable old institution which produced many eminent Texas citizens. Both before and after graduation at college he taught school. During 1893-95 he was principal of the high schools of Comanche. His ambitions had directed him to the law at an early age, but the necessity of earning a living had delayed his preparation until he entered the office of Lindsay & Goodson, prominent attorneys of Comanche. Under them he pursued his studies until admitted to practice in the summer of 1895. Almost immediately he began a career of public service. He was elected county attorney for Comanche county, and served during 1896-97-98. After that he was chosen two terms in the state legislature, and served during the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth sessions. The Texas statutes at the present time have in their pages the seduction law of which Judge Rieger was joint author. After devoting himself to private practice for some years at Comanche, in 1907 he was elected county judge of Comanche county, and was re-elected in 1910. Judge Rieger is a Democrat in politics, and also favors the prohibitionist cause. He is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and he and his family worship in the Christian church.

In August, 1894, Judge Rieger married Miss Lizzie Thornton, a native of Tarrant county, Texas, and a daughter of J. W. Thornton, now deceased, who was one of the early pioneers in north Texas. The four children of Judge Rieger and wife are: Goodson H. Rieger, Herman T. Rieger, Hazel Beth and Johnnie Alene.

Judge Rieger has some farming interests in Comanche county, and has a comfortable residence in Comanche city. While he has been closely identified with public affairs, and has led an active career all his life, Judge Rieger is a student both of his profession and of general literature, and much of his time is spent in the enjoyment of his fine law and private library. He numbers as personal friends a great many of the leading men of Texas.

REV. ROBERT COOKE BUCKNER, D. D., LL. D. One of the oldest and most beneficent institutions of the South West Texas is Buckner Orphans Home, located four miles east of Dallas. Of this great Institution Dr. Robert Cooke Buckner is founder, president and general manager. As a practical philanthropy the Home has long attracted the attention of all who are interested in general benevolence and in juvenile care and training. Since, as has been said, "an institution is but the lengthened shadow of a man," this Orphans Home is the result of the ambition, self-sacrifice, and persistent devotion of its founder and head, Dr. R. C. Buckner.

At the present time Buckner Orphans Home possesses a property comprising twenty-three hundred and fourteen acres of fine land, including thirteen hundred acres at the site of the Institution, that by charter provision cannot be sold or alienated and constituting a highly valuable estate. The plant includes as many as thirty cottages besides imposing brick buildings, an electric light service, water works, sewer system, steam heating, steam cooking and laundry. This assemblage of buildings is known as "Buckner Home Village." One of the most prominent features of the Institution is the Buckner Home Academy, where all inmates are educated. The academy is organized with nine grades, and is conducted by an efficient teaching force.

After serving fourteen years faithfully as pastor of the First Baptist Church at Paris, Texas, Rev. Dr. Buckner began his work in behalf of orphans in December, 1876, having in the meantime located in the city of Dallas. The Home was first chartered in 1879, and was opened in a rented cottage at Dallas with three children December 2, 1879. In September, 1880, forty-four acres of land were purchased for seven hundred and forty-eight dollars as the nucleus of the splendid estate now owned by the Home. The first building was a wooden structure erected in the spring of 1881. By adding to the realty holdings at intervals and by improvements the Home has been developed until it comprises a property in the city of Dallas, known as Buckner Home Annex, and the extensive grounds east of Dallas, with a splendid equipment for the housing, feeding, instruction and general training of the orphans who are so fortunate as to gain admittance.

In his thirty-second annual report for the year ending in November, 1911, the founder of the Home used a graphic method of indicating the growth of the Institution at its successive stages. His language is quoted for the most part in the following brief paragraphs with such changes as are necessary in order to furnish an appropriate history of the Home up to the close of 1914.

"Then (at the beginning), we had no property, opened work in a rented cottage in Dallas April 10, 1879. Now we own that property, 200 feet on Haskell avenue, 420 feet on Junius street, a beautiful corner lawn. It is worth forty thousand dollars, is not taxable, and can neither be sold nor mortgaged.

"Then we had but three children, one from Ellis county, two from Collin.—Later on we built on that lawn two large houses, and established the Children's Hospital and Buckner Home Annex; the Annex is for ten days' detention of children before they enter the Home proper, a precautionary measure to keep out infectious and contagious diseases. The Children's Hospital did a great work for many years, sometimes caring for as many as forty child patients at the same time; it has recently been moved out of the way to give place for a modern fireproof hospital for orphans and other children needing its benefits.—Later on, we bought forty-four acres of ground in the country, put up a two-story frame house, moved the three children from the cottage, adding others, increasing the family to sixty-six.—Later on great brick and concrete buildings were erected, and several modern cottages on separate yards were erected and the family increased to largely more than six hundred; and it is estimated that we have had the care of eight thousand dependents.—Now, the Home owns at the country site thirteen hundred and fourteen acres, including yards, lawns, gardens, lots, Vienna Park of thirty-five acres, large pastures, extensive meadows and farm fields, all paid for, non-taxable, and can neither be sold nor mortgaged.

"Then, the only building the Home owned was a cedar log cabin, valuable only because it was the first house built in all this part of Texas (1841); was Dallas' first residence, Dallas county's first postoffice, and first courthouse.—Now, the Home at the country site, besides barns, outbuildings, shops, etc., has thirty houses, occupied by the orphan children and their caretakers, matrons, teachers, cultivators of the soil and other helpers.

"Then, there was no room for babies.—Later on, Blankenship Nursery was opened in a room eighteen feet by fifty in the girls' brick building, for children from five to eight years old.—Now we have Providence Nursery for babies from five years down. For its quarters noble Christian mothers made it possible to erect a large one-story fire proof building of concrete, and it stands on its own grassy lawn.

"Then, in case of sickness we had to send on horseback for the doctor, and to all departments in case of fire.—Now the Home owns a local telephone plant, connecting twenty-five departments and apartments with each other through the main office, and the doctor's residence, at some distance. We are also connected with the Dallas public telephone system, long distance included.

"Then, we had no place for the care of orphans afflicted with tuberculosis.—Now we have, a mile distant, on high dry ground, seven cottages for such afflicted ones.

"Then, we had no place for the care of aged, broken-down preachers and other worthy, dependent, old people.—Now, for such we have a village of seven cottages, each in a separate yard, and room for more.

"Then, we had one sewing machine.—Now, we have a dozen sewing machines in several departments; and in the main sewing room we have a solid table forty feet long, mounted with heavy Singer Company manufacturing machines, all run by an electric motor.

"Then, for water supply we had one cistern.—Now, we have a half dozen surface wells, a dozen cisterns, three iron tanks above ground. The three have a total capacity of 98,800 gallons, the grand total over ground reserve capacity is 105,000 gallons. On the city property there is a six-inch artesian well; and at the country site an artesian well, 2,325 feet deep, with capacity of 250,000 gallons daily.

"Then, water was served from a single wooden bucket suspended by a rope from the back porch ceiling, to protect it from thirsty cats.—Now, water is served for all purposes from one hundred and ninety-seven hydrants, connected with lateral pipes from the water mains, that are kept full by pressure from the elevated tanks.

"Then, in case of fire we could only use water from the bucket, cook vessels and wet blankets.—Now, we have a fire department, and besides a chemical engine have two lines of two and one-half inch hose that throw streams of water from six fire plugs on the lawn, to the top of the highest buildings.

"Then, we had only a family cook stove in a room ten by fourteen feet.—Now, we have a brick kitchen forty-five by fifty feet, under gravel roof and metallic ceiling, and with a cement floor. This is furnished with a dough mixer of two hundred pounds of flour capacity; a potato peeler and a potato masher; the same is adapted to run a revolving churn. The cook range is fourteen feet long.

"Then, when we had stock we drove them miles to water. That creek is now dry much of the time.—Later on and now the pastures are well supplied with stock water from artificial ponds or lakes, covering several acres, and never dry.

"Then, there was one horse and one cow.—Now there are one hundred head of cattle, including calves and dry cows; eight head of horses, including colts; ten head of jacks and jennets; fifteen head of work mules; fourteen hogs, including pigs, and thirty-seven goats.

"Then, one of the boys had a jews-harp. Now, without drawing on contributions sent in to support the Home, friends of their own choice have given articles in kind and means to buy with, seven pianos, two violins, one organ, three guitars, six mandolins, sheet music, song books, etc., until we have a good orchestra, splendid choir and almost universal congregational singing, equal to what you hear in city churches or in country revivals, and our children are at home in all such places.

"Then, the family washing was done on a scrub board in a tub.—Now, it is done in a steam laundry.

"Then, there were only three fire-places for heating.—Now, the Home has its own steam-heating plant, using exhaust steam principally, from the power house. Besides there are thirty-six fire-places and twelve heating stoves.

"Then, the lighting was from two kerosene lamps.—Now, the Home has its own electric light plant, with a capacity of two thousand lamps of sixteen candle power each; also at the city department thirty-five electric lights.

"Then, flour was bought by the single sack and at the rented cottage. At the beginning the founder and manager would sometimes at night carry a sack on his shoulder from the business part of the city. When moved to the country site he did the same thing, from the railroad a mile distant, sometimes in mud shoe-mouth deep.—Later on, supplies were hauled on a wagon from the city, over bad, black land roads. It always spoiled a day to make the round trip, and sometimes the wagon stuck in the mud, was abandoned till next day, unless a fresh team could be sooner found.—Now flour is bought at wholesale and hauled out on the Home's own automobile trucks over a good gravel road, making the round trip in an hour and thirty minutes, including the time for loading.

"Then, we had no school; but later on the children at school and chapel service were crowded into a small unsuited room.—Now, there is a large school and chapel building with annex, all of reinforced monolithic concrete and brick, properly furnished, with school on the first floor, conducted in seven rooms, a forenoon and an afternoon school, consisting of different pupils; the children dividing their time, four hours in school, four hours at work or play. These do not include the kindergarten nor the nursery department. The chapel is on the second floor, well ventilated, steam heated, lighted with electric lights, and furnished with modern chapel chairs.

"Then, the first dining room was 14x18 feet.—Later on, in the girls' brick building the dining space was 24x130 feet; added later a hall 24x100 feet. There are also five small dining rooms in the various departments.—Now, we have beautiful Manna Hall for a family dining room, separate from other buildings, in dimensions 96x126 feet, strictly fire-proof and amply supplied with tables and all things necessary, especially with children.

"Then, we had one matron.—Now there are seven matrons and a number of assistants.

"Then, we had no forces to organize.—Now, we have an organization, close but conservative, founded on common sense, business principles and extensive experience; an organization of trained officials (including veterans and experts), old and young, for counsel and executive capacity; officials, helpers and laborers. One matron has been with us twenty-seven years, three were reared here; another has fifteen years' experience with us.

"The superintendent of Buckner Orphans Home, my own son, Joe Dudley Buckner, has grown up in the work; and is dividing burdens with me that might sometimes have made me stoop-shouldered.

"Then, a memorandum book three and a half by five and a half inches kept all the records the first year and a pen and bottle of ink did all the writing, including correspondence.—Later on, I wore out a typewriter myself, then gave one of the orphans lessons in shorthand and typewriting, from which has come into the family an unbroken line of stenographers and typewriters.—Now, we have our own experts in stenography, book-keeping, correspondence and office helpers of every kind.

We have a large office, too; large and well furnished by the generosity of Deacon Hal E. White, of Lancaster, Texas. The office is in the great concrete and brick academy building and is itself independently fire-proof, also has a large vault and an iron safe, four business desks, three typewriters, etc."

The founder and president of the Buckner Orphans Home, though with more than sixty years of arduous labors to his credit, is still living, and notwithstanding he is now in the eighty-second year of his age is active and vigorous in the daily performance of all duties, privileges and obligations, as the efficient head and general manager of the Institution. And by standing resolution of the Board of Directors, reaffirmed at each annual meeting for many years, he is to hold this position through life unless removed by resignation or otherwise. But it is expressly provided that no successor shall be similarly clothed with authority.

It is but a matter of justice in this connection to explain Rev. Mr. Buckner's official and business relations with the Home. The facts of the case were set forth several years ago in a special report prepared under the authority of the board of directors of the Home. While as general manager Mr. Buckner bought property on his own judgment and personal credit, and made improvements and assumed the financial obligations personally, all deeds for property were made to the Home as a corporation, and no individual owned or was able to claim or inherit any interest in the property. Quoting directly from the report: "Dr. Buckner repeatedly mortgaged or otherwise encumbered his own property to secure unencumbered titles to the lands bought for the Home. Up to this period (the time when the inmates numbered sixty-five) the manager had never received a dollar for his work, but made as a free will offering all the time, care, toil and anxiety which, with the aid of good friends, had founded and enlarged what was even then recognized as a large and flourishing Institution. He afterwards gave eight hundred dollars at one time and two thousand dollars at another, besides other amounts at intervals. At the close of each of several years he has paid bills and squared the books by personal donations, when expenses had run hundreds of dollars above receipts. In the year 1906 he declined $1,000 a year for each of three years the board had voted him $2,500, and has never accepted over $1,500 for any year's work. This year (1906) he gave the Home $1,579.71 cash and is carrying in notes and contracts for the Home $23,876. At another time he gave $2,000. In addition he has in the last ten years left in the treasury and expended on the betterment of the Home $5,000 of the salary voted to him during these years by the board."

Robert C. Buckner was born in Tennessee in January, 1833, a son of Daniel and Mary (Hampton) Buckner, natives of South and North Carolina respectively. His father became a Baptist minister, and began preaching in 1823. Besides Robert C. Buckner his brother H. F. Buckner was one of the ablest missionaries among the Creek Indians, and spent most of his life in work in behalf of that nation.

Rev. Robert C. Buckner was reared in Kentucky, educated himself for the ministry, and in 1859 moved to Texas and for about fourteen years was pastor of the Baptist church in Paris. He then became the founder, and for ten years was the editor and proprietor of the Texas Baptist. For many years his has been one of the best known names in the Baptist denomination of Texas and the entire country. He has been for twenty years president of the Baptist General Convention of Texas.

Dr. Buckner married in 1854 Miss Vienna Long in Kentucky. The children are: Mary Bell Coleman; Maggie B. Goode; Addie Beddoe; Joe Dudley Buckner; and Hal F. Buckner.

The children, all with families of their own, are practical Christians. Three of them are actively enlisted in the work of the Orphans Home. Mrs. Coleman is girls' matron and musical director. Mrs. Beddoe was matron some years ago, and now is matron at the Annex in the city. Joe Dudley is superintendent, as before stated. Mrs. Goode, in widowhood, has cared for her three living children, bringing them up to honorable maturity. Hal F. Buckner is a missionary at Canton, China, and occupies a professorship in the Graves Theological Seminary of that city. A grandson, Robert E. Beddoe, M. D., is a medical missionary at Yingtak, China. The missionary son and grandson, with their families, comprise what is known as the "Buckner Colony" in China.

But above them all the honored mother, now in her seventy-eighth year and still active, deserves a special meed of praise. She has never been personally identified with the orphan work, but has been faithful in self-denial and as a wise counselor and a balance-wheel.

HON. WILLIAM F. ROBERTSON. In December, 1913, William F. Robertson announced his candidacy for the nomination at the July primaries of 1914 for the office of Governor of Texas. Judge Robertson, who comes of a family of strong and able men, has been a resident of Texas thirty years, has practiced law since 1886, and by service in local office and in the legislature has unusual experience to qualify him for the high office he seeks.

In announcing his candidacy, and in conformity with the usual customs in such matters, Mr. Robertson published his platform of principles and views on public policy which would guide him in his administration should he be successful in gaining the office, and his platform is a splendid document displaying advanced and progressive ideas on matters that directly affect the business and civic interests of the people of Texas.

In his platform Judge Robertson put in the foremost place the subject of education, and two or three brief quotations will indicate the spirit of his opinions in this direction: "Approximately 70 per cent of the scholastic population of this state reside in the rural districts. Make it possible, by amendments to the school law, for the farmer to give his children an education in the community in which he lives equal to that enjoyed by those residing in the towns and cities, and the disposition to leave the farm will be lessened and a spirit of independence will be aroused. Where practicable, rural school districts should be consolidated. . . . To establish the rural schools upon a higher basis, the people should be permitted to vote such tax for their support as the tax-payers are willing to assume. If it be necessary to remove Constitutional restrictions in order to accomplish this, it should be done. . . . Compulsory attendance upon schools for a definite period during each year for all within scholastic age is the plan by which thousands of children can be saved from lives of ignorance. . . . I favor the passage of a statute making it unlawful for any parent or guardian to fail or neglect to cause anyone within scholastic age, who is under their control as child or ward, to attend some public or private school for a definite period of months in each year." Furthermore, Judge Robertson maintains that the state should not spare its resources in keeping up and improving the higher institutions of education, and in view of the fact that the legislature is prohibited by the Constitution from levying a tax or appropriating money out of the general revenues for building improvements of the State University, he favors an amendment to the Constitution authorizing some such special tax to supplement the income derived from the university lands.

Probably the most conspicuous feature of Judge Robertson's platform are his proposals affecting the interests of the farmer, and particularly the cotton grower. Cotton is the greatest product of Texas and the south, and yet such is the lack of organization among the producers, and so completely is the speculator master of the markets, that the grower loses nearly one-half of the profit, most of which goes into the pockets of the speculator. Judge

Robertson called attention to the fact that over a period from 1904 to 1912 the average price received by the farmer for cotton was 9.24 cents per pound, while the average price paid by the manufacturer was 14.85 cents a pound. Thus in the nine years the manufacturers paid the enormous sum of $3,253,742,720 more for the cotton than the farmer received. "From the above we are forced to the conclusion that the Texas farmers should have been paid in 1913 at least sixty million dollars more than they received for the crop. No other business could sustain such a loss and avoid absolute bankruptcy. The cotton producers are saved from financial ruin by free labor—that of their wives and children. If they were compelled to hire the labor under the present so-called system, the cotton could not be produced in Texas." To remedy such conditions Judge Robertson advocates the abolition by the Federal government of the iniquitous system of gambling in futures with no intention of delivering the article sold on exchanges and in the state of Texas he proposes the grading of cotton should be taken from the present sole control of the buyers, and the office of public cotton grader should be created, there should be state supervision and control of public warehouses, and there should be established a marketing bureau, to be placed under the supervision of the Commissioner of Agriculture, the duties of which should be to distribute information and facilitate the marketing of the surplus crop to the greatest advantage to the producer.

Judge Robertson also advocated the placing of the charitable and reform institutions of the state on a cash financial basis and under strictly non-partisan control. Recognizing the necessity of good roads, he advocated the creation of the office of a state highway engineer. He would also improve the present election laws to insure an honest expression of the voters' will. On the prohibition, Judge Robertson maintains the position that the agitation over state-wide prohibition is detrimental to the best interests of the people of Texas, and that the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors should be left to the people in each county. He also favors an amendment to the constitution granting equal franchise to both men and women.

The spirit of his attitude towards the office of governor, Judge Robertson defined in the following words: "The tendency as never before, in state and nation, is for more direct rule by the people. This new spirit of government demands that each public servant shall recognize as his only ruler the majority of the people. If elected governor, I shall at all times be obedient to this principle, and the business of that office will be transacted with open doors. I shall take the liberty of calling in for consultation, upon questions affecting the general welfare, representative men of the various professions, vocations and lines of business. A candidate for office should be moved only by the desire to do good for the state and for the people."

William F. Robertson was born in Roane county, Tennessee, the youngest son of Dr. James R. and Mary (Hunt) Robertson. Several other members of the family gained distinction in public affairs. His oldest brother was the late Colonel John W. Robertson, who died at Austin in 1892, has served with the rank of colonel in the Sixty-third Tennessee Infantry in the Confederate army, was later a member of the Texas legislature and was mayor of the city of Austin. Another brother, also deceased, was Judge James H. Robertson, one of the ablest members of the Texas bar and for many years a partner of Governor James S. Hogg. Joseph W. Robertson, next to the oldest brother, still lives in Austin, where he has practiced law for many years.

William F. Robertson attended the common schools in his native county, later completed the course at the Sweetwater College at Sweetwater, Tennessee, and then for two years taught in the primary department of the college, at the head of which at that time was Professor John Lynn Bachman, one of the distinguished educators of the south. Coming in 1883 to Texas, Mr. Robertson located in Williamson county, and spent two years teaching school. In 1885 he entered the law school of the University of Texas at Austin, graduated in the class of 1886, having been a student under Governor O. M. Roberts and Judge R. S. Gould, both of whom have served as chief justice in the supreme court of Texas.

Mr. Robertson began the practice of law at Taylor in Williamson county in 1886. His success and standing as a lawyer are hardly second to any in the state. In 1903 he moved from Taylor to Austin, and subsequently spent considerable time in New York city representing business interests with which he had become connected in Texas. In 1910 he moved to Dallas, which city has since been his home, and he is general attorney for the National Surety Company in the Southwest and represents other important interests.

Judge Robertson was elected city attorney of Taylor in 1893, and in 1896 was elected county judge of Williamson county and re-elected in 1898. Chosen a member of the legislature from Williamson county, he served through the sessions of 1901 and 1903. He took an active part in various phases of legislation, was chairman of the Railroad Commission committee and the Committee on Public Service Corporations, and a member of several other committees, and took a leading part in trying to secure the submission of the Hogg amendments to the Constitution.

Judge Robertson was married at Austin to Miss Anne Dowling. Mrs. Robertson is the daughter of the famous Major Dick Dowling, hero of the battle of Sabine Pass fought in September, 1863. Mrs. Robertson is one of the best known women in Texas and a leader in anything she undertakes. At the annual reunion of the veterans of Dick Dowling Camp of Houston in September, 1913, just half a century after the battle of Sabine Pass, Judge Robertson was the orator of the day in the memorial services held by the camp. The battle at Sabine Pass was not only a great exploit from a military point of view, but deserves a lasting remembrance in the annals of Texas because it forever saved Texas from invasion by the army of the north. Major Dowling in the fort hastily constructed at Sabine Pass, had a company of only forty-two men, with six small guns, and this splendid garrison engaged in battle four gun-boats and eighteen transports of the enemy, and in the end two gunboats with three hundred and fifty prisoners were captured, ninety-four of the enemy slain, and the rest of the fleet was driven back to sea. Dowling lost not a single man in the conflict.

HAROLD L. WARWICK, M. D. In writing of the life and achievements of Dr. Harold L. Warwick, brevity is demanded, not because of any lack of accomplishment on the part of the doctor, but because of the dearth of facts at the command of the writer of this review. Little is known beyond the more salient facts of Dr. Warwick's career, and such information as is at hand is here set forth briefly.

Dr. Warwick was born in Macon, Georgia, on November 8, 1877, and is a son of Thomas F. and Eleanor (MacArdle) Warwick, both of Georgia. He was educated at the University of Georgia, and was graduated from that institution in 1900 with the degree of M. D. After some little practice, he entered upon a post graduate course of study at the New York Eye & Ear Infirmary in 1901 and 1902, bent upon fitting himself for special service in that department, and in 1903 studied at the Chicago Eye, Ear & Nose Hospital. It was not until 1910 that Dr. Warwick came to Texas, locating in Fort Worth, where he has since conducted a large practice, confined wholly to diseases of the eye, ear and nose. His success has been exceptional, and he has given some attention to the improvement of the instruments used in his department of surgical work, securing patents on a number of highly improved instruments that are now in universal use among eye, ear and nose physicians.

Dr. Warwick married Miss Lydia Houston of Savannah,

Georgia, who is a relative of General Sam Houston, the famous Texan, and the great-granddaughter of a near relative of Sir Henry Elmer of the British peerage.

Dr. Warwick is comparatively young in years, but is well advanced in experience, and his success in his profession is in advance of that of the average man of his age. He possesses a striking personality, in the making of which many excellent traits have been fused, and one of his dominant characteristics is his inclination to express himself openly and frankly, and with all firmness and decision. He is steadily forging ahead in his profession, and the future yet holds in store for him many professional advancements.

J. D. WHEELAN. The distinction of being the pioneer in the moving picture films business of Texas is sufficient to give Mr. Wheelan a recognition among the leading business men of that great state. Mr. Wheelan has been a resident of Texas since 1901, and is now president of the Mutual Film Corporation of Texas, and his home is in Dallas.

Born near Lexington, Kentucky, where he was reared and educated, receiving his early business training in Chicago, where his earlier years were spent, J. D. Wheelan came to Texas in 1901. Mr. Wheelan possesses the initiative and enthusiasm of the born salesman, and much of his early business experience was in that line. Previous to his relations with the moving picture industry, he was connected with a phonograph house in Dallas. His unusual success is accentuated by the fact that he started in life without influence or money, and is now one of the leading men in a great industry that is said to rank fifth in commercial importance among the various classes of commercial undertakings in the United States.

It is superfluous to comment on the value of the motion picture as a source of popular entertainment and instruction. No other form of amusement has been developed so rapidly, has come so intimately into popular approval, and has come so universally and permanently into the common life of the people. So firmly established is the motion picture that it is difficult to realize that ten years ago it was in its crude stages of manufacture and use. While the first machines were perfected for the reproduction of animated scenes some fifteen or sixteen years ago, the motion picture was not really made popular until about ten years ago. It was the establishment of picture show houses in all the important towns and cities of the country and the development of manufacturers to a point where films could be distributed readily and in great variety that marked the practical success of the present industry. In this business of distributing motion picture films to picture show houses in Texas John D. Wheelan was the pioneer. He began in 1905 in Dallas. As an individual he undertook the distribution of films for the few film companies then in existence. By 1908 there had been an improvement both in the quality of pictures and in the organization of the industry, and Mr. Wheelan took charge for Texas of a film service representing all the leading film makers of the time. In 1909 the Motion Picture Patents Company, a combination of a number of leading concerns, was organized, with Mr. Wheelan as the Texas representative. These films he handled under the name of the J. D. Wheelan Film Company, which he had organized in 1908 and of which he was president and general manager. His interests in this company were sold in October, 1910, to other stockholders, but the business was continued under the same name until the early part of 1911, when the entire stock of the J. D. Wheelan Company was taken over by the General Film Company. Mr. Wheelan then became connected with other film interests, and on September 3, 1912, incorporated them under the firm name Mutual Film Corporation of Texas, of which he is president and the largest stockholder. This corporation handles exclusively in Texas what are widely known as the "Mutual Movies," composed of films manufactured by the following noted concerns: Keystone, Reliance, Majestic, Thanhauser, American, Kay Bee, Broncho, Beauty, Domino, Mutual Weekly and others.

A notable enterprise in the moving picture field was recently conducted by Mr. Wheelan. In February, 1914, he went to Juarez, Mexico, where with his staff of operators, representing the Mutual Film Corporation, he joined the great revolutionary leader General Villa under a contract for the exclusive privilege of making motion pictures of the war against the Federal government in Mexico. He was with Villa's army in the various campaigns and battles up to and including the battle of Torreón, and made many pictures of thrilling war scenes which have aroused the greatest interest and sensation wherever shown. While with the army he also staged and produced the story of the life of Villa, which is equal in interest and romance to that of the war pictures.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF HONORABLE WALLER SAUNDERS BAKER.—The Honorable Waller S. Baker was born in Lexington, Kentucky, March 30, 1855. His father, John H. Baker, was of Irish Welsh extraction and was a native of Lexington, Kentucky. He married Miss Amanda Saunders of Shelby County, Kentucky, in 1846. When Waller Baker was still a child his parents moved to McLennan County, Texas, and located on a farm near the present town of Crawford. Mr. Baker in youth attended the public schools and later entered Baylor University, from which institution he graduated with honors in 1875 at the age of twenty years.

After graduation he studied law in the office of General Thomas Harrison, and on his twenty-first birthday made application for license to practice law. Some ten years after admission to the bar he wooed and won the hand and heart of Miss Mary Mills of Galveston. They married January 14, 1886. Mr. Baker practiced law and spent all of the years of his life in Waco, Texas. He died suddenly while walking the streets of San Francisco, where he was spending his vacation, September 9, 1913.

Mr. Baker had the bearing and appearance of an aristocrat, but he instinctively revolted at despotism, and his sympathies were always with the common people. He took an active part in the community life, and was always fond of lending a helping hand to the struggling masses. The glamor of youth and place and power had no charm for him. He preferred to take his place in the ranks of the people, and was always ready to fight their battles, and to bear their burdens. He was fair in the estimate of wealth, and just in his judgment as to his rights, but wealth according to his thinking was never a factor in determining the worth of a man. Not what a man had, but what he was, was always to him the test of sterling worth.

Mr. Baker was a remarkable man. At whatever angle he is viewed he is equally admirable. His varied characteristics acting as checks and balances reacting one upon another, made him so well rounded and symmetrical in his mental and moral proportions that to the casual observer he did not appear as massive as he really was. With his courage, his fierce love of mastery, his faith in himself and his unyielding fidelity to his convictions, he would have been a tyrant to be dreaded, but over against these characteristics was arrayed a gentleness that was almost womanly, a broad, exhaustless charity for his fellow man and a keen appreciation of the rights of his neighbor and of his obligations to him. These opposite characteristics, reacting one upon another, wrought out that strong, harmonious, symmetrical character, the like of which we shall scarcely see again.

He was one of the most unselfish of men. The night was never too dark or the day too hot or too cold for him to serve a friend, and he had that rarer quality of serving those who had no claim on his friendship other than that they were human beings, and in need of help. Could all his deeds of charity to the needy, of kindness to the stricken and of helpfulness to the struggling be written, it would make an astonishing record. He was especially the friend of the struggling young man. His cultured home was always open to him, and within its hospitable precincts many, very many, of this class received encouragement and inspiration that helped them to conquer life's battles.

Mr. Baker early in life chose the law as his profession. By hard labor, coupled with his natural ability, he soon gained an honorable place at the Waco Bar, and it was not long ere he was recognized as a lawyer of ability throughout the state. He never desired or sought judicial honors, but preferred the active part of a practitioner at the bar.

With him the profession of law was not a mere means of a livelihood, that was only an incident. It was not a business, but a great and noble profession, set for the defense of right and the attainment of justice by and through legal methods. And hence, his conduct as an attorney in his office and in the court room was always on a high plane. He never sought an unjust advantage, never asked a ruling of the court he did not believe to be in the interest of justice, and never forgot the honor due to the court or lowered his own dignity as its officer. He was a strong adversary. No man ever met him at the bar or on the hustings that did not recognize him as a foeman worthy of his steel. He always fought in the open, gave blow for blow, asked no quarter, and fearlessly stood for what he believed to be right. He never went into the trial of a case unprepared, he knew his own side and that of his adversary. He never suffered a surprise. Never was there a fairer adversary, seldom one harder to overcome. Yet our brother made no enemies. When the smoke of the conflict cleared away the heat and acrimony passed with it, and there was not a corner in his great, loving, manly heart where a corroding spark of malice could hide itself. Mr. Baker's ideals as a lawyer were high, and he counted not the cost to himself in measuring up towards them. Determining when a young man to make a great lawyer of himself, he never for one moment swerved from his purpose. Gifted with a rugged constitution and a vast capacity for labor, he taxed both to the limit of endurance to compass his ambition, and how well he succeeded the bench and bar of Texas know. Though burdened with a large practice, he never ceased to study, and hence to grow, and when death claimed him, his mind was still fresh and active and strong as in his early manhood, but he did not go till he had attained his ambition, so it might be truthfully written on his tombstone, "Here lies a great lawyer."

Mr. Baker never sought political preferment, but all ways took an active and progressive part in political matters, both local, state and national. While yet young, he was elected chairman of the Democratic Executive Committee of McLennan County. Later, in 1892, he was nominated by the Democrats of his congressional district as Presidential Elector, and after his election to this position in November of that year he went to Austin, and cast the vote of his district for Grover Cleveland for president. While Mr. Baker never sought political honors, he did, at the solicitation of his friends, serve the people as a senator in the Texas Legislature for one term.

At the noted and historic Democratic State Convention that met at Houston in 1892, Mr. Baker was a strong and active supporter of James Stephen Hogg for governor. On account of his wide influence, known executive ability, and wisdom in the affairs of state, he was elected chairman of the State Democratic Executive Committee. The campaign between Hogg and Clark was the most historic one ever waged in the state, and through it all Mr. Baker was the most conspicuous figure, with the exception of the two candidates for governor. He was the most important factor in the battle of the ballots that gave the victory to Hogg, whose cause he championed before the people.

The election of Governor Hogg left the Texas Democracy in a condition that was far from desirable, for the division between the two factions was of acrimonious character, and on both sides Democrats deplored the situation and saw that it must bring greater danger to the party if the breach should remain permanent. No man saw this more clearly than Waller Baker, and it was due to his patriotic and unselfish nature that efforts were early set on foot to heal the breach and bring both wings of the party to honorable and friendly adjustment. He was a leader in this movement, putting aside personal ambitions and opportunities that he might have realized, simply desirous of peace in the party, and this consummation was attained early in the year 1894. There was a memorable gathering of the leaders of the two wings in Dallas in March, 1894, and peace was brought about on a basis honorable and mutually satisfactory. In those eventful years Mr. Baker was thrown with the prominent men of Texas, meaning men prominent in politics, and he made and cemented friendships that existed even after new and more acrimonious issues developed to divide the party, and place men in rival camps. There is hardly a man who has been prominent in Texas politics during the past twenty-five years who has not been more or less associated with Waller Baker during those years—some his adherents and co-laborers, others in the rival camp, but all respected him because of his ability and his sterling manhood. And thus it came to pass that this man, never ambitious to seek high place for himself, was content to work for the common weal and to give his party the influence and power which he felt it deserved to wield. He could easily have won political honors had he sought them. It was generally conceded that he could have succeeded Hogg as governor of the state, but he preferred the practice of his profession and public service in the ranks of the people.

Mr. Baker was a philanthropist in the highest and truest sense of that term. He was a friend and helper to everyone in distress. Few knew of the many benefactions of which he was the author. His charity was broad. He did not count it a sacrifice to serve a friend. His counsel was free to widows in distress, his purse was open to the orphan in need. His helping hand was always extended with good cheer to the struggling youth, striving to make life worth while. He was unassuming in all of this work for the good of others, and perhaps it is now too sacred, admirable as it is, to be published for public view. In this philanthropic work, as in all the other affairs of life, it was his good fortune to have as a comrade and as a companion a wife who always entered into his plans and his purposes. They were congenial by nature and temperament and she possessed the traits and accomplishments to make in the best sense of the word a companion and helpmeet to a man of intellect and splendid purpose, and the result was a wedded life of happiness and mutual devotion. She entered actively and loyally and with all the pride of an intellectual and ambitious woman into the life of the man whose name she had taken, and whose purposes and ideals became hers. Each found in the other what husband and wife should most desire. They had a happy and attractive home. It was a home where hospitality, refinement and culture were exemplified, and many there are who can testify how pleasant it was to linger in that hospitable and happy home, to note there what may be possible in home life. His last words were: "I am dying, and I want my wife."

The lives of three distinguished citizens had much to do with the shaping of Mr. Baker's character. When youth was ripening into manhood he came under the instruction of Dr. Rufus C. Burleson, the great teacher and benefactor. After years of association in college halls with this noble character, he found himself next in the law office of General Thomas Harrison, who was for many years the ornament and leader of the Texas bar. In the mature years of his life he became the bosom companion of Richard Coke, the lion of Texas Democracy. From the first of these, Mr. Baker imbibed his broad spirit of charity, and his love of mankind. From the second he was taught ethics and ideals of the legal profession, and from his association with the third he was inspired with the courageous and patriotic consideration of all public questions.

Mr. Baker died while yet in the prime of his mature manhood. He sleeps beside the grave of his father in Oakwood Cemetery in Waco, in the sod and amidst the scenes he loved so well. His death was not only a loss to the community where he resided, but to the state at large. People from all walks of life gathered at his grave to pay their last tender tribute. Perhaps there was never a funeral in Waco so largely and universally attended as was the last sad rites paid at the bier of this distinguished citizen. Perhaps no more fitting sketch of his life could be printed here than the address of his law partner, delivered at his funeral, which is as follows:

TRIBUTE OF AN ASSOCIATE.

Pat N. Neff, Law Partner, Delivers an Eulogy to the Dead.

In part he said:

"The bereaved family, on account of my intimate and professional association with Mr. Baker, expressed a desire that on this unspeakably sad and exceedingly solemn occasion, I say a few parting words. Thought, however, is bankrupt when we stand in the presence of the dead, and language is indeed a poor vehicle in which to convey one's true sentiments when he realizes that the cold clods of the cemetery are about to hide from view his closest friend and most intimate associate. It has always been considered proper, though, for relatives and loved ones to gather about the casket, and, as a last tender tribute, mingle together their tears as they recall the virtues of the departed.

"Seemingly as quick as the lightning's brief reflection, Mr. Baker was taken from the busy walks of men, to join the innumerable hosts that sweep with silent tread each hour through the open gates of the grave. I have not yet been able to realize that he has gone forever from among us. During the last few days as I have sat in our office, his office no more, bereft and bereaved as it was of its noblest adornment, it seemed that I could still feel the kindly touch of his manly hand, see the genial smile of his honored face, and hear once more the mellow tones of his counseling voice. As I am, however, now forced to know that the mantle of decay wraps his dreamless dust, that only a little while ago moved among us with a life that seemed immortal, and that now we must place him beneath the sacred sod to await the resurrection day, there is nothing the holy hush of the hour would permit my lips to say except to recall, as a blessing and a benediction to broken hearts, the glad some sunshine and the sweet recollection that will come from his abiding memory, the richest legacy he has left behind him.

"His Personality.—On account of Mr. Baker's fine physique, manly mould, imposing personality, decorous conduct, polished manner and innate dignity, some people on casual acquaintance thought him to be of an aristocratic turn, while in truth at heart his emotions were of the purest democratic type, and his thoughts were always of and for the people. He repeated while away on his last trip that which he had stated at home, to the effect that at the end of this year he expected to retire from the active practice of law and devote the larger part of his time to writing articles and publicly discussing certain questions touching the commercialization of the age which he thought some one not a candidate for office ought to openly espouse. He loved the people for the people's sake. His thoughts were always for the enlightenment and uplift of humanity, and his heart beat to its utmost verge in patriotic devotion to his country. He paid as little attention to the empty honors of place and the paltry distinctions of power as any man among us. He appreciated a man and a friend for what he was, not what he had. He thought more of Dan Ford, as the cowboy friend of his youth, and appreciated more keenly his honest hand-clasp than he did the fawning friendship and the bejeweled handshake of many a distinguished latter-day acquaintance. The friends of Waller S. Baker's youth, be it said to his credit, were the friends of his life, and when across the continent the wires flashed the news of his untimely death, they were the first to pay tribute to his sterling worth.

"His Private Life.—When we stand by the tomb of the departed, the glamor and glory of genius, the worth and witchery of wealth, the pomp and power of place are forgotten, and we measure the memory of the man, not as he was before the footlights, not as he was listening to the plaudits of the passing throng, but as he was in the privacy of life, as he was in lifting high the ideals of his profession, as he was in rendering service to those about him. Measured by these standards, Waller Baker walked like Saul of old, head and shoulders above the men of his profession, and the citizenship of his day. In the privacy of his office, as like a great general, he outlined his plans and marshalled his forces for a great legal battle, he not only acted right, but he always thought right, and he possessed at all times the highest ideals and the keenest sense of professional honor, and he never lowered that high standard amid the clash and the conflict of the courtroom. As a lawyer he never worked in brush too thick, nor in timber too high to be seen, but always moved on the open prairie in the clear, white light of the unclouded day. As was stated at the bar meeting by one who has practiced law with him for thirty-five years, you never had to reduce an agreement made with Mr. Baker to writing in order to make it binding. The last case we counselled about before going to the court room, I suggested a certain line of procedure. He said no, we can not do that. Without knowing what had gone before, I insisted on it. He replied, 'We cannot do that, because I gave the lawyer on the other side some time ago my word that we would not raise that question.' Above all people on earth, the lawyer should be true to himself, and then he cannot be false to any client. The most confidential relation between man and man is the relation of attorney and client. A man will not always follow the prescription of the physician who looks after his body; he will not always emulate the precepts of the preacher who ministers to his soul; but he will always follow with implicit faith and unyielding devotion the advice of his lawyer in whose hands he places either his property or his life. Mr. Baker was a great lawyer, not altogether because he had an analytical mind, nor because he won victories in the court room, but because in all his vast and varied practice he never betrayed that high and sacred trust that binds together the conscientious counselor and the confiding client. His falling into the arms of death, like the falling of a mighty oak in the forest, left a gap in the sky and a chasm in the earth amidst the membership of the Waco bar.

"Kindly Acts.—I do not hesitate to say that Mr. Baker and his good wife—God bless her in her lonely bereavement—have been father and mother to more boys and girls in Waco than any other two individuals in all our midst. Each mutually and beautifully surpassed the other in scattering with a loving hand blessings along the needy pathway of many a youth to fame and fortune unknown. They have been a help, a hope and an inspiration to many a struggling lad who was fighting alone the single-handed battle of life. Their home has been open, and his office has been free. There has scarcely been a time for twenty-five years that Mr. Baker did not have in and around his office some ambitious youth who was receiving instructions and encouragement from his lips, and money from his pocket. They love him for it, and there is not one but who will pause today and place with loving hands a sweet forget-me-not above his new-made grave. 'To live in hearts we leave behind is not to die.'

'It has been said that a private secretary after long service never thinks that his employer is either great or good, and yet the little stenographer who for five long years has sat in Mr. Baker's office and taken his dictation, sings his praises everywhere; and when, a few mornings ago, I broke to her the sad news, she said, with a trembling form and fast descending tears, 'He has been more than a father to me. I have lost my best friend.' Last spring the little legless girl who sits along Fourth street, in order that she might better enjoy the sunshine, climbed partly up the steps that lead to our office. I kindly remarked one day, 'You block our stairway.' She gently, but firmly replied, 'Mr. Baker said I could sit anywhere on the stairway I wanted to.' That little incident, my friends, revealed the kind-hearted man. I was sorely ashamed that I had even questioned the propriety of her blocking the entrance to our office. That little spark of humanity that perhaps you have never condescended to speak to, loves Mr. and Mrs. Baker for their kind words and their benefactions. Mr. Baker, she told me, would give her money to buy her pencils with and then frequently on Saturday evening he would buy all she had and send her away happy. I would rather have the tears of the low, the humble, and the outcast to moisten my tomb than to have the chief executive of the nation stand with uncovered head by my coffin. I cannot recall the numerous 'phone messages received at my office during the past week in which a weeping woman's voice at the other end of the line recited how in the years gone by Mr. Baker had given to her a father's advice, lent to her a helping hand, and stayed the lashing waves that were beating at her feet. I have learned more about Mr. Baker's philanthropy and his acts of kindness since his lips have been sealed and his hands have been folded, than I ever heard during my acquaintance with him. He never paraded it. The world will never know it. During the week prior to Mr. Baker's death, he observed in the hotel where he was stopping a young man scouring up the floor. He remarked to his wife that the young man certainly had a fine face, and that he must be working below his station in life, and that his worth deserved him a better job. Mrs. Baker went to her room for a while, and when she returned she looked over in one corner and there she saw the stately form of her husband with his arm around the lad as he leaned on his floor mop. Tears were streaming down the boy's face as he told why he was there. The next day Mr. Baker secured a good place for him in one of the best real estate offices in Los Angeles. The telephone operator at the hotel frequently brought messages to Mr. and Mrs. Baker's room. One day Mr. Baker remarked to her, 'You seem to be sad, and in trouble; is there anything the matter?' She broke down and said that she was in the greatest grief, that her husband had sued for a divorce, and that the light of her life had gone out. Mr. Baker heard her story without comment. He went down and asked the clerk where the lady's husband could be found. Mr. Baker went to see him, and the next day they were living together as happy as a bride and groom. The last act of Mr. Baker's life, an hour before the death reaper cut him down, he wrote a long letter to almost a stranger, but one whose life touched the life of his friend, a former citizen of Waco, and in that letter Mr. Baker sought to make happier and better two dissatisfied lives. I tell you, my friends, little acts of this kind will build for a man a monument of human hearts that will be towering aloft kissing the lips of God, when the marble shafts of the Goulds and Vanderbilts have crumbled to unremembered dust.

'Out yonder in the city of the dead sleeps the mouldering dust of the gallant Ross, the lovely Burleson, the lion-hearted Coke, and many others whose lives added a splendor to the glory of the Lone Star, but never did a nobler character, a more charitable spirit, a more polished or perfect Southern gentleman pass through the gates ajar to Oakwood cemetery than the one, the black plumes of whose hearse we follow today.

'Profession of Faith.—As the climax of Mr. Baker's life, as well as of what I shall say, is that thrilling and heaven-crowned incident, still fresh in the memory of many here, when he stood upright and fearless in the presence of 5,000 people, the people who knew him best, and made a public profession of his faith in the Savior of men. During a general conversation on this last trip, he remarked to those about him that he believed everything in the Bible from lid to lid, and that since he had left the duties of his office he had done much thinking along this line, and that on his return home he was going to make a change in his church relation. Though the silken thread of his life was clipped without a moment's warning, he was prepared and not afraid to die.

'We, therefore, today can indulge in that fond, happy and ever-sustaining belief that, amidst the golden glow of life's setting sun, stars unutterably bright decked the sky that arched the far Pacific's slope, and that the swift-winged messengers of God met him at the sudden terminus of life's railroad, and escorted him in a golden chariot to his heavenly home, where with harp in hand he could sing with the poet divine, 'The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want.' I do not, therefore, say my dear, honored and beloved friend, wrapped as you are in the winding sheet, 'Farewell;' I only say 'Good-bye' till we renew our partnership, I trust, on the everlasting shore where no storms ever beat on the glittering strand as the years of eternity roll.'

FREDERICK W. YENSEN. As General Superintendent of Traffic for the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company of Texas, Frederick W. Yensen, for more than ten years a resident of Texas and since November, 1912, the incumbent of his present position, is occupying a place in Dallas and this part of the state that has brought him into general notice. Practically all his life, since he left his books in the country school where he had his early education, has been spent in the pursuit of the line of work with which he is now identified, and his experience has been so wide as to give him a prestige among telegraph and telephone engineers that few men of the state have equaled.

Mr. Yensen is a native son of Ohio, born near Port Clinton, Ottawa county, that state, in 1871, his parents being farming people who spent their lives in that state. At Port Clinton young Yensen attended the public school, and he also was a student for a term in a commercial school at Port Clinton. He was twenty years of age when he left the home farm and secured a position with the Cleveland Telephone Company, and he is today, after some twenty years of experience, one of the pioneer telephone men in the country.

His activities have covered a wide field, and while it is not possible to enter into minute details concerning his upward path in his chosen activities, an effort will be made to set forth the more striking features of his career thus far.

Mr. Yensen, after identifying himself with telephone work in his native state, continued there until 1902, and in November of that year he left the telephone company at Cleveland, where he had maintained his headquarters, and organized the engineering department of the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company, at Dallas. This city has since been his home, and he has been continuously identified with the company from then to the present time. He was for some years chief engineer of the company, but on November 6, 1912, he had his promotion to his present position of General Superintendent of Traffic for the State of Texas, his territory embracing the immense system of lines operated in this state by the company.

When the news of his appointment came on November 6, 1912, there appeared in a San Antonio paper a brief article, which seems to bear upon the achievements of the man in a manner as to make it especially appropriate of introduction at this point. The article, with but slight omission, here follows: "F. W. Yensen, recently made General Superintendent of Traffic for the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company, and a man so responsible for service and operating conditions in three hundred Texas exchanges, has, as his first official act, announced the early inauguration of full metropolitan telephone methods for San Antonio.

"Formerly chief engineer for the company, he planned the complete new system which has grown up during the past few years and, in this city, made possible the development of the multi-exchange method adopted in all large centers of population. By a slight modification in idea it was so arranged that the first two exchanges could be under the same roof and the names for both were made general in their application. Thus the memory of Crockett and Travis will be perpetuated in San Antonio in the unusual monument of constant telephone usage.

"Mr. Yensen received his appointment after twenty-one years of service with the Bell System. From chief engineer of the Cleveland (Ohio) Company, he was brought to Texas to act in the same capacity ten years ago. Largely through his efforts the magnificent plant of the Southwestern in San Antonio and other large Texas cities has been built. He has now assumed jurisdiction over the service made possible by what he has designed."

Mr. Yensen is a family man, married in Cleveland, Ohio, to Miss Beulah N. Ferrell, a native of that city.

JAMES BENJAMIN GIBSON. A former surveyor of Trinity county, one of the largest land holders and crop raisers in that vicinity, a prominent business man at the village of Trinity, James B. Gibson, represents an old family of East Texas, and both his father and grandfather were surveyors by profession. James B. Gibson was born November 7, 1864, on Caney Creek, ten miles east of Trinity. His father was George Gibson and his grandfather Absalom Gibson. As already stated, both were surveyors. Absalom Gibson was born in the northern part of North Carolina, where the Gibson ancestors had settled on coming from Ireland to the United States. Absalom was one of nine sons, and one of his brothers was Jesse, who settled in Cherokee county, Texas, and left a family, of whom Judge J. P. Gibson of Rusk is a son. Absalom Gibson married Miss Millie Cook, and in 1835 he came out to Texas by wagon, the Cook family composing a large part of the company. They settled at Nacogdoches, and lived in and about the old stone fort for protection for several years. Absalom Gibson's first work in Texas was teaching school in Nacogdoches county, and he then went into the business of surveying, and followed it as his regular calling all over East Texas. He moved to Angelina county and settled nine miles west of Lufkin many years before the war, and died there in February, 1883, at the age of eighty-four. By his marriage to Millie Cook he had the following children: James, George, Mary, who married Elija Beasley, Elizabeth, who married Mr. Parker, and Edward, who died single.

George Gibson, the father of James B., was born at Summerville, Tennessee, March 8, 1828, and was seven years old when he came with his father and mother to Texas. He was educated for the profession of surveyor under his father, and in 1857 settled in Trinity county, and became the second surveyor of that county. Practically all his education was acquired by attending school in the vicinity of Nacogdoches. He early became associated with his father in the surveying profession, and during one season they operated in North Texas around Benton, where they located many land certificates for themselves on tracts which they subsequently sold before that part of the state had appreciated to any extent. George Gibson, in 1857, was appointed deputy surveyor under J. W. Hamilton. At the following election George Gibson became chief of the surveyor's office. In Trinity county his work was the location of certificates on leagues and harbors and other tracts as they were purchased from the Republic. He held the office until 1884, when he retired until 1896, but continued his work with the compass and chain, and in that year was again elected county surveyor and died in office February 4, 1898. During the war between the states George Gibson was a Confederate soldier, and lieutenant of his company. All his service was in the Trans-Mississippi Department. He escaped wounds and capture, and at the close of the war resumed his duties as a surveyor. He had a sawmill at Trinity, built in 1883, and the fourth mill in that section. At that time Trinity county was isolated from railroads, and there was little demand for lumber, except for local purposes, so that the plant failed to do a profitable business and was abandoned. George Gibson had acquired a large amount of land during his career, but his unfortunate experiences with the sawmill swept away practically the entire investment in that property. At one time he owned a half interest in the townsite of Trinity, or what is now Trinity, at that time called Reysers' Prairie. George Gibson was a Democrat, a Baptist and a Master Mason.

In October, 1858, he was married in Walker county, Texas, to Elzira Ann White. Her parents were Tillman B. and Sarah (Harwell) White, who came from near Greenville, Alabama, to Texas during the forties, and her father was a mechanic and a farmer. Mrs. George Gibson died September 1, 1904. Her children were: George H., a farmer and practicing physician in Trinity county; James B.; Elzira, who died unmarried; Frank, who died in Louisiana without a family; Ezra, of Trinity; Fannie, who died young; John, who married Miss Lettie Joplin and lives in Wharton, Texas; Gertrude, who is the wife of F. H. Pitts, and a teacher at Lufkin.

James B. Gibson spent the first seven years of his life in Caney Creek district, where he was born, and in 1872 the family moved to Trinity, and to the residence which he now occupies. His education was secured from the rural schools, and with one year of attendance at the Agricultural and Mechanical College. He early learned the uses of the surveyor's compass, and has been a practical surveyor ever since his young manhood. He was appointed to fill out his father's unexpired term as county surveyor, was regularly elected in 1898 and again in 1900, and filled the office about five years. His work embraced chiefly the surveying of small preemptions and the location of school land. Soon after starting out on his own account, Mr. Gibson became a trader in stocks and land, and has acquired a large property and done a great deal of important work in the development of farms in Trinity county. At the present writing he owns three thousand acres and has a thousand acres cultivated, with enough families as tenants on his land to provide a full quota for a school. He bought up seventy thousand acres of pine land for the Thompson Brothers Lumber Company adjacent to Trinity, and is the builder of the Gibson Hotel which he owns, this being the best brick building in the city of Trinity. He is one of the directors of the Trinity National Bank, is president of the Trinity Compress Company, and was identified with the promotion of the Beaumont & Great

J. B. Gibson,

Northern Railway, having assisted in securing the right of way for that road.

Mr. Gibson has not identified himself with politics outside of his home county. He is a Democrat, has attended several state conventions, and as a delegate helped to nominate Governors Campbell and Colquitt twice. Fraternally his affiliations are with the Masonic fraternity, including the Royal Arch degree, the Woodmen of the World and the Knights of Pythias. Since 1883 he has had an active membership in the Methodist Church, and has served in official position.

James B. Gibson and Miss Jessie Clegg were married in Trinity county, June 14, 1906. She is a daughter of Guilford G. and Virginia Clegg. Mrs. Gibson matriculated in Baylor University and graduated in the Class of 1903, finishing the violin and piano course and receiving the degree of B. L. Their children are George Guilford, born November 27, 1907; Eilzara Ann, born December 1, 1909; and Sidney Gayle, born July 19, 1913.

JAMES LELAND FRANKLIN. For the past seven years county auditor of Collin county, James L. Franklin is the type of an official whom the people instinctively trust, and whose genial character, frankness and heartiness of manner have won him friends among all classes and have made his office a sort of social center as well as place of business in McKinney. Mr. Franklin has lived in this part of Texas for more than fifty years, and in his time has seen many remarkable developments in every phase of activities.

James L. Franklin was born on March 14, 1854, in Montgomery county, but now Powell county, Kentucky. His parents were J. W. and Mary H. (Williams) Franklin. The family is English on the Franklin side and Irish on the maternal side. His grandfather, John A. Franklin, a mechanic, teacher and surveyor, served with General Jackson during the war of 1812, while the great-grandfather was at Bunker Hill and fought in several other battles of the Revolution. The mother's family include some prominent connections, notably the Howard family of Kentucky. His mother's brother served as sheriff of Powell county, Kentucky, represented that and other counties for several years in the state legislature, is president of the National Bank of Stanton, Kentucky, and holds large tracts of land in Powell, Clark and Montgomery counties. The father was a native of Virginia and the mother of Kentucky. J. W. Franklin, the father, who was a farmer and mechanic by occupation, moved to Texas in 1859, settling in Collin county, and a year or so later entered the Confederate service in Bushe's Company, Alendria's regiment, which was attached to Poglinc's brigade, and with that command fought till the close of the war. His death occurred in September, 1889, and his wife passed away about 1876.

The third in a family of six children, James Leland Franklin was a child when the family came to Texas, grew up on a farm in Collin county, attended the district schools, and has been in business and public life since early manhood. His first commercial occupation was as bookkeeper, and for a number of years he was in the mercantile business as bookkeeper and salesman. A hard-working Democrat, Mr. Franklin has the distinction of being one of the first men in Collin county to actively support and work for the nomination of Woodrow Wilson as the Democratic nominee in 1912. In August, 1907, occurred his first election to the office of county auditor, and by re-election his service has been continued as a reward of its competence and fidelity to the present time. Previously he had twice been elected chairman of the Democratic county committee, but in accordance with the provisions of the Terrell election law resigned that position in 1907.

Mr. Franklin is prominent in fraternal matters, especially in Odd Fellowship and Masonry. His connection with the Odd Fellows covers a period of thirty-three years, and he has received the Veteran's Jewel in honor of his long and continuous good standing in the order. He has served as District Deputy Grand Master in the Odd Fellows Lodge of Texas. He has also been District Grand Master of the Masonic Order, and on page 22 of the Grand Lodge report for 1910 is found a fine compliment paid to his efficiency in that office. Mr. Franklin is Captain-General of McKinney Commandery No. 34, Knights Templar, is Past Master of Saint John's Lodge No. 51, A. F. & A. M., at McKinney, and other affiliations are with the Woodmen of the World, the Homesteaders, and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. His church home is the Christian church of McKinney.

In 1879 at Allen, in Collin county, Mr. Franklin married Miss Leuna Huey, daughter of J. H. Huey, a farmer of Allen who died several years ago. Mrs. Franklin died soon after her marriage, leaving one child, James W. Franklin, who is now a farmer and also a rural mail carrier, and during the Spanish-American war fought in campaigns as a member of the United States volunteers. In 1883 Mr. Franklin married, also at Allen, Miss Effie Weaver, daughter of W. M. Weaver, who was born in Tennessee, came to Texas in 1886, has served with the rank of Colonel in the Confederate army, was a prosperous stock farmer and died about 1906. Mr. Franklin and wife have seven children: Pauline, the wife of Harry Nichols, who is a railroad man in California; Lieutenant E. L. Franklin, a graduate of the West Point Military Academy and now in charge of the troop of cavalry at Columbus, New Mexico; Miss Opal, a graduate of the McKinney high school; Miss Luna, who is a teacher in the public schools of McKinney; Miss Lottie, a graduate of the high schools; Thomas W. Franklin, who is a mail carrier in McKinney; and Julius Grady Franklin, a student in the public schools. The Franklin home in McKinney is at 400 S. College street.

WILLIAM MOELLER. A native of Germany, from whence he emigrated to the United States in 1887, William Moeller is in all respects a self-made man. In the prime of young manhood on his arrival in this country, he was content to labor in the station in which he found himself, with fidelity to his employers, without undue ambition, and yet developing a business tact, soundness of judgment and practical sagacity, which have brought him into prominence in the business world, conferred upon him large responsibilities, and made him a favorite with the citizens of El Paso, not only of his own nationality, but American born as well. His life has been a success as the world counts it, for his prudence and sagacity have brought him a handsome competence, and it has been a success in a higher sense, inasmuch as he is the head of a family, and has given of his best energies to the support and building up of his adopted city's best interests.

William Moeller was born May 17, 1864, in Lubeck, Germany, and is a son of John and Katherine (Kowitz) Moeller. His paternal grandfather, John Moeller, was a well-known merchant in Germany, and on the maternal side his grandfather was Henry Kowitz, who was prominent in building circles of Germany. John Moeller, the father of William, has been known for years in steamboat circles of the Fatherland as an expert engineer, and still survives at Edendorf, Germany, having been seventy-six years of age, August 18, 1912. Mr. Moeller was married in Germany to Katherine Kowitz, who was born in Germany, and she died September 23, 1912, aged seventy-eight years, having been the mother of three children: John, who is deceased; William; and Mrs. Sophia Meyer, still a resident of the old country.

After completing a course in the public schools of his native land, William Moeller, as is customary with the youths of Germany, served an enlistment in the German army. Subsequently he secured a position with the large German importing firm of Ketterson & Oegetile, as whose representatives he came to the United States in 1887, and settled in El Paso, Texas. He continued in the employ of this concern until 1903, in which year he established himself in the real estate business. This has become one of the largest enterprises of its kind in the Southwest, and has branched out into the handling of lands, cattle and mines. Since entering this business, Mr. Moeller's advance has been steady and continuous. With a reputation for fidelity and financial skill, surrounded with appreciative and dependable friends, he was emboldened to enter other large ventures, in all of which he has met with uniform success. Today he is a director of the Chamber of Commerce, is secretary of the Mesa Valley Improvement Company, manager of the Columbia Mining and Milling Company, general representative of the Federal Guarantee Company, of Washington, D. C., and secretary of the Ascot Valley Improvement Company, which contains 30,000 acres of land located on the Santa Fe Railroad. In the course of his active and diversified life he has shown himself a successful man of business and a useful and genial member of social circles, bringing into combination tact, prudence, integrity and courtesy, each in its way a superior excellence. He has faith in the future of his adopted State, never hesitates to act the part of "booster" of his locality, and declares that it is his belief "that Texas is on the eve of a great development period."

On February 28, 1891, Mr. Moeller was married to Miss Wilhelmina Schildt, who was born in Lubek, Germany, in 1870, daughter of Heinrich Schildt and wife, both living in the old country. Five children have been born to this union, as follows: Ernest, born June 19, 1893, at El Paso, a graduate of the high school, and now a civil engineer in the employ of the Southwestern Railway, in Mexico; Wilhelm, born June 15, 1895, at El Paso, and died April, 1897, at Sonora, Mexico; Werner, born September 9, 1897, at El Paso, now attending the high school; William, born March 13, 1905, at El Paso, a student of the graded schools; and Max, born April 3, 1907, also a graded school pupil. Mr. and Mrs. Moeller are consistent members of the Lutheran Church. He is independent in his political views and his fraternal affiliation is with the Sons of Hermann, in which he has numerous friends.

ARTHUR C. BALDWIN. In no definite line of business do men of ability become so widely known as in journalism, often as real personalities and always as potent influences. Their audience is the world, their platform is the newspaper and their ideas in print inevitably carry suggestion along some avenue of thought, to every reader. Grave responsibility thus rests upon the journalist, and it often requires high courage and firm devotion to principle to accept this responsibility and uphold it in the face of powerful opposition. The natural school of preparation for the journalist is the printing office and it is possible, perhaps, to count on one's fingers the men who have become masters in the newspaper world who have not had, at least, a modicum of such office training. Particularly well fortified is the modern newspaper man who early found his proper sphere of action and climbed from the position of "devil" to the enviable one of being not only his own editorial writer, but also his own business manager and owner of his own printing plant. These remarks serve to introduce one of Austin's leading and responsible men of affairs, Arthur C. Baldwin, who is editor of the Austin Daily Tribune, president of A. C. Baldwin & Sons, Inc., and president of the Austin Printing Company, which latter company owns the Tribune. He is also president of the Security Can and Container Mfg. Co., a half-million dollar corporation devoted to the introduction of a safety device to make impossible the explosion of oil containers.

Arthur C. Baldwin was born at Meshopen, in Wyoming county, Pennsylvania, April 29, 1860, a son of Charles B. and Roxanna (Bunnell) Baldwin. The mother passed away at the birth of her son. The father, who was a scholarly and talented man, devoted his life to educational work and gave particular attention to the teaching of music. In 1871 he removed from Pennsylvania to Nebraska and resided there until his death in 1890.

It was in the public schools of Nebraska that Arthur C. Baldwin secured his educational training, this period of his life terminating in his fourteenth year, when he started to work on a farm and two years later he became a cowboy, entering into a life that, perhaps, has never been excelled in America for its compelling interest to youths. Although much romance has been written of the life and adventures of the cowboy, it had its hard, practical side and a youth of sixteen years after riding the range, in the face of difficulties, privations and dangers, emerged into manhood long before his legal status had arrived. Doubtless Mr. Baldwin cherishes a tender memory of those days of adventure and high-spirited freedom and deems their discipline as a valued stone in his foundation of success. From the cattle range he became a school teacher, but not yet had he found quite the right path, the one that was to lead along the line of his special talents, to the goal he was seeking. After two months of teaching he retired from that special line of educational work, for he has been, through his pen and press a teacher for many years past, and entered a printing office and served his apprenticeship. When twenty-three years of age Mr. Baldwin embarked in the printing business on his own account, first at Marshall, Missouri, from which point he moved to Sedalia, in the same state, and continued his business there until 1896, when he came to Texas. His first year in this state was spent at Houston and from there he came first to Austin. Later he went to San Antonio for a year and from there to Oklahoma, where he spent one year, but December 25, 1905, found him once more a resident of Austin.

Early in 1906 Mr. Baldwin bought a local, newly started business, known as the Austin Printing Company, then three months old, and in 1911 he purchased the Austin Tribune, the printing business being carried on under the style of the A. C. Baldwin & Sons Company, and the Tribune being issued by the Austin Printing Company. Since his ownership of the Tribune, which is an evening paper, with a weekly and a Sunday morning edition, the circulation has more than doubled and it is the leading journal in Austin, being especially noted for its bright, sharp editorials and valued for its honest stand on public questions. Democratic in creed and policy, it is in hearty accord with the present administration. At the time that Mr. Baldwin showed his progressive spirit in starting his weekly edition, he received a number of very gratifying expressions of approbation of his general course in the editorial field, and it may not be out of place to give further publicity to a few of these, as they came, unsolicited, from high authority.

Hon. Jewel P. Lightfoot, of the firm of Lightfoot, Brady & Robertson, prominent attorneys of Austin, writes as follows:

"Hon. A. C. Baldwin, Editor of the Tribune, Austin, Texas. Dear Sir: I have been advised that you propose to issue a weekly edition of your paper for general circulation. I desire to congratulate you upon this move, as I believe that it will fill a real want, as you are in an unusually favorable location to gather and disseminate information and news of vital interest to all the people of Texas. The people throughout this State will indeed be pleased to have a journal that will give them first hand, and, uncolored, the real facts underlying their government at Austin. From the high class of service, and fearless stand for good government, which you have heretofore taken in the Daily Tribune, I feel certain that you will give to your readers of the Weekly, service which they can secure nowhere else. With very best wishes for your success, I beg to remain, etc.'"

Hon. William D. Williams, a member of the Railroad Commission of Texas, wrote the following:

"Hon. A. C. Baldwin, Austin, Texas. Dear Sir: Under your management the Austin Tribune has come to be noted for its timely and forcible discussion of current events. It carries clear and vivid statements of those facts and theories which are the groundwork of good politics as applied to existing conditions. For myself, I confess the debt I owe when you present to me, briefly and lucidly, as is your custom, the public controversies of the day, and I am frequently delighted—sometimes even when I cannot agree with you—by the simplicity and force with which you express your opinions, and the ease with which I am enabled to understand the points in dispute. If you will only put it before them, I know there are many persons within your reach who are really alive to these subjects and who will wish to subscribe. Right or wrong, you seldom fail to get into the middle of the real fight. Always you are trying to do good. Always you are trying to improve men and conditions. And you show always a rare discrimination in pointing out those false issues which are so potent as a means of delaying the forward march of Progressive Democracy. Every citizen who is desirous of good government really needs to read what you write. I am very sincere in wishing you success.

"Yours very truly,

"WILLIAM D. WILLIAMS."

In the following letter are found similar expressions of confidence and congratulation:

"Hon. A. C. Baldwin, Austin, Texas. Dear Sir: I beg to heartily congratulate you upon the first issue of the Weekly Tribune. If you will continue to make the fight for the people in the weekly that you have heretofore made for them in your daily paper, you will have rendered Texas a great service. Being located at the seat of our government, you are in a position to give the people of Texas the real situation as it exists in every department of our government. Your stand heretofore in the Daily Tribune has been for the interest of the people as against crooked politicians, lobbyists and the devious methods practiced by the political crook. I wish you much success, and hope that the Weekly Tribune will find its way into the home of every patriot of Texas.

"Very truly yours,

"EARLE B. MAYFIELD,

Member of the Railroad Commission, Texas."

In 1880 Mr. Baldwin was united in marriage with Miss Kate Brown. Her father, Col. John Brown, won his title in the War of 1812. He was a lawyer of prominence at Marshall, Missouri, and a large planter in that state. He married at the age of sixty years. Mr. and Mrs. Baldwin have four children, three sons, Charles Julian, Rush and Arthur D., all of whom are associated with their father in business, the two eldest sons being married; and Sydna, who resides with her parents in the beautiful family home, situated at No. 1201 Rio Grande avenue, Austin.

In addition to his large newspaper enterprises, Mr. Baldwin has other interests, being interested in numerous business concerns in the state as a director, and for six years he has been on the directing board of the Austin Chamber of Commerce. He has long been identified with the Masonic fraternity and is a Knights Templar and Shriner. Mr. Baldwin finds recreation as a member of the Rotary Club of Austin. To have accomplished all that he has in the journalistic field he must have had great natural endowments and those who know him best credit him with a high journalistic standard, a clever wit and an individual style, admire him for his dashing courage and esteem him for his warm-hearted sympathies and generous hospitality.

GEORGE H. HIGGINS, M. D. The oldest practicing physician in point of service in El Paso, which city he has seen grow from a small, struggling village to a center of commercial, educational and professional activity, Dr. George H. Higgins has gained an enviable place in the ranks of the medical profession in Texas, of which State he has been a resident for thirty years. Dr. Higgins is a native of England, born in Greenwich, July 1, 1845, a son of Charles and Susan (Moran) Higgins. His father, also a Briton, was a well-known surgeon in the East Indian Government service all of his life, and died in England in 1868, when sixty-two years of age. His mother was born in England in 1810, and died there in 1874. Of a family of five children, Dr. Higgins was the third in order of birth.

After completing his preliminary studies in the public schools of Greenwich, Dr. Higgins received instruction under the preceptorship of his father, and in 1869 was graduated in medicine from Christ Hospital, England. Not long thereafter he emigrated to the United States, having determined to try his fortunes in the new world, and continued his studies for some time in the New York Homeopathic Medical College. On leaving that institution he went to Chicago, and entered the Chicago Homeopathic Medical College, and after graduation therefrom, in 1881, entered upon active practice in the Illinois metropolis. Three years later, Dr. Higgins left for Texas, on the Texas Pacific Railroad, at that time one of the new roads, and first located at Abilene, and later at Colorado City, for a few years. His advent in El Paso occurred in 1887, this city being then a small but ambitious community. Here Dr. Higgins was content to cast his fortunes with those of the thriving little town, with the interests of which he has been closely identified to the present time. It was not long before the abilities of the newcomer were recognized, and he soon began to build up a representative practice which has grown as the city has grown and is now of a substantial character. A close student, an able practitioner and a careful and steady-handed surgeon, he has become widely known in the ranks of his profession, and holds a high place in the esteem of his confreres. Dr. Higgins is at present a member of the El Paso Board of Health, where he is rendering his city valuable services. He has contributed materially to the growth and development of the city, and is firm in his belief that it is destined to become one of the leading municipalities of the State. In addition to the various medical organizations of which he is a valued member, he holds membership in the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, being a charter member of El Paso Lodge No. 187. With his family, he attends the Methodist Episcopal Church. During his long residence here, he has made numerous friends, not alone in his profession, but in business, religious and social circles. His political support has been given to the Democratic party, although he has never been a politician.

On April 9, 1874, Dr. Higgins was married at Peoria, Illinois, to Miss Katherine Chase, daughter of Samuel and Sarah (Russell) Chase, of Peoria, and they have a family of three children: Charles, born January 9, 1875, at Lincoln, Illinois, and now engineer of the Standard Steel Car Company; Freane, born in November, 1877, at Lincoln, Illinois, and now deputy tax collector of El Paso county; and Gertrude, born in August, 1883, at Galesburg, Illinois, a graduate of the El Paso High school and the University of Illinois, who now resides at home with her parents.

HARRY A. BETHEA. The leading sheet metal industry in this section of the state is that operated and owned by Harry A. Bethea in El Paso, where he has been engaged in the business since 1911. The time of his actual identification with the business is admittedly a brief one, but he has made remarkable progress in his field of activity in the time he has been here. The manufacture of building cornice, sky-lights, tanks and roofing represents their principal activities, but a general line of repair work is also given some attention, and the operations of the concern are most extensive in and about El Paso. Mr. Bethea is undoubtedly one of the coming business factors of the city, and his position among the leading men of the city is already secure, by reason of his thoroughgoing qualities of business dealings and his excellent reputation for square methods in the conduct of his affairs.

Born in Little Rock, South Carolina, on May 24, 1862, Harry A. Bethea is the son of William C. and Vazilla (Mace) Bethea. Both of these were born in South Carolina, and in about 1872 they removed to Texas, where they took up their permanent abode, and where the father died in 1873. He was a farmer by occupation, a sturdy, honest countryman, who lived quietly and unostentatiously all his days, and was long a member of the Methodist church and a devout Christian. The mother, who was also possessed of the most beatific Christian character, survived her husband but a few months, and in the same year that marked his passing she died at the family home, and is interred by the side of her companion in the cemetery at Marshall, Texas. They were the parents of nine children, and Harry A., of this review, was the fifth born of that number. He was about eleven years of age when the death of the parents orphaned the family of half grown children, and thus at an early age he assumed the burden of the responsibility for his maintenance.

After the death of the parents, Harry A. Bethea, who had prior to coming to Texas received some training in private schools of the two Carolinas, returned to his former home in North Carolina where he remained for about thirteen years. He attended school there for a time, and when he was seventeen took a position with the C. C. Railroad at Laurinburg, North Carolina, and it may be said that he followed the railroad business continuously from then until he took up his present enterprise in El Paso. The year 1885 saw his return to Texas, and he has since continued to be a resident. He took up railroad work at Marshall, remaining there for three years, then located at Taylor, Texas, where he was occupied for about seven years. In 1885 or thereabouts he came to El Paso, still maintaining his active connection with the railroad business, and it was not until 1911 that he became identified with the sheet metal industry. It will not be denied that his progress has been rapid in that enterprise, and he takes a leading place as a manufacturer of the products already mentioned, in this section of the state. The need for a plant such as he has established and put into operation here was long recognized, but it remained to the enterprising nature of Mr. Bethea to put into practice such a work. The plant is located at 508 S. El Paso street, and is one of the most complete and modern to be found hereabouts.

Mr. Bethea is a man of family, having been married in Taylor, Texas, in 1890, to Miss Jennie Hollaman, the daughter of D. K. Hollaman and wife, old residents of that place. To them have been born four children, as follows: John D., who is deceased; Lula, May B. and Harry W. The family are prominent and popular in El Paso and participate in the busy social activities of the place. They are members of no church, but attend the Methodist church perhaps more than they do any other one denomination.

Mr. Bethea is a Democrat, stanch and true, and takes a hearty interest in the political activities of his party in local, state and national affairs. He has proven himself a citizen of the highest type, and one whose identity with the city of El Paso has been of a worthy order, his influence being a thing of value to the best interests of the community. No Texan native is more ardent and enthusiastic with regard to the excellent qualities and opportunities of the Lone Star state than is he and those who require unprejudiced, honest and competent opinions as to the facts about Texas will do well to address him in the matter, upon which he has expressed his willingness to respond to all honest inquiries.

WARREN N. SMALL, president of the El Paso Foundry and Machine Company, is one of the really big men of the city. That he is thus acknowledged by all his business acquaintances and in fact by the El Paso public in general is not only proof of this fact but also that he has won his position through honest effort and not through clever juggling with funds, or taking advantage of other people. El Paso is not only proud of him but also of the great business which he has built up from practically nothing. It is such men as Mr. Small who really build up a community, not simply because they may be the operators of a business that in itself means much to a locality, but because they are always ready to help along any movement that tends to better conditions and always exert their influence along progressive lines. Mr. Small is eminently a man of this type and El Paso appreciates his efforts.

Massachusetts was the birthplace of Warren Small, he having been born in Lynn, on the 12th of August, 1852. He went to school in Massachusetts until he had reached the age of twelve when it was necessary that he should give up all thought of a further education and try his hand at the wage earning proposition. He worked at various occupations, glad of an opportunity to earn a little money in any way. In 1883 came an opportunity to come west and upon reaching Texas he located in Abilene, where he engaged in buying and selling wool and hides. He followed this business for about three years and then went into the building business. He made a fair success of both of these occupations and then in 1890 he established his present business. He began with a little foundry housed in a tiny adobe building and from this insignificant little beginning has arisen his great business, the plant covering thirty acres of land. The buildings are many in number and all substantially built of brick. The company is known as the El Paso Foundry and Machine Company not only over western Texas and the southwest in general, but also in old Mexico, and even in foreign countries. Every department in this enterprise is equipped with the most modern machinery and all kinds of machinery are manufactured, such as smelters, stamp mills, and cyanide plants. Two steel converters are included in the equipment of this plant and the company manufactures manganese steel, high carbon steel and similar products. As it now stands the plant is valued at about five hundred thousand dollars and four hundred men are employed to operate it. In addition to being president and nominally the executive head Mr. Small is also the manager and the credit for the success of the whole enterprise rests on his shoulders. He it is who has planned and executed, who has laid awake nights when the young plant was in its infancy looking far ahead and trying to foresee what difficulties were going to arise in his path. He has had all the worry and hard work and now no one grudges him the prosperity which has been the result.

Both Mr. Small and his wife are members of the Presbyterian church. He is an active member of the chamber of commerce and in politics although believing in the principles of the Democratic party he prefers to vote an independent ticket. He has been urged many times to run for various offices but has always refused, not caring for public life. In addition to his foundry and machine business, Mr. Small has other valuable interests which take up much of his time.

Mr. Small was married in Chelsea, Massachusetts, in 1880, to Miss Susanna Stone, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Stone, of Boston. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Small, as follows: Harriet, who married M. I. Flag and lives in Minneapolis, Minmesota; Sarah, living with her parents, and Warren D., who is associated with his father in the business.

Mr. Small has an office in the city at 311 San Francisco Street, but he spends most of his time at the plant on San Antonio, opposite Laurel. Here he is always ready to answer any questions about Texas, and having lived in this section for so many years he is competent to speak with authority. He says, "Texas is the finest place in the world. There are more chances for a young man and a homeseeker here than in any other place. In my opinion Providence provided this garden spot and all a man has to do is to come and settle and go to work. It is no place for a drone but the finest place in the world for a worker who wants a home of his own." Mr. Small himself has surely proved his own words. From practically nothing to the ownership of the largest plant of its kind in this section of the country is quite an accomplishment.

JUDGE LEIGH CLARK. One of the oldest lawyers of El Paso is Judge Leigh Clark. He has been identified with his practice in that city for nearly thirty years since the pioneer days of west Texas. A man of splendid ability in his profession he has been connected with the largest commercial practice in this city, and as a corporate and commercial lawyer has few equals and no superiors in this section of the state.

Judge Leigh Clark was born in Issaquena county, Mississippi, March 20, 1856, a son of John M. and Eliza Clark, the father a native of Pennsylvania and the mother of Tennessee. The father was a life long farmer and substantial citizen, and provided a good home and a fair amount of schooling for his children. Judge Clark spent about the first twenty-five years of his life in Mississippi and his early education in the public schools was supplemented by study in the University of the South at Sewanee, Tennessee, a course in a high school in Virginia, and subsequently by study in University of Virginia. Moving to Vicksburg, Mississippi, he began the study of law in the office of Buck & Clark, and continued his studies there until he was admitted to the bar in 1877. His first practice was in Vicksburg, and he next opened an office at Rolling Fork, Mississippi, where he remained until he came out to Texas in 1884 and located in El Paso.

Judge Clark is a Democrat who takes more than passive interest in politics, and for many years has been one of the party fighters, both in local and state affairs. He has served in the office of city attorney of El Paso, but outside of that has never sought nor accepted political honors, all his efforts being given to supporting the cause of his fellow candidates, and friends. In El Paso on June 19, 1890, he married Miss Fannie Eckols, whose parents were formerly from Adairsville, Georgia. Mrs. Clark died April 1, 1907, when about thirty-three years of age, and her remains now rest in one of El Paso's cemeteries. She was a member of the Baptist church and a very devout Christian woman, and devoted to her family and home. She left one child, Frances, now the wife of Dr. James Vrant of El Paso.

Judge Clark is a member of the Episcopal church, is affiliated with the Masonic Order from the Blue Lodge to the Thirty-second degree of Scottish Rite, including the Mystic Shrine. He also belongs to the Toltec Club, the El Paso Country Club, and the El Paso Bar Association. He enjoys an occasional fishing trip, and in his private library at home are some of the old standard authors. Judge Clark has a versatile ability both in his profession and otherwise, and is esteemed and respected as a man of unusual attainments and powers. During his career as a lawyer he has been connected with many of the largest business corporations of Texas as counsel. He maintains fine offices in the Caples Building.

ALONZO CARTER. At the head of his profession in photography is Alonzo Carter of Fort Worth. While he ranks foremost in his own city, his distinctions in his profession are not confined to his immediate locality, and he has received compliments and evidences of his ability from the State Association of Photographers, so that the statement regarding his prominence is by no means an empty assertion. Mr. Carter does a large business as a photographer and also deals in photo supplies. His offices are at 509 Maine Street in Fort Worth.

Alonzo Carter was born in Alexander City, Alabama, May 11, 1873. His early education was obtained in the Cumberland Seminary, and he first came to Texas in 1900. His location for the first four years was at Bryan, after which he moved to Galveston and spent two years there, and has since been in Fort Worth. He has a splendid studio, equipped with all the modern apparatus and facilities for his work, and it is well known that in Carter's studio the most artistic work in photography is done that can be obtained in any part of the state.

Mr. Carter took the first prize at the Professional State Photographic Convention, and won the championship for outside view work, and also the silver loving cup from the Professional Photographic Association of Texas for his studio work. Mr. Carter is a popular member of various local social and civic bodies. He is affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Knights of Pythias, and the Woodmen. He also has membership in the Chamber of Commerce, belongs to the Ad-Men's Club, and is also a member of the Rotary Club. On May 7, 1906, he was united in marriage with Miss Edna Guthrie, daughter of Captain D. E. Guthrie of Galveston. Their two children are: Loraine A. Carter, born July 1, 1907, and Justine Carter, born March 5, 1911.

THOMAS JEFFERSON MILLER. A civil engineer and now engaged in the real estate business at Alpine, Mr. Miller is one of the real old-timers of Texas. At the beginning of his practical experience in life, was a period during which he was engaged in what was at the time known as the buffalo business. The buffalo business is an occupation long since obsolete, not only in Texas, but everywhere in America. During the seventies, however, it was a thriving industry, over all the territory from western Texas north into the plains of Canada. The slaughter of the buffalo for their skins was the last phase of the many years of struggle between civilization and barbarism, barbarism being represented by the buffalo and the Indians. For several years following the extermination of the great herds of Buffalo, the related industry was that of bone-gathering, by which hundreds of enterprising men gathered up the bones of the dead buffalo and shipped them to the gulf coast whence they were used either as fertilizers or were sent to the great sugar refineries of the country. During the thirty-five or forty years which have elapsed since that early period of his career, Mr. Miller has been identified with farming, with merchandising and with the work of his profession and in his present line of business, and is one of the successful and esteemed men of Brewster county.

Thomas Jefferson Miller was born in Llano county, Texas, on May 5, 1858, a son of John W. and Catherine Miller, who still reside on the old homestead in Llano county. All his lifetime has been spent in Texas, and as a boy he attained his education in private schools of Llano. When seventeen years of age he left school and was soon engaged in fulfilling a contract to supply the United States government with wood and hay at Fort McKavitt in west Texas. He was at work on this contract for two years, and then turned his attention to the industry which has been above described. After two years at that he returned to the home farm and managed it for about seven years. His next location was in Eden, Texas, where he spent some six years in the cattle business. While a cattle rancher he was also engaged in contracting and building for two years, and for a similar time had a store and engaged in supplying the general trade of that locality. On account of his wife's health he then disposed of his interests, and the next three years were spent in travel, seeking to restore his wife to health. Finally Mr. Miller located on the south branch of the Concho river, where he was engaged in farming for about a year, then held a position on a ranch for three years, and after that turned his attention to the drilling of wells and surveying in Schleicher county, where he was a resident for six years. Since leaving Schleicher county, Mr. Miller has been a resident of Alpine, where he has conducted a general real estate, insurance, mining and brokerage business for the past two years. Since coming here he has also served as a state surveyor under the supervision of Mr. John J. Terrill, the state land commissioner. Mr. Miller has a large business throughout the country about Alpine, and has enjoyed the confidence of all investors on account of his thorough knowledge and information about everything relating to the lands in this part of the state.

In Llano county on November 3, 1878, Mr. Miller married Mary L. Clendennen, daughter of M. B. Clendennen of Llano county. Nine children, seven sons and two daughters, were born to their happy marriage and six of them are now living, namely: Raymond W., who is married and resides in Brewster county; Katie, the wife of John C. Page of Brewster county; Isaac M., who is married and resides in Lavaca county; Thomas Franklin, who is married and lives in El Paso; Claude, unmarried and in Brewster county, and Archie, single and a resident of Brewster county. Mr. and Mrs. Miller are both members of the Baptist church, and his wife is an active worker in the Ladies' Aid Society. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Masonic and Odd Fellows Orders, and he and his wife both affiliate with the Eastern Star and the Rebekahs. Mr. Miller has filled all the chairs in the lodges of the Masons and the Odd Fellows, and is past master of the Masonic Lodge and noble grand of the Odd Fellows. His political attitude is independent, and he is deeply interested in promoting good local government. For his recreations he finds his best sport in hunting and fishing and enjoys all the amenities of life.

HERBERT R. WILSON. In this modern age of achievement youth is no barrier to successful accomplishment and the higher and better distinctions of the world. To Herbert R. Wilson, of Denton, a young lawyer only twenty-six years of age, have already come some of the honors and successes which men many years his senior would gladly aspire to. Mr. Wilson is one of the most brilliant young attorneys of North Texas.

Herbert R. Wilson was born January 7, 1888, in Denton county, Texas, and is of English descent on his father's side and of Scotch-Irish in the maternal line. His parents are Fred S. and Bettie (Donald) Wilson, both of whom are still living in Denton county. His father, who was born in the city of London, England, when six weeks of age was taken by his parents across the ocean to Virginia and a few years later was brought to Texas, the grandparents locating at Jefferson and subsequently at Louisville in Denton county. Fred S. Wilson has subsequently attained success as a rancher and stock man in Denton county, and lives with his wife at Pilot Point in that county. The mother was born in Texas, a daughter of Robert H. Donald. There were four sons, of whom Herbert R. is the oldest, and the three younger are: Donald, in the general mercantile business at Pilot Point; Frank, a bookkeeper at Pilot Point; and Walter Rowe, a student in the high school at Pilot Point.

Herbert R. Wilson acquired his early education in the public schools of Pilot Point, attended the University for a time in the law department, and showed exceptional keenness of intellect and ability in the realm of scholarship when still a boy. It was in 1907 that he was admitted to the bar at Austin, being at that time only nineteen years of age. He began his practice at Pilot Point, and has advanced rapidly to rank among the leading lawyers of Denton county. Before he came of age he was an active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party, and in 1908 was elected city attorney of Pilot Point, being still under twenty years of age when that honor came to him. Undoubtedly no similar honor had been paid to so young a man in the entire state of Texas. Later he was appointed assistant county attorney of Denton county, serving from December, 1908, to January, 1912. In the latter year he was elected county attorney of Denton county. So far as known, no lawyer or citizen has been honored with this important office so young in life as Mr. Wilson.

Mr. Wilson has taken the Chapter and Council degrees in the Masonic order, belongs to the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World, and joined the Episcopal church while a student in the University at Austin. On June 10, 1909, at St. Jo, Texas, he married Miss L. O. Kelly, whose father, Dr. H. H. O. Kelly, is a practicing physician in Missouri. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Wilson are two in number, named as follows: Herbert R., Jr., born November 21, 1910; and Charles Fred, born August 20, 1913.

Mr. Wilson on account of his official responsibilities and his devotion to the law seldom has time for recreation or a vacation, and his success is partly due to his remarkable concentration of energies upon the work in hand. During the twenty-six years of his residence in Denton county he has witnessed many notable improvements and changes in population, industry, and general development, and is convinced that no section of the state has a brighter and broader future than Denton county.

ROBERT O. WHITEAKER. This civil and contracting engineer, whose home and offices are in San Antonio, and who though a very young man has a broad experience and has proved exceptionally competent in the various lines of his profession, with a specialty in engineering for irrigation projects, represents one of the old and prominent families of Texas with relationships that go back to the time of the Republic, and also includes a number of notable names in the state history.

Robert O. Whiteaker was born at Sherman in Grayson county, Texas, in 1883, a son of Dr. Robert Perry and Mary (Smith) Whiteaker. The Whiteakers were originally from Kentucky, moving from that state to Illinois, and from there to Texas. Dr. Robert P. Whiteaker was born in Illinois, and his father was captain of an Illinois company in the war between the states and was killed during that struggle. Mr. Whiteaker's maternal grandfather, James W. Smith, came to Texas when a boy with his father, settled in Red River county in 1828. The family were members of one of the early colonies which settled in Texas when it was a part of Mexico. Several years ago Dr. R. P. Whiteaker and wife moved from Sherman to Austin, and still reside in the capital city. For many years an active practicing physician, Dr. Whiteaker has now retired from practice.

Robert O. Whiteaker's wife, who before her marriage was Miss Mary H. Shepard, is also of an old and historic family in the state. She was born in old Washington county, daughter of Alexander K. Shepard, who was a double cousin to Judge Seth Shepard, now judge of the court of appeals in the District of Columbia at Washington. The Shepard family of old Washington county had many distinguished members, and many other interesting facts concerning the genealogy and individual careers of the Shepards will be found on other pages in connection with sketches of the Shepard name. Mrs. Whiteaker on her mother's side is related to the Matson family, who were also very early settlers in Washington county and a number of whom are now found in Hill county. Her mother was Mary Belle Matson. Mrs. Whiteaker's paternal grandmother was of the Andrews family, and her paternal grandfather was James E. Shepard. Nearly all of these were members of DeWitt's colony founded in Texas before the separation of the Province from Mexico, and most of whom located in Washington county.

Robert O. Whiteaker was liberally educated, first in the public schools and the high school at Sherman, and studied civil engineering in the University of Texas at Austin. On leaving the university in 1905 he went to Panama and was given a position as an engineer on the great staff of government workers engaged in the construction of the canal. He remained on the Isthmus about a year, and after returning to Texas in 1906 was actively engaged in the various lines of his professional service, and for several years has had his permanent home in San Antonio. He is a member of the firm of Whiteaker & Washington, civil and contracting engineers, with offices in the Moore building.

Mr. Whiteaker has made a specialty of irrigation enterprises. He was engineer of a number of the largest and most successful irrigation canal systems in the Brownsville country, along the lower Rio Grande valley. Since then he has been engaged on other irrigation works of importance. His skill and reliability as an engineer are such that his services are retained on most of the irrigation and other engineering projects throughout southwest Texas, his clients including some of the largest and wealthiest land owners in that part of the state.

Mr. Whiteaker was chosen and is now acting as consulting engineer for the Border Military Highway Commission, which early in 1914 made a prospecting trip from Brownsville to Laredo for the purpose of mapping out a proposed military road from the mouth of the Rio Grande along the entire Mexican border to El Paso. Mr. Whiteaker accompanied the other members of the commission to Washington, where they met various high officials of the government and were given every assurance of support in carrying out the project for a highway whose obvious usefulness should bring about its early undertaking and completion. Through his large experience and broad observation throughout south and southwest Texas Mr. Whiteaker has compiled a large amount of useful data pertaining to topography, water courses, underground water supply, rain fall, etc., and this constitutes him one of the most expert reference authorities on any question affecting agricultural and general industrial development in that part of the state. Mr. Whiteaker is a former lieutenant of the Texas National Guard, and has membership in the Travis Club, the Chamber of Commerce and the Knights of Pythias at San Antonio.

ROBERT E. SPEER. One of the most significant acts of the present national administration, so far as Texas is concerned, was the appointment of a new postmaster at Fort Worth. On April 1, 1914, a commission for that office was issued by the president and postmaster general to Robert E. Speer, who at that time assumed his duties. This honor came to him entirely upon the basis of individual merit, and after Mr. Speer had waged a long campaign, almost single-handed, against the powerful influence of a number of the leading politicians in Texas and in Washington. Supporting him was the great bulk of the rank and file of citizens of his home city, and not even his opponents could allege a flaw in his previous record or any fact that would tend to interfere with the honest and efficient management of the office which he sought. The merits of his case enlisted the attention of the president, and Mr. Wilson freely and frankly gave his endorsement to Mr. Speer, at the same time in a letter to the postmaster general paying a tribute to the applicant's character, his ability and his fitness for the place of postmaster. This appointment was no less an honor to the present postmaster than it was an evidence of the true greatness of Mr. Wilson in his ability to disregard the weight of political influence and favor one who has never assumed to be anything but a working man, while his leading opponent was a multimillionaire. Such acts as this on the part of the president, it has been well said, are of the greatest service in retarding the modern spread of socialism and discontent, since they indicate that the president is a true and loyal friend of the masses.

The Fort Worth postoffice is one of the most important in Texas, ranking third in the amount of its business and revenues. It is division headquarters for the railway mail service, and also headquarters for undelivered parcel post packages covering an extensive territory in the southwest. The payroll of the Fort Worth postoffice amounts to forty thousand dollars a month.

Robert E. Speer was born at Mansfield, Tarrant county, Texas, in 1871, and as a printer by trade has long been identified with organized labor. He is a son of D. and Sallie Hunter (Ellis) Speer, both of whom are now living at Alvord, in Wise county. The Speers are an old east Texas family, but originated in Tennessee. Mr. Speer's father was born in that state, and was brought when a child, in the days of the Texas Republic, to Texas by his parents who settled in what is now Smith county, the county seat of which is Tyler. The paternal grandfather and grand-uncle were soldiers in the Mexican war, and Mr. D. Speer served in the Confederate army throughout the war between the states. In 1871 the family moved to Mansfield in Tarrant county, spent several years in this county, and after a long and active career as a farmer the father is now retired. Robert E. Speer's brother is Judge Ocie Speer, one of the distinguished jurists of Texas. He was born in Smith county in 1869, and at the age of thirty-three was elected associate justice of the court of civil appeals at Fort Worth, a position he has filled for the past twelve years. He is the author of "Speer's Law of Married Women in Texas," one of the standard law books on that subject and prescribed in the course of studies at the University of Texas. Mrs. Sallie Hunter (Ellis) Speer was born in Memphis, Tennessee, and was reared in the Swann family at Tyler, one of the old and substantial families of east Texas.

Robert E. Speer grew up on a farm, lived there until eighteen, acquired an education in the common schools, and about 1889 went out to northwest Texas and taught a term or two of school in what is now the town of Roby in Fisher county. Following this, with his brother, Ocie Speer, he bought the Fisher County Call and having learned the trade of printer engaged in newspaper publishing. From Fisher county he went to Wise county and established the Alvord Local, which was subsequently sold, and he then established the Bowie Blade in Wise county. The Blade was conducted as a daily during the Spanish-American war in 1898, and after that as a weekly. Having sold out his newspaper interests in 1899 Mr. Speer moved to Fort Worth, and established a plant for commercial printing, a business which he has conducted ever since under the name of the Speer Printing Company.

Ever since he was in a position to employ labor Mr. Speer has been an earnest and consistent advocate of union labor and is himself a member of the local typographical union. He has also been prominent in the councils of the American Federation of Labor in Texas and has held positions as delegate and in other capacities in that order. Mr. Speer was married at Roby, Fisher county, to Miss Lou Patterson, a member of a South Texas family also well known in West Texas. They are the parents of three children: Marvin, Winnie and Lou Ellis Speer.

JOE GILBERT, M. D. Both professional success and influential activity as a citizen mark the career of Joseph Gilbert, who is regarded by the community and his associates as one of the ablest and most successful physicians and surgeons of Austin, where he has a very high class practice. Dr. Gilbert has practiced at Austin for the past sixteen years, and he represents one of the old and honored family names of this section of the state.

Joe Gilbert was born May 8, 1873, in Travis county, Texas, a son of George and Mandana (Hornsby) Gilbert. His father was a planter and stock raiser, and was brought to Texas in 1855, at the age of eight years, from Spartansburg, South Carolina, where the grandparents had previously lived. Mandana Hornsby, the mother, was born and reared in Travis county, Texas, and her grandfather was one of the earliest settlers of Hornsby's Bend, and was a participant in some of the early Indian wars.

Dr. Gilbert was educated in the Austin public schools, in 1894 graduated Bachelor of Science from the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, and received his degree in medicine from the medical department of the State University in 1897. Dr. Gilbert has since taken further research and hospital work in the New York Post-Graduate College.

He is at this time president of the Travis county Medical Society, belongs to the District and the State Medical Societies and the American Medical Association. In 1907 he served as surgeon to the Texas Confederate Home, and has also acted as city and county health officer. For two years he was surgeon to the Agricultural and Mechanical College, and is now University Physician to the Texas State University. He is also a member of the staff of the Austin City Infirmary. For ten years Dr. Gilbert was Captain of the Austin Company of State Militia. His fraternal affiliations are with Austin Lodge No. 2, A. F. & A. M., with the Knights Templar Commandery, and with Ben Hur Temple of the Mystic Shrine, and also with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks at Austin. His church is St. David's Protestant Episcopal Church of Austin.

Dr. Gilbert has his offices in the Scarborough building and his home is at 1402 West avenue. He has a delightful family. On September 13, 1900, he married Miss Daisy Thorne of Galveston, who had been a teacher in the Rosenberg School in that city. Her father, John Thorne, came from London, England, and at the time of his death was purchasing agent for the Santa Fe Railroad Company. Dr. Gilbert and wife were married with the first marriage license issued at Galveston after the great storm and flood of September, 1900. In that calamity Miss Thorne had a very narrow escape, being rescued with twenty-one others in the Lucas Terrace, a large building, all of which was swept away by the water with the exception of the apartment in which Miss Thorne lived. Dr. Gilbert and wife have three children: Etta King, born January 7, 1902; Joe Thorne, born August 7, 1905; and Daisy, born March 7, 1912.

FELIX GRUNDY TRAYNHAM, M. D., of Teague, has been a resident of Freestone county since 1893, in which year he began his residence as a physician at Cotton Gin, coming to Teague in 1912, here identifying himself with the drug business and the continuation of his office practice.

Dr. Traynham was born at Byhalia, Marshall county, Mississippi, on May 26, 1867, and his early environment was that of a farmer's son. His father was Benjamin F. Traynham, a native of Lawrence District, South Carolina, and he was a son of William David Traynham, who moved out of Virginia into South Carolina, and was the first of three brothers to make that move. The Traynham family is one of the oldest in the south, and the old Traynham homestead in South Carolina has been in the family for two hundred years, the original of the name in America having been the great-great-grand-sire of Dr. Traynham of this review. He came from the vicinity of London during the early settlement of Halifax county in Virginia, and took up his residence in South Carolina, where men of the name have ever since been prominent.

Wm. David Traynham, grandfather of the subject, married a Miss Key, who bore him ten children. He later married a sister of his wife, and of their four children one of them was the Benjamin F. Traynham, father of Dr. Traynham. The oldest sons of the first marriage, John and William, were graduated from Jefferson Medical College, and John practiced his profession at Laurens, South Carolina. William subsequently came to Texas in 1849 and lived at Chapel Hill, where he died, leaving a family. Others of that family were Commodore Traynham, who was educated for the profession of law and died unmarried; Sanford, who died young in South Carolina; Nancy, who married Daniel Brown and spent her life at Graton, Illinois; Sarah, who married David Garrison and moved to Clarksville, Texas, where she later died; and a daughter, who married a Mr. Townsend and spent the rest of her life at Spring, Texas. The second set of children comprised Mary, who married John D. Cutter and lived in Houston, Texas, since 1846; Benjamin F., father of the subject, who died at Lovelady, Texas, in 1906; Felix G., who died at Aberdeen, Mississippi, and left two sons; and Octavia, who married William Posey and spent the remainder of her life in Monroe county, Mississippi.

Benjamin F. Traynham was born in the year 1833 and in 1851 he left his native state of South Carolina and went to Mississippi, stopping there briefly and then moving on to Texas. His education was a limited one, obtained in the schools of Laurens, South Carolina, as a boy, and he spent his life as a farmer. With the outbreak of the war he entered the Tenth Mississippi Regiment, Company I, as a non-commissioned officer under Capt. George B. Myers in Colonel Chalmers' Regiment, General Bragg's army. He was active at the battle of Mumfordsville, Perryville and Murfreesboro, and in many of the battles of the Atlanta campaign. He passed through the entire war without being once wounded or captured. With the close of the war he returned to Mississippi where he had occupied himself with farming for some time previous to his military career, and took up the threads of the old life in so far as it was possible, in consideration of the havoc that the war had wrought. Though Mr. Traynham never owned a slave, he was the son of slave holding ancestors, the South Carolina plantation having long previous been operated by slave labor. It was not until 1884 that Mr. Traynham came to Texas to make it his home, though he had made previous visits to the state. In that year he settled near Lovelady, and he did his last work there as a farmer. He spent a quiet life, and was a member of the Baptist church. He was a Democrat but in no sense a politician, and he was never a member of any secret or fraternal order of whatever nature. He was married in Marshall county, Mississippi, to Miss Mary McRae, a daughter of William and Melissa McRae. The father was born in North Carolina, but was reared at Clayton, Alabama, and was a farmer all his days. He died in his old Alabama home while on a visit there in late life, and his widow died in Mississippi.

Of the children of Benjamin and Melissa (McRae) Traynham, the oldest is William D., of Lovelady, Texas; Fannie May is the wife of C. F. Nissle, also of Lovelady; Dr. Felix G. comes next in line. Henry U. is a conductor on the Frisco line from Memphis, Tennessee, to Birmingham, Alabama; and Melissa Traynham died in 1879 in Mississippi.

Dr. Traynham got his education in the common branches in the schools of Center Hill, DeSoto county, Mississippi, then the family home, and he taught school in Houston, Anderson, Cass and Lamar counties, Texas, and also in Caddo parish, Louisiana. He finished his literary education in Bowling Green, Kentucky, in 1887, his teaching experience coming both before and after his graduation. After he took his A. B. degree he resumed his educational activities and in 1890 he attended the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville, the branch of the well known Transylvania University, and he was graduated with first honors in a class of 1856, though he never read medicine a day before his entry in that institution. He finished his course in 1892 and established himself at Cotton Gin, Texas, remaining there for nineteen years. While there he became extensively interested in farming, and of his large land holdings much of it was brought under cultivation during his residence there. He was also active in his profession to an unusual degree, and when he came to Teague he early found favor with the public as the exponent of advanced medical knowledge. Coming to this city in 1912, his advance in professional and other circles has been a rapid one, and he is today identified with various enterprises in the city that stamp him a skilled man of business as well as a successful medical practitioner. He is a director of the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank of Teague, and is also interested in the drug business as the proprietor of the Traynham Drug Company. His fine home is on Ninth and Magnolia streets.

On April 27, 1893, Dr. Traynham was married at Palestine, Texas, to Miss Lillie Coleman, daughter of Travis and Elizabeth Coleman. Mr. Coleman was reared in Mississippi where at Byhalia, his daughter, Mrs. Traynham, was born, likewise the birthplace of the doctor. One child was born to Dr. and Mrs. Traynham, Harold Leland, who died in infancy.

The doctor is not a fraternity man, nor a "joiner" of any variety. He has no church affiliations, and though Democrat in his political sympathies, takes no active part in politics, his entire time being engrossed with his professional and business affairs.

COLONEL GEORGE T. TODD. One of the ablest lawyers of Eastern Texas was the late Col. George T. Todd, who died at his home in Jefferson January 29, 1913. The Todd family has furnished noted lawyers and men of public usefulness to Texas through three generations, and Col. Todd's father, William S. Todd, was one of the eminent men in the early history of the state. As judge of the eighth district court, he organized and presided over, from 1850 to 1862, the first court held in Cooke, Grayson, Hunt and Collin counties. He held the office of judge of that district twelve years, and his jurisdiction extended from Grayson and Cooke counties to the east line of the state. Judge Todd was a member of the secession convention of 1860-61 and signed the ordinance of secession. He came from Virginia, his native state, to Texas in 1843, and first settled at Boston in Bowie county. From there he moved to Clarksville, and afterwards to Jefferson, where his death occurred in 1864, at the age of fifty-six. Before coming to Texas he had been a member of the state legislature of Virginia, and few men stood higher as a lawyer or as an impartial and just judge. He was a man of great liberality and public spirit. It is said that no person ever applied to him for help and went away disappointed, and it was this free-handed generosity which kept him a poor man until his death. Judge Todd was the only son of George T. Todd, who died at the age of ninety years in Carolina county, Virginia, and in his time was the wealthiest citizen of that county. Judge Todd's grandfather was a Scotch doctor who came from Scotland with several brothers, who settled in the states of Kentucky, Mississippi and Missouri. To one branch of the family belongs Mrs. Abraham Lincoln.

Col. Todd's mother was Eliza A. Hudgins, a native of Virginia, a woman of the finest attainments, natural and acquired. She taught school at Boston and at Clarksville in Texas up to the time of her death, and many of her former pupils remember with pride and affection her work as an educational guide and friend. Colonel Charles De Morse considered her the best contributor to his paper, the Northern Standard, then the leading paper in North Texas. She was a daughter of Thomas D. Hudgins, of Mathews county, Virginia, a planter and at one time a large ship owner, who died at Richmond about 1862. Her sister, Columbia H., became the wife of Col. John B. Cary, a colonel in the Confederate army and for a number of years one of the leading life insurance men of Virginia. Her brother, William P. Hudgins, of Marshall, was for a long time the head of the Marshall University, and for several years railroad ticket and freight agent at that city.

Colonel George T. Todd was born on the shore of Chesapeake Bay, Mathews county, Virginia, May 6, 1839, and came with his father's family at the age of four to Texas. He was educated by his mother at Boston and Clarksville. He also went to school to the Rev. Dr. J. W. P. McKenzie two years. After the death of his mother, he was sent with his sister, Mary, to Virginia, to Hampton Academy, and remained three years. He then taught school at the age of nineteen near Petersburg, Virginia, after which he attended, in 1858-9, the University of Virginia one year, obtaining distinction in several studies. He came back to Texas in 1860 and began the study of law in Jefferson, under his father. Upon reaching the age of twenty-one he was admitted to practice in the courts of the state, and practiced till the breaking out of the war, when he volunteered as a private in Black's Company A, First Texas Regiment of Infantry, which was mustered in for twelve months at New Orleans and organized with other companies into the First Texas Regiment at Richmond, under Colonel Lewis T. Wigfall. The regiment went into active service immediately, and reached the scene of action the day after the battle of Manassas. This regiment was afterward commanded by Hugh McLeod, of Galveston, who was succeeded by Colonel (afterward General) John B. Hood, who organized with this and two other (the 4th and 5th) regiments from Texas, one Georgia and one Arkansas regiment, the historic Hood's Brigade. The first Texas regiment was for the first time in battle at Eltham's Landing, on York river, in May, 1862. Their twelve months' service expiring, the regiment was reorganized by electing new officers. A. T. Rainey was elected colonel, and Captain Todd was elected captain of his old Company A. Immediately afterwards the command participated in all the battles around Richmond, from Seven Pines to Malvern Hill. They were afterward engaged in the second battle of Manassas, next at Sharpsburg or Antietam. In December of that year, in the battle of Fredericksburg, the battles of the Wilderness, and after that, in the battle of Chickamauga, Tennessee, the command going there with General Longstreet to make that fight. After this battle Company A, having been recruited from home, was reduced by sickness and death on the field to five men and two commissioned officers, including the captain. Here is a record commanding admiration from all brave and just minds. The decimated commands were consolidated by general order, and upon the application of Captain Todd, he was transferred and made adjutant of the cavalry regiment of Colonel (afterward General) Walter P. Lane, in which service he was engaged to the end of the war, and which command was never surrendered, bringing their guns, camp equipage, wagons and teams home, and distributing them among the men, the enemy never getting a gun or a mule. Colonel Crump was at that time in command of this regiment in Lane's brigade.

On reaching home, Colonel Todd found that his father had been dead more than a year, and the family then consisting of his stepmother and two children (his half brothers), besides his own sister and full brothers, one of whom was about grown. He and his brothers had the family to support. They worked on the small farm left by his father, and that year managed to make a living until he could get to practice law. He began practice at Jefferson and was there until his death. At the first state election prior to reconstruction, Captain Todd was elected State's Attorney in his father's old district, and held the office until removed as an impediment to reconstruction—all the officers of the state going out about the same time. Soon after this he took part in the defense (together with Colonel Culberson and other lawyers of the place) of the prisoners who were arrested and tried by a court martial for their lives. Colonel Todd and W. L. Crawford, as Democrats, in 1870, made a canvass of the counties of Marion and Cass for the legislature, but were defeated by the Republicans. In 1876 he was a candidate for district judge and again defeated. In 1880 he was elected from the same district (Marion, Cass and Bowie) to the legislature. In this body he was chairman of the committee on education and a member of the judiciary and constitutional amendments committees. He was an advocate of locating the State University in its entirety at one place, instead of dividing the medical department from it.

Colonel Todd became a Mason in Jefferson Lodge, No. 38, in May, 1860, and took all the Chapter, Council and Commandery degrees, together with all the degrees of the ancient Scotch rite. He was once elected Master of the Blue Lodge, but did not serve. He represented his own lodge three times in the Grand Lodge. He was secretary of the Chapter, junior and senior warden of the Blue Lodge, and grand orator of the Grand Chapter of Texas. His grandfather was a strong Whig. His father was a Jeffersonian Democrat, and Colonel Todd was a life-long Democrat, with progressive and liberal views in favor of supplanting muscle by new and approved machinery and of educating to the extent that the common people of the country may be able to use on their farms all the improved machinery, now or hereafter in use. He strongly favored the Agricultural and Mechanical College on these grounds. He was an alternate delegate to the Greeley convention at Baltimore, in 1872, and the same year a member of the State convention.

Colonel Todd first married in Clarksville, Texas, May 6, 1869, Miss Edwina Van Dyke, who was born in Red River county, the daughter of L. D. Van Dyke, a farmer of a Pennsylvania German family. She died at Jefferson, in February, 1872. By this marriage there was one child, Vandyke, born in Jefferson June 6, 1870. The first Mrs. Todd was noted for her remarkable beauty, her amiability and attractive and popular manners. Colonel Todd next married in Brandon, Mississippi, March 13, 1873, Miss Marion B. Miller, who was born near Brandon, the daughter of A. P. Miller, a native of Virginia. Her mother was originally Mary Todd, a cousin to Colonel Todd's father. She graduated at Judson's Female Institute, Marion, Alabama. By this wife Colonel Todd had five children, namely: Miller, Charles C., May Virginia, Eva Cary, and Lulu Dotson. Colonel Todd was a deacon in the Missionary Baptist church, but originally joined the Christians or Campbellites, his parents having been members of that body. Mrs. Todd is a very zealous member of the Baptist church.

Quoting from what a friend said of Colonel Todd:—"He has always been energetic, ambitious and determined to succeed. He is universally respected as an honest, honorable and reliable man, of unimpeachable integrity. He is an able orator, having few superiors in the state. His moral character is good. He is a genial, pleasant gentleman, a good talker, a man who enjoys society and who always makes himself very agreeable. He is a very successful and able lawyer."

CHARLES C. TODD. A prominent young lawyer of San Antonio, and a son of the late Colonel George T. Todd, whose many distinguished services as a soldier, lawyer and public official are recounted elsewhere in this publication, Charles C. Todd was born at Jefferson, his father's old home on May 1, 1877. Mr. Todd has himself had a notable career—as a college man, in the army and in the practice of law. The earlier years of his life especially, up to the age of twenty-five, were filled with varied activity and useful accomplishment. He was educated in the public schools of Jefferson and in the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Bryan. At the latter institution he graduated with honors in 1897. Before his graduation he had been military commandant of the college, and following his graduation he became assistant analytical chemist in the college faculty. On account of the military attainments he had shown as a member and commandant of the cadet corps of the college, he received and accepted in 1898 a commission of second lieutenant in the Third United States Infantry, and during that year was in actual service with his regiment against the Indians in Northern Minnesota. In 1899 he was transferred to the Philippine service, where he at once took part in the warfare then going on in the islands. He was promoted to First Lieutenant in the Twentieth Infantry, and was wounded at the battle of San Rafael, one of the early battles of the Philippine war. He soon thereafter returned home for treatment, and after being engaged for some time in recruiting service, he retired from military service.

Mr. Todd studied law in the office of his uncle, Charles S. Todd, in Texarkana, Texas, and was admitted to the bar in 1902. In 1904 he began the practice of law in San Antonio, which has since been his home. He has maintained a law association with Mr. Carlos Bee since 1906. Previous to taking up the practice of law permanently, he had filled the position of commandant of a military school in Little Rock, Arkansas; also was commandant of Peacock Military Academy in San Antonio.

Mr. Todd is married and he and his wife are the parents of two children: Charles C., Jr., and Marion Josephine. Mrs. Todd, formerly Miss Mary B. Bittle, is a daughter of Prof. T. C. Bittle, who was one of the instructors at Agricultural and Mechanical College. She and her father were born in Virginia, and belong to a family of distinguished educators. Professor Bittle's father was the founder and first president of Roanoke College in Virginia.

CAPTAIN THOMAS HATLEY CRAIG. While Harrison county has a distinctive position among East Texas counties for its splendid resources and development in modern times, it is also noted as one of the sections which have retained most of the fine ideals and aristocratic culture of the old South. While population and economic conditions have changed here as elsewhere, it is a fact that a large number of the most influential citizens are people who were born or have spent most of their lives in this one community and the knowledge that people have of each other is based upon almost lifelong associations and neighborly fellowship in one community. Among the most prominent representatives of such families is Captain Thomas Hatley Craig, than whom there is hardly a better known or esteemed citizen in Harrison county, and he is still the owner of one of the fine old plantations which before the war were the conspicuous centers of rural life in this section of the state. The Craigs have lived in Harrison county for more than sixty-five years, and in pioneer times did their share of the labors and hardships involved in the development of the wilderness.

Thomas Hatley Craig was born in Fayette county, Tennessee, December 6, 1839, a son of Eli Taylor and N. A. (Collier) Craig. Eli T. Craig, a native of Lincoln county, Tennessee, late in 1846 moved his family from Fayette county to Texas, making the journey in wagons through the state of Arkansas and arriving in Harrison county on January 4, 1847. His wife's brother, Captain James Yancy Collier, had been a settler in this section for several years, and it was in the Collier home that the Craigs made their first stop on arriving in Harrison county. The old Collier homestead at that time was situated about eight miles south of Marshall. Eli T. Craig bought land about eleven miles south of the county seat, and in 1848 moved his family to the new home and lived there the rest of his days. The old Craig place south of Marshall was in many ways representative of the best features of the old-time plantations in East Texas. Its fields were devoted to the raising of cotton, grain, with considerable fruit, and the live stock was allowed to pasture in the woods and on the prairies. Slave quarters were a prominent feature, and the slaves did most of the labor in producing the aggregate of crops. A large planter in those days was a more important citizen than the resident of the town, and Eli T. Craig was honored with positions of public trust, was sent as representative to the state legislature for two terms before the war, and during that great struggle he continued to live in Harrison county, a witness to the overthrow of the old industrial conditions, and died two years after the close of the war in 1867. He had been one of the most active members of the Cumberland Presbyterian church in this section of Texas and for a number of years had served as ruling elder.

Captain Craig's mother was a native of North Carolina, a daughter of Joseph Collier, who had been a soldier in the war of 1812, and her mother was a Yancy, the name of one of the most distinguished families in North Carolina. She married Mr. Craig in Tennessee, and her death occurred in Harrison county, Texas, in January, 1911, when ninety years and six months of age.

Thomas Hatley Craig, about seven years of age when the family moved to Texas, was reared on the old Harrison county plantation, and with the exception of his service in the war that estate has been the scene of both his earlier and later associations. Planting and farming have been his chief occupations, and the success won from the soil has been accompanied by patriotic service as a soldier and civil official. Though reared in the primitive times of Northeast Texas, his was a better than ordinary education. From the local schools he entered Chapel Hill College at Daingerfield, and was a student there at the outbreak of the war. He left school to enlist in Company H of the Seventh Texas Infantry, his brother James Marion Craig being captain of this company. The Seventh Texas was one of the most noted regiments in the Confederate army from this state, and all its service was on the east side of the Mississippi river. It was in the commands at different times of Generals Bragg, Johnston and Hood. At Fort Donelson early in the war Captain Craig was taken prisoner, but seven months later was exchanged at Vicksburg. In the closing months of the great struggle through the southern half of the Confederacy he participated at Lookout Mountain, Chattanooga, Missionary Ridge, and was with his command before Atlanta, though prevented by illness from actively participating in the many battles that preceded the fall of that city. In one of the battles before Atlanta his brother, Captain James M. Craig, was killed, and the company then elected as successor to their beloved captain the brother, Thomas H. Craig. He led his company during the campaign after Atlanta into Tennessee with General Hood's army. At the battle of Franklin in the fall of 1864 Captain Craig led his company with distinguished bravery in the front rank of a battle which for desperate courage had no equal in the entire war. In that long continued battle he was shot seven times, one bullet passing entirely through his body. These wounds disabled him for further active military service, although he continued with the army until the end of the war and did not reach home until June, 1865. Another brother, Jonathan Louis Craig, also lost his life in the war. He was a member of the Seventeenth Texas Regiment, was captured in the battle of Arkansas Post, and while a prisoner at Camp Douglas in Chicago died.

After his return to Texas and slow recovery from wounds and the hardships of war, Captain Craig took charge of the old home plantation and for many years was engaged in its management. As a planter and business man he has long been considered one of the prosperous men of Harrison county, and in addition to the homestead owns several other farms that constitute an ample provision against old age. In 1892 Captain Craig was elected state and county tax collector of Harrison county, and that office caused him to move his residence into Marshall, where he still resides. After seven years in office he retired from both public and business affairs. Like his father, Captain Craig is one of the active members of the Cumberland Presbyterian church. Captain Craig has two children: James Marion and Mrs. Anna (Craig) Bates. They are the children of his first wife, whose maiden name was Anna Hall, who was born in Alabama and came with her family to Harrison county in 1849.

HON. N. A. (GUS) SHAW, of Texarkana, is a Texas planter with extensive interests, and a Texas politician with a large following. A brief review of his life reveals the following facts:

N. A. Shaw, "Gus" Shaw, as he is familiarly called, was born in Chickasaw county, Mississippi, May 19, 1863, son of William A. and Mary (Shannon) Shaw. William A. Shaw, also a native of Mississippi, spent about half his life in Texas, and in both states he was a prominent and influential citizen. He was a graduate of Princeton College and had studied law and been admitted to the bar, but he never practiced his profession, preferring to devote his attention to agriculture. He had extensive plantation interests at Shaw's in Bolivar county. Before coming to Texas, he had been prominent in state politics in Mississippi and had stumped the state with Jefferson Davis in the memorable contest between Fillmore and Buchanan. It was in 1863 that he came to Texas, and the following year he took up his residence on a plantation on Red River in Bowie county. Here he lived until 1870, when he moved to Clarksville, Texas, where he passed the rest of his life, and died in 1900, at the ripe age of seventy-four. During the reconstruction period he represented his county in the Twelfth Legislature, and while a member of that body fought every iniquitous measure enacted by it. He was a Democrat and a champion of the rights of the people during "a time that tried men's souls." Through the successful operation of his planting interests, he became a man of substantial wealth. His wife, the mother of N. A. Shaw, was a native of Shannon, Chickasaw county, Mississippi. She died in 1865.

Gus Shaw was reared and received his early education at Clarksville. He attended the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Bryan, Texas, and is a graduate of that institution with the class of 1880. While there he was elected editor of the college paper published by the cadets, and served as such, and he was also elected and served as president of the Austin Literary Society. In the final debate at the commencement of 1880 he was one of the champions of that society. The years 1881 and 1882 he spent in the study of law at the University of Virginia. In 1883 he was admitted to the bar at Bonham, Texas, and that year began the practice of law at Clarksville. He served as District Attorney for Red River county in 1886-88. In the last named year the counties of Red River, Lamar and Fannin were united in one judicial district. Mr. Shaw's county, Red River, instructed for him for District Attorney for the new district, but he declined to be a candidate. He preferred to devote himself to his private practice. His ability and talents as a lawyer, combined with success in his agricultural enterprises, brought him a comfortable fortune. With his father's inclination for agriculture rather than law practice, he retired from professional life to give all his time to farming, with the result that he has become one of the largest and most successful planters in Northwestern Texas, and he is one of the largest land-owners in this section of the State, his holdings being in Bowie and Red River counties, in the Red River valley. In 1904, he moved from his old home at Clarksville to Texarkana, where he has since resided. His latter years have been devoted entirely to agriculture. This, however, he conducts more as a profession than as a business, long staple cotton being his specialty, which he produces and markets in the most modern and scientific way. Indeed, he has the reputation of being the most successful and best posted grower of long staple cotton in the State of Texas.

In 1890, Mr. Shaw was elected to the 22nd legislature, from the 38th legislative district, to represent Red River county in the lower house, and while serving in that body was chairman of the House Committee on Federal Relations; member of Judiciary Committee No. 1, and the committees on county government and county finance.

At this time, although Mr. Shaw seems to have no personal inclination to re-enter public life, he has been widely mentioned as a candidate for governor, it being considered that he would make an exceptionally strong candidate on account of the confidence reposed in him by the farming and laboring elements. It is his pleasure to have the strong friendship of the most prominent leaders in State politics.

Mr. Shaw was married in Clarksville to Miss Corinne Lee of Red River county, a lineal descendant of the Robert E. Lee family of Virginia.

LESTER M. WARD, who at this writing is secretary of the Sherman Chamber of Commerce, which he organized and brought up to its high point of influence and efficiency, is one of the vigorous young business leaders of Texas, was identified with Y. M. C. A. work for some years, and since the first of January, 1914, has been assistant secretary of the Business Men's Association of Fort Worth.

Lester M. Ward was born August 22, 1879, in the state of Michigan, a son of Franklin F. and Helen M. Ward. His father was born in Ohio and his mother in Michigan. The former was a Michigan merchant and is still active in business in that state. Mr. Ward, the only child of his parents, received his educational training in the public schools of Michigan, and subsequently took special instruction in Y. M. C. A. work. He served as assistant secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association in Grand Rapids in the boys department, and subsequently became physical director of the Memphis, Tennessee, Y. M. C. A. In 1902 the International Young Men's Christian Association sent him to Havana, Cuba, as member of a committee to inaugurate the physical work of the association in that city. In 1904 his work took him to New Orleans, where he became director of the Physical department of the association in that city. While in New Orleans Mr. Ward inaugurated the annual cross country run, held on January 8th of each year. The course covered by the runners in this event is between Spanish Fort and Jackson Square, a distance of six miles. It is the same route taken by the Baratarrian pirates who responded to the call of General Jackson in 1815 to repel the advance of the British army upon New Orleans. Since Mr. Ward inaugurated the run, it has proved a very popular event and has been held each year, and is now one of the leading athletic attractions in that part of the country.

From New Orleans Mr. Ward went to Houston, Texas, and assisted in the erection of the fine Y. M. C. A. building of that city, and was chosen as the first physical director after the completion of the building. Two years later he came to Sherman as general secretary of the local Y. M. C. A., and he was here while the building was in course of construction. The Sherman Y. M. C. A. is a handsome three-story brick building, built at a cost of $75,000, and its service to the young men of the city was inaugurated and perfected by Mr. Ward.

While serving as secretary of the Y. M. C. A., he assisted in the organization of what was first known as the Young Men's Business Association, became a charter member and was on the executive committee of the association. On June 12, 1912, he accepted the secretaryship of the reorganized body, which then became the Sherman Chamber of Commerce. He continued as secretary and has done a great deal to render more effective the organization and all its departments. He has recently tendered his resignation in order to accept the position of assistant secretary of the Business Men's Association of Fort Worth, the duties of which office he assumed on January 1, 1914.

Mr. Ward is also president of the Texas Commercial Executive Association, is vice president of the Southern Commercial Secretaries Association, is secretary and treasurer of the Oklahoma, Texas and Gulf Highway Association, and a member of the executive committee of the Texas Men's Business Association. He has affiliation with the Travelers Protective Association and the Knights of the Maccabees and belongs to the Baptist church. In politics he is a Democrat.

Mr. Ward was married September 12, 1900, at Cincinnati, Ohio, to Miss Minnie D. Hall, of Grand Rapids, Michigan, a daughter of Matthew Hall, who was a carpenter and contractor and still lives at Grand Rapids. Mr. and Mrs. Ward have two children: Helen Anastasia, aged twelve, and in school; and Andrew Franklin, about one year of age. A few years ago while attending a meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association at Austin, Mr. Ward composed the following "lines on the capitol," which has often been praised by the people of Texas, and which may appropriately be quoted in this connection:

O'er-awed I stand before this granite pile;
With grace and beauty clothed, thy massive walls
Stand sure, as stand the battlements of war.

As firmly fixed as Granite Mountains, thou
Her child, torn from the breast that gave thee grace;
For thou did'st take unto thyself her strength.
The tan of countless suns is in thy face.

The Colorado glistens at thy feet;
Her fertile valley is thy resting place.
The walls of thine estate are rambling hills;
And cultured Austin nestles at thy base.

But what the price that fashioned thee? Ah me,
What price indeed! Six years of ceaseless toil;
Three million acres—priceless acres they—
Three million acres of most fertile soil.

But who will rise to say the price too great?
Should Texas with her vast expanse, disdain
To pay such price, to build a Capitol
In keeping with her widely spread domain?

Stand firm upon thy base throughout the years
No voice condemns the price that fashioned thee.
And may the justice of thy spacious halls,
As strong as thou, as broad as lofty be.

HON. A. D. HAMILTON. Among the older members of the Sabine county bar is Alexander D. Hamilton, for a quarter of a century active in his profession at Hemphill, recognized as a man of eminent capabilities and talents in the law, and with corresponding prominence in civic and social affairs. His family has been identified with east Texas since the early years of the Republic, and there are many things to give the name prominence in its association with Texas and Texans.

Alexander D. Hamilton is a native of Jasper county, Texas, where he was born in 1857. His parents were John and Amanda (Thomason) Hamilton. His father, one of the early pioneers of east Texas, was born at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, and in 1838 came to the southwest and located in Jasper county, Texas. That was just two years after Texas had won her independence from Mexico, and Jasper county was still a wilderness only settled here and there, and the existence of the county began about the same time that John Hamilton located there. He was married in that county to Miss Amanda Thomason who was born in Alabama. John Hamilton, whose business career was that of stockman and farmer, enlisted from Texas for service in the Mexican war, during 1846, and for a short time saw service as a Confederate soldier. His wife lived and died in Jasper county.

The boyhood of Alexander D. Hamilton was spent on a farm in Jasper county, and for several years he lived in Pennsylvania, the original home of his father. While in Pennsylvania, he completed his education in the Pennsylvania State College in Center county. He studied law in the office of Judge T. W. Ford at Jasper, and in 1886 he passed the examinations and was admitted to the bar at Jasper. Mr. Hamilton in February, 1887, moved to Hemphill, the county seat of Sabine county, and there, having been married a short time before, established his home, and engaged in the practice of his profession. He has long since been accorded a place of leadership at the bar in east Texas. He was twice elected and served as a member of the house of representatives in the state legislature during the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh sessions in 1899 and 1901. Outside of his public and professional work he has been much interested in the practical development of Sabine county resources, and owns some valuable property in the county and in the town of Hemphill.

At Jasper in January, 1887, Mr. Hamilton married Miss Callie Hart. She was born in Jasper county, and is related by direct family ties to Thomas Hart Benton, the famous Missouri Senator and statesman. Her parents came from North Carolina, and settled in Jasper county in 1840. The oldest son of Mr. Hamilton, Beaver A. Hamilton, graduated in law from the law department of Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tennessee, with the class of 1912 and is now his father's law partner. The younger son, Thomas Benton Hamilton, graduated in law in the same institution with the class of 1913. Besides these two sons already fitted out and started on professional careers, there are two daughters: Sarah M. and Ida Hamilton, both of whom are students in Baylor College for girls at Belton, Texas.

JAMES MCGUIRE MOBBERLY. For more than forty years James M. Mobberly has been conspicuously identified with affairs in and about Longview. Not a little money and service have been contributed by him toward making from a once unpromising village the commercial and industrial metropolis which Longview has become.

Mr. Mobberly, whose life has been fraught with many interesting experiences, is a son of Kentucky. His grandfather, John T. Mobberly, born in Virginia, selected the Bluegrass State as the commonwealth in which to bring up his children. Who his wife was is not definitely known, although she is known to have been, like himself, a Virginian. Their children, some of whom were born before the family migration to Kentucky, were six in number—three sons and three daughters. The eldest, William Peyton Mobberly (who lived to become the father of him whose name heads this account), is the subject of further detail below; Lewis passed his life in Indiana; Remus died before marriage in Kentucky; Elizabeth became Mrs. James Britton; Tabitha became Mrs. Frederick Pettit; and Mary, who became Mrs. Frank Haynes. Several of these sons and daughters abandoned the old slave-labor custom of the family, sold their slaves and moved across to the free territory on the other side of the Ohio river. William Peyton Mobberly, the eldest, clung to the old traditions and in after years suffered the usual losses incident to sympathizers of the Confederacy in a border state. It had been during his childhood that the removal from Virginia had taken place and his identification with the new home was as close as that of a born Kentuckian. He married Lucy Haynes, who was a daughter of Joseph Haynes, a farmer of Daviess county, the home locality of the Mobberlys. The sons and daughters of the Haynes-Mobberly marriage were the following: John, who still resides near the old home; one who died in that locality; James McGuire, our subject; Samuel, who died in Longview, Texas; Allen, who spent his life in Kentucky; Charles, who is still a resident of that state; Sarah, who is Mrs. J. F. Hile and Mary, Mrs. W. T. Burton, both residents of the Bluegrass commonwealth. All these have made their native state their home. There both John Mobberly and William Peyton Mobberly spent their final days, which ended at or near the same time, the former being then ninety and the latter sixty-five years of age.

1842 was the year of James McGuire Mobberly's birth and Daviess county his birthplace. His independent citizenship was first notably launched in his participation as a soldier in the fortunes of the Confederate army. He entered service in 1861, as a private in Captain Noel's Company A, of the First Kentucky Cavalry, commanded by Colonel Ben Hardin Helms, a brother-in-law of Abraham Lincoln. He was at times under General Forrest or General Joe Wheeler, and belonged to Bragg's army. He took part in the battle of Perryville, of Chickamauga and in the campaign around Chattanooga in which the battles of Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain were fought. Such were the fortunes allotted to him that at Charleston, Tennessee, he was taken a prisoner of war and was sent to Rock Island, Illinois, where, after a confinement of eleven months, he escaped by sheer nerve and hardihood. His disguise was that of a Federal uniform, which he had evolved by borrowing trousers from one, a blouse from another and a cap from a third of the Union privates; adding a pistol holster made from a boot leg and stuck into his blouse where the end of it could be seen. Thus attired, he marched boldly out, confidently kicked open a gate and walked across the river on the ice with a party of skaters. He then made his way to the house of a lady friend near the town. She provided him with a misfit suit of citizens' clothes, gave him $150.00 in cash and started him out as an "Iowa Hoosier." It was on February 12, 1865, that he left the prison and in the same year, after a trip by rail from Monmouth, Illinois, he crossed the boundary at Detroit, thus reaching Canada. Once in the dominions of the British sovereign, Mr. Mobberly was safe from pursuit and recapture. Proceeding to Toronto, he reported to Jacob Thompson, the Confederate agent, who placed him in the Confederate navy of a single vessel, "The Georgian Bay," which was then preparing to make a run to Matamoros, Mexico. The arrest of the vessel put an end to Confederate activity from that source; the surrender of Lee soon afterward threw Thompson and aids out of their employment; and "Jim" Mobberly made his way back to his old Kentucky home.

At his old home Mr. Mobberly spent his first post-bellum days. In 1868, having arranged for an advent into Texas, he arrived at Milligan, in this state. That locality was then the end of the Texas Central Railroad. Engaging in merchandise, Mr. Mobberly followed the slowly lengthening line to Calvert. There he engaged in contracting on the road. He took and completed four miles between Crockett and Palestine and another subcontract of three miles between Crockett and Mineola. He then left off contracting and established a plant for the manufacture of lumber on the Sabine River, four miles east of Longview. After four years of operating his establishment burned. He thereupon left that industry, located in Longview and began his business connection with this city.

At the time when Mr. Mobberly located in Longview, there was abundant opportunity for a trader to do well in real estate. This he took up and eventually extended his business to distant parts of the State, dealing in lands, ranches and mining property, at the same time doing something toward the development of each. He has in the meantime been at times interested in other enterprises. He built the Mobberly hotel and operated it until 1893. One brief period in his career was spent in the Pecos country, developing an alfalfa farm, only to see his labors destroyed by the flood waters of the Pecos river. Another year was spent in work on the "Nugget" Mine, a silver proposition situated near Loydsburg, New Mexico, which proved false to its proprietor. He has been a cotton farmer and a fruit grower on a modest scale.

Mr. Mobberly has been largely connected with the Longview building improvements. He superintended the construction of both the city hall and the Christian church; and during his six years on the council he was notably active in connection with the vast system of public improvements instituted and completed by the Bodenheim administration. While he was a member of the board of education and of its building committee, four modern school buildings took form and are doing duty as models of sanitary construction. He has also served as a member of the board of county commissioners, being thus active for three terms, during which the era of road improvements can be said to have been started.

Membership in the Baptist church and in the Blue Lodge and Chapter of Masonry are among Mr. Mobberly's non-business interests. A family of seven children have been reared by him and his wife, who was formerly Miss Mary B. Noel, a daughter of Dr. Charles Todd Noel, whose mother was of the Todd family of Mrs. Abraham Lincoln. The eldest, Daisy, is Mrs. W. T. Hardy of Marshall, Texas, where her husband is engaged in the Baptist ministry; Lydia is Mrs. Arthur Chapman, of Hopkinsville, Kentucky; Ida is Mrs. Berry Duff, of Monroe, Louisiana; Noel is Mrs. "Tad" Stincheomb, her husband being one of the able lawyers of Longview; Jessie is the wife of Eugene Pegues of Longview; Elsie is Mrs. James Stanley of Monroe, Louisiana; and Miss Mary Mobberly resides at Longview. Mr. Mobberly's home is an attractive suburban place adjacent to Longview.

CLAY COOKE. Clay Cooke, a member of the well known legal firm of Heffner Cooke, of Pecos, Texas, is one of the younger members of the legal profession in this section of the country. He has made a brilliant reputation for himself since coming to Pecos, although he has only been here a short time. He has decided that the future of this section of the country is a bright one and hopes that his success will continue to grow with the growth of the country. From the evidences which the citizens of Pecos and Reeves county have already received of the kind of work which Mr. Cooke does, they believe that his hopes will be realized, for he has shown that he is an able lawyer.

Clay Cooke was born on the 8th of November, 1882, the son of Henry Clay and Fannie I. (Millner) Cooke. His father was born in Alabama, while his mother was a native of Louisiana. Henry Clay Cooke served in the Civil war as a member of the famous Jackson's brigade, under the command of the redoubtable Stonewall Jackson, himself. He was wounded at one of the great battles of the war, having his right hand shot away, and was consequently forced to leave the army. He returned to his Alabama home and later entered the newspaper field as an editor of a newspaper in Selma, Alabama. He became prominent in this line and after the war had been brought to a close he left his native state and came to Texas where he settled in the town of Kimball and there gained prominence in the political field. He held the office of county clerk for six years and then was elected county judge, and served in this post for seven years. Later he moved to Tyler, Texas, and there became the editor of the Democrat Reporter. He remained here for five years and won such a reputation for himself that when he moved to Dallas, Texas, it was to accept a position on one of the big metropolitan dailies. He became a member of the editorial staff on the Times Herald, a position which he filled for several years. He is now the editor and proprietor of one of the best known trade journals in the state, Cotton and Cotton Oil News, published in Dallas.

Seven children were born to Henry Clay Cooke and his wife, and of these Clay Cooke was the next to the eldest. He received a thorough course in the grammar and high schools of the various points in Texas where his family lived during his boyhood and he was then sent to the Meridian Academy, at Meridian, Texas, where he remained until he was seventeen years of age. He then secured employment in the United States Weather Bureau and served six years in this department. He was stationed in a number of places throughout the country and gained all the advantages of such an experience, and the broadening effect of travel. He was located in Galveston, Texas; Scranton, Pennsylvania; Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; Springfield, Illinois; Charleston, South Carolina; Key West, Florida; Santiago, Cuba; and Washington, D. C.

At the age of twenty-three, Mr. Cooke decided to take up the study of law and he began the study of his future profession in the legal department of George Washington University. After completing his studies he entered upon his legal career in the legal department of the Southern Railway Company, being stationed at Columbia, South Carolina. In 1908 he came to Dallas, Texas, and was admitted to the bar of this state during that year. He practiced in Dallas until the fall of 1911 when he came to Pecos, Reeves county, and here located, becoming associated with Mr. Heffner, who is one of the oldest and most prominent lawyers in this section of Texas. This firm has a large and extensive business in Pecos and throughout Reeves county, and bears an enviable reputation for successfully accomplishing whatever they start to do.

In politics Mr. Cooke is a member of the Democratic party, but he has never cared to hold office. He belongs to the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, being a member of the Tannahill lodge at Dallas. He has purchased a splendid irrigated farm on the outskirts of Pecos and intends to build a modern residence on his new property.

On the 2nd of November, 1910, Mr. Cooke was married to Miss Mary Wilm, a native of Morgan, Texas. Mrs. Cooke is the daughter of Sam J. and Sarah (Hunt) Wilm.

REV. R. H. TALIAFERRO. Regarded by his associates and contemporaries as one of the ablest ministers of the Baptist church in early Texas, the late Rev. Robert Hay Taliaferro was a notable and useful member of an exceedingly well-known family in the south. The name was founded in America some time during the seventeenth century by Robert Taliaferro who was born in 1635 and located in Virginia. From that time and through all the succeeding generations there have been able and in some cases pre-eminent men, in the professional, business and public affairs of county, state and country.

Robert H. Taliaferro who was born in Kentucky October 19, 1824, and died at Austin, Texas, November 19, 1875, lost his parents early in childhood, and was trained by his sisters, especially by Mrs. Judge French, and completed his education at Granville, Ohio, and the Western Baptist Theological Seminary at Covington, Kentucky. He was ordained to the ministry September 15, 1846, and came to Texas in 1847. His first location and labors were at Austin and in the Colorado Valley. In December, 1848, he was called to Galveston and took charge of the church March 9, 1849. Becoming impressed with a sense of obligation to the western Indians, he resigned his place at Galveston in July, 1850 and went to Indian Territory and was missionary to the Choctaws for a year or two. After his marriage, Mr. Taliaferro moved to Travis county, and lived at Webberville, at Austin, at Bastrop, and other localities in that section of the state. During his earlier ministry he often walked from Webberville to fill an appointment at Austin, a distance of eighteen miles. In July, 1847, he had organized the First Baptist church in Austin with only seven members. For many years he lived at Austin, and was pastor of the Austin church most of the time, but with only little remuneration. In 1857 he erected the First Baptist church in Austin. He then served as pastor to the church for three years without any remuneration, in order to help pay the debt incurred in building the church. He taught school to support his family during these three years. It is said that the first church in Williamson county was organized by him when there was not a glass window or a plank floor in the country. He was elected and served as Chaplain of the Senate of the twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth legislatures, and was one of the volunteer chaplains of the Constitutional Convention of 1875.

Rev. Taliaferro was associated with Rev. G. W. Baines as editor or special correspondent of the Texas Baptist for six years and was on the Texas Baptist Herald as corresponding editor from the first number in December, 1865, until the end of February, 1868, and Rev. G. W. Baines said of him that "he did more with his pen to establish Bible truth in the minds of Texas Baptists than any other writer in the state or out of it." He wrote and published several other small works, and did a great deal to influence the church and the general cause of religion and morality, both by his pen and his voice. Some of his associates who followed his career testified to the brilliance of his intellect and his vivid, persuasive and magnetic oratory, and the rhetorical and literary character of his early sermons in later years yielded place to a more intense earnestness in delivery and closer attention to the illustrative material and doctrine of the Bible itself. He was a man of classic education, a scholar in various realms of literature, and it is said that for a long time no ministers in Texas could draw larger crowds than Rev. Taliaferro.

In 1855 at Webberville Rev. Taliaferro married Miss Chloe, the only child of Colonel Washington Anderson. Colonel Anderson was a wealthy real estate man, and it is said had no superior in purity and nobleness of soul unless it was Rev. Taliaferro. Washington Anderson was born in Virginia in 1817, the grandson of a Revolutionary officer, and came to Texas with his father in 1835. In February, 1836, he went into the army of Texas and fought at the battle of San Jacinto, and later was in the frontier service with the Texas Rangers. Past military age at the time of the war between the states, he served as Confederate assessor. He was one of the pioneer farmers and citizens in Bastrop and Williamson counties, having assisted in the organization of the latter county, and acquired large interests at Austin and Round Rock. Mrs. Taliaferro died in 1885, leaving five children, one son and four daughters.

JOHN DOUGLAS MITCHELL, M. D. A physician of Fort Worth for nearly twenty years, Dr. Mitchell has not only devoted himself with much skill and success to the needs of a large patronage, but has interested himself in the welfare of the medical profession, and by his work and influence is regarded as one of the leading members of the profession in the state.

John Douglas Mitchell was born at Sweetwater, Tennessee, November 17, 1872, a son of James and Ann (Stephen) Mitchell. The parents moved to Texas in 1873 when John D. was one year of age, locating at Austin. He grew up in the capital city, attended the public schools, and was graduated with the degree of A. B. from the University of Texas in 1891. He then entered the Hahnemann Medical College of Philadelphia, where he was graduated M. D. in 1893. He subsequently attended the Herring Medical College of Chicago, and in 1894 was awarded another diploma as doctor of medicine from that institution.

In the same year of his graduation Dr. Mitchell located in Fort Worth, and soon was in the enjoyment of a large general practice. Dr. Mitchell was elected August 13, 1907, a member of the state board of medical examiners, and served in that capacity until 1912. During two years of this time he was secretary of the board. In the legislation of recent years regulating the dealing generally with the medical profession, it is noteworthy that Dr. Mitchell drew up the bill which makes it compulsory for an applicant for license before the board of medical examiners in Texas to present credentials showing that he has a high school education or its equivalent as a pre-requisite to the study or practice of medicine in this state. His offices are in the Reynolds building.

Dr. Mitchell is a member of the Fort Worth Country Club, the Benevolent & Protective Order of Elks, and the Knights of Pythias. He married Miss Zetta Gatlin, daughter of W. L. and Virginia Gatlin of Abilene, Texas. They have one son, Douglas Gatlin Mitchell, born September 3, 1914.

SAMUEL L. HENDERSON. One of the most capable and successful of the automobile men of San Angelo is Samuel L. Henderson, who conducts a modern sales room and handles the sale of the Buick and Cole automobiles and accessories for the trade of San Angelo and vicinity. He has proved himself the man for the business in which he is now occupied, and his popularity and prominence in automobile circles is steadily increasing. Mr. Henderson was for a number of years engaged in ranching and belongs to a family which has been identified with the sheep industry of Tom Green county from the early days.

Samuel L. Henderson was born in Concho county, Texas, November 10, 1881, a son of James E. and Clara A. (Losten) Henderson. The Henderson family is of Scotch stock, and English on the mother's side. Both grandparents were southerners, and slave holders before the war. James E. Henderson came from Alabama to Texas, while the mother was born in this state. The father has long been a prosperous rancher of Concho county, where he settled at a time when it was necessary to fight off the Indians in order to pursue his industry, and to protect his home and family. He has been in the stock business for many years, is one of the best known cattle men in the western part of the state, and is still in the harness.

Samuel L. Henderson was educated at home by a governess, whom the parents provided for the training of their children in this west Texas country, at a time when schools were not to be had. He afterwards was a student in Howard Payne College at Brownwood, Texas, and also in the Southwestern University at Georgetown. After leaving school Mr. Henderson took up the ranching industry with his father, and at the age of twenty began for himself. He continued as one of the young and enterprising stockmen until August, 1912, at which time he sold his interests and established his automobile business at San Angelo.

Mr. Henderson has been a supporter and voter for the Republican party since he reached manhood. He is affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and belongs to the San Angelo Club. On June 14, 1905, he married Miss Rosamund Ede, of San Angelo, a daughter of Fred and Catherine Ede. Her father who died in November, 1897, was formerly a sheep man and also a merchant. Her mother is still living. Mr. and Mrs. Henderson have one child, a daughter, Catherine Losten Henderson, born December 17, 1908.

GARLAND B. FOSCUE. Engaged in practice at Waco during the past thirty years, Dr. Garland B. Foscue has made continued advancement in his profession through his broad study and research, and in the practice of his vocation is showing intimate and accurate knowledge of the principles of medicine and surgery. Although devoted to his calling and confining his best interests thereto, he has also become widely known in business and social circles, and as a citizen has ever done his share in promoting his city's welfare and advancement. Doctor Foscue was born at Jefferson, Texas, June 21, 1860, and is a son of Augustus W. and Ada V. (Brown) Foscue.

Augustus W. Foscue was born at Tallahassee, Florida, in 1835, and accompanied his parents to Texas as a lad of fifteen years, the family settling at Jefferson. There he grew to manhood and became a planter and merchant, and while thus engaged the Civil war broke out, and he enlisted under the Confederate flag in the Seventh Texas Regiment, continuing to serve as a first lieutenant of infantry until the close of hostilities. The effects of his army experience shortened his life, and his death occurred in 1867. Mr. Foscue married Ada V. Brown, who was born in Buckingham county, Virginia, in 1837, and they became the parents of four children, namely: Augusta A., Garland B., John W. and Augustus W. After the death of her first husband, Mrs. Foscue married (second) S. J. White, a planter, in 1881, and he died in 1892, Mrs. White surviving until 1912. They were the parents of one daughter, Frances.

The early education of Doctor Foscue was secured in the public schools of Jefferson, following which he attended the Jefferson High school until his seventeenth year. After some preparation, he next entered the Long Island Hospital Medical College, New York City, and in 1883 was graduated with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. At that time he opened an office at Callisburg, Cooke county, Texas, but shortly thereafter went to Mexico, and a little later, in 1884, came to Waco, which has since been his field of activity. A successful physician of wide and varied learning, his career has been one of signal usefulness to his fellowmen, and he has achieved more than an ordinary measure of success, due in large measure to the fact that he has kept in touch with the progress of the profession through broad reading and post graduate study at the clinics of America and Europe. He is, and has for a number of years been prominently identified with organized medicine, is a member of a number of medical societies and a constant attendant at their meetings. He has for several terms been elected president of McLennan Co. Medical Society, and has been honored with every office within the gift of the Texas State Medical Association, serving as its president in 1906-7. He is a fellow of the A. M. A. and a member and attended the last meeting of the International Medical Association.

He was largely instrumental in securing the passage of the "One Board Medical Act," which became a law in Texas in 1907, and was secretary and was an executive officer of this board for the first two years of its existence. During the Spanish-American War he served as Surgeon and Major in the U. S. A., having been appointed to this position by the Surgeon General of U. S. Army. He is division surgeon of the H. & T. C. Ry. and local surgeon of the St. L. & S. W. Ry., the I. G. N. Ry. and the S. A. & A. P. Ry. He is ex-medical director of the Amicable Life Insurance Company, and has been state referee for a number of out of state life insurance companies, beside being chief local examiner for a great many of them. He was for years president of the Waco City board of health, of which he was one of the originators.

On November 25, 1886, Doctor Foscue was married at Jefferson, Texas, to Miss Sallie E. Rowell, a daughter of J. H. and Josephine (Hart) Rowell, of Jefferson, Texas, where Mr. Rowell is a prominent merchant. Three children have been born to this union, namely: Garland B., Jr., a lumber merchant at Welden, Texas; Bessie, who married Dr. N. C. Hamner, of Dallas, Texas; and Josephine H., who resides at home with her parents.

MR. JOHN HENRY HOUGHTON was born September 18, 1847. He was a son of one of those rare old aristocratic Southern gentlemen who continued to fight the battles of the Confederacy long after Lee had surrendered at Appomattox.

Born in the lap of luxury and left desolate by the Civil war, young Houghton at the early age of twelve began that sturdy career which led him on eventually to fortune, place, and power. He acquired a wagon and team of mules by working out for two years on a farm, and began his financial career as a teamster hauling goods from the town of Hempstead, which was the nearest railroad point to Austin and Georgetown. He loved to tell of the privations he and his fellow teamsters met with during his early 'teens. Three of his comrades became wealthy later in life, and they frequently met and talked over the exploits of their youth.

At the age of twenty-two he married Miss Peay, who was the niece of President Polk, and after conducting a successful business for a number of years in Georgetown, Texas, moved to the city of Austin, and formed a partnership with John H. Robinson, under the firm name of Houghton & Robinson. His wife, Clara Peay, died at the age of twenty-nine, one of the best loved characters in the city of Austin, leaving a husband and two children, John Henry Houghton, Jr., and Josephine Houghton. In about ten years Mr. Houghton married Florence Seeligson of Galveston, who survived him only eight months.

About 1895 Mr. Houghton began extensive purchases of ranching lands, and his cattle interests soon began to take most of his time. The last five years of his life the firm of Houghton & Robinson was dissolved, and he devoted all of his time to his cattle interests, and to his duties as first vice president of the American National Bank of Austin, Texas. The death of his son, John Henry Houghton, Jr., affected him as nothing in life had, and he followed his son to the grave a broken hearted man three years after the death of his boy. He died at the age of sixty-three.

Mr. Houghton belonged to one of those pioneer types of Texans who saw the advantage of land investments, and he left vast estates in Jim Hogg, Runnels, Travis, and Bexar counties for his children and grandchildren to enjoy. He was as kind and tender hearted as a woman, and he has been seen to weep at the tale of a child. In business he matched his intellect with the masters, and his counsel and advice were sought far and wide. To him honor was the greatest virtue. His word was his bond, and no sacrifice was too great for him to make for those who kept the faith with him.

John Henry Houghton was a master builder; a dominant, forceful pioneer among a race of giants and pioneers, and the memory of his stainless life and far flung visions will endure.

GEORGE W. ALLEN was born in Jasper, Georgia, April 24, 1869. His father was Thomas W. Allen, a doctor of no small attainments, and his mother was Fannie M. Allen. The Allens were Scotch-Irish, and on their father's side traced their ancestry direct to Sir Robert Bruce of Scotland.

George W. Allen was left an orphan at an early age, and came to Texas, working his way through the University of Texas, and being among the first to obtain a law degree from that institution. His early struggles with poverty and sickness were well known to his friends, and at one time came very nearly causing him to give up the practice of his chosen profession. From out the bitterness of it all, however, he emerged stronger from the strife, his best friends being George W. Pendexter, perhaps the most brilliant advocate at the Austin Bar, Ex-Governor James Stephen Hogg, the Attorney General of the United States, T. W. Gregory, Postmaster General of the United States, A. S. Bursleson, for all of whom he maintained the most enduring regard. His ability as a lawyer was first demonstrated as Assistant City Attorney of the City of Austin, and on numerous occasions he was appointed by the Governors of the State to sit on the various appellate courts and the Supreme Court. By the time he reached thirty-five years of age he was recognized as one of the foremost civil lawyers of Texas, and at thirty-eight was engaged as special counsel by the Attorney General of the State in the famous Waters-Pierce Oil Company controversy, which was carried through all of the State courts and the Supreme court of the United States.

George W. Allen was a deep student of the law, a wonderful and resourceful advocate, and his splendid abilities were never shown to better advantage than his argument of the Waters-Pierce Oil case before the Supreme Court of the United States. Soon after this litigation was over he submitted to an operation which his physicians had been urging upon him for years, but he put them off from time to time, pleading press of business. When he finally submitted to the surgeon's knife it was too late. He died at the age of forty-two, and was buried in the family lot at Oakwood Cemetery in the City of Austin. His wife, Elizabeth Hagar Allen, and two daughters, Mary Louise and Virginia Hagar, survive him.

No more universal sorrow was ever expressed at the death of a member of the Austin Bar than that shown by strong men at the grave of George W. Allen. He was universally admired, loved, and respected, and when, at the zenith of his mental attainments, he passed on, the City halted in sorrow to pay its last tribute to a good citizen, a great and honorable and resourceful lawyer, a loved and honored husband and father.

WILBUR PRICE ALLEN, born in La Grange, Texas, September 26, 1879, is the son of Fred Lowery Allen, one of the pioneer Methodist ministers of Texas, and Cylinda Whipple Allen. His father was a Captain of the 3rd Georgia Cavalry in the Confederate Army, and his people on the Whipple side were pioneers and fighters from the early days of Texas.

It is small wonder, therefore, that when the subject of this sketch was thrown on his resources at fourteen years of age he decided to obtain an academic education, and when asked how he intended to get it, replied that he would fight his way through.

He attended Vanderbilt University at Nashville, Tennessee, and then came to the University of Texas, where he took the academic and law degrees, entering upon the practice of his profession in 1902 at the City of Austin, Travis county, Texas.

During his college career the athletic and oratorical qualities of Wilbur Allen were acknowledged in many contests. He won several medals in debates in the University of Texas, and was twice chosen to represent his University in the Southern Inter-Collegiate Oratorical Contest. His ability as a speaker served him in good stead when he began the practice of his profession. When he hung out his shingle in the Capital City of the State he cast his fortunes with the most cultured and learned bar of the State. He was just a delicate slip of a boy, hardly past his majority, and he was told by Judge Allen, his cousin, and T. W. Gregory, later Attorney General of these United States, that he would starve to death in Austin. The first year out he made twice as much money as these gentlemen had made in their initial year, and from that time on he acquired as much practice as any member of the bar of his age and standing. The queer thing about Allen's practice to all of his brother practitioners is that he apparently made no effort to obtain practice, and yet he was retained in some of the heaviest litigation ever brought in Travis county, Texas. He was leading counsel for the Receiver in the case of the State of Texas vs. The Motion Patent Company, and was paid one of the largest annual retainers ever paid to a Receiver's attorney in this State. He was leading counsel in the Hunter Will Suit, which involved the settlement of an estate well worth a million dollars. Allen has led one of the most interesting and well rounded lives of any lawyer at the bar, is an ardent sportsman, a devoted member of the Sigma Chi fraternity, to whose functions he has been an invited guest to speak all over the United States. He is also a loyal member of the Elk's Lodge, and his oratorical ability is in frequent demand at its open meetings.

On February 9, 1905, he married Josephine Houghton, daughter of John H. Houghton, and to them were born three children, Florence Clara Allen, John Houghton Allen, and Wilbur George Allen. Their home life is ideally happy, and if we were to emphasize his love for his home and family, his love for the few who were numbered among the inner circle of his friends, his capacity to do big things apparently without effort, his love of sportsmanship and fair play to all mankind, his ability to conserve and foster the best interests of several large estates that were left to his care and keeping, his ability to impress juries of his fellowmen with the sincerity of his cause, the ability to throw around his arguments the grace of a rare and poetic nature; these are some of the virtues that endear Wilbur Price Allen to those who are fortunate enough to know him. Mr. Allen's life is full of work, his interests being large and many. To express his occupation in the language of his friends, he is a ranchman, capitalist, banker, and a lawyer. He was for five years the President of the Texas Baseball League, and only resigned when the press of his many other affairs made his resignation imperative. He is at present a Director of the American National Bank of Austin, Texas, and has interests in many of the stock corporations of the State.

WALTER F. WOODUL.

HENRY C. KING. Between the year 1860 when he located in Texas and his death on March 24, 1911, at his home in San Antonio, Henry Clay King, as a citizen and as a man, was a notable figure in his home city and in the state at large. He was prominent in Texas public affairs in the early days, a lawyer by profession, at one time editor of the San Antonio Express, a successful man of affairs, and a gentleman of the old school who had hosts of devoted friends in all parts of the country.

Born in Wayne county, Georgia, in 1830, he was past fourscore years at the time of his death. Educated by attendance at the University of Georgia at Athens, graduating from Oglethorpe University in 1848, he studied law in Charleston, South Carolina, under James L. Pettigrew, who was the foremost lawyer of his day. The practice of law soon proved too confining for the energetic nature of the young man, and he discontinued it for a time to become a rice planter on the coast of Georgia near Savannah, in 1851. During the following eight or ten years Mr. King made several trips on hunting and prospecting expeditions into the far west, particularly the Rocky Mountain country, and passed through Texas once or twice. Among his wide acquaintance in the South and Southwest was George Wilkins Kendall, at that time living at Boerne, in Kendall county, Texas. Kendall county received its name from this conspicuous character of the southwest, a brilliant journalist and writer, founder of the New Orleans Picayune, subsequently gaining large interests in Texas, and from the material acquired by his experience as a member of the Santa Fe expedition, the author of the standard work and one of the most important volumes on early Texas annals, "History of the Santa Fe Expedition." It was on the advice of this friend that Mr. King in 1860 moved to Texas and first located at San Antonio. That was his home, with the exception of seven years, from 1869 to 1876, until his death. During those years his home was at Boerne in Kendall county. Much of his time at different periods was also spent on his large cattle ranch at Leon Springs near San Antonio. Mr. King was engaged in the practice of law at Boerne from 1870 to 1876, and on returning to San Antonio continued practice for a number of years. The last few years of his life were spent retired from practice and active business cares.

In early years Mr. King was an active and influential figure in politics. In 1869 he made a horseback canvass for member of the state senate, over the large territorial district that at the time was about the same in extent as the present fourteenth congressional district. That campaign occurred in the midst of the reconstruction and carpet-bag regime, when most of the Democratic voters of Texas were disqualified, and it followed almost as a matter of course that Mr. King was defeated. In 1872 he returned to the fight, was candidate for the same position, and notwithstanding a strong Republican opposition was elected by an overwhelming majority, and took his seat in the senate without question. Perhaps at no time in its history did Texas need so much the disinterested services of able leaders as in the years immediately following the war, and as senator in the thirteenth legislature Mr. King was one of the leaders in the repeal of obnoxious reconstruction and military measures and restoring popular government which had been withheld for several years. He introduced and had passed a number of excellent laws, and did able and efficient work to save the state from financial ruin at the hands of irresponsible politicians. After the expiration of his first term he declined to stand for re-election. During his membership in the senate Mr. King was chairman of the committee on Indian Affairs, which was an important position at that time, when the people of west and northwest Texas were almost constantly at the mercy of murdering and pillaging Indians. He was also a member of the Judiciary and other prominent senatorial committees.

Mr. King returned to public life to play an important part in the final movements which brought about the restoration of constitutional and popular government. He was elected a member of the constitutional convention and was on several committees which framed important portions of the present constitution of Texas. Both Governor Coke and Governor Hubbard appointed Mr. King to the office of commissioner of canals and ditches for navigation and irrigation, and he also served as commissioner for the state for the sale and lease of school lands. By appointment from President Harrison he was Democratic alternate commissioner at large from Texas to the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago in 1893. Mr. King during 1875 was for a time an active candidate before the primaries for the office of Governor of Texas, but finally withdrew in favor of his friend, R. B. Hubbard, who was elected.

While it was as a loyal and public leader that Mr. King was best known, he was also an able newspaper man, and for two years, from 1877 to 1879, was editor in chief of the San Antonio Daily Express. He possessed the ability to win friends, and his fine genial spirit made him greatly beloved by all who were fortunate enough to be included within his circle of acquaintance. Throughout his life he maintained a high standard of honor, and was a splendid exemplar of a gentleman of the old school in the best meaning of that time. He enjoyed the acquaintance and friendship of hundreds of people, many of them of wealth and distinction, not only in Texas, but in various other sections of the United States. He himself was successful in his business affairs, and particularly in his active days of the early years in Texas enjoyed ample means from his law practice, his ranching and other business affairs.

Mr. King was a member of the First Presbyterian church of San Antonio, and at the time of his death was one of the oldest Masons in Texas. In 1856 he married Miss Jean Adams Parland of Georgia, who died at San Antonio in 1891. Of their seven children five survive, four daughters and one son.

Henry C. King, Jr., the only surviving son of the distinguished lawyer and public leader sketched above, himself gained prominence as a member of the San Antonio bar.

Born, reared and educated in San Antonio, as a youth he served as a clerk in the postoffice under Postmaster Howard during the Cleveland administration, and was for some time connected with the business office of the San Antonio Express. He studied law in San Antonio, was admitted to the bar in 1899, and since that date has practiced his profession with growing success and prestige. In the fall of 1913 Governor Colquitt tendered him an appointment to the office of judge of the forty-fifth judicial district, including San Antonio, but he declined that honor in favor of his private interests.

Mr. King is a director and attorney for the Globe Fire Insurance Company of San Antonio, is director and attorney for the State Bank and Trust Company, and is one of the influential younger men in affairs in the Alamo city. Formerly he was a member of the Belknap Rifles, a notable military organization in its time. Henry C. King, Jr., married Miss Carolyn Harper, who was born in Louisiana. They have one daughter, Mary Carolyn King.

JOHN SCHARBAUER. If by the phrase "cattle king" is meant the owner of almost an empire of land, with herds of cattle aggregating many thousand of head, then to no one is the title more justly applied than to John Scharbauer of Fort Worth. To all who are acquainted with the live stock industry of Texas, and of the United States, for that matter, the name of Scharbauer has a significance which requires no explanation. As a factor in Texas industrial history, he has long been one of the most prominent and has few equals as a cattle man anywhere in the country. At Midland and other points in west Texas hundreds of thousands of acres are devoted to the great ranching enterprise conducted under his name and management. His chief industry for many years has been cattle raising, although more than thirty years ago he began his career in west Texas as a sheep man. Mr. Scharbauer has spent almost unlimited money, patience, and labor in laying the foundation of what is the largest and the most splendid herd of Hereford cattle in the world. While his interests lie in many parts of Texas and the southwest Mr. Scharbauer has for a number of years had his home at Fort Worth.

John Scharbauer is a native of New York State, born in the city of Albany, December 28, 1851, a son of Ferdinand and Roseanna (Fells) Scharbauer. He had a public school education, and a good practical training during his career in the east.

It was in 1881 that Mr. Scharbauer first came to Texas, locating at Eastland county. Practically all of west Texas was then without railroads, and the one industry of its scattered population was cattle raising. Mr. Scharbauer engaged in the sheep business in Eastland county, and after several years moved his flocks west to Midland in Midland county. As a sheep raiser he conducted operations on a large scale, and at one time had as many as one hundred thousand head ranging over his pastures. During one year he shipped to the Chicago market over forty-seven thousand head of mutton sheep. Between 1887 and 1893, Mr. Scharbauer was interested both in sheep and cattle, but in the latter year directed all his efforts to the raising of fine beef cattle.

The Scharbauer cattle are now known the country over, and his ranch is famous for its facilities, and in its improvements and profitable operations probably has no superior anywhere in the west. The land controlled and devoted to the cattle business of Mr. Scharbauer comprises two hundred and eighty-six thousand acres, and Mr. Scharbauer is himself the owner of one hundred and forty thousand acres, the rest of it being leased. His aim through many years has been to develop his herds by the highest grade of Herefords, and in point of number his cattle herd is now the largest individual aggregation in the United States, numbering more than one hundred thousand head. Another distinction that belongs to Mr. Scharbauer, is that on his ranch may be found more registered fancy cattle than on any other farm in the United States. He has also handled and sold more genuine registered Hereford bulls than any other owner or dealer in the country.

For a number of years, there probably has not been one among the thousands of visitors at the Worth hotel in Fort Worth who has not admired and been attracted by the splendid paintings which adorn the walls of the hotel lobby. These paintings are illustrative of scenes on the Scharbauer ranch at Midland. The canvases cover a space of more than forty-five feet in length, one of the paintings being more than twenty feet long, and showing a herd of white-faced Herefords. Every cattleman who stops at the hotel has a glance of appreciation at these paintings, and they have served an excellent purpose also in illustrating to the general public the unexampled facilities not only of the Scharbauer ranch, but also of pictures as a great stock raising country. Much has been said and written of these paintings, and they are the most distinctive decorative work to be found in any Texas hostelry. While for many years Mr. Scharbauer's chief interests have been directed to cattle, he is also a great lover of good horses, and has many first-class animals on his ranch.

Personally Mr. Scharbauer appears to a casual acquaintance as a man of much dignity and reserve, but with his friends and associates he is regarded as exceedingly affable, a kind-hearted gentleman, and a philanthropist in many quiet and effective ways.

His business enterprise as one of the greatest of Texas' cattlemen has also brought him into connection with a number of financial and industrial undertakings. He is president of the Fort Worth Gas & Oil Company, is vice president of the Bankers' Trust Company of Fort Worth, is vice president of the Commonwealth Bonding & Casualty Company, vice president of the Texas Pottery Company, a director in the First National Bank of Fort Worth, and interested in many banking institutions throughout the state. His interest in banking began in 1888 at Midland with the firm of Connell Brothers & Scharbauer, and since then he has been a stockholder, director or other official in a number of financial enterprises. Mr. Scharbauer is owner of the Worth Hotel at Fort Worth, and has other extensive real estate interests in the city.

He married Miss Kate Tomkins, a daughter of Henry Tomkins of Albany, New York. Their one daughter is Ubesia, wife of W. C. Stonestreet of Fort Worth. Mr. and Mrs. Scharbauer have their home in the Worth Hotel.

JOHN P. GILLESPIE. About five years after the first railroad came to Dallas, a young Tennessean, twenty-five years of age, who had finished his law studies at the Old Trinity University at Tehuacana, Texas, in 1877, was admitted to the bar at Dallas. He at once became a factor in the sterling activities of the growing town, and after thirty-five years of successful practice now ranks as one of the oldest established attorneys of the North Texas metropolis, though only in the prime of his years. Besides the general success which has attended his private practice Mr. Gillespie is well remembered for his able administration of the office of county attorney some years ago.

John P. Gillespie was born near Somerville, Fayette county, Tennessee, July 10, 1852. His parents, A. J. and Julia Ann (Wright) Gillespie, now deceased, were natives of Tennessee, and their two oldest sons served throughout the war in the Confederate army under the great cavalry commander, General Nathan Bedford Forrest. A. J. Gillespie brought his family to Texas in 1866, locating on a farm in Colorado county, and died there in 1868. His wife died in 1900.

John P. Gillespie was about sixteen years old when his father died. On that account and because of the dissipation of the family resources during the war he early began his own support, and worked hard to realize his ambition to become a lawyer. In those early years his labors were directed to the farm, in cultivating and raising the staple crops of cotton and corn, and such time as could be spared from his duties in assisting to support the family was devoted to the local schools. He secured some law books, kept them at home, and after a hard day's work would spend several of the night hours in prolonged and serious study. At the age of twenty-five, in 1877, he stood the examinations and was admitted to the bar at Dallas, which has since been his home. His practice began shortly after locating in the city, and he has seen practically all of his one-time contemporaries either retire from the active work of law or pass to their long reward. Mr. Gillespie's practice is a general one and takes him into all the courts of the state.

In 1892 he was elected to the office of county attorney of Dallas county, and by re-election in 1894 served two full terms. The splendid record he made in that four years has given rise to the statement often made in later times that Mr. Gillespie was one of the best prosecuting attorneys the county ever had. To a large degree the enforcement of law and order depends upon the efficiency of the county attorney, and there has never been a period when the instruments of law were used more effectively and persistently against the law breakers, and Mr. Gillespie was noted for his absolute fearlessness in combating all the criminal agencies then active in Dallas county.

Mr. Gillespie was married in Dallas in 1880 to Miss Emma Dickason, daughter of the late John S. and Mary L. Dickason, formerly of Shelby Co., Tenn. They are the parents of five children: Jack D. Gillespie, who is assistant cashier of the City National Bank of Dallas; Eloise, wife of B. R. Fewell; and Gladys, Julia and Emma Gillespie.

JOHN EDWARD STONE. A successful lumberman at Pine Hill, John E. Stone was born in that locality, was left an orphan in childhood, made his home among various families of the neighborhood, has been the architect of his own fortunes. His education was a fragmentary training in the country schools, and it was actual contact with the world and business experience which finally opened for him the avenue to success. Mr. Stone is big of body, energetic, a man of purpose, and has demonstrated that he can succeed in his business. At the present writing he has three million feet of lumber in his yard, waiting for the right price, and though only thirty-five years of age, is practically independent, and has accomplished more than many men in a lifetime.

John Edward Stone was born January 23, 1878, in Panola county. He is a son of Joseph Stone, and a grandson of John Stone. John Stone came to Texas as a pioneer from Georgia, settling in Panola county, was a farmer, served as a soldier in the Confederate army, and immediately after the war left this part of Texas and nothing was thereafter known of his whereabouts. John Stone married a Miss Leech, and their children were Joseph and Mrs. Ella Woods. Joseph Stone was born in Panola county, Texas and died when a young married man. The maiden name of his wife was Saughter, who died in 1884. Their children were John Edward and Adelia, the latter dying in childhood.

As a youth of eighteen years, John E. Stone went to work as a farmhand at thirteen dollars a month, following that vocation for two years. He had a little land of his own, and divided his attention between its cultivation and operating a gin in that locality, but hardly laid the basis of a fortune in either occupation. His ambition did not allow him to remain in a rut, and about ten years ago, he broke away from the farm altogether, and in 1905, aided by men of means, he entered the lumber business near Beckville, where he erected a saw mill. In two years the adjacent supply of pine had been used up, and he then built a plant near Pine Hill with an increased capacity. This venture proved a failure at the end of two years, and the panic of 1907 also occurred while located there. He moved to a new location, in the hope of recuperating his loss, and prices soon began to favor him, and in two years his profit was ten thousand dollars. In 1912, Mr. Stone erected a planing mill at Pine Hill, and his saw mill six miles west of town has a capacity of twenty thousand feet a day. He employs a considerable force of men in his saw mill, and in the planer, and his payroll adds about eighty dollars a day to the circulating medium of Pine Hill.

Mr. Stone is affiliated with the Beckville Lodge, of Masons. He is a Baptist. On November 10, 1898, occurred his marriage with Miss Mary E. Jackson, a daughter of J. P. Jackson, a Texas farmer who came from South Carolina. Mrs. Stone is the only surviving child of her parents. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Stone are Clyde, Fannie May, Irene, Monnie Fay, and Pauline.

JEFF L. REECE. In the fall of 1912 one of the progressive young business men and native sons of Coleman county was elected to the office of county treasurer. Jeff L. Reece belongs to one of the old families in this section, and since attaining manhood has himself gained a popular place among the people of his native county.

Jeff L. Reece was born in Coleman county March 5, 1885, a son of W. F. and Nora (Mills) Reece. The father came to Texas with his parents, locating in Hill county, Texas, many years ago, while the mother was a native of this state and was reared in Bell county. W. F. Reece is a prosperous farmer and stock raiser still living in Coleman county, to which county he moved from Bell county in 1884, and has participated in its development from pioneer conditions. There were six children in the family, five sons and one daughter, and all are yet living.

Jeff L. Reece, the third in the family, was first educated in the public schools of Coleman county, and received a practical equipment of a business career in Draughton's Business College at Fort Worth. On leaving school he became a clerk for D. H. Call & Company at Talpa in Coleman county, and later was with the firm of B. F. Farman & Son at Talpa for three years. In 1912 came his election to the office of county treasurer, a position which he now fills with honor and credit. Mr. Reece has always been a staunch Democrat, working whenever possible for the good of his party. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Woodmen of the World and the Modern Order of Pretorians. His church is the Baptist.

Mr. Reece was married at Talpa, August 19, 1905, and has a son, born September 6, 1907.

JOHN EDWIN WILSON, M. D. This well known physician and citizen of Shiro is a native of Grimes county, and represents a family of Irish Wilsons who were originally from Belfast. His father, John Hamill Wilson, was a Belfast boy who at the age of seventeen years came alone to the United States. John H. Wilson was born in 1832, the son of John Wilson, who was a baker who furnished his goods to the government. John Wilson married a Miss Hamill, an English woman, and among their children were: Hugh, who died in Navasota, Texas, in December, 1913, leaving a family; Walter, who died in Dunedin, New Zealand, in August, 1912, having originally come from Ireland to the United States, and after service in the Confederate army, emigrated to New Zealand; David, who also moved to New Zealand and lives at Dunedin; Thomas, who was drowned on the voyage to New Zealand; William, who emigrated from Ireland to New Zealand, which country is still his home; Mary Ann and Ellen, one of whom went to New Zealand and the other died in Ireland.

John Hamill Wilson was a self-made man, and from the time he left the Old World was dependent upon his own efforts. For several years his work was in the printing trade, and in the course of his employment he worked as a journeyman on the New York Tribune while Horace Greeley was its manager and editor. From the east he came into Texas during the '50s, became a merchant at Anderson, was somewhat prominent in local politics, serving as county judge during the early '70s. During the war he was collector and tax assessor, and though his early political affiliations were with the Republican party, he became a Democrat before his death. He was prominent and an active worker in the Masonic order, and was brought up in the faith of the Presbyterian church. Personally he was a reserved man, well informed, and deserved the respect and esteem always paid him. On leaving as a merchant he was proprietor of a cotton warehouse at Navasota, where his death occurred in 1884, when still in the prime of life. John Hamill Wilson was married at Anderson, Texas, in 1859, to Miss Mary Graves. Her father, John Graves, was a Kentuckian who settled in Texas in 1847 and spent his career as a farmer. John Graves married a Miss Patrick, a sister of Dr. G. M. Patrick, one of the pioneers of Grimes county. Mrs. Wilson was born in Kentucky in 1837, and her children are: Dr. John E.; Theodore W., a stockman at Navasota; and Robert H., of Navasota.

John Edwin Wilson grew up in Grimes county, attended the schools at Anderson and Navasota, and for one term was in the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Bryan. When about seventeen years old he began the study of medicine with Dr. A. L. Kilpatrick, later took lectures at the University of Louisiana, and graduated M. D. in 1882. Since then he has combined his vocation as a doctor with farming and has a comfortable home at Shiro. Dr. Wilson has been especially successful in the raising of game chickens, and at his farm has bred a number of prize birds and battle winners. Among the strains which he specially favors and keeps in his pens are the Arkansas Travelers, the Irish Flat-heads, the Texas Rangers and the Hercules. Dr. Wilson has never interested himself in politics except as a voter.

Dr. Wilson was married at Shiro, May 14, 1890, to Miss Mattie Florence Rea. Her father was Judge A. F. Rea, a merchant of Shiro until he retired from business. Dr. Wilson and wife have the following children: Clara, at St. Agnes Academy in Houston; Elise; Evelyn and Edwin, twins; Christine; and Ferdinand Hamill.

JUDGE J. O. WOODWARD. The identification of Judge Woodward with Coleman and Coleman county began in 1878, very soon after the organization of the county, and it has continued up to the present time. The years have brought to Judge Woodward professional honors of rather more than average order, and he has come to have a place of no little distinction among his fellow men in these parts, where his life and work has been marked by a high order of service, both in public and private capacities. As an official, he is deserving of some praise and as a citizen he is one who well merits the esteem of all.

Judge J. O. Woodward was born on September 24, 1855, in Cass county, Texas, and he is a son of Samuel P. and Melissa (Pruitt) Woodward, natives of Alabama and Mississippi, respectively. The father came to Texas in about 1850, settling in Cass county, then known as Davies county, and he was active and prosperous as a farmer and stockman. He came of a slave holding family in Alabama, where the family is widely known, and many of the name served in the Confederate army, as did he. He continued a farmer up to the time of his death, which occurred on July 17, 1885, in Queen City, Cass county, Texas. The mother died in 1857, leaving four children. The father married a second time, and eight children were born to him and his wife. Judge J. O. Woodward was the youngest child of his father's first marriage. He was educated in the private schools of his community, being trained in early life by Samuel Ray, Robert Haynes and Rev. I. W. Clark, the latter a Methodist minister and all of them well known educators in their day in Cass county. These tutors brought the boy to years where the choice of a career was incumbent upon him, and he made the law his choice. In 1876 was admitted to the bar in Mount Pleasant, Texas, his first practice being with Judge William McLean, who was afterward one of the first railroad commissioners appointed by Governor Hay. In 1878 the young attorney came to Coleman county, then but recently organized, and here he found a wide field for his splendid energies. His first two years here were spent in practical retirement from professional activities, however, the state of his health being so precarious as to preclude any real efforts on his part, but in the fall of 1880 he felt himself sufficiently recovered to again enter the lists with the best of the legal talent in the county, and he was in that autumn elected to the office of county attorney of Coleman county, serving two consecutive terms in the office. Then, in 1888, after a short interval of non-service in public office, he was elected district attorney of the Thirty-fifth district, serving there for two terms also. In 1892 he was elected district judge, and he retired from the office in 1900, since which time he has been active in the practice of his profession.

In all his public service Judge Woodward brought to bear upon his duties a high sense of stewardship, which in combination with his undeniable professional ability, made him a factor to be reckoned with in the proper administration of his respective offices. A staunch Democrat, he has done good work for the party in the county and state. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World. He is also a member of the Coleman Club, and his church relations are maintained as a member of the Christian church.

On February 23, 1876, Judge Woodward was married in Mount Pleasant, Texas, to Miss Fannie Dillard, a daughter of Col. John D. and Martha (Lamb) Dillard. Col. Dillard was a farmer of means who came to Texas from Tennessee at an early date, and who was a veteran of the Confederate army, who served throughout the war. He died in 1876, the mother passing away in 1880.

The Judge and his wife have six children,—four daughters and two sons. Willie, the eldest, became the wife of J. K. Baker, an attorney and the partner of the Judge for some time; Mabel married James A. Henson, and now resides in Fort Worth, where Mr. Henson is prominent in real estate activities; Walter C. Woodward is a practicing attorney of Coleman; Jessie Woodward lives with her parents; Garland Woodward is also a lawyer, and engaged in practice in his home city of Coleman; and Miss Nadine also shares the parental home.

No better citizen or more loyal Texan may be found within the borders of the state than is Judge Woodward. In his professional and public life he has performed well and faithfully, and in all other relations of life as well he has measured well up to the southern standard of citizenship and manhood.

NICHOLAS J. BAGLEY. The career of Nicholas J. Bagley, now a well known business man of Rockdale, has encountered almost all the changes and vicissitudes of Texas industrial life within the last forty or fifty years. He was a sheep raiser and cattleman, had success and also adversity in that business, but wherever his home has been he has borne an honest name and a reputation for integrity and fair and square dealing.

Nicholas J. Bagley was born in Mississippi, December 14, 1850, a son of William H. and Elizabeth (Davis) Bagley. His father, who was born in Talladega county, Alabama, in 1824, came to Texas in 1850 and died in 1906, having spent all his life as a farmer. The mother was born near Huntsville in Butler county, Alabama, in 1825, and died in 1909. Their seven children were Nicholas J., Mattie, Nannie, William D., Emma, Franklin and one that died in infancy. The daughter Mattie, now deceased, was the wife of William Knight, who lives at Cisco; Franklin died as a child; Nannie is deceased; Emma is the wife of H. Lockwood, a lumber merchant at Rockdale, and the mother of six children; William D. is at the head of the W. D. Bagley Lumber Company of Rockdale, and by his marriage to Minnie Lee Mins has four children.

Nicholas J. Bagley came to Texas when an infant, and as the old home was on the frontier his only instruction up to the time he was fifteen years of age was obtained from his mother, who was a cultured woman, and who in addition to the many burdens of household management found time to instruct her young. At the age of fifteen he began attending a common school in Burleson county, and afterwards was in Cottonwood Academy until nineteen years old. Employment was given him regularly on his father's farm until 1876, and he then went out to Coleman county, at that time on the frontier, and engaged in the sheep business with his father. In 1879 a blizzard came and practically the entire flock was frozen to death or subsequently died. This was a disaster which reduced him to bankruptcy, and he had to begin all over again. He then removed to another county, of which he was one of the organizers and had a prominent part in its affairs, remaining until 1886, when he moved to Nolan county, and was in the sheep business there until 1889. Selling out his interests, he lived on a small farm in Taylor county until 1894, and in 1895 first took up his residence in Rockdale in Milam county. For several years after that he lived in San Saba county, and in 1899 returned to Rockdale, and has since been identified with the W. D. Bagley Lumber Company.

Mr. Bagley has been affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows since 1881, is a Royal Arch Mason, and also belongs to the Knights and Ladies of Honor. His church is the Presbyterian, and in politics he is a Democrat. Besides his comfortable home in Rockdale he owns twenty acres of land in Milam county.

In San Saba county, Texas, in 1892, Mr. Bagley married Mattie F. Senderfitt. Two children were born, and the one now living is Mattie Mae, who in 1910 was granted a first grade certificate and has since been a successful and popular teacher.

HENRY ELWOOD OLDFATHER. Mr. Oldfather has been identified with the business community of Cleburne for more than twenty years, and is well remembered as having been a successful newspaper man for some years, but since 1894 has been principally identified with the abstract business, and conducts a large and flourishing business in that line. His career has been one of much variety, spent in various states of the Union, and he has never been afraid to leave one occupation and venture his abilities in a different line.

Henry Elwood Oldfather was born in Madison county, Ohio, August 15, 1860, a son of Jacob P. and Mary Ann (Wilson) Oldfather. His father was born in 1828, was a farmer, and died in Kansas July 1, 1901, while the mother, born in 1831, died July 4, 1911. Their eight children were: George W., Ellen J., Eli S., Henry E., Elmer

D., Etta M., Belle and Clare E. The son George is a teacher of manual training in a Chicago training school; Ellen is the wife of Ed B. Lutz, a farmer in Kay county, Oklahoma; Eli married Dinah Dickerson, is a farmer at Abingdon, Illinois, and has two children; Elmer married Miranda, and is a farmer at Harper, Kansas, and has seven children; Etta married Irving Klough, a cattleman of Manhattan, Kansas, and they have six children; Belle is the widow of John J. Clutter, a former ranchman and banker, and she now lives in Abington, Illinois, the mother of seven children; Clare, who lives at Abington, Illinois, is the wife of W. H. Ganson, a carpenter, and has one child.

Henry E. Oldfather grew up in Illinois, received his education in the schools of Abington until he was seventeen years old and at that place got his first experience in the newspaper business, which he followed there from 1874 until 1878. Moving out to Kansas, and locating at Harper, he continued newspaper work from 1878 to 1881, spent six months in the same line at Kingman, Kansas, went east and lived for a year in Montgomery county, Ohio, then returned to Kansas, and was located at Coldwater, from 1886 to 1891, and in the latter year established his home at Cleburne. Here he started the Johnson County Review, built it up to successful proportions with a good patronage, and in 1894 sold the plant and good will and then entered the abstract and title business. He has a good business, gives all his attention to its management, and among other interests is a stockholder in the Cleburne Street Railway Company. He owns fourteen vacant lots in the city, besides his attractive home. Mr. Oldfather is affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and the Knights of Pythias, and is a Democratic voter. He holds no particular church affiliation.

On June 19, 1902, at Cleburne, he married Bertie Clements, a daughter of Peter and Susan Clements. Her father was a prominent attorney and died in 1878. To their marriage have been born three children: Dorothy Due, Grace E., and Marion.

WILLIAM ZOELLER. For many years engaged in the customs brokerage business at El Paso and vicinity, William Zoeller has spent nearly all his active business career, either on the International Boundary, or in old Mexico, and is one of the best posted men in Texas on international trade relations between America and the Republic on the South.

William Zoeller is a native of Boerne, Texas, where he was born April 26, 1868. His family belonged to the old German colonists, who located in Texas during the forties. His father was Phillip Zoeller, born in Germany and coming to America in 1845, locating at Boerne. He was an architect, but spent the greater part of his career as a farmer and stock raiser. He died at Boerne when eighty-four years of age. The maiden name of the mother was Margaret Schneider, who came over in 1847, and was met at Galveston by Mr. Zoeller, and there they were married. Her death occurred at Boerne in 1906. There were eight children born to the parents and William was next to the youngest. He attained his education in the Boerne public schools up to the time he was fifteen years of age, and those early days were spent on a farm. When he started out in life on his own account, his first position was as clerk in a wholesale merchandise house at Pecos Negras in old Mexico. He was given no salary during the period while he was learning the details of the business, and the first regular salary which he did receive was thirty dollars a month in Mexican money. He remained in the employ of others up to 1894 and from that year to 1897 was in the custom house brokerage business at Juarez. He then was a clerk in Customs Agency of the Mexican Central Railway from December, 1897, until February, 1906, after which he was appointed customs agent at Manzanillo, Mexico. He was agent there for six months and then occupied the same position for the Mexican Central at Juarez again for one year. At the end of that time he formed a partnership with Thomas J. Woodside in the general brokerage business and as custom house broker. This is the business with which his name is associated at the present time and the offices are Second and Leone streets.

Mr. Zoeller on October 4, 1910, was appointed by the Department of State as vice-consul at Juarez. He is a Republican in politics, and is well known in business and social circles in this city. On November 28, 1912, at Waring, Texas, he married Miss Otilie Zoeller, who was born at Waring, Texas, a daughter of Adolph Zoeller. Their home is at 215 West Overland street. Mr. Zoeller besides his business interests in El Paso is the owner of a small tract of land near Boerne, his native town.

LOUIS F. ROGERS. A citizen of Texas who has had a varied and eventful career, including the service in the Spanish-American war, and varied and different places in the state and railroad service, Mr. Rogers is now agent of the Gulf Refining Company at El Paso.

Louis F. Rogers was born May 12, 1876, at Chapel Hill, Texas, and belonged to a family which has long been prominent and well known in the south. His parents were Ben S. and Mollie E. Rogers. The late Ben S. Rogers, his father, whose death occurred in July, 1911, was one of the best known Texans in public life and as a member of the bar. He practiced law at Berneham for many years, and was representative of his district in both the lower house and the state senate. For ten years he served as county attorney, an ardent Democrat, he worked for the party in its campaign, and received many official and unofficial honors at its hands. He was also prominent in fraternal affairs, being grand chancellor of the Knights of Pythias of Texas and grand master of the state lodge of the Odd Fellows for several years. Mr. Louis F. Rogers attained his education in the public schools of Berneham, and on leaving school entered the service of the Southwestern Telephone & Telegraph Company at his home town, where he remained until 1898. On April 28, 1898, he enlisted for service in the Spanish-American war, with the Texas volunteers at Austin, and became sergeant of his company. He was mustered out at Fort Sam Houston on November 14, 1898. His next experience was with the International and Great Northern railway and the Mexican National Railroad in a clerical position, which he held until 1907. In January of the latter year he was appointed assistant quarter-master general for the state of Texas, under Governor Campbell. He continued in that capacity until December, 1909, at which date he was appointed assistant financial agent of the state penitentiary, and gave his attention to that branch of the state service until December 1, 1910. He was then reappointed to his former office as assistant quarter-master general of the state, but left state employment in 1911 to accept a place in the auditing department of the G. H. & S. A. Railroad. In September, 1911, he took the agency for the Gulf Refining Company at El Paso, and has managed the local affairs of this large corporation ever since with complete satisfaction to all concerned. The plant in El Paso is located at Dallas street and the Southern Pacific tracks.

Mr. Rogers is a Democrat by heritage and personal belief. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and is a member of the Southern Methodist church. On February 22, 1900, at Laredo, Texas, he married Miss Lupe Morton, a daughter of George W. Morton, formerly of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and for many years a planter in old Mexico, owning some of the largest tracts of land held by any American in the Republic. Mrs. Rogers' parents both died about 1884. Mr. and Mrs. Rogers have one child, Elizabeth, who is twelve years of age and now in the fifth grade of the public schools.

* G. W. HARRIS. In the annals of south Texas no family is more conspicuous in the actual betterment and improvement of the region about the shores of Galveston Bay than that of Harris. The county in which the city of Houston is the metropolis and county seat, has perpetuated the name of this family. The Harris' were among the first American settlers along the shores of Galveston Bay and Buffalo Bayou, and the old town of Harrisburg, once the capital of the Republic of Texas, is also a memorial of this noted family. One of the descendants in the third generation from those original settlers is Mr. G. W. Harris of Palestine, and in his own career he has represented many of the fine qualities which distinguish the best settlers.

George W. Harris was born in Harris county near the Bay shore on October 6, 1862, a son of W. P. and Emily (Coit) Harris. Both parents were natives of this state. It was the grandfather, David Harris who founded this branch of the family from which the Palestine business man is directly descended. David Harris was one of three brothers who came by boat from New York and in 1832 landed on Galveston Island. Galveston Island, at that time and for a number of years previous, during the Spanish and Mexican occupations, had had only one mark to distinguish it from the low-lying desolate shore which stretched all along the gulf coast of Texas. That one mark was an old rough house which had various times served as a custom-house and fort during the Spanish and Mexican regime. It was four years after the Harris brothers landed on the island that the foundation of the present city was laid. Grandfather David Harris did not choose his settlement upon the island itself, but crossed the bay to the mainland shore and there set up an establishment as a rancher and also did considerable boating during the early years of settlement up and down the bay and the tributaries. He owned a large tract of land but his large herds of cattle roamed unheeded over the free range which extended backward for miles. It was in this way that he laid the foundation for the Harris fortune.

During the revolution of 1836 he fought in Sam Houston's gallant army of Texans, and the famous battle of San Jacinto, in which he participated, was fought on land not far from his own homestead. By his privileges as a settler and as a soldier of the patriot army he received a grant of two leagues of land, all of which was situated along the shore of Galveston Bay and Buffalo Bayou. The death of this honored old pioneer of Texas occurred in Harris county. W. P. Harris, the father, spent practically all his life near Galveston Bay, and was one of the large farmers and stock raisers of his time. He owned a large amount of land, and for a number of years also served as ranch foreman and manager for the great cattle king Sam Allen. Among the stockmen of his day he was one of the best riders and was very popular among his large group of associates. He conducted a boating and general transporting business, especially in wood, up and down the waters of Galveston Bay. During the war he enlisted in Captain Hair's Company of Cavalry and saw much arduous service in Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas. After a long and useful life he passed away at a ripe old age. The wife and mother still resides an honored resident at Seabrook, Texas, along the shore of Galveston Bay. Of the four children Joseph and William are now deceased, and besides George W. the other survivor is Mrs. Josephene Rogers of Houston.

It was along the shores of the Bay that George W. Harris was reared to manhood and when a boy he engaged in farming and also in boating on the bayou. He earned his first shotgun by cutting cord-wood. Soon afterward he became a typical Texas cow-boy, and was able to ride his pony and rope cattle with the best of the "cow-punchers" of his time. The Gulf country of Texas was just then beginning to be developed, and Houston was still a small town, although a very important place as a cotton shipping center. As an incident of his boyhood, Mr. Harris recalls having hauled sand at fifty cents per day and board for the construction of the famous old Rice Hotel of Houston, the landmark of that city and a site which marks the place of the first capitol of Texas. On quitting the range life, he took a position as newsboy on a train, and was advanced after a time to manager of the I. & G. N.

Railroad lunchroom at Houston, which he conducted for four years.

In 1876 Mr. Harris came to Palestine to take charge of the I. & G. N. Railroad lunchroom, and was manager and proprietor of this business for a period of twenty-six years, a record seldom excelled in the history of the business. The lunchroom under his management had a reputation all over the entire system for excellence, and it was with many regrets on the part of the steady patronage along the road that he was finally retired from the business through the influence of the Interstate News Company. Since leaving that business, Mr. Harris has devoted much of his time to the management of his large property interests. He is one of the prosperous men of Anderson county, and owns valuable city property and farm lands. During his residence in Palestine he has always been behind every movement for the betterment and progress of the city, and has enjoyed the highest esteem of his fellow-citizens. He was one of the four organizers of the new water company. A number of years ago Mr. Harris served as baggage-man on the I. & G. N. Railroad.

He married in 1886 Miss Jennie Fisher, whose parents John and Christina Fisher came from Germany and were old residents of Houston. The two children of Mr. and Mrs. Harris are: Will F., who resides at home; and Mrs. Mary Morrow, wife of W. M. Morrow of St. Louis. Mrs. Harris is a member of the Congregational church, while he was one of the organizers and an active member of the Elks' Lodge, though no longer affiliated with this organization.

THOMAS C. FOSTER, M. D. The late Thomas C. Foster, M. D., who died at Navasota, Texas, as a farmer, came to the Lone Star state in childhood with his father, Dr. Robert B. S. Foster, who settled near Old Washington, Washington county. There the Doctor grew up until the outbreak of the war between the South and the North, when he entered the army of the Confederacy as a member of Colonel Mills' regiment of Hood's Brigade. He acquired a liberal literary education, graduating from Soule's University at Chapel Hill, and prepared for medicine in New Orleans, completing his medical course in Galveston. He had entered the practice at the outbreak of the war, and spent a term as a teacher in Soule's University, in the department of mathematics, and entered the army directly from school. Doctor Foster's army service comprised activities in Arkansas after going to the front, and his command crossed the Mississippi and became a part of the Army of the Tennessee. The Doctor, however, was captured by the enemy at Arkansas Post, and was taken to Camp Douglas, Chicago, where he remained in prison until the spring of the following year, when he was exchanged and rejoined his regiment. He next participated in the Atlanta campaign and returned under General Hood to Franklin and Nashville and was on a furlough into Alabama, when the war closed with the surrender at Appamattox.

Returning to Texas, Doctor Foster joined his father's family in Grimes county, above Roan's Prairie, and there began the practice of medicine. He followed it less than two years there, when he moved to the Brazos bottoms and rented land for one year on which he carried on general farming. In 1868 he moved to Navasota and resumed the same vocation, remaining so until his death. He raised cotton as well as corn, and his operations became somewhat extensive, while he demonstrated good business ability, acumen and foresight. His political inclinations were manifested by his attendance upon conventions of the Democratic party, the principles and candidates of which he never failed to stanchly support, although he was not inclined to seek personal preferment in the public arena. His religious connection was with the Methodist church, but he belonged to no fraternal organizations.

On June 13, 1865, Doctor Foster was married to Miss Annie R. Blackshear, daughter of Gen. Thomas E. Blackshear, who came to Texas from Thomas county, Georgia, in 1855, was a slaveholding planter near Navasota, and was born in Georgia, August 18, 1809. He was liberally educated at Athens, Georgia, and passed his life as a farmer, although he also had some military experience, holding a commission as general during the Florida War. He took no active personal part in the Civil war, but had four sons in the Confederate service. He married Emily G. Raines, who was born February 18, 1814, and died June 19, 1865, and the General passed away October 20, 1867, of yellow fever. He and his wife were the parents of the following children: Robert B., a farmer of Grimes county; James J., who died at Thomasville, Georgia, after the war; Edward T., who died during the war there as a soldier; Annie R., who is now Mrs. Foster; Duncan R., who died at Dallas, Texas, August 12, 1906, a Confederate soldier of the Fourth Texas; Sallie F., who married Frank R. Jones and died at Elgin, Texas; Emily G., who married W. J. Foster and resides at Navasota, Texas; William P., who has spent his life as a farmer and carpenter and now makes his home at Navasota; and Frank, who died single in 1875. Doctor and Mrs. Foster had no children.

Robert B. S. Foster was born at Forsyth, Georgia, and died in March, 1901, at the age of eighty-four years. He was a practicing physician and made his last home at Navasota. His wife was Charlotte Pinckard, and to them there were born: Dr. Thomas C.; Sarah L., who married R. D. D. Blackshear and died in 1908; William J., who died at Navasota in that year; Georgie, who became Mrs. William E. Edwards and died at Roan's Prairie; Robert B. S., Jr., who died near Navasota in 1899; and John, of Navasota; and James Pinckard, who died in childhood. This branch of the Foster family came originally from Scotland and settled first at Hampton, Virginia, from whence they scattered all over the South, the greater number being found in Alabama and Texas, where they have ever been foremost in the professions, in business, and in public, military and civil life.

ALLEN C. McDONALD. Mr. McDonald is now serving his third term as city secretary, tax assessor and tax collector of San Angelo, and is one of the most capable and energetic of the official corps of this flourishing west Texas. Mr. McDonald stands very high in the esteem of the local people, and his choice for his present office is a tribute to his ability and many sterling qualities.

Allen C. McDonald, who is of stanch Scotch stock on his father's side and English on his mother's side, was born February 21, 1873, in Limestone county, Texas. His parents who are both now residing in Dublin, Texas, were Thomas and Mary (Lasswell) McDonald. His father was a native of Tennessee, but the mother was born in Texas. The father is by trade a millwright and machinist and many years ago came from Tennessee to Texas, where he was for several years engaged in farm labor but has given most of his time to his regular trade. There were six children in the family, of whom Allen C. was the oldest. As a boy he grew up in Bosque county, attaining his early education in the public schools. When a little more than a boy he entered the railroad service, learning telegraphy and becoming an operator, and being stationed in that work in different parts of the states. He was actively identified with railroading until about 1905. He first came to San Angelo in 1901, and was stationed here in his regular work and was also in the real estate business for a while. In 1908 he was elected clerk and tax assessor and collector, and has been re-elected to that office so that his service has been continuous.

Mr. McDonald is a loyal Democrat, and has had an influential voice in the party councils. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias. On March 25, 1896, he married Miss Dee Wood, a daughter of John and Eugenia Wood of Taylor county, Texas. Her father was a stock raiser, and died about 1911, while her mother is now living in Abilene. Mr. and Mrs. McDonald have one daughter Hazel, aged fourteen, and attending school.

DR. J. H. DOWNIE. That San Antonio may claim distinction as the home of a manufacturing laboratory turning out some of the most popular dental supplies in America is a fact that may occasion some surprise, but is demonstrable by actual facts. Some years ago Dr. J. H. Downie, who had begun his work as an inventor and manufacturer of dental goods in Detroit, was forced by trust methods of competition to seek a new field, and in San Antonio started all over again and has developed a business which is one of the largest of its class in the country.

Born in St. Clair county, Michigan, in 1864, reared on a farm and educated partly in the country schools and the high school at Romeo, Michigan, J. H. Downie began the study and later the practice of dentistry under his father-in-law, Dr. Douglas, at Romeo. Two years were spent as a student in the dental department of Vanderbilt University at Nashville, Tennessee, until graduating in the class of 1890. In 1892, removing to Detroit, he founded and was the senior partner of the Detroit Dental Manufacturing Company, manufacturers of dental supplies. This concern, under his management, proved highly successful and developed a prosperous business which continued for a number of years. On account of the unfair methods of most of the other manufacturers of similar goods, who had organized into what became known as the Dental Trust, his independent business was injured and finally became unprofitable. Dr. Downie ceased his business connections at Detroit in 1904.

In 1897, seven years before that, Dr. Downie had established a home in San Antonio, Texas. In connection with his business at Detroit he occasionally made trips to the north, usually in the summer. It was on an exceedingly small scale that Dr. Downie began his manufacture of dental specialties in San Antonio. Seventeen years ago, on coming to the city, he was practically "without a dollar" and had to begin at the bottom. By hard, unremitting work and constantly pushing his business in the new field, he has developed an industry that commands a trade that extends from coast to coast, and in the spring of 1914 began a revised system of business extension that will carry his goods into every part of the world where there are dentists and dental supply houses. Orders have already been received from South Africa and South America. In the United States, although his laboratory is located so far south, and so far from the center of population and demand, he receives more and larger orders from dental supply houses in Boston and Chicago than from the entire southern states.

A notable achievement for his business and one indicating the merits of his goods was the large sale made to the United States government in April, 1914. At that time the medical supply department of the United States army at New York city placed with Dr. Downie an order for nearly twelve thousand dental instruments of a special make for use by the army dental surgeons. That was the largest order for a single kind of instrument ever placed by the government, and since January, 1914, Dr. Downie has filled three such orders. The device ordered in such large quantity by the government is one of Dr. Downie's numerous inventions, and is known as the Lone Star Spiral Broach, used by dentists for extracting nerves and cleaning the nerve canals. He originated this device and first put it out in 1890. It has been and continues to be the most popular of his specialties and the most profitable article of manufacture.

Since beginning business in Detroit Dr. Downie has invented and put on the market a great number of dental devices, and is widely and favorably known for his achievements in that direction. It is undeniable that Dr. Downie has originated more dental devices than any other manufacturer. Not only that, but he originates and builds the machines by which his goods are made. That places him in a position of peculiar advantage for the manufacture of his instruments at a lower cost than other concerns. He is constantly improving his machinery with the idea of turning out his products faster and at possibly less cost. Within the limited space of this sketch it is impossible to give a complete list or description of the Downie dental specialties. It should be stated, however, that among other things he manufactures and sells more impression compound than anyone else in the business. His first invention in the dental supply line was Downie's bridge furnace, which at that time was the most popular thing he ever made. During the years when porcelain fillings and porcelain crowns were being experimented with and somewhat extensively used by dentists, Dr. Downie was a large manufacturer of that material and of successful implements for its application. One of these was the Downie gas furnace and also the Downie electric furnace, both of which have since gone out of use on account of the decline in the use of porcelain by dentists. Another popular part of dental equipment which he originated is the Universal bridge tray, which has a swivel enabling it to be used in any part of the mouth. This has had a very large sale, as has also the Downie flexible aluminum impression tray, an improvement on the old style, and which is now extensively used.

The success which Dr. Downie has had as a manufacturer and business man has won illustration in the beautiful home which he built and owns at 402 East San Pedro Place at the corner of Paschal Street. It is a handsome two-story frame structure, of modern architecture and convenience. At the rear of his residence is his manufacturing laboratory, a two-story stucco building, containing besides the workrooms his private office. The lot is 165 feet front by 156 feet deep. Here he raises a great variety of fruit, of nearly every known species that can be grown in this section of the state. Horticulture has become a serious study of Dr. Downie, and his many experiments have been undertaken chiefly in order to get the proper varieties of fruit adaptable to this section. His object in this is eventually to make a fine fruit farm out of a piece of rich land owned by him in Nueces county in the vicinity of Corpus Christi. At the present time he raises fruit in such abundance as to supply his home generously the year around.

Dr. Downie's wife before her marriage was Miss Elizabeth Douglas. They have a daughter, Mrs. Jeanne Smith. Both the wife and daughter have been of much assistance to Dr. Downie, especially during the years of vicissitudes and the building up of his industry, and have taken their part in superintending work, both in his office and in his laboratory.

WILLIAM THOMAS DUNCAN. Among those prominent cattle men in southwest Texas who were pioneers in this section, none ranks higher in the esteem of his fellows than William Thomas Duncan of Reeves county. He located here in the early days of this country and his prosperity has grown with the growth of the country. He is now one of the wealthy and influential stockmen in the section, and also holds an important position in the business world of Toyah, Texas, near which town his ranch is located.

William Thomas Duncan was born in Ellis county, Texas, on the 17th of March, 1869, and so he is bound to the state by the double ties of affection and birth. He is the son of James and Elizabeth Jane (Thomas) Duncan, both of whom were born in the state of Tennessee. They were among the early pioneers in Texas, coming to this state in the forties. They located in Kaufman county and there James Duncan became a rancher and a raiser of stock. This was during the years when the Indians were actively contesting the right of the white man to settle in their hunting grounds and the days and nights were lived in hourly expectation of an Indian attack. For fifteen years Mr. Duncan lived in Kaufman county and he then moved to Brown county and later to Kimball county. In 1882 he came out and settled in Jeff Davis county, where he spent the last sixteen years of his life, dying in 1898. He had lived an eventful life and had played a conspicuous part in the pioneer history of the state. As a stock raiser he had been extremely successful, owning large herds of cattle. He served in the Confederate army throughout the Civil war and participated in a number of the great battles. In politics he was always an active member of the Democratic party.

The following children were born to James Duncan and his wife: William Thomas; George D., who is a merchant in Toyah; James Lafayette, who is engaged in ranching and stock raising in Jeff Davis county, Texas; Joseph D., who is a stockman near Toyah, and Lela, who is now Mrs. Frank Billingslea, of Toyah. William Thomas Duncan received the greater share of his education in the schools of Reeves county, and he attended school until he was seventeen years of age. He then went into the stock raising business in Jeff Davis county. He began in a modest way and the hardships and trials which he had to face made a man of him before his time. In the earlier days of stock raising in this country, the rancher had the open country on which to graze his stock, but as the country began to be settled up it was necessary to buy or lease land and this made stock raising a much more costly occupation. With the energy and pluck that has always been a characteristic of Mr. Duncan's, he devoted himself to his business, and he has been steadily successful.

He has always employed the most modern methods on his ranch, and has thoroughly proved the practicability of using up-to-date methods. He now controls sixty sections of grazing lands in Reeves county, and at present is engaged in buying and selling cattle, making Toyah his home, going and coming to and from the ranch in an up-to-date automobile of the latest make, somewhat of an improvement over the cow pony of not so very many years back. During the life of the First National Bank, that is during 1910, 1911, and 1912, before it was combined with the Citizens State Bank of Toyah, Mr. Duncan was its vice president, and he is a factor in the business world of Toyah today. In politics he is a member of the Democratic party. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and of the Woodmen of the World.

On the 29th of July, 1889, Mr. Duncan was married to Miss Annie L. Chalk, a native of Texas. Four children have been born to this union, namely: Alice Zillah, who is now Mrs. Albert Tinnin, her husband being a prominent ranchman of Culberson county; James C., who is associated with his father in business; William K. and Aubrey, who live at home with their parents.

R. E. TAYLOR. One of the prominent members of the legal fraternity of Clay county is R. E. Taylor, who began the practice of his profession in Archer county in 1891, and who has since 1898 made his home in Clay county and here has carried on his legal and other activities. He is one of the successful men of the town and county, and has served two terms as District Attorney for Clay county, in which office he acquitted himself most creditably and capably. Mr. Taylor was born in Butler county, Kentucky, in August, 1863, and is a son of Robert M. and Elena (Reed) Taylor, both of whom were born in Kentucky and came to Texas in early life. They located in Archer county and there the father was for years identified with lumber activities in that county. He died in June, 1899, aged sixty-nine years. The mother was educated in Kentucky, her native state, and there married Mr. Taylor. She was a school teacher in her maiden days, and a woman of many excellent qualities of heart and mind. She is still living at Henrietta, and is now at the advanced age of seventy-nine years, though she retains much of the vigor of earlier years. She became the mother of five children, of which number the subject was the third born.

R. E. Taylor attended the public schools of Kentucky, finishing his common school training in the high school in Rochester, Kentucky. He further prosecuted his studies by reading law in the office of a well known and most able attorney of that time and place, and in 1891, so faithfully had he applied himself to the task in hand, Mr. Taylor was admitted to the bar. He began his practice in Archer county, continuing there successfully until 1898, when he was elected to the office of District Attorney for Clay county. Since that time Mr. Taylor has confined his activities and his residence to Clay county, and he has served two full terms in the office of District Attorney.

Mr. Taylor is a Democrat, and active in the work and interests of the party. He has fraternal relations with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and the Woodmen of the World. He has passed through all chairs in the first named order, and in all of them is he prominent and popular, as becoming a man of his type. He is a member of the Baptist church.

The first marriage of Mr. Taylor was solemnized, in 1891, when Miss Kate Trumble became his wife. She died in Henrietta, Texas, in 1904, and she was a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Trumble, both of whom are yet living in Clay county, this state. One child was born of their union, Cedric Taylor, born in Archer City in 1896, and now attending Terrell School in Dallas, Texas. In 1907 Mr. Taylor married Miss Grace Lanham, a granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Lanham. The Lanham family pioneered to Texas in the early days of her history, and have been prominent in the state ever since.

Two children have come to Mr. and Mrs. Taylor: Mildred and Alberta, both born in Canadian, Texas, in 1908 and 1910, respectively.

It is interesting to contemplate the career of Mr. Taylor when it is remembered that he made his way alone in the world, gaining his professional training as best he might, but carrying out that work in a manner such as to permit his steady and persistent rise in his profession. Today he is at the top of the legal fraternity in these parts, and is known as the ablest attorney in Clay county. His reputation for integrity and civic pride and general good citizenship is a most enviable one, and one that is not the least part of his assets in this community.

E. A. CARLOCK. Proprietor and editor of the Paducah Post, Mr. Carlock is one of the vigorous and enterprising young newspaper men of northwest Texas, and has built up a very successful weekly paper in Cottle county, with a circulation and influence throughout the territory adjacent to Paducah.

Mr. Carlock was born in Madison county, Arkansas, October 17, 1883, the fourth in a family of five children, born to John A. and Nancy (Waldon) Carlock, the father a native of Tennessee, and the mother of Arkansas. From Tennessee, the father moved to Illinois, then to Arkansas, and finally to Texas, in 1885, locating in Wise county. He has been a farmer all his active life, and was one of the early settlers of Wise and Jack counties, where he became owner of extensive lands. He is now living retired at the age of seventy-four. During the war he was living in Arkansas, and enlisted in the Confederate army from that state under General McCulloch. He participated in the great battle of Elk Horn and was in a number of other engagements, but went through his service without wound or capture. The mother is also living and is now sixty-three years of age. The other children of their union were: Miss Ollie Carlock, born in Arkansas; Miss Rosie, born in Jack county, Texas; Darrett T., now deceased; and Zuella, also deceased.

E. A. Carlock from the age of two years was reared and educated in Texas, attending the common schools, and also the high school at Paradise. He afterwards graduated from the Denton Normal School in 1904 in the literary course, and after completing his education took up school work for two terms in Wise county, and in Oklahoma. His ambition was for newspaper work, and after his brief experience as a teacher, he conducted for two years the Paradise Echo in Paradise, Wise county. He then came to Paducah in Cottle county, and acquired the Paducah

Post, and under his proprietorship he has made it one of the live journals of Cottle county.

Mr. Carlock was a member of the first city council of Paducah, and his citizenship has always been of a public spirited order, and both through the columns of his paper, and as an individual he has done everything possible to promote the welfare of this vicinity. In politics he is a Democrat. His fraternal membership includes the Masonic Order, and the Knights of Pythias. He is a Royal Arch Mason, and has filled all the chairs in the Blue Lodge, including Master.

At Paducah, on December 22, 1911, Mr. Carlock married Miss Elsie Blake, a daughter of S. L. Blake, who now lives in Paducah, and belongs to one of the old families of Texas.

WILLIAM H. TUTTLE. The largest business of its kind in the southwest, the Tuttle Paint Company, Incorporated, represents the splendid business enterprise and accomplishment of William H. Tuttle, president of this company, and for more than thirty years actively identified with El Paso. Mr. Tuttle came to this city when it was a pioneer town on the western borders, was a poor young man, a painter by trade, and established himself in business in a very small way. It has been his fortune and that of the city where he makes his home to have since developed an establishment which is a matter of pride to all local citizens, and which has a trade extending throughout the southwest.

William H. Tuttle was born in Indiana, but near the city of Louisville, January 29, 1859. His parents were John R. and Amelia (Hagins) Tuttle. The family is one of the oldest in America, two brothers of the name having come from England and established themselves as merchants early in the seventeenth century, and one of them owns the grounds on which Harvard University was subsequently founded. The family has contributed a number of its members to the Mission wars, and Mr. Tuttle is a member of the Sons of the American Revolution. His grandfather Tuttle was a drummer boy during the war of 1812 and was in Washington when the British captured that city and burned the capitol. John R. Tuttle, the father, was born in Ohio, and moved to Indiana, during the early fifties. He became a resident of El Paso in 1892 and continued in this city until his death in 1906. His business was that of contracting and he was very successful in all his enterprises. During the Civil war he answered the first call of Lincoln for volunteers, but owing to physical inability was not accepted for service. The mother of Mr. William H. Tuttle was born near Washington, Kentucky. Her father, William Hagins, was one of the followers of General Jackson at the battle of New Orleans when the British troops made their final attempt in the war of 1812 and when they were decisively defeated by the American army, consisting largely of Tennessee and Kentucky backwoodsmen. William Hagins also served in the Indian war in Florida during 1835-36, and his death occurred very soon afterwards. He was a farmer by occupation, and his father was a soldier under George Rogers Clark in the campaign of 1777-79, by which the northwest territory was conquered by the British. The mother of William H. Tuttle died in 1869 at Topeka, Kansas, at the age of thirty-five. The father was again married and had children by both wives. Amelia Hagins, the mother, was of Irish ancestry, and was born at Culpepper Courthouse in Virginia.

Mr. William H. Tuttle, who was the second of his father's family by the first marriage received an education in the public schools of Indiana and Topeka, Kansas, and at the age of nineteen began learning the carpenter's trade. An accident prevented his following that business, so he next directed his attention to the trade of painter, which he actively followed in connection with contracting for a period of twenty years. Mr. Tuttle in 1882 came out to El Paso, only a year or so after the first railroad had reached this town, and here established himself in business as painting and contractor and also the nucleus of what is now the Tuttle Paint Company. Besides himself as president, the other principal officers of this corporation are B. J. Tuttle, treasurer, and H. M. Tuttle, secretary, the two latter being the half-brothers of William W. The firm has twenty-five employees, and the store occupies a floor space of fifteen thousand square feet. It was in a small shop and one of the obscure enterprises of El Paso when first started, and a single workman made up the working staff. At the present time besides the central store, the company maintains two large warehouses.

Mr. Tuttle is a public spirited citizen, uses his support for community enterprises, but has never sought office or taken active part in politics, though a good Republican. Fraternally he has gone through all the chairs of the local Odd Fellows lodge, and is a member of the El Paso Country Club. In the early days he was one of the organizers of the Volunteer Fire Department, and was at the head of this organization for some years. He and his family are active members of the Episcopal church, and he is related to the Rev. Bishop Tuttle of Missouri.

On July 4, 1892, Mr. Tuttle was married at Nevada City, California, to Miss Constance Small, daughter of Benjamin Small, a native of Nevada. The three children born to their marriage are as follows: William B., born at El Paso in May, 1894, and now a student in the Agricultural College of New Mexico; Norma Hagins Tuttle, born in El Paso in December, 1898, and now a student in the El Paso School for Girls; and Joslin P., born in El Paso in July, 1900, and a student in the El Paso Public Schools. The offices of the Tuttle Paint Company are at 210-212 North Stanton street.

Mr. Tuttle has attained his success by his own energy and efforts. When he was a boy he worked as a call boy, drove stage, prospected in the mining regions, hauled freight, and saw every side of life and both good and hard times. With the success which has come to him in El Paso, he is one of the most loyal of the local citizenship, and uses excellent argument in upholding his proposition that El Paso will some day become the largest city in the state. He points to the fact that sixty per cent of El Paso's development has been due to the mining industry. The mining industry is now only in its infancy to what it will be in the near future. The future, with the development of Mexico and the great trade which will flow back and forth across the border between the two countries El Paso will probably benefit more from this source than any other city on the international boundary. Hence, in his opinion, El Paso is bound to grow, and with the great farming, mining and cattle resources situated all around it, its destiny is secure.

HORACE M. ADAMS. Now a prospering real estate and insurance man of El Paso, Mr. Adams has had a career of much diversity and varied experience, and started life a poor boy with very meagre education, and has made his own way to a fair degree of success and prosperity.

Horace M. Adams was born March 22, 1866, on the Delaware Indian Reservation in the state of Kansas. His father was William Adams, a native of Kansas and a three-quarter Delaware Indian, and a hereditary chieftain of the tribe, although in his own lifetime he never filled that office. His ancestors had been prominent members of the race and the oldest male member of the family had served as chief of the tribe. The father was a minister of the Baptist church, and gave the greater part of his life to religious work among the Indians, and also did much to promote schools among his people. He died at Kansas City, Missouri, August 30, 1902, at the age of seventy. The maiden name of his wife was Kate Woodfield, a daughter of George Woodfield, who was of German stock. She died in 1870 near Chetopa, Kansas. Of their three children, the El Paso real estate man was the youngest.

During his youth he educated himself largely, and had little opportunity to attend schools of regular instruction. From the age of twelve he became self-supporting and his first work was on a farm. In 1903 Mr. Adams became interested in the oil business in the Indian Territory and Oklahoma, and through his operations in that field he got a very substantial start in life. In 1908 he took up his residence at El Paso and for several years was engaged in stock raising in this vicinity. In 1912 he became the associate of J. T. Cassidy in the real estate and insurance business and their office at 211 Mesa street has since been the center of a very large and prosperous business for both partners.

Mr. Adams in politics is a Democrat, and is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias. He and his family worship in the Baptist church. On July 29, 1892, at Alluwe, Indian Territory, he married Miss Maude Bramwell, who was the daughter of John Bramwell, a native of Kansas. They are the parents of three children, one son and two daughters. The family reside at 1507 N. Kansas avenue.

OTIS A. CRITCHELL. A mineralogist, chemist and assayer, Mr. Critchell is senior member of one of the leading firms of assayers in West Texas. He has been identified with Mexico and the southwest United States throughout his active career, and has served as chemist and assayer in El Paso since 1901. Otis A. Critchell was born in Monroe, Michigan, August 17, 1875, a son of Otis A. and Guilletta (Warner) Critchell. Both parents were born in Michigan and are now deceased. The senior Critchell during his lifetime was a prominent attorney and held the office of probate judge for fifteen years in Monroe. He was in practice of the law for more than thirty years, continuing up to the time of his death. In politics he was an active Republican and for twenty-two years was a trustee of Albion College. He held the degrees of A. B., M. A., and LL. B. There were four children in the family, one daughter being deceased. James C. Critchell, a brother of Otis A., is superintendent of road work in El Paso county, and a resident of the city of El Paso, and for ten years was a United States customs inspector. Another brother is superintendent of the Mazapitel Copper Company of Conception Delore, Mexico, in the state of Zacatecas.

Mr. Otis A. Critchell was reared and educated in Michigan, and from the public schools of Monroe entered the University of Michigan, graduating with the class of 1897, and with the degree of Ph. C. Somewhat later he came to Mexico and for a year and a half was employed as chemist for the Sierra Mojada Mining Company. In 1901 he located in El Paso as chemist for the Candelaria Mining Company, being with that company for one year. In 1902 Mr. Critchell established himself in business with Mr. George Ferguson, under the firm name of Critchell & Ferguson, assayers. They have laboratories and assaying offices, and by their technical experience and thorough reliability have gained a clientage second to none in this field. They number among their clients many of the largest mining corporations of Mexico, New Mexico and West Texas.

Mr. Critchell thoroughly believes in the future greatness of El Paso and all the valley up and down from this city. He has shown his faith by making extensive investments in valley land in El Paso county, and among his other interests he owns a pleasant home at 1515 Montana street. He is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Order of Beavers. He belongs to the Wigwam Club in El Paso, and is fond of all manner of athletics, especially of bowling. At the beginning of the Spanish-American war, Mr. Critchell was in Michigan, and enlisted at Ann Arbor in Company A of the Thirty-First Infantry, serving thirteen months as a private before being mustered out.

In 1901 he married Miss Belle C. Ferguson, whose grandparents were both of Scotch ancestry. Mr. and Mrs. Critchell had one child, which died in infancy. Among the reasons which Mr. Critchell assigns for the continued growth and prosperity of El Paso, is the fact that there is no town of importance between El Paso and Fort Worth, a distance of six hundred miles, and also of greater importance is the fact that at the present time and on a much larger scale in the near future is being developed many thousands of acres of irrigated land in the valley adjacent to El Paso.

C. E. HAYES. With initiative and constructive genius of a high order, Colonel Hayes has proved a veritable captain of industry and stands as a fine type of the world's productive workers. He served as a soldier in the Civil war when a mere boy, and in later years he has gained high reputation as a civil and mechanical engineer, as an expert horticulturist, and as a promoter of civic and industrial development and progress. He has maintained his home in Texas during the major part of the time for the past quarter of a century and is today one of the best known and most highly honored citizens of Crockett, the thriving metropolis and judicial center of Houston county. His career has been marked by varied and interesting experiences and has been guided and governed by those high principles of personal integrity and honor that ever beget objective confidence and esteem.

His intellectual ken has been broadened alike by well directed study and reading and by extensive travel, and in his civic attitude he is emphatically liberal, loyal and progressive.

Colonel Hayes claims the fine old Buckeye state as the place of his nativity, as he was born in Williams county, Ohio, on the 6th of August, 1852. He is a son of H. B. and Ellen (Campbell) Hayes, the former of whom was a native of Connecticut and the latter of Tennessee, both representatives of families founded in America in the colonial era of our national history. The father was a man of high attainments as an architect and civil engineer and was prominently engaged in the work of these professions in Ohio and other parts of the middle West. He rendered gallant service as a soldier of the Union in the Civil war, and his activities during this climacteric period in the nation's history transcended those of the private in the ranks, as he did effective work as a civil engineer in connection with military operations and also gained prestige as a sharpshooter and scout. Incidental to his army service he was a member of the intrepid band of soldiers who boldly confiscated a locomotive engine at Big Shanty, Georgia, and with the same made a hazardous race through the enemy's territory. He participated in the battle of Crab Orchard, the second battle of Bull Run and that of Antietam, besides many minor engagements, and he was thrice wounded while in action. In later years he manifested his abiding interest in his old comrades in arms by retaining affiliation with the Grand Army of the Republic. After the war he resumed his labors as a civil engineer and railroad builder, and at one time he was treasurer of a minor railway company. He finally removed from Ohio to Michigan, and he became a representative in the legislature of that state, as well as an influential factor in civic affairs of a local order. He passed the closing years of his life in the city of Battle Creek, Calhoun county, Michigan, secure in the high esteem of all who knew him, and he was ninety years of age at the time of his death.

Colonel C. E. Hayes was a lad of about nine years at the inception of the Civil war and after his father went to the front as a soldier he remained with his mother at the old home in Northern Ohio until after the famous raid made by the gallant General Morgan in the southern part of that state. Concerning the attitude of his noble and fearless mother at this time the following statements have been made: "Fearing the depredations and vengeance of the intrepid Confederate raider, the farmers of the neighborhood in which Mrs. Hayes was residing fled in all directions, offering their horses, cattle and fodder at any price they could secure. Mrs. Hayes, of Scottish lineage and imbued with much of the shrewdness of the Scotch type, utilized her appreciable fund of ready money in buying largely of the stock and produce of her panic-stricken neighbors, and later she disposed of the greater part of this property to Morgan and his men, who paid her large prices, as the gallant Confederate commander absolutely forbade any plundering of the noble woman who had thus fearlessly stood her ground. After the disappearance of the Confederate raiders the neighbors returned to their farms and, mastered by chagrin, cupidity and jealousy, they began threatening Mrs. Hayes and her family, maintaining that she was a sympathizer with the cause of the Confederacy, even though her husband was at the time gallantly fighting in defense of the Union. Finally, fearing for her life in view of the manifest hostility of those who should have been her friends, she removed with her children to Maryland and settled in Charles county, near the Potomac river. There her son C. E., though a mere boy, began carrying messages back and forth across the river and in time his sympathy turned to the southern cause, with the result that he enlisted in a Confederate regiment, with which he continued in active service for nine months, and took part in the second battle of Bull Run, as well as in many sharp skirmishes. He was finally captured, in company with his commanding officer, General Skinner, by General Sickles, the venerable Union officer whose financial and family affairs are attracting much attention in the present year, 1913, and the young soldier was taken to Glymont, Charles county, Maryland, where his mother was still residing, and there he took the oath of allegiance to the United States and joined the Union army, with which he continued in active service until the close of the war."

Colonel Hayes had availed himself of the advantages of the public schools of his native state and of Maryland, but his studies were early interrupted by his determined efforts to take an active part in the war, so that the present liberal education which is his has been gained through self-discipline and close association with the practical affairs of life. After the close of the war he secured employment as purser upon a steamboat, and after having been employed on various boats in this capacity he became a marine engineer on the boats. Finally he assumed the position of locomotive engineer on the old Chicago & Port Huron Railroad, in Michigan, and he thus served for three years. As an expert mechanical engineer he then entered the employ of the great J. I. Case Machinery Company, of Wisconsin, by which corporation he was sent to the newly opened rice fields in Louisiana, for the purpose of assisting in the development of the infant industry and bring about the adoption of the machinery manufactured by the company. After two years of effective work for the Case company, Colonel Hayes engaged in independent business as a civil and mechanical engineer, and as such he installed many rice mills in Louisiana, where he assisted in erecting and equipping the first plant of this kind, besides doing other important work in the line of his chosen vocation.

After Colonel Hayes came to Texas he continued effective service in his profession, the while he became deeply impressed with the resources and advantages of the state. He finally began to give much attention to horticulture, and in connection with this industry he has made many important developments, the most important of which has been the propagation of the purple-leaf cotton and the successful crossing of the red raspberry with the common dewberry, besides which he has made successful experiments in the propagation of hybrid plums and potatoes. He finds recreation and pleasure in his work along these lines and is the owner of a finely improved farm lying contiguous to the city of Crockett, the same engrossing much of his time and attention. He gives a personal supervision to all of its operations as well as to the evolving of improvements which keep the place a veritable model. He has given considerable attention to the real estate business during his residence in Houston county, and he is one of the promoters and builders of the new town of Latexo, this county. Colonel Hayes has been distinctively a man of thought and action, and he is to be credited with the development of many enterprises that are of enduring value and importance and that give him a secure place as one of the world's constructive workers. Taking a lively interest in all that touches the general welfare of the community and ever ready to lend his co-operation in the furtherance of progressive measures and enterprises, Colonel Hayes has never been a seeker of public office, though he is unwavering in his allegiance to the Democratic party.

On the twenty-seventh of November, 1885, was solemnized the marriage of Colonel Hayes to Miss Alice E. Rice, who was born and reared in Maryland and who is a daughter of the late Absalom Rice, a prominent figure in educational and religious activities in Maryland and a man of the highest ideals. Under home environment representative of the finest culture, Mrs. Hayes was signally favored, and thus was early promoted her love of the best in literature. She received a liberal education and prior to her marriage had been a successful and popular teacher in the schools of her native state. She has proved a valued acquisition to the leading social circles of Crockett, has traveled extensively in both America and Europe, and as a gracious gentlewoman she presides as the popular chatelaine of an attractive home that is known for its generous hospitality. She is zealous in the support of church, charitable and benevolent work, and both she and her husband are active members of the Methodist Episcopal church, South. Their only child died at the age of five years.

PHILO M. INGRAHAM. Now serving as deputy collector of customs at the Port of Sabine in Jefferson county, Mr. Ingraham has been a resident of this state for nearly twenty years, and has had an active career largely of public and social service.

Mr. Ingraham was born in Wright county, Missouri, in 1870. His parents were T. C. and Mary (Fortune) Ingraham. His father was born in Franklin county, Georgia, and the mother of Ingraham, Clay county, Illinois, a place named for her father, Daniel Ingraham. Philo N. Ingraham was reared and received his education in Wright county, Missouri, and for several years followed school teaching both in his native state and in Texas. Coming to Texas in 1894, he taught school awhile at Ladonia, in Fannin county. He has always been ambitious for the best of equipment, and training for his life's work, and after coming to this state attended the Polytechnic College at Fort Worth four years. He graduated there in 1903, and then engaged in Y. M. C. A. work, being secretary of the associations of Temple, Galveston and Port Arthur. At Port Arthur he took the civil service examination in April, 1907, and having qualified, was appointed in June of the same year to his present office as deputy collector of customs for the Sabine district, with headquarters at the town of Sabine. His service in this capacity has been so efficient that no change in his tenure of office was suggested after the change of administration in office at Washington, in March, 1913.

Mr. Ingraham has membership in the Methodist Episcopal church, South, is affiliated with the Masonic Order and the Knights of Pythias. He was married at Galveston to Miss Maryetta Woolford. She was born at Sabine Pass, her father, Captain J. B. Woolford having been a well known bar pilot of Galveston.

ROBERT TERRY STUART. Even in a community which can boast of numerous business men who have attained eminent positions in the commercial and financial world almost before the flush of youth has left their cheeks, there are to be found but few to whom has come so great a success as that which has attended the efforts of Robert Terry Stuart, of Fort Worth and Dallas. Although at an age when the average citizen is but fairly entering upon his career, Mr. Stuart has reached an acknowledged and enviable position, where his influence is a decided factor in business and financial circles of the Lone Star state, and his success is all the more remarkable in that it has been entirely self-gained, for he has fought his way up within a few short years from obscurity and indebtedness, has worked with his hands, and trod the familiar but difficult self-made road to independence.

Robert Terry Stuart was born near Terrell, Kaufman county, Texas, January 24, 1880, a son of Champ T. and Betty (Raines) Stuart, native Texans. His paternal grandfather, Terry Stuart, and his uncle "Bob" Coutts, came to Texas prior to the Civil war. The former located in Terrell, while the latter settled at Weatherford, and was one of the pioneer leaders in business and civic affairs. Both were known as pioneer ranchmen and noted Indian fighters.

When Robert T. Stuart was but twelve years of age, his father, who had been the owner of an extensive and prosperous cattle business, lost everything in the great cattle panic of 1892, and the plans he made for the education of his children had to be abandoned. Young Stuart, however, continued to attend the country school at Chico, and when seventeen years of age went to the Sam Houston Normal School, the excellence of his examination gaining for him a life certificate from that institution, which is equal to the degree of Bachelor of Arts. During his vacations he had worked in the harvest fields and accepted every opportunity to earn money with which to continue his studies, but when he graduated at the age of nineteen years, he found himself eight hundred dollars in debt. His energetic and ambitious spirit was shown when he promptly accepted a position on a rock crushing machine, at a salary of forty dollars per month, and after two months, seeing the possibilities of the business, he contracted for and received twenty-five cents per yard for stone from the railroads, having embarked in the business on his own account, although he found it necessary to go into debt still deeper in order to buy mules, harness, wagons, camp outfits, etc. The wisdom of his venture was shown within the next six months, during which time he cleared more than $4,500. When the winter came on, Mr. Stuart, having had a chance to look around and choose a position of a more congenial nature, accepted an appointment as teacher, at a salary of $100 per month.

It was during the time that he was employed as educator that Mr. Stuart started writing life insurance. It has been stated by good authority that the successful life insurance man, like the poet, is born—not made. At any rate, Mr. Stuart at once recognized that he had found the field for which his abilities were best adapted, and in his new line he began to forge rapidly to the front. In speaking of his phenomenal success in the insurance field, a recent article in the Fort Worth Star-Telegram said in part: "Mr. Stuart was formerly general agent of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company in this city, in whose service he led the entire United States in general agencies, as well as in personal business produced last year (1912). His record as a business producer with the Pacific Mutual and with the Equitable, the only two companies with which he has heretofore been identified, attracted the attention of the heads of these companies through his having won every prize offered by them for business in this state, together with two national prizes offered in competition with the agencies of the whole country." Mr. Stuart's trophies won thus in competition include a handsome loving cup presented by the Equitable Life of New York for breaking the world's record for getting business.

Mr. Stuart founded the International Fire Insurance Company of Fort Worth and the Commonwealth Bonding and Casualty Company of Fort Worth. He is also president of the R. T. Stuart Company, Incorporated. It is his distinction to have been the president of the first million dollar life insurance company in Texas. In 1909 in Fort Worth, at a meeting of over two hundred stockholders, there was organized the American Home Life Insurance Company, with a capital and surplus of $1,000,000, which chose for its slogan, "Keep Southern Money in the South." The organization is an especially strong one from top to bottom and comprises the strongest and most substantial insurance men, business men, bankers and cattlemen in the state. Mr. Stuart was elected president, and in addition was made a member of the finance and executive committees and the board of directors, and continued to direct the company's affairs with the greatest ability until his resignation in 1910.

In all his undertakings Mr. Stuart has shown himself a shrewd, capable, energetic business man and financier, worthy the confidence of his associates and the public at large, and possessed of the qualities which at all times in this country have qualified men for leadership. Mr. Stuart's work as an organizer and promoter has probably its best example in the founding of the Bankers Trust Company at Fort Worth in 1910, with a capital of four hundred thousand dollars. Mr. Stuart was president of the company until its removal to Dallas in 1913, when the business was reorganized, with Colonel C. C. Slaughter as chairman of the board, Judge W. B. Slaughter as president, and Mr. Stuart as active vice-president. The present capitalization of the Bankers Trust Company is five million dollars. Mr. Stuart now has his home and business headquarters in Dallas.

On June 30, 1904, at Vernon, Texas, he married Miss Maude Elizabeth McKibben, daughter of H. F. McKibben of that city.

GEORGE I. TERRELL. A retired farmer, banker and business man of Deport, George I. Terrell represents the finest moral character and substantial business success of his community. It has been his privilege to witness the development in the Red River Valley from pioneer times. He was a soldier for the South during the war between the states. He returned and engaged in farming, and by the process of honorable dealings and insistent industry gradually extended his operations and his possessions until he became one of the wealthiest men in his immediate community. The weight of years has since divorced him from active affairs, and he now enjoys that esteem and admiration which attain to the older men, whose lives have been useful and honorable in every relation.

Mr. Terrell has resided in this community since 1859, when he came from Marshall, Kentucky, as a young man. He was one of the Terrell family who made the journey from the old home state in a wagon, being one of the seven children of Joel Terrell. A few slaves accompanied the family on its migration, and settlement was made upon land which cost them $2.50 per acre. Few of the settlers at that time were farmers in the modern sense, their requirements for land being for grazing purposes, and they cultivated only enough to provide for the immediate needs of the household. The whole country was practically a public pasture, and no one was crowded for room.

Joel Terrell was born in Virginia in 1812, and was taken to Kentucky by his father, William Terrell, when a child. Settlement was made in Marshall county, where the senior Terrell died as a modest farmer in 1839. William Terrell married Esther Bledsoe in Virginia and the representative of a family name which has long been prominent through the middle bulk of Southern states. Joel Terrell, who was the only one of the three children to come to Texas, married Mary M. Davidson, a daughter of Asa Davidson, who was also a Kentucky settler. Mrs. Terrell died in 1850 and Joel Terrell passed away in 1877. They were both members of the Methodist church, and Joel Terrell was a man of quiet industry, a good neighbor, thoroughly honest in all his dealings, and while never conspicuous in public affairs, he always bore the responsibilities of life with great credit. He sympathized with the attitude of the South during the war, and saw his son put on the gray uniform and attempt the establishment of a new republic upon an American continent. The children of Joel and Mary Terrell were: George I., of Deport; John J., who died in the military service of the Confederacy; Adaline, wife of the late Captain W. T. Gunn; Catherine, who married Theodore Haydock, and died in Lamar county; Martha B., wife of Elisha K. Gunn, of Deport; Mary E., who married J. N. Grant, and is a resident of Arkansas, and Joel Milton of Jones county, Texas.

George I. Terrell attained his majority in Marshall county, Kentucky, where he was born on November 20, 1837. The local schools gave him little more than the bare superficial training of books, and he practically learned from experience the best lessons of life. A short time before the beginning of the great war between the states he was one of those who helped to pilot the family caravan across Arkansas, crossing the Mississippi river at Columbus, Kentucky, and reaching the new home in Texas when the rumblings of war were already heard. The family had scarcely settled itself securely in North Texas when he responded in 1861 to the call to arms, as a member of Company K of the Ninth Texas Infantry, under Captain M. A. Dillard and Colonel Sam Bell Maxey. The company reached the scene of operations at Shiloh and took part in that famous battle on April 6 and 7, 1862. He was also in the engagement at Murfreesboro, and continued in the Mississippi Valley campaign at Chickamauga, where he was captured on September 19, 1863. Removed as a prisoner of war to Camp Douglas in Chicago, he remained in that Federal prison until the end of the war. The prison grounds, now almost in the heart of the city of Chicago, were enclosed and heavily guarded by sentinels, pacing a wall sixteen feet high, and commanding every point of the camp. The features of the daily life were answering roll call, "boiling out" and the routine of keeping clean and providing themselves with food. To those who had no mechanical genius and no initiative in devising pursuits for killing time, camp life became hum-drum indeed. The barracks were twenty by one hundred feet and usually housed from one hundred and fifty to two hundred men. When an epidemic of smallpox chanced to break out there were anxious times in that old camp. A few attempts were made in the direction of liberty through escape, but these were nearly always frustrated and the attempts finally abandoned. While a prisoner at Camp Douglas Mr. Terrell employed himself in making trinkets for sale to the curious visitors who usually hung about the prison. These trinkets were manufactured from gutta percha and ornamented with silver settings gathered from various sources. From his fellow prisoners he acquired a sort of trade as a ring and breastpin maker, and improvised some tools from which he fashioned his coat buttons into rings and decorated them with settings cut from an old fork. These were crude ornaments, but found some sale, and with the money supplied by this source he purchased some new gutta percha and new silver and continued the making of rings and other jewelry. In this way he found that he was converting his enforced leisure into real money, and had a small amount of capital when he left prison at the end of the war.

Released in June, 1865, Mr. Terrell was provided with transportation as far as Shreveport, Louisiana, and from that point was fortunate in getting a ride as far as Marshall, Texas, and while walking on west was befriended by a resident, who loaned him a saddled horse upon the back of which he reached home about the first of July. Taking up the routine of civil life, he put his hands to the plow and continued from that time on as a farmer until 1911. He began his independent career with a team and a hundred acres of prairie land, and from time to time extended his farm boundaries, established new farms from his successive purchases, equipped them with substantial improvements, and by his individual enterprise contributed much wealth to the community and made it a better place for later settlers to live. When he retired after nearly fifty years of husbandry, he owned six hundred acres of land under cultivation and eight hundred acres of pasture, and held stock in various enterprises, so that he ranks as one of the foremost men in the business enterprises of this section of the state. In 1900 Mr. Terrell took stock in the Deport Cotton Oil Company, and has since been its manager. The disastrous cyclone of a few years ago demolished the mill and Mr. Terrell's home was crushed over his head, and himself and wife seriously injured. This disaster made it necessary to close up the business of the oil mill company, but the property was purchased by a few citizens and the plant rebuilt and it has since existed as a vigorous industry in Deport. For several years Mr. Terrell was engaged in merchandising as one of the firm of the Deport Dry Goods Company. He is now a stockholder of the First National Bank, and its vice president, and was the first president of this important financial institution.

On January 5, 1867, Mr. Terrell married Miss Frances F. Patterson. Mrs. Terrell was born in Alabama, July 3, 1843, and was a daughter of George McD. Patterson, who was of Scotch stock and who moved from Alabama to Texas in 1866. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Terrell are John J., of Paris, Texas, who married Miss Aileen Flew-hart; Ida, who is the wife of W. P. L. Duncan of Paris; Mary, who married V. C. Oliver, a farmer and merchant of Deport; Catherine, wife of Charles Harvey of Honey Grove, Texas; Joel F., of Seattle, Washington; Blanche, who married Ernest Pool and is a resident of Fort Worth; Noel, who married Catherine Teague and Martha Frances, the widow of W. W. Nobles, who was a partner in the leading mercantile house of Nobles-Read Dry Goods Company of Deport.

Mr. Terrell has never taken any active part in party politics, but is a loyal Democrat, and fraternally is a chapter Mason.

HON. JOHN W. MINTON. A well known citizen of Sabine county, and a member of the Hemphill bar since 1906, Mr. Minton represents a family or rather a group of families whose lives and activities have been centered about the old town of Geneva in the northern portion of Sabine county since pioneer times.

John W. Minton was born at Geneva, in Sabine county, December 31, 1875. His parents, W. H. and Lucena (Maddox) Minton, are both living at Geneva. His father has served as county commissioner of Sabine county, and has always been a man of influence in his community. He was born in Shelby county, Tennessee, and in 1858 came to Texas with his father, William Minton, settling in the northern portion of Sabine county, in the neighborhood where the family residence has ever since been. W. H. Minton, through his mother, was a nephew of Rev. John C. Woolam, a noted Methodist minister of the early days in Texas, who for some time served as chaplain of the State Penitentiary at Rusk. Mrs. Woolam, his wife, has been twice married to notable characters. Her first husband was John J. Porter, an Arctic explorer, one of the very first to attempt to penetrate the icy barrier between the temperate zone and the North pole. He made a voyage in 1824. Later he and his wife came to Texas in 1836, the year of the revolution, and settled in Sabine county. After the death of John J. Porter, his wife married Rev. Littleton Fowler, a pioneer Methodist minister, who is buried in Sabine county, and concerning whom much has been said in the history of Methodism in Texas. Mrs. Woolam was herself one of the noted pioneer women of East Texas. Mrs. Lucena (Maddox) Minton is a daughter of J. J. Maddox, who was born in the neighborhood of Anniston, Alabama, and came to Texas in the early forties. He served throughout the war between the states, as a lieutenant of his company, and practically all his campaigning and fighting was done in Texas. On her mother's side, Mrs. Lucena Minton is a granddaughter of Lawson Reeves, another Texas pioneer, who was born in Georgia, lived in Alabama, and from that state moved to Texas in 1838, locating in Sabine county. The old town of Geneva, about which so many of the associations of the Mintons center, is one of the oldest settlements in Texas. There was a little colony there during the Spanish days, and the village is built of land contained within a grant of four leagues, granted in 1797 to Juan Ignacio Pifirno.

John W. Minton received his education in the local schools of Geneva, and was liberally trained in the literary and art departments of the University of Texas. For eight years during his younger career he engaged in teaching school in Sabine county. In 1906 he graduated as an LL. B. from the law department of the University of Texas, and since that time has practiced with unusual success at Hemphill, the county seat of Sabine county. For about a year previous to his taking up active law practice he had served as deputy sheriff, during 1901. In June, 1910, he was elected to fill an unexpired term in the Thirty-First Legislature, and in November of the same year was elected to the full term of the Thirty-Second session. He acquitted himself well in both sessions, and made his influence felt for beneficent legislation, both on the floor of the house and in the committee rooms.

Mr. Minton was married at his old home town of Geneva, to Miss Florence Dean, who was born at Geneva. They are the parents of five children: Tenny D., John Henry, Marguerite, Hugh and Morris Sheppard. Mr. Minton is prominent in the Baptist church, being a deacon, and has membership in several fraternal orders.

BRAINARD J. LINDSAY. Now in the general insurance business at Denison, Mr. Lindsay has spent practically all his life in Grayson county, and for many years his name has been associated with various phases of Denison's commercial activities. He is a successful man who has created his own prosperity, from comparatively humble beginnings, and at the same time has never been selfish or lacking in public spirit, having served his community and being always ready to promote movements for the good of the locality.

Born August 10, 1866, at Sherman, Texas, he is a son of George F. and Sarah (Smith) Lindsay. His father, who came from Missouri to Texas about 1855, being then a small child, grew up in Collins county, near Ray's Mill, learned the trade of saddle and harness maker, and about 1865 at the close of the war moved to Sherman, where he was in active business the rest of his career. At the time of the Civil war he volunteered for service in the Confederate army, under General Throckmorton, and as he was still a boy he went out as a drummer boy, and was in that service all through the struggle. His death occurred in April, 1912. His widow is still living at her home in Sherman. They had ten children, three sons and seven daughters; and Brainard J. Lindsay is the oldest.

Growing up in the city of Sherman, he enjoyed sufficient advantages at the public schools to give him a substantial foundation for his business career, and as the oldest of the family eagerly sought an opportunity to earn his own living. His first occupation was driving an express wagon in Sherman. Later he had some experience in the furniture and second-hand business at Bonham, where he lived from 1884 to 1886, and in the latter year moved to Denison. Here he continued in the second-hand trade for a year, and then undertook a larger field of enterprise, as a wholesale merchant, a line which he successfully pursued for about eighteen years. He was next in the wholesale and retail grain business for about two years, and in 1912 opened his office as a general insurance agency. Mr. Brainard Lindsay represents a company insuring for fire, plate glass, tornadoes, live stock and bonding and liability insurance.

Mr. Lindsay for four years served in the city council, and is now in his second term of school trustee. In politics a Democrat, he has for many years voted and supported the party, and is highly pleased with the present administration of national affairs. His fraternal affiliations are with the Knights of Pythias, and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and as a live business man he has his place in the Chamber of Commerce.

At Bonham on October 6, 1884, he married Miss Louisa Flitsch, a daughter of John Flitsch. Her father came from Germany to Texas many years ago and followed the trade of shoemaker. Mr. and Mrs. Lindsay have one child, now Mrs. Fay Greer, whose husband, J. Z. Greer, is manager of the Denison Daily Herald. Mr. Lindsay usually spends his vacation in travel, and also considerable time on his ranch in Colorado. His office address is at 425½ West Main street, and his home is on West Gandy street.

SAMUEL H. GRANT. Samuel H. Grant is one of the well-known and prosperous farmers of the county, located some two miles distant from the town of Deport, in the vicinity of which he has lived since 1868. He was born at a saw-mill in the northern part of Red River county in Texas, on October 4, 1860, and is the son of Stephen Grant, the first of this numerous and important family to come to Texas and identify himself with this section, an account of whose family appears elsewhere in this volume, so that further details concerning the parentage and ancestry of the subject are not required at this juncture.

The first eight years of the life of Samuel Grant were spent in the community wherein his birth occurred, three miles west of Clarksville, and since 1868 he has lived in the Deport locality. While growing up on the farm he attended the country schools and continued a member of the home family and an important factor in its maintenance until he came of age, when he launched out in life for himself. At the age of twenty-three he married and began life at his present location. Here he bought the George Barnett tract of one hundred and twenty acres, sixty-five of which were under cultivation, and with the raising of corn and cotton, the favorite crops of the East Texan, prosperity smiled broadly upon his efforts from year to year. He has sold cotton at a price as high as fifteen cents a pound, and as low as five, but the average price has been sufficient to provide a surplus for the enlarging of his farm from time to time. He has managed his affairs so as to produce annually more stock than he used on his place, and has added to his holdings until he has five hundred acres of black land in the most fertile district in the state. He has brought a large portion of his land under the plow and into a productive state, the whole giving employment to three families of tenants, who find on the Grant domain an opportunity to earn the necessities of life, and not a few of the comforts and even luxuries. Mr. Grant's own sons have been potent factors in bringing about the vast improvements that have come to pass in the home estate, aiding him in his plans for the furthering of the work and in extending the borders of the estate.

On December 26, 1883, Mr. Grant was married to Miss Bettie Bolton, the daughter of William P. Bolton and his wife. The Boltons came from North Carolina to Texas, spending some time in Tennessee on the way, and their children are Thomas Bolton, of Rosalie, Texas, Dr. Lee, of Anderson county, Texas, Miss Frances, of Rosalie, and Mrs. Grant. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Grant are as follows: Mack H., a farmer near the old home, married to Helen Jeffus, and the father of Marshall Wellington Grant; Prella C., is a farmer and stock man in the vicinity of the home place, and is married to Stella Elliot; Samuel Bertram is also following the vocation of his father, and is married to Etta Moore; they also have two unmarried sons at home, Troy and Sidney.

Mr. and Mrs. Grant are members of the Presbyterian church, active and energetic in its varied work, and Mr.

Grant is a Democrat in his political faith. They have long enjoyed the most enviable reputations in their community, where they are known for honest, hard working people, who confine their principal attention to their own affairs, and as a result have the wholesome respect and esteem of all who know them.

GEORGE W. WOLCOTT. In the cattle business of western Texas no name within the past quarter of a century has become better known than that of Wolcott, and of the different members of the Wolcott family in this industry the most prominent is George W. Wolcott, whose landed possessions, and great herds of live stock are among the prominent features of this industry in the region about Midland.

George W. Wolcott, who is a younger brother of William H. Wolcott, whose sketch is given above, was born in Alabama, December 10, 1851. The details of the family history are given in the preceding article. The family came to Smith county, Texas, in 1853, and the father died in 1860, when George W. was nine years of age. He received most of his education in the public schools of Ellis county, and later was a student in a commercial college at Dallas. After leaving school he went into the stock business in Ellis county, and soon became well known for his enterprise and successful management. He remained in Ellis county until 1883, and by that time his interests had increased to large proportions, although he had begun on a modest scale. In 1883 he moved out to Tom Green county, and continued to develop his business on a large scale and each year increasing the pasture range of his many herds. He subsequently moved his headquarters to Midland county, in which vicinity he purchased many sections of grazing lands, extending over into Martin county. He now owns and controls some of the finest pasture lands in West Texas, and his herds graze over thousands of acres in this locality.

On March 6, 1888, Mr. Wolcott married Miss Ida Herring, who was born in Texas, a daughter of Major Calvin Herring. Major Herring was a Confederate soldier who attained official title and made a brilliant record as a soldier of the South. The six children in the Wolcott family are named as follows: Frank F., who is a stock-raiser in Martin county; Juliette, a graduate of Belmont College at Nashville, Tennessee, and now at home with her parents at Midland; Edith, who is a student in Belmont College; Henry; Elsie; and Kitty Bell. The family reside in one of the most attractive homes of Midland and are well known in the social circles of this city. Mr. Wolcott himself is devoted to the interests and activities of his home, and it has been his successful ambition to provide well for his family and to give his children as much education as they desire. The family are members of the Christian church, and Mr. Wolcott is a Royal Arch Mason and a member of the Knights of Pythias. He owns a large amount of stock in the Midland National Bank, and has numerous evidences of material prosperity, as well as the high esteem which is paid to a man of influence and honor.

THOMAS H. MARBERRY. The recent widespread interest in banking and currency laws and reforms along these lines has brought to the notice of the general public the great importance of the bank in the business world of today. Many important concerns could not operate were it not for the support of some bank, and when some bank becomes involved and fails people are prone to forget the many times when the bank has come to the aid of some struggling firm and placed it on a solid foundation. It takes a man of keen business ability, both progressive and at the same time cautious, to successfully handle the affairs of a bank, and one of the most successful men of this type in Clay county, Texas, is Thomas H. Marberry, the president of the Merchant and Planter's Bank of Henrietta.

Thomas H. Marberry is the son of Thomas J. Marberry, who was born in the state of Tennessee. The latter grew up in his native state and then moved to Kentucky, where he entered the mercantile business and continued in this line of work during his entire business career. He was a member of the Methodist church and was an active Mason. When the Civil war broke out he enlisted in the Confederate army and took part in many engagements, being in active service almost continuously. He died in 1900, at the age of sixty-four, and is buried in Kentucky. He married Miss Mary Rowlett after coming to Kentucky to live, his wife being a native of this state. She was a member of the Methodist church, and her death occurred when she was but twenty-eight years of age, in 1874. She is buried in Kentucky. Five children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Marberry, of whom Thomas H. Marberry was the third child.

Until he was about nineteen years of age Thomas H. Marberry lived in Kentucky. He was born in the latter state, in Callaway county, on the 13th of April, 1870. He received his early education in the public schools of Kentucky and later entered the National Institute of Mathematics, at Madisonville, Kentucky, where he was a student for a time. When he left Kentucky he came directly to Texas, and his first position in the state was as deputy in the county clerk's office in Archer county. He remained in this position for about two years and during this time he studied law. He was admitted to the bar in 1890 and began the practice of his profession in Archer City. He remained here for twelve years, not only engaged in a large legal practice, but also prominent in various business enterprises. He organized the First National Bank at Archer City and was its president and active head for three years. Then, in 1904, he came to Henrietta, Texas, and here organized the Merchants and Planter's Bank. He was first cashier of this institution, but was later made president, and during the entire life of the bank he has been its active head. The bank does a general banking business in all its branches, and its reputation for strength and stability is largely due to the wisdom with which Mr. Marberry has invested its funds and has directed the policy of the institution.

In his religious affiliations Mr. Marberry is a member of the Methodist church. He is a member of the Commercial Club, and belongs to the Democratic party, but takes no active interest in local politics, although, like most men of important interests, he is keenly interested in national politics. His chief recreation is horseback riding, but his home and family occupy most of his spare time.

Mr. Marberry was married in Farmington, Kentucky, on the 17th of November, 1890, to Miss Oina Hendley, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Hendley of Farmington. Mr. and Mrs. Marberry have had four children, three girls and one boy, namely: Bessie, who is deceased; Ruby, Allie and Joy.

Mr. Marberry is an active member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, belonging to the Blue Lodge and to the Commandery. He is also a member of the Woodmen of the World.

JOHN L. MCGEEHEE, M. D. Dr. John L. McGehee is a Mississippian by birth, and all his life was passed in that state, with but little exception, until he came to Burkburnett, in 1907, where he took up the practice of his profession, and has since continued with excellent success.

Born in Amite county, Mississippi, on April 19, 1872, Dr. McGehee is the son of Hansford J. and Matha (Gardner) McGehee, both native Mississippians. The father, who was a farmer and miller by trade, died in his native state in 1898, aged sixty-three, and is there buried. He was a staunch Baptist and a Democrat, and he lived a life of singular uprightness and integrity. His widow, who survives him still, has spent all her days in her native state. She, too, is a Baptist, and a woman of fine character, possessing all the Christian virtues. They were the parents of six children, Dr. McGehee being the fourth child born and is now the eldest living son.

Until he was twenty-seven years of age Dr. McGehee lived in Mississippi, barring the time spent in New Orleans when in pursuit of his medical studies. He gained his early education in the public schools of his native community, following the same with a three years' course at the East Fork Academy, in Mississippi, finishing his studies there when he was twenty-one years old. It was his wish that he might study medicine, but the status of the family exchequer made it incumbent upon him to provide the means for his studies, which he proved himself wholly equal to. He took a position in a loan office in Meridian, Mississippi, and after a year's work and saving he entered Tulane University, in New Orleans, and was graduated therefrom with his medical degree in 1900. He returned to Mississippi following his graduation, but did not engage in practice there, preferring to start in a newer territory, and so came to Texas, where he located in Tazewell, and was for five years engaged there in practice. He then came to Burkburnett, in 1907, and here he has since continued in his professional activities, having in the years that have passed come to be regarded as the leading physician of the place. He is local physician for the railroad, and in the matter of public service he has been active as city health physician, as well as being now assistant county health officer. He stands well with the profession in these parts and enjoys the unqualified esteem of the best people of the community.

Dr. McGehee has been twice married. He was married first at Gloster, Mississippi, on June 2, 1897, to Miss Ruth Toler, who died in 1902 at the age of twenty-eight years, leaving one child, Pansy Matlyde. In Sulphur Springs, Texas, the Doctor was married a second time, on June 18, 1895, when Miss Ola L. Formby became his wife. She is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. N. Formby of Sulphur Springs, well known and highly estimable people of that place.

Of this later marriage there have been born four children—three girls and a boy. They are named as follows: Alleene, Louise, Edward S. and Johnnie Mae.

Dr. McGehee is a member of the Baptist church, as is his wife, and he has membership in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Woodmen of the World. He is a Democrat, but the demands of his profession are such that he devotes little attention to political affairs of the community beyond the demands of good citizenship, in which quality he is not surpassed by any.

SAMUEL A. ROBERTS. As editor, owner and publisher of the Burkburnett Star, Samuel A. Roberts took up his residence in this community on April 1, 1913, and already he has made a deal of headway in his enterprise. Long familiar with newspaper work, or one might better say identified with it since his boyhood, Mr. Roberts is thoroughly familiar with his enterprise, and in connection with the publication of his paper he carries on a general job-printing business.

Samuel A. Roberts was born in Bedford county, Tennessee, on August 4, 1888, and he is the son of Joseph G. and Adele (Arnold) Roberts, both natives of the state of Tennessee, where they married and settled in Bedford county, the father identifying himself with farming activities. He came to Texas in 1891, and died in 1905 at the early age of about forty-four years, his widow still surviving him. He was a devout Baptist and a worker in the church, as is also his widow, who now maintains her residence at Byers, in Clay county. They were the parents of nine children, and of that number the subject of this review was the second born.

Samuel Roberts was three years old when his parents moved to Texas, and he has made the state his home since that time. He was given fair educational advantages in the common schools, with a commercial school training, and at the age of seventeen he took his first position, as a bookkeeper in a general store. He worked at that for eighteen months, when he became assistant editor and reporter of the Byers Searchlight, remaining thus occupied for perhaps a year. Since then he has, with the exception of a year when he was connected with the Petrolia bank, been identified solely with newspaper business, his labors being confined to the towns of Byers, Petrolia and Burkburnett.

When he was twenty years old Mr. Roberts made his first independent business venture, when he bought the Petrolia Roundup, running the paper with fair success for about two years. Since that time numerous business ventures have held his attention, and it was in April, 1913, that he bought his present plant, the Star. This paper, a most creditable news sheet for the town, circulates widely in this part of Texas and in Oklahoma, while it goes to some extent into practically every state in the Union. The plant is equipped with modern machinery, and the job-printing department is a feature of the establishment.

Mr. Roberts is a member of the Knights of Pythias, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Woodmen of the World, and, while he has no church membership, he favors the Baptist church to some extent, though he supports all denominations in a most liberal-minded manner. A Democrat, Mr. Roberts is active in the political activities of the county, and, altogether, is known for one of the enterprising young men of the community.

THOMAS VARDEMAN WOODRUFF. The only son of Judge Woodruff, and now one of the leading members of the Nolan county bar, Thomas Vardeman Woodruff was born in Anson, Jones county, Texas, June 3, 1887. As a boy he was reared in what is known as west central Texas, and attended the public schools, graduating from the high school at Abilene. He then entered the state university at Austin, and after a course of study there at the age of twenty-two took the bar examinations and was admitted to practice in August, 1910. He then joined his father, Judge Woodruff, at Sweetwater, where he is successfully engaged in practice, and has attained distinction on his own account. He is associated with J. McAllister Stevenson in title examination and abstract work, and in this line the firm, known as the Nolan County Abstract Company, has practically a monopoly of the business in this section, and has given a perfection of service for all its patrons. Mr. Woodruff is a Democrat in politics and fraternally is affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Knights of Pythias and with a Greek Letter fraternity of the Chi Phi.

THOMAS PEYTON STEGER is one of the leading members of the legal profession at Bonham, to which point he came in 1889 from Memphis, Tennessee. He was born near that city, in Fayette county, March 15, 1852, and is of German blood. His father, Edward Harris Steger, was born in Pittsylvania county, Virginia, in 1809, was educated there, and migrated to Tennessee about 1830, taught school there, while getting his bearings for a business career, was connected as a contractor with the construction of the Memphis & Charleston Railway, and settled down to the life of a farmer forty miles east of Memphis several years before the Rebellion. He became a strong character among the forces for advancement, was thrifty, educated his children, and contributed through his family to the success of the Confederate arms during the struggle between the North and South. Through his sons, also, his family has been actively identified with the politics of Tennessee, one of them having served in the Legislature as a Democrat of the Carmack following and aided in the election of Governor Hooper, while another son was sheriff of Fayette county, subsequently came to Texas, and is now a business man of Bonham.

Edward Harris Steger was a son of Peyton Steger, born in Virginia, where his father, Gen. John Steger, settled with his English wife before the War of the Revolution. Gen. Steger was a German soldier, married an English woman through whom he acquired title, or a grant, of land on the James river, at what was called Parrot's Nest, and he settled upon it and spent several years there. He had a number of children, among them Peyton, John and Edward Harris. Peyton was the grandfather of Thomas Peyton Steger, of Bonham, Texas, and when he abandoned the parental home he moved to Alabama and settled near Huntsville, where he finally passed away. Peyton Steger married Frances Jefferson, a daughter of John Jefferson, brother of Thomas Jefferson, the Sage of Monticello, and the third president of the United States. Of their union the children were: John Jefferson, who was highly educated by his father, became a teacher and educator, was a member of the State Legislature of Mississippi, and lived and died as one of that State's scholarly citizens, having founded Marshall Institute, in Marshall City, Mississippi; Edward Harris, who died on his farm near Moscow, Tennessee, in 1888; Elizabeth, who married a Mr. Hill, came to Texas during the frontier period, and lived and died in Caldwell county; Katherine, who became the wife of Thomas Stratton, who died many years ago, leaving a large family, and Frances, who married Dr. Joseph E. Douglas, a Methodist preacher, and resided in Marshall county, Mississippi, where her husband assisted in founding Marshall Institute.

Edward Harris Steger married Miss Virginia Allen, a daughter of Darling Allen, a thrifty planter of Virginia. She survived her husband until 1891, when she passed away in the locality in which she had resided almost from her bridal days. Their children were: Elizabeth, who married Dr. John S. Hill, a Confederate soldier and who died, a martyr to duty, having fallen a victim of yellow fever, at Moscow, Tennessee, after having nursed as a physician hundreds of cases, and his widow is buried at Paris, Texas; Frances, who became the wife of Dr. R. L. Knox, and died at Memphis, Tennessee; John Jefferson, who is the successor of his father upon the Tennessee family homestead; Robert E., ex-sheriff of Fayette county, Tennessee; William Allen, who died at Bonham, Texas, in 1896; Thomas P., whose name introduces this sketch; Gus F., who is president of the Steger Lumber Company, of Bonham, Texas, and manager of the Steger Milling Company; Edward Darling, a member of the Bonham bar, who gave up his profession and engaged in business and politics, stumped Texas in 1887 with Jo Bailey, in support of state-wide prohibition, became an admirer and friend of the young statesman made common cause with him in all of his subsequent political battles and victories, and sat in the councils of the leaders of Texas Democracy for many years, subsequently demonstrated his success as a financier, built the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railway, became its president, sold it to the M. K. & T. Railway Company, of which he is a director, is one of the large land owners of Fannin county, and has become extensively interested in industrial and financial concerns in this county; and Virginus, the youngest member of the family, is a merchant of Bonham and manager of the Steger Opera House.

Thomas Peyton Steger obtained his education in private schools of Tennessee and Mississippi and through the aid of his sister Frances, in the parental home. His earliest and youthful efforts were given to the plantation which brought him up from childhood, and he chose telegraphy and railroad work when he reached years of responsibility. He learned the telegraph code at Moscow, his home town, with the old Memphis & Charleston Railroad, afterwards entering the service of the Mobile & Ohio Railway Company, had positions at Macon, Tupelo, Meridian and Baldwin, Mississippi. At Tupelo he read law in the office of "Private" John Allen, who later became a member of Congress from Mississippi, and was admitted to the bar there in 1873. He continued his service as an operator and ultimately reached Memphis as day operator and day manager of the Associated Press office of the Western Union Telegraph Company. He was engaged in that work from 1883 to 1889, and when he left the "key," he began a career in Texas and took up the practice of law.

Mr. Steger's career as a lawyer covers a period of a quarter of a century, an era prolific and fruitful of litigation in the State and Federal courts, and during almost a third of this he was associated with P. C. Thurmond in practice. Among the first cases with which he became connected as counsel was one of the famous law suits of Fannin county and it dragged over a period of many years and was transferred to Grayson county upon a change of venue before the case ran its course. The case above referred to arose by reason of the death of Col. Thomas C. Bean, one of the most eccentric characters as well as one of the most mysterious citizens ever connected with human affairs. Mr. Steger was appointed by the judge of the district court as one of the attorneys for the unknown heirs of Col. Bean's vast estate. The Colonel had died intestate, and Mr. Steger was associated with his brother, Edward D. Steger, in the case from the filing of the first papers until the verdict of the last jury.

This case attracted so much notoriety that some history of Col. Bean will, no doubt, be of interest at this point. The Colonel was one of the oldest lawyers and oldest surveyors in Texas. He is believed to have been born at Palmyra, Missouri, about 1818, and was a young man of about twenty-seven years when he accompanied his father, Colmore Bean, to Fannin county. They came here directly from Fayetteville, Arkansas, and cabined themselves about, eking out an existence by raising a few head of live stock and by the earnings of the son as a surveyor. Where the young man was educated is a matter unknown, but he was acquainted with logarithms, latitude and departure, and such other features of higher mathematics as are required to do efficient work in his line. He was a man of mystery from the beginning, but as age crept upon him he grew more reticent about himself and finally reached a point where he resented mildly any attempt of his few friends to gain information about himself or his affairs.

Upon current subjects, Col. Bean was sociable and companionable with those who chanced to attract him and seems to have offered no offensive speech except when the privacy of his life was threatened with invasion. His services as a surveyor were in demand, and he took land at twenty-five cents per acre in settlement for his fees for his work. During his life he gathered together many thousands of acres which he refused to put to his own use, to lease or to sell. When approached by those wishing to lease land from him, he generally used his famous expression: "Damn a rat! The poor folks need the pasture." He wished to accumulate nothing but land and was frequently hard pressed for money to pay his taxes and to provide for the few wants of his body. He wore the same plug hat for twenty-five years, always carried an umbrella, and wore a long, black, sleek coat that served for him from the vigor of manhood until his death. He made his home in a cabin about fourteen feet square, back of which lived some of his old slaves, and they ministered to him during the lonely hours of his last existence, and when he died, in 1887, the book of his life was closed and sealed and the struggle for his estate began.

With the legal announcement of his death, some fifty claimants appeared for his estate. Some came with records purported to show blood relationship and others brought wills as evidence of their interest in the estate. At the threat of prosecution for perjury by the attorneys for the estate, the wills all wilted and the court began to grind upon the claims of the others. It was finally decided by the claimants to go to trial with the plaintiff having the strongest case. The robbery was so apparent to the populace of Fannin county that the claimants believed such prejudice as to warrant a change of venue existed and the court removed the case to Sherman for trial. There, after some seven or eight years from the death of Col. Bean, and after one hung jury, his vast estate was handed over to supposed relatives, assignees of claimants, and lawyers, as flesh to wolves, and one of the historic suits at law in north Texas came to an unholy end.

Thomas P. Steger has maintained himself a Democrat, and his personal activity has been given in behalf of his friends. He managed the congressional campaign for the Hon. Sam Rayburn for the nomination in 1912, and won a plurality of 600 votes in a race having eight entries. He is a director of the Steger Lumber Company and its attorney. On January 1, 1873, Mr. Steger was married at Baldwin, Massachusetts, to Miss Alice Scales, the only daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Pleasant A. Scales. Mrs. Scales was formerly Harriet Clayton, and Mrs. Steger was reared under most favorable educational and social environment. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Steger were: Elizabeth, who is the wife of Robert S. Rodgers, of Bonham, and Harry Peyton, who married Miss Dorothy McCormick, who came to this country when eight years of age, from Dublin, Ireland, and now resides in Freeport, Long Island, New York. In the untimely death of Harry Peyton Steger, which occurred January 5, 1912, in New York City, the American world of letters suffered a loss that will be felt long and poignantly. With his never failing enthusiasm and his cheerful kindness, Mr. Steger had made a host of friends throughout the country, to whom he was a constant inspiration. As literary advisor of Doubleday, Page & Company, and editor of Short Stories, his activities in the publishing world brought him into close contact with every phase of the life, and to everyone—authors, statesmen, scholars, journalists, editors, publishers and a host of others with whom he came into contact—he was a marvel of energy, an inexhaustible well of enthusiasm and a never failing encouragement.

Mr. Steger had packed into his thirty short years enough incidents to fill several times over the span allotted him. He was born March 2, 1882, at Moscow, Tennessee, near Memphis, to which city his family soon removed. As Mr. Steger himself expressed it one time, he "fed squirrels in Court Square, for seven years, and then moved to Bonham, Texas." He attended private and public schools and was graduated in 1897, delivering as his final high school address, "Character vs. Reputation." Mr. Steger told his friends that he entered the University of Texas in 1897, "having donned long trousers especially for that event." As a matter of fact, as he was only fifteen years old, a special permit had to be obtained for a boy so young to enter the University. At the University of Texas, Mr. Steger was president of the Sophomore class, business manager of the University magazine, editor of the University newspaper, editor-in-chief of the University annual, The Cactus, Key Orator, member of the Phi Delta Theta, the Theta Nu Upsilon, and the Goo Roos. He was a fellow in Greek and Latin, and was graduated with a M. A. Degree for a Metrical translation of Aristophanes' Greek Comedy, "The Wasps." On account of his high scholarship, he was elected to the Phi Beta Kappa.

Mr. Steger taught Greek and Latin in the Mineola

(Texas) high school for one year, and later was instructor of Latin in the Bonham high school, after which he went to Johns Hopkins University to study Sanskrit, having passed the examination for the Rhodes Scholarship. While in Baltimore, he received word that the scholarship, beginning in 1905, had been awarded him. He immediately took passage for Europe, entering the Balliol College, Oxford. There he became president of the Arnold Literary Society, and contributed to the Oxford periodicals. During this time he traveled extensively over the continent. Mr. Steger did considerable free lance work on the strength of his sociological investigations. He lived for a season in Toynbee Hall, a Whitechapel settlement in the London slums, serving the London Relief Committee as a parochial visitor. It was a bitter winter, thousands of men were out of employment, and the young student saw something of the grinding of the "wheel", where it grinds most cruelly. Articles describing his observations in the London slums were published in English, German and American magazines. Then he undertook a new experiment in sociological studies. He wanted to know something about life from the tramp's point of view. Accordingly, he became a tramp. He walked 250 miles, going from Queensboro to London, with no means of resources of any kind, except the resource of his own personality. He was dependent on back-door hand-outs for his food, and slept in the Parks or under hay lofts or in rural barns, spending not a cent for anything during the entire "tramp." He realized some financial gain from his experiment, in addition to the experience, for he wrote a series of articles for magazines, narrating the personal adventures of a hobo.

When he had played these varied parts in life, his thoughts turned homeward and he was eager for America. He had been Oxford scholar, German newspaper man and lecturer, London reporter and special correspondent, poor relief worker in the London slums and tramp! He would not lose the opportunity to continue his studies of the under-crust even on the voyage home and took steerage passage for Quebec.

"Then," said Steger, in telling this part of his life to a friend, "I scrambled to New York and shaved at once." For a time while staying in Germany, Mr. Steger had written for the Koetner Zeitung, of Cologne, Germany, and again lectured before an organization of business men in Bonnam Rhein, on "Texas Niggers and Cotton." After leaving Oxford, he began journalism in earnest and became connected with the London Express. During this time he did considerable independent writing, and was sent to Monte Carlo by the newspaper, "where," said Steger once to a friend, "I got arrested by the Italian Army, or most of it, for constructing a wind whistle on a rock in the Mediterranean."

Soon after returning to this country, Mr. Steger became connected with Doubleday, Page & Company, in the service of which house the balance of his years were spent. Perhaps the part of his work for which Mr. Steger was best known was the position of literary editor of O. Henry. A friend and advisor of the late Sidney Porter in life, Mr. Steger became administrator of his estate when that famous short story writer died. Almost the last work that he did was the gathering together and editing the twelfth and last O. Henry volume, "Rolling Stones," which was published only a fortnight before Mr. Steger's death. He had gathered the material from all the sources, having gone to Texas and North Carolina for most of it, and having interviewed every person who he thought it likely could give him any information of O. Henry's early life and writings. It had been Mr. Steger's intention to write a biography of Sidney Porter within a few years.

COL. STEPHEN W. BLOUNT. At Washington on the Brazos on the 2d of March, 1836, Stephen W. Blount, who had settled at San Augustine in the preceding year and had been elected a delegate to the convention, stood up and proposed the motion for the adoption of the Texas Declaration of Independence. In the subsequent proceedings of that body he was one of the signers of the immortal document, and for several years prior to his death, in 1890, he enjoyed the unique distinction of being the last surviving signer of the Texas Declaration of Independence.

Colonel Blount was in many respects a most remarkable man. His forebears for generations had in their times been men of prominence and influence in different localities, and in his family of sons Colonel Blount left men who have conferred additional honor upon the name.

Stephen W. Blount was born in Burke county, Georgia, in 1808. The progenitor of the Blount family, William Blount, came from Normandy with William the Conqueror, and his descendants, adherents of Charles I, were driven from England by Cromwell and settled in the American colony. The grandfather of the late Colonel Blount was Gen. Stephen Blount, a revolutionary soldier in the Continental line, who was wounded in the battle at Eutaw Springs, and in the siege of Savannah lost his leg. He was made customs collector at Savannah by President Washington during the latter's second administration. The Blount family has given other notable characters to American history, including Congressman Blount of Georgia, Governor Blount of Tennessee (who also was United States Senator from that state), and others. When Colonel Blount was a young man he served as sheriff in Burke county, Georgia. In 1835, while on a visit to Montgomery, Alabama, he made the acquaintance of Archibald Hotchkiss, one of the Texas impresarios, who gave Blount such a glowing prediction of the future of Texas that his auditor decided to make the journey across the Sabine with Hotchkiss. He arrived at San Augustine in the autumn of 1835 and continued thereafter to make that town his home until his death. Soon after locating at San Augustine came his election as a delegate to the convention at Washington on the Brazos, and there he was prominent in the proceedings of that body of delegates. While returning from Washington to San Augustine, he met Ratcliffe's company, which he joined on its way to the battle of San Jacinto. Only those of this company who had good horses were enabled to reach San Jacinto in time for the battle, and Colonel Blount had the honor of being among those Texas patriots who stood on the banks of Buffalo Bayou until the arrival of Santa Anna's army, and then marched forth to give them battle, resulting in a complete victory for the American forces.

From the winning of Texas independence up to the war between the states, Colonel Blount was a planter at San Augustine. During his young career in Georgia he had served as colonel on the staff of Governor Schley of that state, and thus gained the title by which he was always known. At San Augustine he served as postmaster from 1846 to 1849. He was a delegate to the State Democratic Convention of 1850 at Waco.

Colonel Blount was the first county clerk of San Augustine county after its organization. He was one of the charter members of Redland Lodge, No. 3, A. F. & A. M., at San Augustine. In 1876 he was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention at Cincinnati, and was always prominent in public affairs. During the war between the states he served as a fiscal agent for the Confederate government, and after the war and up to the time of his death he was a merchant at San Augustine. His home, which he built in 1837, still stands in good condition and is now owned by his sons. He attended many conventions and public gatherings and during his later years, as the last surviving signer of the declaration of independence, always attracted much attention and was made much of.

Thos W. Blount.

Yours Truly
E. A. Blom

S. W. P. Hunt

Colonel Blount married Mary Landon, who was born in Vermont and at the age of twenty, in 1835, came to San Augustine, her people being earlier settlers there than the Blounts. Mrs. Blount died in 1892. Colonel Blount reared a fine family of six children, all of whom are still living. They are: Capt. T. W. Blount, of San Augustine; E. A. Blount and S. W. Blount, of Nacogdoches; Mrs. Jennie B. Holmes, of Waco; Mrs. Mary Thomas, of Washington, District of Columbia, and Mrs. Emma B. Shindler, of Dahart, Texas.

CAPTAIN THOMAS W. BLOUNT. Bearing an old and distinguished name in East Texas, Captain Blount has himself well performed the responsibility and creditably lived up to the expectations of his family history. During the war between the states he earned distinction as a Texas soldier and officer. He was admitted to the bar, but never practiced, and during all the years since the war has been prominent as a planter in San Augustine county. He has been honored with various offices in the gift of his fellow citizens, and it may be said without any exaggeration that Captain Blount is now as he has been for many years one of the most highly esteemed men of the state of Texas and a worthy representative of its history. Capt. Thomas W. Blount is a son of the late Col. Stephen W. Blount and his wife, Mary (Landon) Blount. The career of Colonel Blount, who was a member of that notable group of Texans who signed the declaration of independence in 1836, is given in detail on other pages of this history. Captain Blount is in every respect except one a native son and Texan in all his character and training. He should have been a native of San Augustine, but at the time of his birth, in 1839, his parents were on a visit at Talladega, Alabama, so that Alabama is his native state, although from infancy he has lived in Texas.

Captain Blount was reared at San Augustine and for his early education was sent to Kentucky Military Institute at Lexington, where he was graduated in the class of 1857. Taking up the study of law, he was admitted to the bar after the war, but never practiced, preferring plantation life. During the Civil war Captain Blount well won his title and made a record of distinction as a soldier. Before the actual hostilities began he was commissioned in the latter part of March, 1861, as a lieutenant by President Davis, and was sent to Pensacola, Florida, where he was assigned as instructor of volunteers in artillery practice. His training in military schools stood him in good stead. When the bombardment of Pensacola took place he was by order of General Bragg placed in command of two batteries. On this and on two subsequent occasions during his war service he was reported to commander officers for distinguished and meritorious conduct. At Pensacola he was assigned to duty as a member of the staff of General Gladden. Later he was made chief of staff under General Villepigue, and as such took part in the battle at Fort Pillow, above Memphis, on the Mississippi River, where for bravery in action he was promoted to captain of artillery on the recommendation of General Villepigue. Later he was with General Allen in the battle of Baton Rouge and was complimented for gallant and meritorious conduct, and still later took part in the battle of Port Hudson. Upon the surrender of Port Hudson he was carried a prisoner to Johnson's Island, where he was detained until the close of the war.

After the war in 1866, Captain Blount was elected to the legislature during the Throckmorton administration, and had an important part in the reconstruction era in Texas. As soon as settled conditions had been brought about, he engaged in planting, and that is still his regular vocation, although on account of rheumatism he was compelled to retire from active charge of his estate in 1910, and since that time has had his home in the town of San Augustine. With the exception of this minor affliction, he is still in the best of health and spirits, and is one of the well preserved veterans whose record both in war and peace has been one of great honor. Captain Blount owns a fine farm three miles from San Augustine. Like his father, he has always had a reputation of being a first class plantation manager, and his place shows the best of care and has been brought to a high state of productiveness. Some years ago, out of his generous accumulations, he gave a thousand acres of land to his children. He has always lived a life of strictest honor and integrity, true to the traditions of the Blount family. The wife of Captain Blount is now deceased. Before her marriage she was Miss Mary Rather, a native of Shelby county, Texas, and a daughter of Dr. Rather. Captain Blount has four children: Captain Frank Blount, of San Augustine; Dr. Stephen L. Blount, of Fort Worth; Thomas W. Blount and Miss Emma Blount, of San Augustine. Captain Blount has a membership in the old Redland Lodge, No. 3, A. F. & A. M., at San Augustine, and is also a Royal Arch Mason.

EDWARD A. BLOUNT. While one of the sons of the late Col. Stephen W. Blount turned his attention to farming and planting, another to the law, Edward A. Blount has been throughout his entire active career strictly a business man, and is undoubtedly one of the most successful and enterprising in East Texas. For the past nineteen years his home has been at Nacogdoches, where he has been known as a banker, and connection with extensive interests especially in lumbering. While he has devoted himself to the rigid routine of business, Mr. Blount has seldom exacted the same rigid requirements from others which he has accepted for himself. He has been generous, not only as a public spirited citizen, but also through his liberal relationships with many less successful men, and by free extension of credit has assisted many deserving men to buy homes and farms and establish themselves as prosperous and industrious citizens in different sections of East Texas.

Edward A. Blount was born at San Augustine, in the old homestead, in 1849, a son of Col. Stephen W. and Mary (Landon) Blount. Concerning his distinguished father a sketch appears on preceding pages.

Edward A. Blount manifested his tendency and inclinations for business early in life and has been very busy, and up to the present time gives active personal supervision to his large and important financial and industrial enterprises. He was educated in the Kentucky Military Institute at Frankfort, Kentucky, where he graduated at the end of his third year, having crowded four years' work into three and standing at the head of his class each year. He remained at Frankfort the entire three years of his schooling without coming home for a vacation. This exhibition of energy and industry is the chief characteristic of all his subsequent business career. He grew up in the mercantile business at San Augustine, associated with his father, and carried the enterprise on after the latter's death. About 1894 Mr. Blount moved to Nacogdoches and bought a controlling interest in the Commercial National Bank, of which he became president. In the early part of 1911 he changed this bank to the Guaranty State Bank, of which he is president and manager and principal owner. Mr. Blount is widely known among financiers as one of the most successful bankers in Texas. He is also largely interested in other affairs in East Texas, especially the lumber industry. He is president of the Blount-Decker Lumber Company at Alto, also president of the Blount-Summers Lumber Company at LaTexo. He has accumulated a large fortune through his own capacity and effort.

STEPHEN W. BLOUNT. A son of the late Colonel Blount and a worthy bearer of his name, Stephen W. Blount has since 1876 practiced law and for many years has had foremost rank in the bar of East Texas. For the past fifteen years his home and center of practice has been at Nacogdoches.

Stephen W. Blount was born at San Augustine, Texas, in 1854, a son of Col. Stephen W. and Mary (Landon) Blount. Reared at the old homestead in San Augustine, he continued his education beyond local schools, first at the Kentucky Military Institute at Lexington, then in the University of Virginia, and studied law in the law department of Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tennessee. He graduated LL. B. at Cumberland in 1876. Returning to Texas and being admitted to the bar, he established himself in practice at San Augustine, where he remained until 1898, in which year he moved to Nacogdoches. Advancing years have brought advancing and increasing prominence and success in his profession, and few members of the bar of East Texas equal in prominence and success in the law Stephen W. Blount. Mr. Blount served as a member of the Texas legislature during the sessions of 1883 and 1885.

Mr. Blount has a fine home and family at Nacogdoches. He married Miss Mary Price, a daughter of Lieut. B. F. Price, of Benton's Company, Hood's Brigade, in service throughout the war. Mrs. Blount is a granddaughter of William Garrett of Tennessee, who was one of the first American settlers of San Augustine county, having located there in 1828. To Mr. Blount and wife have been born ten children, all of whom they reared and are all still living.

SOUTHWESTERN TELEGRAPH & TELEPHONE COMPANY. As an agency that has had powerful influence in furthering industrial and commercial progress in the Lone Star state, this strong and ably managed corporation is consistently made the subject of specific mention in this publication.

The telephone business in Texas had its inception through the medium of the Western Union Telegraph Company, operating under the Edison patents. Exchanges were installed in the cities of Galveston and Houston, the former by David Hall and the latter by James W. Stacey, who were managers for the Western Union in the respective cities in 1879. Arthur B. Homer, a representative merchant of Galveston, was probably the first to exploit the Bell telephone system in Texas, but by reason of certain misunderstanding with the parent company, in the city of Boston, Massachusetts, he withdrew from this field of enterprise without building any exchanges. By the close of the year 1879 the differences between the owners of the Bell telephone patents and the Western Union Telegraph Company had been adjusted and the latter corporation then withdrew entirely from the telephone field.

At the beginning of the year 1880 the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company was organized, at Little Rock, Arkansas, by Logan H. Roots, Edward C. Newton, P. K. Roots, and W. P. Davidson. Shortly after the incorporation of the company Jasper N. Keller became one of its interested principals and its field of operations was expanded to cover the state of Texas. Under Mr. Keller's effective management the new company purchased and assumed control of the Western Union exchanges at Galveston and Houston and immediately instituted the construction of exchanges in all of the important cities of the state, besides making provision for the building of toll lines between exchanges, wherever such expansion seemed to promise a profitable business. The exchange in the city of Dallas was opened for business on the 1st of June, 1881, and within the same period exchanges were installed at San Antonio and Austin. During the year 1882 development of substantial order was made, by the establishing of exchanges at Brownsville, Brenham, Cleburne, Colorado, Corsicana, Gainesville, Greenville, Jefferson, Marshall, Paris, Palestine, Sherman, Denison and Texarkana.

In the spring of 1883 the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company's holdings were sold to a syndicate organized at Lowell Massachusetts, and among the leading members of the new corporation were William A. Ingram, Charles J. Glidden, and Loren N. Downs. A reorganization of the original company was immediately effected, and James K. Dunbar, of San Antonio, was made general superintendent, with headquarters temporarily established at Little Rock, Arkansas. The territory was separated into operating divisions and superintendents were appointed with headquarters in the cities of Dallas and Austin. On the 31st of August, 1883, the respective number of subscribers listed at the various exchanges in Texas was as here noted: Austin, 125; Brownsville, 60; Brenham, 97; Cleburne, 42; Colorado, 57; Corsicana, 71; Dallas, 259; Fort Worth, 168; Gainesville, 68; Galveston, 330; Greenville, 38; Houston, 148; Jefferson, 44; Marshall, 56; Paris, 87; Palestine, 42; Sherman, 114; Denison, 75; San Antonio, 323; Texarkana, 52; and Waco, 87.

When the Lowell syndicate had effected the reorganization of the operating force of the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company, the name of the same was changed to the Erie Telegraph & Telephone Company, but the original title was restored a few years later.

During the years 1884 and 1885 the following was the personnel of the executive corps of the Erie Telegraph & Telephone Company: Southwestern division,—William A. Ingram, president; Charles J. Glidden, secretary; and Loren N. Downs, general manager, all of these officials being residents of Lowell, Massachusetts. John K. Dunbar was general superintendent, with headquarters at Austin, Texas; Earle K. Baker, superintendent of the First district, with headquarters in the city of Dallas; and Thomas W. Milburn, superintendent of the Second division, with headquarters at San Antonio. Within the year 1885 James W. Bennett became president of the company, at Lowell, Massachusetts; J. P. McKinstry, general manager at Cleveland, Ohio; and Joseph E. Farnsworth was appointed auditor at Austin, Texas. During the period from 1884 to 1886 the officials of the company gave their attention principally to the development of the local-exchange business. The construction of long-distance lines was not pushed to any great extent, by reason of the fact that such service was at that time unsatisfactory over a distance beyond fifty or seventy-five miles. In 1886 the official roster of the company was as here noted: Levi Sprague, president; Charles J. Glidden, treasurer; J. E. Farnsworth, general auditor; J. P. McKinstry, general manager; J. K. Dunbar, general superintendent; E. K. Baker, superintendent First district, at Dallas, Texas; and G. W. Foster, superintendent of Second district, at Galveston.

At this time an added impetus was given to long-distance service by the invention of the bridging bell and the granulated-carbon electrodes for long-distance transmitters. In 1890 the two Texas divisions of the company were permanently separated and the heads of the divisions reported direct to the general manager at Cleveland, Ohio. At this time E. K. Baker was transferred to Galveston and G. W. Foster to Dallas. Arthur F. Adams was in charge of the Arkansas division, at Little Rock. On the 31st of December, 1891, the principal exchanges in Texas listed their respective numbers of subscribers as follows: Austin, 314; Galveston, 608; Houston, 397; San Antonio, 603; Waco, 252; Dallas, 536; Fort Worth, 355; and Paris, 136.

The rebuilding of all of the important toll lines in Texas was initiated in 1893, and from that time onward all toll-line construction was of the very best order, and this doubtless aided greatly in the development of the local telephone business throughout the state. However, up to 1898, there were somewhat less than ten thousand subscribers' stations in Texas. Since that time the growth has been phenomenal, and at the time of this writing, in 1913, there are upward of one hundred and seventy-five thousand subscribers' stations in Texas.

On the 1st of June, 1896, J. E. Farnsworth became general superintendent of the North Texas division, G. W. Foster having assumed a position with the Postal Telegraph Cable Company in Texas. On the 1st of June, 1899, H. J. Pettengill was elected vice-president of the company, with headquarters in the city of Boston, Massachusetts, and on the 8th of January, 1900, C. A. Gates came from Michigan to Texas to assume charge as superintendent of the long-distance service. Since 1909 many changes have taken place in the personnel of the official corps of the company, and at the opening of the year 1913 the executive officers are as here noted: Heman J. Pettengill, president; E. D. Nims, first vice president; Edgar S. Bloom, second vice president; Joseph E. Farnsworth, vice president; Charles A. Gates, general manager; Frederick E. Bedlow, division auditor; W. R. Faught, assistant treasurer; A. P. Wozencraft, general attorney; W. S. Bramlitt, D. A. Frank, and S. P. English, assistant general attorneys; P. K. Baker, general commercial superintendent; F. W. Yensen, general superintendent of traffic; and A. B. Elias, general superintendent of plant.

JUDGE THOMAS B. BUTLER is president of the Guaranty State Bank of Tyler, a successful business man and a retired member of the bar of Smith county. He is one of the few self-made men of modern times whose life has been devoted to affairs wholly within his county, and he has demonstrated a many-sidedness in business and professional channels that marks his peculiarly successful career. A native of Smith county, his life is an open book to the people in this section of the state, and few there are more worthy of the generous measure of esteem and confidence that is bestowed upon Judge Butler.

Born in the Starville community of Smith county, eleven miles east of Tyler, the birth of Thomas Booker Butler occurred on January 14, 1867. His pioneer ancestor settled there about 1855, coming from Chambers county, Alabama, and the resultant posterity has spread the name of Butler well over the face of East Texas. James Wiley Butler is the father of Judge Butler, and he was for many years Deputy United States Clerk of the Tyler district. He was the son of William Booker Butler, who passed his life as a farmer, and who died in the Starville neighborhood where he had established his family.

The family is a most interesting one to contemplate from a biographical standpoint, and some few details concerning the ancestry of the subject are not amiss at this juncture. William Booker Butler was born in Georgia, and came of ancestry, who, it is believed, settled in that commonwealth from the state of Virginia. He was the son of Samuel Butler, and was born in 1799. His education was of the rural type, and while yet in his twenties he married Elizabeth Downs. He died in 1872, his widow surviving him until about 1880. She was six years his junior and with him was a member of the Baptist church. During the Civil war period William B. Butler avowed his allegiance to the Union and advocated the settlement of the political differences under the flag, and for these utterances his life was threatened and his influence in his community undermined. His early political allegiance was with the Whigs, and when that organization disappeared he took an independent stand rather than follow in the wake of the party whose leaders had conspired previously against his life. Although regarded as an enemy of the South during the Rebellion, it is a fact that few avowed secessionists furnished more sons and better soldiers in support of the Confederate cause than did he.

The issue of James Booker and Elizabeth (Downs) Butler were as follows: Mary, who married three husbands and by them reared children, namely: Elias Ivey;

Dr. James Wilcoxon; and John A. Powell. Jesse S. Butler served in General Walker's division of the Trans-Mississippi Department of the Confederate Military establishment during the Rebellion; he spent his subsequent life as a farmer and married Mary Lott, dying later in Smith county, Texas. William Booker Butler was a soldier in the same command. He devoted his later life to farming activities, and now lives in Troup, Texas. He married M. Black. Levi F. enlisted for service in the Confederate army in Mississippi and was killed in the battle of Gettysburg; James Wiley later became the father of Judge Butler; Alphonso F. was also a Confederate soldier for a brief period toward the close of the war, and is now a merchant farmer and banker of Winona, Texas, where he married Carrie Dean; R. Henry Clay is a Smith county farmer, and the husband of Ella Gray.

James Wiley Butler enlisted in May, 1862, in Company G, Captain B. B. Long, in Colonel O. M. Robert's Second Texas Infantry, and served in Randall's Brigade of General Walker's Division in the Trans-Mississippi Department. His first skirmish was at Burbow, Louisiana, and his real engagements were at Mansfield, Pleasant Hill and Jenkins Ferry. Long and rapid marches up and down the Mississippi River from New Orleans to Vicksburg and across the department characterized the activities of the command so strongly that the Federals named it "Walkers' Greyhounds". The troops finished service in Texas after the surrender of General Lee, and disbanded near Hempstead in June, 1865. Mr. Butler was offered a lieutenant's commission when he entered the army, but he concluded to remain in the service as a private. He passed through the entire war period without being once captured or wounded.

Upon taking up civil life once more Mr. Butler resumed the vocation of a farmer, to which he had been trained in his youth, and he continued therein until his election to the office of Sheriff of Smith county in 1870. He served four years and then returned to his rural calling for another four years. In 1878 he was again elected to the same office, being reelected in 1880, and again in 1882. In 1884 he retired to take up civil life again and engaged in the grocery business in Tyler, soon after which he was elected city marshal of the town, in which capacity he served for four years. After leaving that service he was appointed Deputy United States Marshal by A. J. Dickerson, and served through his administration and under Marshal John Grant until 1902, when he was appointed United States Court Clerk to fill a vacancy caused by death. He served as clerk under the consolidation of the various offices under one head, when he was made Deputy Clerk for the Tyler Division of the Federal Court, and he has held that office since until the present time. He was also appointed United States Commissioner of this district about that time, and holds that office today.

On December 20, 1866, Mr. Butler was married to Miss Sallie F. Holt, a daughter of Thomas S. Holt, one of the early settlers of Smith county and a farmer. Mrs. Butler passed away in 1882 and her three surviving children are: Judge Thomas B., of this review; Miss Berta Butler, and Lee Butler. In October, 1884, Mr. Butler married Mrs. Mary Deweese, a daughter of Carey Askew, and the children of this union are Elizabeth, the wife of J. M. Biscoff, chief engineer of the Cuban Central Railroad at Sagua la Grande, Cuba, and Clarence Butler, who is in the service of the same road. Mr. Butler is a Royal Arch Mason, is Past Chief Patriarch of Tyler Encampment of Oddfellowship and Past Grand Patriarch of the Texas Encampment of the Order.

Judge Thomas B. Butler was educated in the public schools, finishing his schooling in the Tyler schools. He chose the profession of law for his life work, and without college training, prepared himself for his admission to the bar in the offices of Hogg & Marsh, and was their student when these attorneys went to Austin, the former as Attorney General of the state, and the latter as his assistant. Judge Butler was formally admitted to the bar before Judge McCord in 1887 and began the practice of his profession alone. He subsequently became a member of the firm of Finley, Marsh & Butler, and when the former was appointed to the bench continued as a member of the firm of Marsh & Butler until his own appointment to the bench of Smith county as county judge in 1894. Judge Butler served in this capacity for one term and then resumed private practice. He became a partner of Mr. Lasseter as one of the firm of Butler & Lasseter, and subsequently, with the addition of his brother, Lee, the firm became Butler, Lasseter & Butler. Judge Butler was removed from this firm in 1902 by the action of Governor Sayers, who appointed him to the bench of the district court of the Seventh Judicial District. He served the few remaining months of an unexpired term and again sought his law office for the further prosecution of his profession, entering into partnership with Judge J. W. Fitzgerald, under the firm name of Fitzgerald & Butler, and he is now a member of the firm of Fitzgerald, Butler & Bullock, but does not give the law business his personal attention.

In February, 1910, Judge Butler retired from active law practice and turned his attention to business affairs, which had lately been calling for more and more of his attention. He had demonstrated his success as a dealer and trader, and had amassed, chiefly through the medium of real estate, a competency sufficient to permit him to engage in financial pursuits. He accordingly organized the Guaranty State Bank of Tyler, with a capital of $100,000 and was elected president of the bank. W. D. Swann and A. P. Moore were chosen vice-presidents and J. D. Shelton was made cashier. To the direction of the affairs of this well established institution Mr. Butler is giving much of his busy life, and the bank enjoys a solid reputation in Smith county. In addition to the banking interests, Judge Butler is president of the Burk-Walker Furniture Company, owns a controlling interest in the Courier-Times, a daily and weekly paper of Tyler, is president of the Butler-Cain Hardware Company of Terrell, Texas, is a director of the East Texas Investment Company, and the Swann Wholesale Furniture Company and of the Commercial Club of Tyler, all of which would indicate something of his importance and activity in the industrial and commercial world. Judge Butler is a Democrat, and a member of the Baptist church.

On December 26, 1889, Judge Butler was united in marriage, in Tyler, with Miss Sallie Cain, a daughter of Robert M. and Carrie Cain, early settlers from Alabama. The issue of Judge and Mrs. Butler are Carrie Lee, Sarah, Emma Eloise and Thomas, Jr.

PAUL E. WILLIAMS. The most remarkable epoch of commercialism and industry in Texas has been within the last quarter century, and largely the result of the introduction of so many varied forms of wealth producing enterprises. One of the citizens of Northeast Texas who deserves especial credit for this new phase of Texas' business is Paul E. Williams of Texarkana. His prominence is largely in the development of the peanut industry. When in 1904 Mr. Williams came into Texas and located at Paris, he was the leader in co-operation with the Frisco Railroad and the Paris Board of Trade in establishing the first peanut factory in this state. The Paris factory has had an enviable career since its establishment. In June, 1911, Mr. Williams in partnership with James and Robert M. Hubbard, of New Boston, Texas, and under the corporate name of the Williams-Hubbard Peanut Company, established a peanut factory at Texarkana, which like the Paris plant, has been highly successful. The company owns and operates both plants at Paris and Texarkana. These plants have a combined capacity of two thousand bushels of peanuts per day. The principal business is grading and shelling peanuts, supplying the wholesale candy markets west of the Mississippi river, and peanut butter, which is sold to the jobbing trade, although considerable business is done in Peanut Bran and salted peanuts.

As the first industry of its kind in the state of Texas a brief description of the Texarkana plant, derived from a local publication, will have a fitting place in this work. The factory shells and grades peanuts, popcorn and cocoanut products, and sells this product in all states west of the Mississippi river to candy and peanut butter manufacturers. The plant at Texarkana is situated on the tracks of the Kansas City Southern Railway and in point of equipment is modern throughout. Its floor space is fourteen thousand square feet and in order to load and unload goods in any kind of weather it has been connected by a private switch. About fifty employees are on the pay roll of the company in both plants and it can be readily understood that the industry is one that is closely related with the growing agricultural prosperity of northeast Texas.

Mr. Williams was the pioneer in inducing the farmers of Texas to grow peanuts for commercial purposes. It has long been a more or less familiar crop in various parts of Texas, but its commercial possibilities have never been realized to any extent in Texas previous to the establishment of the Paris factory, and it is easily possible to foresee that with continued development of the business that peanut growing will take a high rank among the agricultural activities of the state. It adds another productive industry, which is not only profitable for the increase of the current income of local farmers, but adds much to the general value of the land, and it is one more possibility to complete the diversification and rotation of crops of the south.

Mr. Paul E. Williams was born in Petersburg, Virginia, in 1878. His father James M. Williams, who was born in New Kent county, Virginia, was a captain in the Confederate army and served with distinction throughout the Civil war, after which he located at Petersburg and was there engaged in business during the remainder of his active life. His chief activity for many years was the manufacture of peanut products, and after his death the business was continued by his two sons, Mortimer and Paul E., the former still conducting the business at Petersburg.

WILLIAM BENJAMIN MUNSON. Should a thorough and conscientious search be conducted throughout the length and breadth of the state of Texas, it is doubtful if a better example of self-made American manhood could be found than that illustrated in the career of William Benjamin Munson, one of north Texas' captains of industry to whom this part of the state owes a lasting debt of gratitude. No fortunate family or pecuniary advantages aided him at the outset of his business life. On the contrary, he was forced to begin work at a tender age in order to earn the means by which to secure an acceptable education. Obstacles and difficulties have confronted him, but these he has overcome by determined and well-directed effort and, as the years have advanced, he has worked his way steadily upward until today, still active and vigorous, with powers undiminished, he is accounted one of the foremost figures in the business world of a state which does not lack for forceful and able men. It is impossible in a sketch of this kind to detail minutely each step of a career that has been so crowded with activities and achievements; the biographer must content himself with merely noting the salient points which have marked the life of an extremely busy and successful man.

Th. B. Munson

Mr. Munson was born near Astoria, Fulton county, Illinois, January 7, 1845, and is a son of William and Maria (Linley) Munson. The father, a native of New Hampshire, moved to Illinois as a young man and engaged in farming in Fulton county until his retirement, then moving to Astoria, where he spent the remainder of his life. The mother was born near Maysville, Mason county, Kentucky, daughter of Joseph and Sybilla Linley, and came to Illinois in young womanhood. She passed away one week before the death of the father, in 1891. There were six children in the family: Mrs. Louisa E. Douglas, now a resident of Fremont, Nebraska; Thomas Volney, who died in January, 1913, a vitaculturist of national reputation, a sketch of whose career will be found on another page of this work; William Benjamin, of this review; Miss T. M., and Miss M. G., in connection with a charitable school for the young, founded by Mrs. Catherine Tingley, at Point Loma, California.

The early education of William B. Munson was secured in the public schools of the districts in which his father made his home, and showed himself an industrious and ambitious youth, with a thirst for knowledge and a determination to make a success of whatever he undertook. He supplemented his early training by a course at Abingdon College, Abingdon, Illinois, where he spent one year, and then, in order to earn funds to complete his education, entered the country schools as a teacher. Afterward he entered the Agricultural and Mechanical College, then a department of the University of Kentucky, at Lexington, Kentucky, but was often crowded to meet expenses, and during the first year he and his brother, Thomas V., boarded themselves and did their own cooking, being thus able to live at an expense of one dollar per week each. These early struggles, no doubt, proved an excellent training for the youth, and when he graduated from the university in 1869, with the degree of Bachelor of Sciences, he was fully prepared to meet whatever the world had in store for him.

Mr. Munson entered upon his career as a railroad man in civil engineering and contract work for the Rockford, Rock Island & St. Louis Railway, now a part of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, then being built through the state of Illinois. About one year later he joined his brother, J. T. Munson, in the drug business, at Astoria, Illinois, but after a brief period he decided to cast in his fortunes with those of the rapidly growing state of Texas, and in September, 1871, came to the town of Sherman, a move he has never found cause to regret. There he applied himself to the study of law and was admitted to the bar, and as a young and untired practitioner came to Denison. In order to add to his small income, he embarked in the real estate business, and this proved so profitable that in 1873 he practically put aside his practice and formed a partnership with Jot Gunter, which during the next ten years proved a most profitable one in the field of real estate, the firm handling more realty than any other in the state. During the latter part of this period, the firm engaged in the cattle business, and when the partnership was dissolved, in 1883, purchased the interests of his associates and became sole owner of 75,000 acres of land, with 250,000 additional acres under lease. Of this he disposed two years later, with 25,500 head of cattle, a large number of horses and much ranch property and paraphernalia, and at this time began to invest heavily in Denison real estate. Here he purchased the First National Bank, of which he had been made president in 1876, but after about two years sold out his controlling interest to other parties and retired at that time from active banking. The next few years found him one of the foremost organizers, promoters and executive officers of his locality, and to his efforts the city of Denison owes much of its present prominence and prosperity. He organized and was president of the Denison & Washington Valley Railroad Company and likewise organized the Southwestern Coal and Improvement Company, through which he operated coal mines at Colgate, Indian Territory; was elected president of the Sherman, Shreveport & Southern Railroad and of the Light and Power Company of Denison, and in 1905, in connection with his brother, purchased the property of the Denison Cotton Manufacturing Company and organized the Denison Cotton Mill Company. This mill has since been successfully operated, and at this time is one of the largest cotton mills west of the Mississippi river. Mr. Munson was mainly instrumental in securing for Denison the Texas & Pacific Interurban Railway; the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railroad, of which he was at one time vice president; the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad, and the M. O. & G. Railroad. He was the organizer of the Red River Bridge Company that built a wagon bridge across the Red river and secured the reconstruction of this bridge recently to replace the one which had been swept away in the great floods of 1908. In 1886 Mr. Munson became a member of the firm of Munson & Brother, which has continued to handle large real estate deals in and around Denison to the present time. He was one of the organizers of the Southwestern Surety and Insurance Company, with a capital and surplus of over $800,000, and is president of this great enterprise at this time.

Mr. Munson has never had the time nor inclination to enter actively into political life, yet supports democratic principles and candidates. He has been active fraternally as a member of the Elks, is connected with the Chamber of Commerce, and readily contributes his co-operation and financial aid to any movement which promises to be of benefit to his adopted locality. In his religious belief he is an Evolutionist, believing in the unfolding and growth of our finer individualism from our inherited natures to a full stature of man and womanhood. His faith is based on what may, perhaps, be called "Natural Philosophy."

In September, 1876, Mr. Munson was married at Sherman, Texas, to Miss Ellen Newton, daughter of J. M. and Levinda Newton, the father being a farmer and cotton merchant of Grayson county. Of the children born to this union, five are now living: Linley A., who married S. J. Tonkin, of McAllister, Oklahoma; Theda, who married R. L. McKinney, of Little Rock, Arkansas; Mrs. Maud, the wife of Dr. C. D. Ferguson, of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; W. B., Jr., who is manager of the Denison Cotton Mill Company; and Eloise, who lives at home with her parents. The beautiful Munson residence is situated at No. 1127 West Morton street, which is a fitting monument to a successful business life.

GEORGE ALEXANDER. For sixteen years prominently connected with educational work in Archer county, George Alexander in 1912 relinquished that service to assume the duties of county clerk of Archer county, to which he had been elected. He is serving in that important office today, and has in his official capacity brought to bear those excellent qualities of mind and character that made his work in the schools of the county so successful and of such value to the county at large. A man who in his youth received but the fewest of educational advantages, he is one who, through rigid self-discipline and careful study, fitted himself for the duties that he successfully performed for years, and those sturdy qualities that have entered largely into the character building of the youth of the county under his supervision, in the various communities with which he was identified.

Born in Humboldt, Tennessee, on July 28, 1876, George Alexander is a son of N. W. and Missouri (Miles) Alexander, both natives of Tennessee. The father moved hence in the year 1858 and located in Williamson county, this state, when he returned to Tennessee and remained there for five years. Again he sought the freedom of Texas, coming to Williamson county in 1876, in the same year removing to San Saba county, where he continued until 1890. In that year he came to Archer county and devoted himself to stock-farming. He is still living in Archer City, aged seventy-three years. He was a soldier of the Civil war, enlisting with a Texas company in the Confederate army, and serving throughout the entire four years of the war. The mother, who was reared, educated and married in Tennessee, died in San Saba county in 1905, when she was in the sixty-first year of her life. She was the mother of four sons and three daughters, of which number George Alexander, of this review, was the second in order of birth.

In his boyhood George Alexander attended the schools of Denton, Texas, but his education was by no means a sufficient one to warrant his later work in life. That deficiency, however, he supplied by a thorough course of home study, and in 1896, when he was just nineteen years of age, he felt himself prepared to take up educational work in the county. He began as a teacher and for sixteen years continued, holding the position of principal in many of the leading schools of the county. He continued in the work with enthusiasm and pride, only giving up the work in 1912 when he was elected to the office of county clerk, since which time he has efficiently filled that office. He was elected on the Democratic ticket, of which party he has always been the adherent, and in which he has manifested a good citizen-like interest since he reached man's estate. In a fraternal way, Mr. Alexander is active as a Mason, who has taken his Master's degree, and as a member of the Woodmen of the World. He has membership in the Methodist Episcopal church also.

On August 18, 1898, Mr. Alexander was married to Miss Bennie Rayborn, a daughter of J. E. and Mary (McKay) Rayborn, of Dundee, both of whom died in 1876, and were Texas pioneers. Five children have come to Mr. and Mrs. Alexander: Marie, born March 5, 1900, at Dundee, Texas, and now in school. McKay Alexander, born April 11, 1903, in Dundee, Texas, in school at Archer City. Anna Jean, born July 1, 1905, and Berta Alexander, born in 1907, both of whom are attending school; and George Alexander, Jr., born in 1910.

The family is a popular and prominent one in the city, taking a leading place in the best social activities of the place, and sharing the genuine esteem of a wide circle of friends. Mr. Alexander is widely known as one of the young men of the county who has made his own way in the world and taken a worthy part in the world's work.

VERY REV. DAVID H. DUNNE. Among the men who have consecrated their lives to the ministrations of the Catholic priesthood none, perhaps, is better known than is the Very Rev. Father Dunne, the head of the Catholic church in the Panhandle. Coming to northern Texas in 1900, he has remained much longer than any of his predecessors, and during the past thirteen years his labors have resulted in the accomplishment of a wonderful work. Father Dunne was born in Queens county, Ireland, July 20, 1869, a son of Michael and Mary Dunne, the former of whom died on April 2, 1900, at the age of eighty-three years, while the latter died on March 18, 1913, having then attained the remarkable age of ninety-seven years.

The youngest of a family of eleven children, Father Dunne was brought to the United States as a youth, and after spending two years in St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, became a student in St. Joseph's College, Dubuque, Iowa, where he remained four years. He completed his theological studies at Baltimore, Maryland, in March, 1899, and his first charge was at Fort Worth, Texas, where he became chaplain of St.

Joseph's Infirmary. On June 30, 1900, he was sent to northern Texas, having been given charge of the entire northern part of the state from Wichita to the line and clear across the state. He made his first headquarters at Clarendon, but in 1901 came to Amarillo, where he has since been located. For several years he covered this vast stretch of territory alone, visiting the various towns and settlements at least once a month. In this extensive field, where only one church was established in 1900, we find today in 1913 no less than twenty-two. Nine of these were built by Father Dunne. They are now presided over by nine priests, who are directly under his supervision. In connection with his other labors Father Dunne was the founder of Saint Anthony's Sanitarium, at Amarillo, which is conducted by the Sisters of Charity of the Incarnate Word. The building is of pressed brick, costing $125,000, and is situated on a slight eminence about half a mile from the business center of the city, on the North Polk line of the street railway. In Saint Anthony's Sanitarium there are fifty beautifully furnished rooms and two wards, affording accommodations for nearly one hundred patients. The equipment and appliances of the operating rooms, with their natural and artificial lighting effects, are not surpassed in many places in the United States. In all other departments the facilities and equipments are of the same high order of excellence, rendering Saint Anthony's one of the most thoroughly prepared sanitariums in the southwest.

Father Dunne is an omnivorous reader, and when he can spare the time from his duties frequently spends eighteen hours out of the twenty-four in his pursuit of knowledge. Another monument to the zeal and devotion of this indefatigable worker for the church is being erected on Washington street, Amarillo, a modern structure to cost $40,000, to be used as a Sisters' school and to be under the supervision of the Sisters of San Antonio. Father Dunne has been generously fitted by nature to carry on the great work in which he is engaged. Of a broad, sympathetic nature, a thorough understanding of the frailties of humankind, and to the gift of imparting to others the knowledge that years of study has brought him, is combined business ability of the highest order. These qualities have not only made him a conspicuous figure in the church, but have gained him the love and affection of the people of his section, of all creeds, classes and nationalities.

NORTH TEXAS CATHOLIC MISSION. In appropriate connection with the sketch of Father Dunne is herewith reproduced an article on the Catholic missions in north Texas, substantially as published in the Southern Messenger of July 18, 1912. This article contains a brief statement of facts concerning the establishment and service of the Catholic church in north and west Texas, and is really an important chapter in the history of the church in the state.

In early days Amarillo and other north Texas missions were attended from Trinidad, Colorado, by the Jesuit fathers. Very Rev. C. M. Pinto, S. J., now superior at El Paso visited Channing, Tascosa and Fort Elliott once in a while. Rev. J. J. O'Riordan took charge of all the missions from Fort Worth to Texline on May 24, 1891.

Rt. Rev. Bishop Brennan gave confirmation at Tascosa on April 5, 1892. Father O'Riordan remained until July 8, 1892, with headquarters at Henrietta. Rev. T. J. E. Blakeney took charge of Henrietta and all missions on November 28, 1892, and remained until March 8, 1896. As far as can be ascertained Father Blakeney was the first priest to say mass in Castro county near the present colony of Nazareth. Rev. Joseph E. Malone took charge of the north Texas missions on April 11, 1896. He transferred his headquarters to Wichita Falls. He seemed to have made only one trip over the territory and possibly he was the first to say mass in St. Mary's church at Clarendon. He left on May 10, 1896.

On May 24, 1896, Rev. Daniel O'Sullivan was assigned to these missions, with headquarters at Wichita Falls. He remained until July 1, 1897. Father O'Sullivan did splendid work among the officers and men at Fort Elliott in Wheeler county. The Rev. J. Lenert succeeded him and took charge of the mission with headquarters at Henrietta, on August 8, 1897. He moved his headquarters to Clarendon during 1898. In the spring of 1899 Father Lenert took a vacation and during his absence Rev. J. E. Burns was placed in charge. On the return of Father Lenert in July, 1899, the district was divided. The Rev. J. E. Burns was given charge of Wichita Falls and all missions south of Fort Worth, and his headquarters were fixed at Henrietta. Rev. J. Lenert was given charge of all territory north of Wichita Falls, with headquarters at Clarendon. The division was made by the late Rt. Rev. E. J. Dunne.

During the years 1898 and 1899, St. Mary's Academy at Clarendon was built by Father Lenert. The academy was opened January 16, 1899, with four Sisters of Charity of the Incarnate Word, from San Antonio, in charge. The academy was closed about November, 1911, to be opened in Amarillo at a later date. Father Lenert left on December 31, 1899, and Rev. A. M. Kearns took charge on January 1, 1900. Father Kearns, however, did not remain long, and on June 30, 1900, Rev. D. H. Dunne, now of Amarillo, took charge. At this time Father Dunne's missions comprised an area of over sixty thousand square miles and occasional visits had to be made to New Mexico on sick calls.

Rt. Rev. E. J. Dunne visited Clarendon and confirmed a class of seventeen on April 3, 1900. During this year the corner stone of St. Anthony's Sanitarium of Amarillo was laid by Rev. D. H. Dunne, concerning which institution more is said in the sketch of Father Dunne. During the year 1901 and following years Father Dunne had several priests conduct missions in north Texas. On April 7, 1901, Rev. J. E. Burns arrived at the Sanitarium as first chaplain. He said his first mass on April 9. After a few months Father Burns left for California, where he died after a sojourn of several months.

On December 30, 1900, Rev. Joseph P. Lynch, now bishop of Dallas, preached in Clarendon at the evening services.

In May, 1901, Father Gilvert, S. J., presided at the forty hours' devotion at Clarendon and gave a mission at Tascosa. In December, 1901, Father O'Connor, S. J., gave a mission in Clarendon.

During 1902 Father Dunne moved his headquarters from Clarendon to Amarillo. In January, 1902, Father Dunne gave a mission of eight days for railroad men in the Sanitarium chapel. In April, 1902, Father Dunne took Rev. Joseph Reisdorff to Mr. Thomas McCormick's in Castro county and gave him charge of the county for his proposed colony. Nazareth is the result of his work. On August 18, 1902, Rev. V. I. Donnelly, C. S. B., opened a week's mission for non-Catholics in the old court-house building. On August 25th the same Father Donnelly opened a week's mission in the Sanitarium chapel. On Christmas day, 1902, midnight mass was celebrated in the Sanitarium chapel by Rev. D. H. Dunne.

Rev. S. P. McDonnell of Chicago delivered a sermon in Clarendon and Rev. J. J. Dolje gave a three days' mission in Tascosa. Rev. J. M. Hayes lectured in Clarendon in 1899 and gave a mission in Amarillo in 1908, and a lecture on October 12, 1911. Rt. Rev. Bishop Dunne delivered sermons and lectured at various times. In 1903, Father Hartman was appointed assistant to Father Dunne and Father Bresson; O. Praem was also appointed his assistant. Rev. Patrick F. Brannan gave missions at Clarendon and Childress.

On St. Patrick's day, 1903, ground was broken for the present church in the Clidden and Sanborn addition, at Amarillo. The first mass was said in the new church on Sunday, August 2, 1903, by Rev. D. H. Dunne on the feast of St. Stephen. The church was dedicated on October 18, 1903. Eleven persons were confirmed on the same day. A large crowd of Catholics and Protestants were present at the dedication. The services were conducted by Rt. Rev. E. J. Dunne, assisted by Fathers Hilary, O. S. B., from Sacred Heart, Oklahoma; Rev. Joseph Reisdorff and Rev. D. H. Dunne. The church edifice is very pretty and its present excellent condition is due largely to the indefatigable efforts of Father Dunne, who not only donated the lot on which the church stands, but also succeeded in obtaining financial assistance from his personal friends, both Catholic and Protestant. When the church was dedicated it was out of debt. To help pay for the pews, Bishop Dunne gave a lecture in the evening on October 18, 1903.

On July 20, 1905, Dalhart became a separate parish, including all territory north of the Candian river. Father A. O'Hara was the first pastor and Rev. Patrick J. Murphy is the present incumbent. Confirmation was administered on July 17, 1907, by Bishop Dunne. On August 28, 1909, Rt. Rev. T. Meerschaert, D. D., of Oklahoma, visited Amarillo and dedicated the new St. Anthony's sanitarium.

In November, 1909, two lots were purchased at the corner of Ninth and Taylor streets in the best section of Amarillo, for a new church, at a cost of five thousand dollars. During 1912 collections were taken up for a new church building and plans for a handsome new church were prepared by the architect. In 1913, St. Mary's Academy was opened in Amarillo.

In September, 1911, Rev. D. H. Dunne was appointed dean of the north Texas deanery, comprising the parishes of Rhineland, Childress, Groom, Dalhart, Umbarger, Nazareth, Slaton and Amarillo, and the missions of Perico, Happy, Plainview, Vega, St. Francis, Tascosa and White Deer.

CHESTER H. BRYAN. One of the successful younger attorneys of Houston and a man who gives splendid promise for the future is Chester H. Bryan, who has been engaged in the practice of his profession in Houston since he received his degree of LL. B., in 1901. He has already made a distinctive niche for himself in the political life of his district, and as a member of the Twenty-ninth Legislature, in 1905-6, gave praiseworthy service to his fellows, being distinguished by his service there as the youngest member of the legislature. Mr. Bryan comes of a family that is well known in Houston and throughout the state. He was born in this city in 1880 and is a son of Dr. Louis A. and Bettie (Hillyard) Bryan, concerning whom a necessarily brief mention is made, as follows, although their accomplishments have won for him the right to more than a mere cursory notice.

Dr. Louis A. Bryan was born in Mississippi, and he came to Texas in about 1850, settling in Houston, which city was thereafter his official headquarters, although he carried on his work in many points throughout the south. During the Civil war Dr. Bryan was in charge of the Texas Hospital Service, in which capacity he rendered most valuable aid to the south and gained a name and fame that would have brought him permanent honor had he done nothing more in life to warrant the encomiums of his fellows. It was his good fortune, however, to have gained lasting renown as a Yellow Fever expert, that dreaded scourge of the south, and he served voluntarily through the south during numerous horrible epidemics at Memphis, Mobile, Jacksonville and other southern cities, on every occasion offering his services and entering to the life-saving work with a zeal and heroism that has never been exceeded in the annals of American history. It was his self-sacrificing and untiring work that was the forerunner of what has since been done to eradicate this dread disease, and the comparative freedom of the south today from the plague of Yellow Fever may be directly credited to the heroic fighting and close research work of Dr. Bryan. Like his son, he also gave service as a member of the Texas State Legislature, and for a number of years he performed a most worthy work as head of the State Quarantine Department at Laredo, Texas. He died in 1890, and, though his own labors were ended there, the work he begun has been carried forward unflaggingly, with a benefit to the south that only southerners can appreciate.

The mother of the subject was born in Texas, the daughter of James Hillyard, a Tennessee man who came to this state in the early days and was widely known as a successful and prosperous planter in Fort Bend county, Texas. He accumulated a considerable property in the way of plantations throughout the state, and died in Austin county, Texas, in September, 1860. When Dr. Bryan died, in 1890, his widow, not content to idle her time away, brought into play a share of the splendid executive business ability that she had inherited from her father, and she organized the L. Bryan Company for the purpose of operating in real estate. To say that she has been successful in the business is no adequate expression of the accomplishments of Mrs. Bryan, for she has taken the lead in real estate activities in Houston almost from the first. As agent for the Old Fair Ground property, she made a new subdivision to Houston of the land and disposed of it for residence spots, bringing the deal through to a most happy consummation and establishing another fine residence district in the city. She has, during the years of her activities in this field of enterprise, handled some of the largest real estate transactions that have ever been put through in the county, and her capacity and acumen as a business woman have been so amply demonstrated as to leave no slightest grounds for conjecture thereto. It is especially notable that her success in this newer departure has in no wise detracted from her many admirable qualities as a woman and as a mother, for she has retained to the fullest those splendid qualities that make for the most successful motherhood, and she stands forth in the city as one of the most womanly women to be found within its precincts and as one who enjoys to the fullest the admiration and high regard of a wide circle of genuine friends. She takes a prominent place in the best social activities of the city, and maintains a residence at No. 1602 McKinney avenue, which is the scene of many social events and the center of a true southern hospitality.

Chester H. Bryan received his early education in the public schools of Houston, later attending the Bethel Military Academy, at Bethel, Virginia. He then attended the law school of the University of Texas, and was graduated from that institution in 1901, when he received the degree of LL. B. Mr. Bryan lost no time about initiating the active practice of his profession, returning to his native city to establish himself in his career, and here he has made a splendid record for himself in professional circles, as well as identifying himself conspicuously with the political activities of the district. As has been already stated in another paragraph, Mr. Bryan was elected to the Twenty-ninth Legislature, serving through 1905-1906, and taking an important place as a member of the Judiciary Committee No. 1, the Committee on State Affairs, the Military Committee and others of equal import.

Mr. Bryan has from the beginning of his career in Houston been popular and prominent in social and fraternal circles, and he is identified with practically all the leading clubs and societies of the city. His fraternal relations are represented by his membership in the Holland Lodge, No. 1, A. F. & A. M.; El Mina Temple, Ancient Arabic Order, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine; Texas Consistory No. 1, and all the Scottish Rite bodies of Masonry. He is a Past Dictator in the Loyal Order of Moose, of which he has been a member for several years, and has membership in Texas Lodge, No. 1, Knights of Pythias; the Maccabees, and the Woodmen of the World. He is a member and a director of the Thalian Club of Houston, the Houston Country Club and the Houston Turnverein, while he still retains membership in the Kappa Sigma fraternity of his college days. He is president of the Texas Pan-Hellenic fraternities, and was president of the Houston Alumni Association of the University of Texas, while he holds the office of vice president of the same Association today. He has membership in the Harris County Bar Association, of which he is secretary-treasurer, and has a place on the board of directors of the association as well. Mr. Bryan thus far has eschewed matrimony, and shares the handsome home of his mother, on McKinney avenue.

HENRY PRATHER BURNEY. Among the Pioneer Texas Families, none has been more conspicuous in the work of developing Southwest Texas from pioneer conditions, nor have any borne the responsibilities of citizenship with greater credit, than have the various members of the Burney Family, four generations of which are still living in Texas. The Burneys are of Scotch-English and Scotch-Irish descent; their English ancestors settled in Virginia in the early colonial times, and a number of their descendants located in North Carolina, and Tennessee. The family was a historic one in North Carolina, and many of its members took part in the Revolutionary war. In 1850 several of the Burneys came to Texas, and soon thereafter settled in Kerr County, and the name of Burney has been closely connected with the history of that county since an early date. They passed through the frontier days, and were accustomed to Indian alarms, scouts, trails, and battles with the Red Men, and materially aided in settling and developing the country. To this latter branch of the Burney Family belongs the subject of this sketch, Henry Prather Burney.

Henry Prather Burney is one of the successful younger members of the bar of Texas, and, as a member of the law firm of Kampmann & Burney, of San Antonio, Texas, is rapidly acquiring distinction as a lawyer. He was born June 17, 1884, in Kerrville, Kerr county, Texas, and was reared and educated in his native city, until he entered the Law Department of the University of Texas in September 1903. As a member of the law class of 1906 Mr. Burney graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Laws, and the following year he was one of the Quiz-masters of the Law Department of the University. While attending the University he took an active part in student affairs, and was a member of the Alpha Tau Omega, and Theta Nu Epsilon Fraternities.

Mr. Burney located permanently in San Antonio in the Fall of 1907, for the practice of his profession, and was associated with the well known law firm of Denman, Franklin & McGown, until October, 1910, when he formed his present partnership with Ike S. Kampmann, under the firm name of Kampmann & Burney, with offices in the San Antonio Loan & Trust Building. In 1910, in addition to his general practice, he acted as first assistant to the Codifying Commission, appointed by Governor Campbell, to revise and annotate the Laws of Texas. Mr. Burney was married in San Antonio, on April 19, 1911, to Miss Clare Shirley Denman, a daughter of Judge Leroy G. Denman, one of San Antonio's most distinguished and able lawyers, and a former justice of the Supreme Court of Texas. Miss Denman was one of San Antonio's most accomplished and beautiful young ladies, who was educated at Hollins, Virginia. Mr. and Mrs. Burney have one child, a son, Henry P. Burney, Jr., who represents the fourth generation of the Burney Family now living in Texas.

Mr. Burney is the son of Judge and Mrs. R. H. Burney, who moved to Kerrville and made that city their home in 1880. Judge Burney was born October 22nd, 1854, in McNary county, Tennessee, and in 1856 he came to Texas with his father, Judge H.

M. Burney, and settled in Kerrville, where he still resides. Judge Burney's first schooling was only such as could be afforded in a sparsely settled country on the border, with log-houses for school buildings. He was compelled to make his own money to attend institutions of higher education, and with this object in view, he joined a company of Texas Rangers in 1874, commanded by Captain Neal Caldwell. While a Texas Ranger, Judge Burney made many scouts after Indians over the rough mountain country of West Texas, and became an expert shot with a rifle. With the money earned as a ranger he paid his college expenses for the first two years he attended the Southwestern University at Georgetown, Texas, which institution he entered in 1875, at the age of twenty-one. In 1878 Judge Burney entered the Law Department of Vanderbilt University, at Nashville, Tennessee, and in June 1879 he received the degree of Bachelor of Laws from that University, having completed a two year law course in one year. The same year the Southwestern University conferred upon him the degree of Bachelor of Arts, as a recognition of his ability and work as a student, he having entered the study of law before completing the course at the Southwestern University. During his college career Judge Burney was awarded several medals for proficiency in mathematics and oratory.

After receiving his law degree Judge Burney first practiced law at Georgetown, Texas, for a short time, in partnership with Judge T. P. Hughes. In 1880 he moved to Kerrville where he continued the practice of law until he was appointed District Judge in 1904. He was elected State Senator in 1886, and re-elected in 1890 to represent the twenty-eighth senatorial district in the Twentieth, Twenty-first and Twenty-second Legislatures. Senator Burney was nominated both times at San Antonio, without opposition, by the Democracy of the District, which was the largest district in the State, extending from San Antonio to El Paso. Senator Burney was chairman of the Select Joint Committee of the Senate and House, of the Twentieth Legislature, charged with an examination into the conduct of the Comptroller's office, and the thorough investigation and exhaustive report made by this committee was mainly due to his labors and intelligent direction. The report was the cause of the enactment of a law by that Legislature to prevent the possibility of fraudulent settlement of accounts by tax collectors. As a member of the Legislature, Senator Burney took a broad and progressive view as to the building up of State Institutions, and especially the State University, and while he was chairman of the committee on Education, he sought in every way possible to advance that institution, along with other schools of the State, and was author of the act creating a State Geological Department. Senator Burney was appointed on the Free conference committee of the two houses to formulate a State policy with reference to the sale and disposition of the public free school lands of Texas, as he was considered an authority on such questions. He was also a member of the Joint Committee of the House and Senate that drafted the present Judicial Articles to the Constitution of Texas, and took an active part in all the important matters before the Legislature during his term as senator. During the Twenty-second Legislature, Senator Burney's colleagues unanimously elected him President Pro Tem of the Senate.

Senator Burney was appointed Judge of the Thirty-eighth Judicial District of Texas, in March, 1904, by Governor Lanham, and was elected to that position in the Fall of 1904, and re-elected in 1908 and 1912, which position he now holds. Judge Burney has filled the position of District Judge with credit to himself, and his record as a trial judge is second to none in the State.

On the 30th day of September, 1879, Judge Burney was united in marriage to Miss Mattie Prather, a beautiful and accomplished young lady of Palestine, Texas. They had four children, the subject of this sketch, Henry Prather Burney, Golda, Vela, and Ivy Burney. Golda Burney Harper died December 16th, 1901, and left surviving her a son, John Henry Harper, who now lives with his grandfather, Judge Burney. Miss Vela Burney lives at Kerrville with her father, and Ivy H. Burney is located at Uvalde, Texas, where he is practicing law, he having graduated at the University of Texas, and received his Bachelor of Law degree in June, 1914. Mrs. Mattie Prather Burney died March 14th, 1914, at Kerrville, Texas, and left Judge Burney, the above named children and several brothers surviving her. Mrs. Burney was born in Wilcox County, Alabama, January 25th, 1854; her parents moved to Texas when she was a girl, and she was reared and educated at Palestine. Several of her brothers saw service in the Confederate Army during the Civil War, and as her father died when she was a child, she was reared by her mother and brothers.

Judge and Mrs. H. M. Burney, the grand-father and mother of Henry Prather Burney, are a remarkable pioneer couple, and are the only couple now living who were residents of Kerrville fifty-seven years ago. Judge H. M. Burney is eighty-eight years old and his wife is seventy-five. On the 28th day of December, 1913, they celebrated their sixtieth wedding anniversary, one of the most notable and rare events in family history. All of their nine sons and their families were present at the celebration, which took place at their pleasant country home near Kerrville, where they have been living for over fifty-two years. Judge H. M. Burney was born May 12th, 1826, in Guilford County, North Carolina, near the Old Guilford Court House Battle Ground, and Mrs. Burney, nee Mary A. Tatum, was born in McNary County, Tennessee on June 13th, 1839. Judge H. M. Burney spent his youth in McNary County, Tennessee, to which place his father moved when he was a boy, and first came to Texas in 1853. Miss Tatum came to Texas with her parents, who settled in Washington County in 1852. The following year Judge Burney located in the same County, and on the 28th day of December, 1853, he and Miss Tatum were married at the town of Burton in Washington County, Texas. Shortly after their marriage the young couple returned to Tennessee, and remained there about four years. In 1856 they came again to Texas and soon located with the little band of pioneers who settled at Kerrville. They are truly "old land marks" among the people of Kerr County. After having passed through all the hardships of pioneer times, they are today enjoying good health, and promise to live to celebrate another wedding anniversary.

During his early life in Kerr County, Judge H. M. Burney, was on the frontier, and was in the midst of the Indian troubles that prevailed over that section of the State before and after the Civil War. There were many Indian raids in the Country; many families were killed, and he and his neighbors went on many Indian scouts. Judge Burney suffered much from the depredations of the foes, many of his horses and cattle were stolen, and he and his family were often in great personal danger from the raids of the savages. Judge Burney first entered into the trading business, when he moved to Kerrville, and bought and sold all kinds of supplies that were used on the frontier in those days. He furnished the United States soldiers located at Camp Verde with supplies, and bought and sold cypress shingles. At one time in 1858 he sold the United States Government one hundred thousand shingles, which were hauled by ox-wagons from Kerrville to Fort Bellnap to be used in building quarters for troops. For several years the chief occupation of the people of the little settlement of Kerrville, was making cypress shingles from the large cypress trees that lined the banks of the Guadalupe River, and Judge Burney had the first steam sawmill in that country. In addition to making shingles he sawed cypress lumber, and in 1868 sold a large lot of lumber to the Government to be used in building quarters for troops on the Rio Grande. The lumber was hauled to the Mexican frontier by Mexicans in carts, which was an interesting sight even in those days. Judge Burney's principal business, however, was stock raising; and he has been a successful cattleman all of his life, and acquired many acres of land, which in his later years he divided among his sons, who now have some of the best farms and stock ranches in that country.

Judge H. M. Burney, during the early history of Kerr County, held several official positions. The Kerrville postoffice was established in 1857, and he was appointed the first postmaster, which position he held seven years. During the early '60's he was Probate Judge of Kerr County, which was organized in 1856, and in 1878 he was elected County Judge, in which capacity he served four years. For several years, after he reached the age of eighty he was president of the First National Bank, of Center Point, Texas.

Judge and Mrs. H. M. Burney are parents of nine sons, all of whom are now living in Texas, and are representatives of the second generation of the family. Despite the fact that there were poor school facilities in that country in early times, they succeeded in educating their sons and fitting each of them for a useful life, and afterwards helped equip them for successful careers. The sons are mentioned as follows: Judge R. H. Burney, whose career, as the father of Henry P. Burney, has been given in this sketch; Hon. I. H. Burney, the second son, is one of the most brilliant and successful lawyers of Texas, he is a member of the firm of Cowan & Burney, of Ft. Worth, Texas, who are general attorneys for the Texas Cattle Raisers Association, and the National Live Stock Association; W. D. Burney, of Center Point, the third son, is a merchant and farmer; Hon. J. G. Burney, of Austin, a former member of the Legislature, the fourth son, is a merchant and farmer; William, Lee, John W. and Mack Burney, the fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth sons are all farmers and stock raisers, and live in Kerr County; P. C. Burney, the ninth son is an electrical engineer, at present located at Alpine, Texas. While there have been two or three deaths in the families of the nine sons, all of whom are married, there has never been a death in the immediate family of Judge H. M. Burney.

The members of the Burney family are remarkable for their exceptional physical and intellectual strength, and for their longevity. Henry P. Burney's Great Grand-father, Robert Burney, the father of Judge H. M. Burney, was sheriff of Guilford County, North Carolina, from 1820 to 1826. Robert Burney married Lydia McCain in 1814, and they had ten children, four of whom are still living, and enjoying good health, even though they are all over eighty-six years old. Mrs. Emily Burney Denny, the oldest of the four children, is ninety-two, and now lives at Bethel, Tennessee, and her sister, Mrs. Eutentia Burney Saner, who lives near Kerrville, is ninety. Judge H. M. Burney, whose career has been given in this sketch, is eighty-eight, and his brother, Captain W. D. C. Burney, the youngest of the four children, is eighty-six. Captain Burney was the first sheriff of Kerr County in 1856, when that County was organized, and still lives on his old home place near Center Point, where he has resided for the last fifty-five years. The most remarkable of Henry P. Burney's ancestors are Judge and Mrs. H. M. Burney, standing, as they do today, grand old pioneer trees in the forests of Kerr County's citizenship, no two people in West Texas are more highly respected than Judge and Mrs. H. M. Burney. Of the old pioneers of Texas, Judge H. M. Burney, is one of the most interesting, and his range of recollections goes back almost as far as that of any other citizen now living in Texas.

JOSEPH R. STUART, M. D. A son of the late Dr. D. F. Stuart, whose notable career as a physician and surgeon and good citizen of Houston during more than forty years has been sketched elsewhere in this work, Dr. Joseph R. Stuart likewise distinguished himself for professional ability and while the destiny of life did not privilege him length of years as it did his father, he well fulfilled his obligations and responsibilities, and at the time of his death held a position of recognized leadership in the medical fraternity of his home city.

Dr. Joseph R. Stuart was born at Houston, in July, 1868, and was in his forty-fourth year when he died at his home on Washington street in that city, January 12, 1913. He was the oldest child of the late David F. and Ellen (Dart) Stuart. Coming from a family of physicians, and one which high ideals were maintained and high standards of culture, he very naturally chose a professional career and was given the best of advantages in preparation for his chosen calling. He received his literary education at Hampden-Sydney College and at the University of Virginia. He then entered the Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia, where he was graduated M. D. in March, 1889. This was many years after his father had been a student at that institution. Following his graduation, Dr. Stuart returned to Houston and became associated in practice with his father, relationship which was continued until the death of the senior Stuart in 1908. Dr. Joseph Stuart then became proprietor and manager of the Houston Infirmary and Sanitarium, an institution founded by his father more than forty years before, and continued at the head of that institution until his death in 1913.

The late Dr. Stuart was a director of the Union National Bank of Houston and in his profession was a member of the County and State Medical Societies and the American Association and for his work as a railway surgeon belongs to the Association of Railway Surgeons. He was affiliated with the Elks Lodge, No. 151, of Houston.

In 1892 Dr. Joseph R. Stuart married Miss Elizabeth R. Stuart, a daughter of Robert C. Stuart, of Austin, Texas. Mrs. Stuart continues to live at the old home at 1008 Washington street, and is the mother of three children, David F. Stuart, Elizabeth Stuart and Margaret Dart Stuart.

ROBERT D. ROBINSON, M. D. A physician and surgeon who held first rank among the fraternity in the city of El Paso during his practice there, the late Dr. Robinson was identified with the profession for a quarter of a century, and had a large and varied experience in various parts of the country, and in many departments and phases of professional work. He was for a number of years engaged in practice in Old Mexico. Dr. Robinson's specialty was in the diseases of children and orthopedic surgery, and in this department he had no superior in the state of Texas.

Robert D. Robinson was a native of Lafayette, Indiana, where he was born September 23, 1860. He belonged to a family which were among the early settlers of Wabash Valley of Indiana, and his parents were William D. and Sarah R. Robinson. They located at Lafayette about the year 1840 and the father was a successful farmer and one of the large stock raisers of that vicinity.

Dr. Robinson was brought up in the wholesome atmosphere of an Indiana farm. His first education was obtained in the public schools of Lafayette, and he subsequently entered Purdue University, one of the leading institutions of higher education in the middle west, which is located in the city of Lafayette, and later he entered the University of Kentucky at Louisville, where he was graduated M. D. For the practice of his profession he returned to his home town, and remained there from 1887 to 1892. During the succeeding five years, Dr. Robinson was a physician in Chicago, where he acquired a large private practice and enjoyed much success as a physician. In 1897 he went to the city of Torreon in Old Mexico, and was actively identified with his profession in that city until 1910, at which date he located in El Paso. Dr. Robinson had offices in the Robert Banner Building, and he had a large practice both in consultation and among a large number of individual patients. Since locating in El Paso, however, the doctor's practice had been largely limited to diseases of children and orthopedic surgery, and he gave stated lectures on these branches of medicine and surgery at the Hotel Dieu hospital in this city and was a member of its board.

Dr. Robinson had always maintained an independent attitude in political affairs, was never a party worker, and had cast his vote for men and measures, rather than according to party affiliations. For many years he had been affiliated with the Masonic Order and the Knights of Pythias, and often filled chairs in both orders. During his residence at Torreon he was a member of the board of managers of the foreign clubs in Mexico, and was the first president of the International Medical Association of Mexico. His church is the Presbyterian.

Dr. Robinson was married October 11, 1899, at Lafayette, Indiana, to Miss Jennie Westfall. They were the parents of one child, Jennie Katherina, who died when three years and six months of age.

Though a resident of west Texas only a short time, Dr. Robinson was one of the enthusiastic admirers of the state, not only for its wonderful climate, but for what he was confident will be its wonderful future in development and general civilization. He was one of the citizens of El Paso who stood behind every movement for the upbuilding and promotion of the welfare of this city, and it was a pleasure for him to afford information to interested parties who desire to investigate the resources of west Texas.

Dr. Robinson died very suddenly of heart failure at his residence in El Paso, Texas, April 9th, 1913, and was laid to rest in Evergreen Cemetery in El Paso.

EDWARD W. EARL. The attractions of climate and of resources and citizenship have brought many of the ablest citizens from other states into Texas during recent years, and in this class should be noted the well known El Paso lawyer, Mr. Edward W. Earl. Mr. Earl in 1904 made a pleasant trip into Central Texas, and became so well pleased with the state as a whole and its climate and its possibilities as contrasted with the older country of the east with which he was familiar that he determined to make Texas his permanent residence. Soon afterward he located at El Paso and in that city has been one of the prominent lawyers.

Edward W. Earl was born in the city of Lafayette, Indiana, December 23, 1879. His parents were Frank Crane and Virginia E. (Taylor) Earl. His father was a stock raiser and now lives retired in the beautiful city of Lafayette, Indiana. The Earl family is of Scotch and English descent. His great-grandfather Earl was a soldier in the war of 1812. His grandmother is still living at the good old age of eighty-six years, and his grandmother Taylor is also living, being now eighty-eight years of age.

Mr. Earl first attended the public schools of Lafayette and then entered Purdue University at Lafayette, receiving a thorough literary education, and took his law studies at Indiana University in Bloomington, where he was graduated LL. B. For three years he practiced law in his home town, and then following the visit to Texas which has been mentioned, in 1906, he came to this state and has since been practicing in El Paso. His offices are in the First National Bank Building. Mr. Earl is independent in politics, and gives his support to the candidate who most thoroughly carries out his ideas of effective government. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Masonic Order, belonging to the Knights Templar and Mystic Shrine, and also with the Knights of Pythias. During his university career he was a member of the Kappa Sigma and of the legal fraternity, Phi Delta Phi. His church is the Baptist.

Vol. V—32

At El Paso on January 21, 1909, Mr. Earl married Miss Anne Coffin, a daughter of C. O. Coffin of El Paso and a descendant of the Nantucket, Massachusetts, family of Coffin on her father's side, and of the Texas family of Brownings on her mother's side. Her grandfather, John Alexander Browning, served as a colonel in the Confederate army. Mr. Earl is very fond of hunting as a diversion from his professional duties, and each year spends his vacation period on his father-in-law's ranch in Texas.

OSCAR L. BOWEN. A rising young attorney, who several years ago identified himself with the El Paso bar, and has already attained successful position. Oscar L. Bowen is a Virginian, is a product of the schools and colleges of old Virginia, and for the practice of his profession chose the southwestern country, and has never regretted the choice which led him to El Paso.

Oscar L. Bowen was born December 1, 1884, on a plantation near Richmond, Virginia. His parents were Edwin T. and Nannie (Tanner) Bowen, of an old English family. The father was for many years a successful planter of Virginia, and belonged to a family which had been planters for several generations and before the war were large owners of slaves.

Oscar L. Bowen attained his early training at Richmond College in Virginia, entering this institution in 1903, and taking both the academic and law courses. He was graduated in June, 1909, with the degrees of Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Laws. In the same year he located at El Paso, where he began the practice of law, and has accepted many opportunities for professional success and advancement. His office at the present time is in the Caples building, No. 413, with Lessing and Bowen. Mr. Bowen is a staunch Democrat, belonging to a family which has always supported that party, and has himself taken considerable interest in local politics. He is affiliated with the Loyal Order of Moose, and served one year as secretary of the local lodge at El Paso. His church is the Baptist.

CHARLES M. HENDRICKS, M. D. In devotion to the broader interests and activities of his profession as well as in the success of his private practice, Dr. Hendricks ranks as one of the foremost physicians and surgeons of Texas, and has been highly honored in his professional career.

Charles M. Hendricks, who was born December 5, 1878, at Eton, Ohio, belongs to a prominent American family, the various representatives of which have during several generations acquired more than local prominence. The Hendricks family came to America from England, and John Adams and Thomas Hendricks the founders of the family were in company with a colony of French Huguenots who settled on this side of the Atlantic. Grandfather John Hendricks was a cousin of Thomas A. Hendricks, the former vice president of the United States. The father of John Hendricks was a soldier with the rank of major during the war of 1812. John, Thomas and Adam Hendricks were all prominent in national politics, and Eugene R. Hendricks, a son of Adam, is today and has been for many years, a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. John Hendricks, a brother of Eugene, was a congressman representing the Brooklyn district of New York.

The father of Dr. Hendricks was Dallas C. Hendricks, who was born in Ohio, and for many years was engaged in real estate business at Eaton. He was from the beginning of his career a prominent citizen at Eton, and is still active there, having been commissioner of the county for a period of twenty years. The maiden name of his wife was Eleanor McChristie, daughter of Arthur McChristie, a native of Ohio. She was born at Gratis, Ohio, and her family, of Scotch stock, was originally from Pennsylvania. Her grandfather was born in Scotland and settled in Pennsylvania, where he lived for some years, and later pre-empted government land in Ohio. Mrs. Hendricks, the mother, is still living, and there were five children in her family.

Dr. Hendricks, the first born, as a boy attended the public schools of Gratis, Ohio, and also the high schools there, graduating from the latter in 1896. He then entered Miami University at Oxford, where he spent three and a half years. Illness compelled him to leave college before graduation, and he subsequently took up the study of medicine in the medical college of Ohio at Cincinnati, where he was graduated M. D. in 1905. After graduation he was appointed interne at the National Jewish Hospital in Denver, Colorado, where he remained one year, and then served one year as assistant physician at Agnes Memorial Sanatorium in Denver. From Denver he came to El Paso, in which city he established himself on the 22nd of February, 1908, and at once began a general practice which he has since increased until he is recognized as one of the most successful of the El Paso physicians.

On coming to El Paso Dr. Hendricks became medical director of the Albert Balwin Sanatorium in this city, and served one year, after which he took up private practice. He is also contract surgeon for the United States Government at El Paso. In 1912 Dr. Hendricks was appointed by the governor of Texas as delegate to attend the international congress on tuberculosis at Rome, Italy. After attending the sessions of the convention, Dr. Hendricks visited the clinics, hospitals and attended lectures at Genoa, Italy, Paris, Edinburgh, and other points, and spent nine months in increasing his knowledge and experience in medical affairs.

In politics Dr. Hendricks is a Democrat, though he takes no active part in party affairs. He has membership in the El Paso County and the Texas State Medical Societies, and is a member of the American Medical Association. He is a member of the Toltec Club, of the El Paso Country Club, and belongs to the National Association for the study and prevention of tuberculosis. He is chief of the El Paso free clinic. Dr. Hendricks is a trustee in the Congregational church, where he and his family worship.

On June 7, 1905, at Toledo, Ohio, he married Miss Edith Louise Duguid, daughter of Alexander Duguid, a native of Ohio and of Scotch parentage. The three children of the Doctor and wife are Louise, born in El Paso, December 22, 1908; Marjorie, born in El Paso, July 12, 1910, and Mary E., born September 20, 1913. The family reside at 1825 Montana Street.

AMBROSE E. RYAN. A druggist and business man of El Paso, Mr. Ryan is one of the young and enterprising citizens, has developed one of the best appointed and best patronized stores in the city, and is in every way prospering.

Ambrose E. Ryan was born at Honey Grove, Texas, October 28, 1878. His father was Joseph B. Ryan, a native of Kentucky, who came to Texas in the early sixties, and was himself a druggist, having a business at Honey Grove up to the time of his death in 1892. He also served for some time as deputy county clerk of Lamar county. He was a Democrat and a Baptist, and one of the prominent men in his vicinity. The maiden name of the mother was Belle Drennen, who now resides in Dallas. Her father was David Drennen, a native of Illinois and a lifelong friend of Abraham Lincoln. He and Lincoln were reared in the same locality and as young men split rails together, and they also courted the same girl. There were five children in the Ryan family, Ambrose E. being the oldest.

Mr. Ryan was educated in the public schools of Honey Grove, and in the Staunton Military Academy of Virginia, up to the age of seventeen. At Dallas he entered the Texas Drug Company, a wholesale house, and spent three years learning the business. He then removed to Alamogordo, New Mexico, where he was employed for a year and a half in the drug store of W. E. Warren &

Company. He then went to St. Louis, where he became connected with the wholesale chemical works of Herck & Fehrick and while there acquired a thorough theoretical and practical knowledge of chemistry and pharmacy. A year later he returned to Texas, spending three years in Fort Worth, in the employ of H. W. Williams, the wholesale druggist, then a year and a half in another locality, after which he moved to El Paso and entered the employ of different drug concerns of the city. On April 14, 1909, he established the A. E. Ryan & Company drug store at 212 East San Antonio Street, and has given all his attention to making a store second to none in the city. He employs eleven clerks and besides has four registered pharmacists in service.

Mr. Ryan is an independent Democrat and takes an active part in fraternal organizations. He has attained the thirty-second degree of Scottish Rite Masonry, and has also reached the capitular degrees of York Rite. His other affiliations are with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Beavers, the Fraternal Brotherhood, the Modern Brotherhood of America, the Knights & Ladies of Security and he is a member of the El Paso Chamber of Commerce, the American Pharmaceutical Association, the Texas State and the El Paso Pharmacists Association. At Alamogordo, New Mexico, on March 28, 1903, he married Miss Gladys Bates. Two children have been born to their marriage: Leone, deceased; and Eureka, who was born in Fort Worth. Their home is at Hotel Paso del Norte.

WILLIAM T. JONES, M. D. A member of the Texas medical fraternity for nearly thirty years, and since 1900 in active practice at Fort Davis, Dr. Jones has shown a rare combination of personal success with large interests in the public life of his community and its general business affairs. He is one of the county officials, is one of the leading men in the Fort Davis State Bank, enjoys a large practice and has taken a prominent part in the social life of this vicinity.

William T. Jones was born in Putnam county, Georgia, March 21, 1853, and spent the first twenty-nine years of his life in his native state. His early education was attained in the public school of Eatonton, Georgia, and after leaving high school at the age of sixteen he took a position in a drug store. That position led to professional career and it was while in the drug business that he formed his determination to become a doctor. In 1873 he took up farming, which he followed for four years and then at Augusta, Georgia, entered the State University where he graduated from the medical department in 1884. On graduation he moved to Texas, and began his practice in DeWitt county, which was his home from 1884 to 1900. In the meantime in 1893 in order to keep up with the progress of his profession he spent a year in post-graduate study at New Orleans. In 1900 Dr. Jones came out to Fort Davis, and in the succeeding twelve years has built up a practice which ranks him as probably the leading physician and surgeon of this city.

At White Plains, Georgia, on November 14, 1872, Mr. Jones married Miss Sallie Williams, daughter of J. M. Williams of White Plains. The six children, two sons and four daughters, born to their marriage are as follows: Annie, now deceased, who married J. G. Ewell; Paul W., who is married and a resident in San Antonio; Dr. H. M. Jones, who is married, and is a practicing dentist and active manager of a drug store in Fort Davis; Mary W., who married A. W. Bard and is a resident of Old Mexico; Eva, who was married October 1, 1913, to Henry T. Adriance, of Galveston, Texas; and Lenore, who is at home.

The family worship in the Episcopal faith. Dr. Jones is affiliated with York Rite Masonry from the Blue Lodge to the Commandery, and is also a member of the Woodmen of the World and the Knights of Pythias. He also has membership in the El Paso County, the Texas State Medical Societies, and the American Medical Association.

Auf der

In his larger relations with the community, Dr. Jones is president of Fort Davis Commercial Club and is vice president of the Fort Davis State Bank. He has for a number of years been an active factor in Democratic politics, and since 1909 has held the office of county treasurer. For twelve years he was a member of the school board and did much to improve the facilities of education in this vicinity. For his vacation periods Dr. Jones enjoys nothing better than a fishing trip, and at home is prominent in all the social diversions, he and his family having a prominent part in the social life of Fort Davis. He is a student, not only of his profession, but of general literature, and is especially fond of history.

ALBERT M. LOOMIS. As a native product of the great southwest, Albert M. Loomis finds his native element in Texas, with which he has been identified since 1881, in which year he accompanied his parents to El Paso, Texas, at a time when he was eight years of age. Mr. Loomis is a son of Albert M. and Laura A. Loomis, and he was born in San Luis Obispo county, California, on June 14, 1873. Since reaching years of manhood he has identified himself chiefly with the business of real estate in El Paso, and his success has been of large and worthy nature and one which should entitle him to a leading place among the most prominent business men of this city.

Albert M. Loomis, Sr., was born in Ohio, and went to California about 1851, at the time when the gold excitement was at its uppermost. He remained there until 1881, when he came to Texas, and in this state he followed the real estate business, establishing at that time the business in which his son is actively engaged. Mr. Loomis was a man who was always active in political affairs, and during his active career he held many important offices. He was prominent in social, business and political circles in El Paso practically all his life. He was a prominent member of the Masonic fraternity, in which he had taken the thirty-second degree, and was one of the most public spirited and popular men the city of El Paso has ever known. He was found to be identified with practically every worthy movement that was ever promulgated in the city of El Paso for the improvement and development of that city, and was further identified with every good work in which the Presbyterian church was found to be interested. He was a member of that churchly body and was one of the valued communicants of that church. He is buried in El Paso. His wife, who was Laura A. Joslin, was born in California, and there she met and married her husband. She still survives him and makes her home in El Paso. They were the parents of five children, of whom, Albert M. Loomis, the subject of this review, was the oldest boy. The principal schooling which Albert M. Loomis received was in El Paso, although it is true that he began his early training in California, prior to the time when his family migrated from that state into Texas. When he was finished with the curriculum of the public schools of El Paso he was sent to Oberlin College, at Oberlin, Ohio, and there he followed a special course in engineering, later taking a course at the State Agricultural and Mechanical College at Bryan, Texas. When he was finished with his college course in Bryan he returned to El Paso and assumed activities in the real estate business with which his father had so long been identified. Since that time he has continued to carry on that business which is one of the most extensive and pretentious concerns of its kind in this section of the state. Like his father, Mr. Loomis has been interested in the development of El Paso along the best lines and has given excellent service in all movements pertaining to that class of work. In addition to his real estate activities, Mr. Loomis has shown a pronounced ability as a farmer and he has an excellent farm of some four hundred acres in the vicinity of El Paso in the conduct of which he finds considerable pleasure as well as no little profit. Mr. Loomis is a Democrat and is prominently concerned in political activities in this section of the state and he is particularly interested in local affairs of that nature, although he has never been an office holder or an office seeker.

In March, 1902, Mr. Loomis was married in Galveston, Texas, to Florence Foley, a daughter of P. J. Foley, of Galveston. They have one child, Albert M., Jr.

DR. WALTER B. ADAMS. In August, 1912, Dr. Walter B. Adams, fresh from his service as interne and assistant city physician at Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, came to Texas and opened an office for the independent practice of his profession at Electra, for which he had prepared himself in years of close attention to his studies, and in which he bids fair to make an unusual success, judging by his present position and the rapid strides he has already made in his work. On the 12th of June, 1913, he moved to Burkburnett. Born in Decatur, Texas, on January 12, 1888, he is the son of John L. and Nancy M. (Collins) Adams, both native born Georgians, and now living in Electra, where the father is engaged in the drug business. Both are members of the Methodist church, South, and are among the best known and highly esteemed people of their community. They were the parents of nine children, of which number Dr. Adams was the third born.

Dr. Adams was five years of age when his parents moved from their Texas home into Oklahoma, and there he continued to live until he reached the age of eighteen years. He was educated, primarily, in the schools of that state, and he also took a course at the Southwestern Normal at Weatherford, Oklahoma, after which he entered Epworth University at Oklahoma City. This was followed by a commercial course in a business college in Oklahoma City, and he then entered the University of the South at Sewanee, where he pursued his medical studies. He remained there for three years, then returned to Oklahoma and in 1911 was graduated from the Medical Department of the Oklahoma State University. For two years thereafter Dr. Adams served as interne and assistant city physician in Oklahoma City, where he gained an experience that was wide enough in its nature to give him the standing of a much older practitioner, so that his advent into Electra in August, 1912, was followed by a decided influx of patronage. He is constantly gaining in prominence, and is already in high standing with the medical fraternity in these parts, having membership in the county and state medical societies.

On Christmas Day, 1910, Dr. Adams was married to Miss Hallie V. Mansfield, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. Mansfield, of Nashville, Tennessee. Dr. and Mrs. Adams are members of the Episcopal church, and his fraternal associations are with the Masons, the Maccabees, the Woodmen of the World and the Modern Woodmen of America. He is a Democrat in his political faith, but not one who takes an active part in the political activities of his community. Though many years of his younger life were spent outside the borders of Texas, he still owns allegiance of the stoutest order to his native state, and regards the great southwestern commonwealth as the greatest state in the Union, not so much in point of size as in her many other wonderful resources and characteristics.

JUDGE CASWELL K. McDOWELL. The name of Judge Caswell K. McDowell is familiar to every man in Texas today who knows anything about the political situation, and, indeed, is well known to many men outside of his own state, for he is one of the leaders of the Republican party in the state and a brilliant member of the legal profession. Judge McDowell has spent practically all of his life in Texas and has been active in furthering her development and growth from the early days, when the western counties were part of the frontier, down to the present day, when civilization has claimed all for her own. Judge McDowell is much more than a politician; he belongs in the ranks of statesmen; for, believing that his party is built on the principles that mean the best government for the country, he has fought for it bravely through many years.

Judge McDowell is a native of the state of Texas, having been born in Sulphur Springs on the 28th of July, 1870. His father, James K. McDowell, was born in Alabama, and came to Texas as a young man. He was a well-educated man for those times, and in his early days followed teaching as a profession. Later on he took up the practice of law, and for many years was a successful member of the bar. He was active politically, and held various important offices, among them being that of United States district attorney, which he held for many years. He was a member of the Masons. James K. McDowell married Victoria A. James, and they became the parents of twelve children. He died in 1899, at the age of sixty-two, and is buried in Childress county, Texas. Mrs. McDowell now resides in Del Rio. She was born in Tennessee and was married in Texas.

Judge McDowell received his early education in the public schools of his native state, and at the early age of thirteen he had to leave school and begin to earn his living, for he was the sixth in a large family, and money was scarce in those days. He entered the employ of a firm that bought and sold stock, and for four years he worked in this line of business, being engaged in the selling and trading end of the business. He then accepted a position with the Cotton Belt Railroad, and for two years remained in their employ. The Pan Handle country and the stock raising business next claimed his attention, and for about two years he was thus engaged.

Now begins his entry into public life, with the formation of the new county of Motley, for Judge McDowell was elected constable and was appointed deputy sheriff. He served in this capacity for about three years, and he then removed to Dickens county, where he engaged in the stock business, also being engaged in the mercantile business during part of his eight years' residence in that county.

While living in Motley county he had begun the study of law, and now, while living in Dickens county, he continued his studies, and in 1898 was admitted to the bar. He had made the same mistake that so many ambitious young men make, however, and had overworked; consequently his health began to fail and he was obliged to go down into the Rio Grande country to recuperate. He located at Eagle Pass, and there secured a position in the United States custom service, serving therein for about three years. He was then promoted to the captaincy of the mounted inspectors of customs, and now came to Del Rio to live, and has resided here ever since. In his official capacity, he had charge of all the mounted inspectors between El Paso and Webb counties, this territory covering seven hundred miles of river front. Such an office required an immense amount of work and executive ability, and he filled the position to the great satisfaction of the authorities. After his resignation from this post, he was elected county attorney, and served one term, later being elected county judge. He is now filling this office, this being his fourth term, and he has gained a reputation for fairness and clear administration of justice since his accession to the bench that has won for him great popularity.

In political affairs, he is a member of the Republican party, and is not only prominent in state politics, but is one of the strong figures in national Republican circles. He is at present chairman of the Republican state central committee, and has been a candidate for state offices more than once, though, in a state overwhelmingly Democratic, the entire ticket has failed of election. In 1896 Judge McDowell was the Republican nominee for the state senatorship from his district, and in 1900 he was nominated for state treasurer. He was a member of the school board in Del Rio for several years, during two of which he served as president of the board.

In fraternal affairs Judge McDowell takes an active interest. He is a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted and Royal Arch Masons and the Eastern Star, and he has held office in the order. He belongs to the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, being president of the state association. He is past exalted ruler of the local lodge, and at one time was district deputy grand exalted ruler for this district of Texas. He is also a member of the Woodmen of the World and the Sons of Hermann.

In religious matters, he is a member of no one particular church, but is a firm believer in Christianity and a liberal supporter of all of the churches in Del Rio.

Judge McDowell was married at Dickens, Texas, on the 1st of December, 1891, to Miss Callie Jones, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Jones of Dickens county. The judge and his wife have two sons, James Veto and Hobart K.

FREDERICK SCHAEFER. The proprietor of the second oldest drug business in the city of El Paso, Mr. Schaefer is a veteran business man of this city, and while he has been developing a very prosperous enterprise of his own he has at the same time witnessed and has given his cordial cooperation in the progress of a town which, when he first saw it, was almost insignificant so far as commerce was concerned, until El Paso is now the metropolis of western Texas and destined to be one day one of the largest cities between the Gulf and the Pacific Coast.

Frederick Schaefer is a native of Wuerttemberg, Germany, where he was born September 28, 1864, a son of J. M. and Friedricka Schaefer. The father, who was a substantial farmer, died in Germany. The mother, after her husband's death, immigrated with her family to America, and her death occurred at Sabetha, Kansas, in 1911, when at the very advanced age of eighty-five years. Frederick, who was the youngest of the six children, when a young boy attended the schools of Germany, but after his mother had moved to America and located in the state of Missouri he attended high school in that section of the country for some time.

However, at the early age of fifteen, in 1879, he began earning his own way, and entered a drug store. He continued in one employment until 1887, and thus acquired a valuable experience and laid the foundation for all his subsequent career. Mr. Schaefer came to El Paso in 1887. Only a few years had elapsed since crossing the Rio Grande, and American population was still disproportionate in number to the native Mexicans, and enterprise had advanced only a small degree in comparison with the modern expansion of the city. On arriving at El Paso, he began work for Mr. Campbell, who was one of the leading druggists of the day. A few years later, in 1889, he established himself in the drug business, and from a little store, which catered to a correspondingly small patronage during the early years of the town, he has kept his business apace with the extension of the city and increased population, and now has not only one of the oldest mercantile enterprises, but also one of the most popular and up-to-date drug stores in west Texas. He has also acquired valuable real estate property, and is today regarded as one of the prosperous men of El Paso.

In politics, Mr. Schaefer is a Democrat, but has never aspired to any office. Fraternally, he is affiliated with the Masonic Order, and has the degrees up to and including the Knights Templar, being affiliated with the

A. K. Curtis

Local Commandery. He is also a member of the Order of Elks. In 1897 Mr. Schaefer married Miss Hanna Schaefer, their marriage having been celebrated at Centralia, in the State of Washington. On April 7, 1899, at El Paso, there was born to their marriage Hilbert Schaefer, who is now a student in the public school of the sixth grade.

WYCLIFF KERR CURTIS, M. D. Western Texas has been fortunate in the high average of its settlers, for they have been not only men who have been successful in developing and improving the material resources of this vicinity, but have also maintained at a high standard the social and civic life of the various communities along the routes of the great railroad lines penetrating that section of the state. One of the best representatives of this citizenship is Dr. Curtis, of Midland, where he has been a resident for more than twenty years, was one of the early practitioners of medicine and though now retired from general practice is still a prominent factor in business and affairs in his splendid city and county.

Dr. Curtis has owed much of his success in life to his parentage and early training. He was reared in a home and community notable for its Christian character and high moral standards, and besides the fundamental training of his moral nature he was also liberally educated, and brought to the wealth of his profession unusual talents and the best equipment afforded by school and hospital. Wycliff Kerr Curtis was born in Bethany, West Virginia, on August 10, 1852, and was a son of Jacob E. and Melissa (Kerr) Curtis, the father a native of Maryland and the mother of Pennsylvania. Jacob Curtis was a boy when his family located in the panhandle of West Virginia, and he spent the greater part of his life in Bethany, where he was first a successful merchant, and then for a number of years editor and owner of the Pan Handle News at Wellsburg, West Virginia. Though until within recent years completely isolated from railroads, Bethany has been one of the most notable centers of religious and moral culture in the country. It was at Bethany that Alexander Campbell, founder of the Church of the Disciples, or the Christian Church, founded his seminary, which subsequently developed into Bethany College, and became the training ground for nearly all the early ministers of the church in this country. Alexander Campbell spent the greater part of his active career at Bethany. Jacob Curtis was prominent in the Disciples Church, and was a personal friend of Alexander Campbell, witnessed his will, and was a pall-bearer at his funeral. Mr. Curtis now makes his home in Lexington, Kentucky, being retired and residing with his daughter, Mrs. De Long. He is eighty-nine years of age and yet still enjoys life and fishing is one of his best pleasures. For half a century he has been a trustee of Bethany College, and has never missed a meeting of the board. He has lived a noble, wholesome life, successful from a business standpoint, and filled with those numerous kindly activities, which are the best fruits of human achievements. The mother of Dr. Curtis died in 1863. The five children in the family are named as follows: George C., who is editor and owner of the Pan Handle News at Wellsburg, West Virginia; Belle, now deceased, who was the wife of David Hahn; Dr. Curtis; Josiah L., now prominent in real estate and mining business at Los Angeles; Ida, who is Mrs. G. A. De Long of Lexington, Kentucky. Some years after the death of his first wife, Jacob Curtis married her sister, Sarah Kerr, and she is still living at Lexington, Kentucky, aged eighty-four years. There were no children by the second marriage.

Dr. Curtis was reared in the old town of Bethany and from the local schools entered Bethany College, where he was graduated A. B. in 1873. Bethany College in 1895 honored him with the degree of A. M. He entered upon his medical studies in the Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia, and was graduated with his medical degree in 1878. Wellsburg was the scene of his active practice for a number of years up to 1891, in which year he came to Midland, Texas, locating here at a time when there were few physicians and practically the only development was in the cattle raising industry. He has been with the town and vicinity throughout its period of substantial growth and is honored as one of the pioneer residents. He established an excellent practice and continued to attend to it until 1909. From the beginning of his residence at Midland he was local surgeon for the Texas & Pacific Railroad, and has always retained that post. He has also served as health officer for Midland since that position was created in the civic organization of the city.

In 1898 Dr. Curtis turned his attention to stock raising, and is now best known probably as one of the leading stockmen in this region. His ranches are located in Ector and Crane counties, and since giving up his medical practice he has devoted much of his time to this industry. Dr. Curtis is a director of the Midland National Bank, and owns a good deal of valuable real estate including a pleasant home in the city of Midland. He has membership in the state and district medical societies, and he and his wife worship in the Christian church.

In Masonry Dr. Curtis is one of the best known members in west Texas. His Masonic record is taken largely from a recent article published in the Dallas News. Dr. Curtis was made a Master Mason on August 1, 1876, in Bethany Lodge, No. 69, A. F. & A. M., at Bethany, West Virginia. He received the Council and Royal Arch degrees in Wheeling Union Chapter No. 1, at Wheeling, West Virginia, on October 30, 1882. He received the Red Cross degree on January 5, 1883, and on March 2, 1883, was created a Knight Templar in Cyrene Commandery at Wheeling. He is now a member and Past Master of Midland Lodge, No. 623, A. F. & A. M.; Past High Priest of Keystone Chapter, No. 172, and Past Thrice Illustrious Master of Keystone Council, No. 112, of Midland. He is a member of Big Springs Commandery, No. 31, at Big Springs. He received the degrees four to fourteen, on December 14, 1883, in McDaniel Lodge of Perfection, No. 1, at Wheeling; received the degrees fifteen to thirty-two by communication from Dr. A. B. Chamberlin, thirty-third degree sovereign grand inspector general in Texas, at Weatherford, on January 21 and 22, 1896. He was one of the charter members of Dallas Lodge of Perfection, No. 7, and is now a member of all the Scottish Rite bodies in the Valley of Dallas. He was elected Knight Commander of the Court of Honor in October, 1909, and is a member of the Royal Order of Scotland. He is a member of the Order of the Red Cross of Constantine, and also belongs to Hella Temple of the Mystic Shrine. The crowning honor of Dr. Curtis' masonic career came at a recent session of the Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite at Washington, D. C., where he was given the thirty-third degree honorary, and thus becomes one of a few Masons in Texas who has been honored in this distinctive way. It is also noteworthy that Dr. Curtis comes of Masonic ancestry. His grandfather, John Curtis, was a mason and belonged to the Lodge at Alexandria, Virginia, which General Washington attended, and furthermore was a soldier under General Washington during the Revolution and met the "Father of his country" in lodge sessions at Philadelphia and New York during the war. Dr. Curtis is also affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias and the Midland Lodge of the Woodmen of the World was organized in his office.

On December 19, 1901, Dr. Curtis married Miss Annie Glenn Reid, a native of Alabama, and a daughter of Thomas and Camille Josephine (Blunt) Reid, both of whom were natives of Alabama. After their marriage, Dr. Curtis and wife made a long wedding tour, during which they visited Cuba and Porto Rico and various points in the Carribean Seas. They have one son now ten years of age, Wyoliff Reid Curtis.

Dr. Curtis having lived at Midland for more than twenty years is thoroughly informed as to the resources and opportunities in this section of the state, and it is his belief that the country at large does not realize the splendid attractions of this locality, with its wonderful climate, its abundance of water, and its soil adapted not only for the raising of many kinds of grain and fruit, but for every kind of mixed farming.

WILLIAM R. HOARD, M. D. The reputation of the eminent physician and surgeon of any section is not gained in a day, unusual ability in this broad field demanding not only natural abilities, but the most thorough preparation, strenuous, continuous and intense application and industry. Broad education, natural tact and sympathy and fearless courage play their parts. Commencing practice some twenty-three years ago, Dr. William R. Hoard has labored in Sherman since 1898, and has steadily advanced to the front in reputation and the legitimate rewards of such a standing.

Born January 4, 1870, at Pilot Grove, Grayson county, Texas, Dr. Hoard is a son of W. D. and M. J. (Lively) Hoard. His father was born in Georgia, and came to Texas as early as 1849, first locating in Smith county, where he was residing at the time of his enlistment in the Texas Rangers, in which he rose to a lieutenantancy due to his bravery and achievements during the frontier period. At the outbreak of the war between the states he enlisted with a Texas company of volunteers, and served under the flag of the Lost Cause until the close of hostilities. On his return to Texas he located at Pilot Grove, where he established himself in business as a merchant, but subsequently went to Whitewright, Grayson county, and there continued in business successfully until his retirement, about seven years before his death, which occurred February 11, 1908. The mother still survives, and makes her home at Whitewright. There were four children in the family, of whom three are still living: John, who is now a retired farmer and makes his home at Whitewright; Horace, who is engaged in agricultural pursuits and also is engaged in the electrical business at Mineola, Texas, and Dr. William R.

The early education of Doctor Hoard was secured in the public schools of Whitewright, to which place he accompanied his parents as a lad, and this was supplemented by one year in the Baylor Academy. At that time he entered upon his medical studies, entering the University of Louisville, Kentucky, from which institution he was graduated in 1891, with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. With the acquirement of his diploma, however, Doctor Hoard did not give up his studies, for he has continued to devote himself most assiduously to his books and to original research and investigation, and each year since 1896 has taken a post-graduate course. He began to practice in his home city of Whitewright, but in 1898, desiring a wider field for the display of his abilities, he came to Sherman, and here has continued to remain, now having offices with the firm of Granby, Hoard, McElabanan & Spangler, at No. 117½ South Travis street. He belongs to the Grayson County Medical Society, the Texas State Medical Society and the American Medical Association, in the work of which he takes a keen and active interest, and belongs to various other organizations of the profession. Fraternally he is connected with the Free and Accepted Masons and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, while his religious belief is that of the Baptist church and his identification with the First congregation of that faith at Sherman. In political matters he is a Democrat, but he takes only a passive interest in the activities of the parties, except where their affairs affect his community. A strong, active and energetic man, he is always ready to assist in the advancement of projects for the benefit of his locality, and during the forty-four years that he has resided in Grayson county he has seen it grow in population and wealth into one of the most flourishing communities of the great Lone Star State. It is his professional opinion that the climate of this part of Texas is ideal, while in a business way he advises those who have ambition, determination and grit to cast their fortunes with this part of the Southwest. Although he has large interests in Oklahoma and believes in the future of that state, he maintains his own home in Sherman, where he has a handsome residence at No. 710 South Travis street. Like other lifelong Texans, Doctor Hoard is extremely fond of outdoor life, and several times a year takes a vacation from his arduous professional duties, and with dog and gun goes on an extensive camping and hunting trip to Southwestern Texas.

In 1893 Doctor Hoard was married (first) at Whitewright to Miss Emma King, daughter of J. H. and Ann King, early pioneer settlers of Grayson county, both of whom passed away several years ago. There were two children born to this union, namely: Miss Julia and Joseph, both of whom are attending school at Sherman. Mrs. Hoard died in February, 1899, and in 1903, Doctor Hoard was married (second) to Miss Lillian Childs, the daughter of W. B. Childs, who was a well-known farmer and stockman of Texas, and an old settler of Grayson county, who died several years ago. Doctor and Mrs. Hoard have had no children of their own, but are the foster parents of Miss Mack Hoard.

HON. CHOICE BOSWELL RANDELL. When Mr. Randell returned to Sherman from Washington, at the close of the sixty-second congress in March, 1913, he had the satisfaction of reviewing an exceptionally useful and prominent career of six terms, or twelve years in the national house of representatives. A lawyer of more than thirty years standing, Mr. Randell, by reason of his thorough ability, his progressive attitude and his training in political life, was one of the important factors in Washington legislative life during twelve years. In his first term, from 1901 to 1903, Mr. Randell represented the Fifth Texas District, and from the fifty-eighth to the sixty-second congress represented the Fourth District, his home being in the same county, but a change in the numeral designation of the district having occurred between his first and second election.

Choice Boswell Randell was born January 1, 1857, in Murray county, Georgia, and comes from good old American stock, long established in Georgia, where his parents were James L. and Louisa Amantha (Gartrell) Randell. His father was an educator, and followed that vocation for a number of years in Georgia, and was also a farmer. From Georgia he went out as a volunteer in the service of the Confederate government, and followed General Johnston in his numerous campaigns through the south. After the war he moved to the state of Arkansas, taught school, farmed, and finally lived retired until his death on April 11, 1906. His wife died May 31, 1904. There were seven children, four sons and three daughters, of whom Congressman Randell was the fifth. The two oldest sons are now deceased.

Born neither in poverty nor affluence, Mr. Randell came from that great class of middle prosperity, which has produced by far the greatest number of successful men and women in America. He had the advantage of a home of culture and high ideals, and so far as means permitted his education was prosecuted in the best schools, both private and public. Later he attended the North Georgia Agricultural College, and was a member of the class of 1878, though he did not graduate. After leaving school he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1878. He practiced for a short time in Georgia, and in January, 1879, located at Denison, Texas. For nearly thirty-five years he has been successfully identified with the Grayson county bar, and has always held a high position as a lawyer, as well as a leader in public matters. A number of years ago he took considerable interest in military affairs, and was appointed captain of the Gate City Guards at Denison, in March, 1879, and subsequently became colonel in the Fourth Texas Regiment of Militia. In 1881 he was elected city attorney of Denison, and was elected in 1882 county attorney for Grayson county, an office which he held for six years. In 1900 came his first election to congress from the Fifth Texas District. He served on a number of committees, in the House, and during his last term was a member of the important ways and means committee, and had much influence in promoting and working out the legislative problems before that committee, and before the house as a whole. Besides many other services while in congress, Mr. Randell gained particular notice as author of the Randell Anti-Graft Resolutions, which were passed, and which were designed to prevent members of congress from receiving any gifts or fees from corporations and individuals interested in any legislative matters that might come under consideration before the national congress.

Mr. Randell stands high in Masonic circles, being a Knights Templar, is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, the Improved Order of Red Men and the Woodmen of the World, belongs to the Sherman Commercial Club and his church is the Presbyterian.

On October 29, 1879, at Natchez, Mississippi, he married Miss Anna Marschalk, a daughter of Colonel Andrew Marschalk, who was born in Mississippi, and was a son in turn of Colonel Marschalk, who gained distinction as a Revolutionary soldier, the Marschalk family having long been prominent in Mississippi and other portions of the south. Mr. and Mrs. Randell have two children, one now deceased, and Andrew Earl Randell, who was born August 13, 1880, and has since been admitted to the bar and is now practicing law with his father, under the firm name of Randell & Randell, with offices in the Watson Building at Sherman. The family home is at 712 North Travis street.

ROY L. WHITEHEAD, attorney for Harris county, 301 to 303 Stewart Building, Houston, Texas, although a native of the Buckeye State, has been a resident of Texas since his early childhood. He has the liberal views and the broad spirit characteristic of the people of the big state in which he lives, and he has so directed his course as to gain recognition and position commensurate with his efforts and talents.

Roy L. Whitehead was born at Pataskala, Ohio, August 10, 1871, son of Ezra L. and Hattie C. (Clark) Whitehead, both natives of Ohio. His father, a shoe merchant, moved from Ohio to Texas in 1878, and settled at Austin, where he reared his family. Of his five children Roy L. was the second born. Roy L. was seven years of age at the time of their removal to this state, and at Austin he was educated in the public schools. As a young man he came to Houston and entered the law office of G. W. Tharp, under whose instructions he pursued the study of law until November, 1894, when he was admitted to the bar, and with whom he was subsequently associated in legal practice. In December, 1905, the firm of Tharp & Whitehead was formed, and under this name G. W. Tharp and Roy L. Whitehead conducted a successful business for a period of five years, until August 1, 1910, when by mutual consent the firm was dissolved. In May, 1909, Mr. Whitehead was appointed attorney for Harris county, to fill a vacancy. The following year he was appointed to succeed himself for a two years' term, and in 1912 he was again appointed for another term of two years. His reappointment to this position speaks for itself; it is prima facie evidence of his fitness for the office and his popularity with the people of the county.

Mr. Whitehead resides with his family at 1235 Harvard street, Houston Heights, and is an influential factor in the social and civic life of the suburb. For a number of years he has been a member of the Houston Heights

Board of School Trustees, and has served as secretary of the board.

Mr. Whitehead was first married, in 1895, to Miss Marcie B. Viglini, daughter of Capt. J. P. Viglini of Baton Rouge, Louisiana. She died in September, 1902, leaving two children, Marcie B. and Hattie L. May 22, 1907, he was united in marriage with Miss Ethel M. Laughton, daughter of Capt. J. P. Laughton of Houston, and by her he has two children, Ray Laughton and Bernice.

Fraternally, Mr. Whitehead is identified with the Knights of Pythias, the Odd Fellows and the Masons, his work in Masonry extending to and including the eighteenth degree Scottish Rite.

WILLIAM H. HUMPHRIES, a merchant and prosperous farmer of Edgewood, is one of the few men who have made a modest success by their own efforts, handicapped in their work by the enforced use of a crutch. Misfortune early made his acquaintance for he was but a child of eighteen months when typhoid fever seized him and his right leg perished as a result of the illness. For forty years he went about with one crutch, and then his right arm gave way under the long continued strain, so that he was forced to add another crutch to his means of locomotion. Thus he has gone through life, but he has met with courage and fortitude all of misfortune that has visited him and his success has been one of steady growth.

Born on April 8, 1862, William H. Humphries is the son of William E. Humphries and his wife, Louisa Fuston, who was the daughter of William Fuston. William E. Humphries died in October, 1862, as a result of wounds received in the Confederate service at Knoxville, Tennessee, in 1862. He was born in Georgia in 1833, was a man of fair education and a son of Shadrack Humphries. He was one of five sons and four daughters born to his parents, all of whom, with the exception of himself, spent their lives in Macon county, Alabama. The children of William E. and Louisa (Fuston) Humphries were as follows: Mary Ann, who married E. T. Barnett, both deceased; James M., who died in Texas leaving a family, and William H. of this review.

William H. Humphries reached mature years in Leake county, Mississippi, practically with no education. At the age of twenty-one he was unable to solve a simple problem in fractions, but he applied himself to study and in the Walnut Grove high school he took a complete course in the common branches. This, with a public service of four years and his long experience as a merchant in this state, have equipped him splendidly for business, and he is known for one of the most able and capable men in his community. Until he was twenty-five he continued as a farmer and despite his infirmities of body he could chop as much wood or hoe as much cotton as an able-bodied negro.

In 1887 Mr. Humphries was elected Clerk of the Chancery court of Leake county, Mississippi, and he filled the office from January, 1888, to January, 1892, his service being different from that of any clerk before or since in that he performed the work of the office alone. When his term expired he came to Texas and located in Edgewood, then a hamlet of about twenty-five people, and here he formed a partnership with R. M. Millsap, engaging in the mercantile business under the firm name of Millsap & Humphries, and continuing thus for four years. They then dissolved the partnership and Mr. Humphries associated himself in business with W. J. Pressley, in a general merchandise business, the same continuing for another four years. He then purchased the interest of his partner and for eleven years he ran the business alone with excellent success, until his store and stock were destroyed by fire, presumably the work of an incendiary, several wooden structures adjoining being also destroyed, and entailing a total loss of $5,000.

From November 24, 1911, the date of the fire, Mr. Humphries gave his attention to farming and to the development of his farming properties about Edgewood. He placed under cultivation as much as five hundred acres of land, caused half a dozen tenant houses to be built and contributed other improvements to various farms that he owns. His contribution to the growth of Edgewood proper comprises two residences and one of the few really good barns of Van Zandt county. His home stands forth as an example of thrift and neatness, the same being a large one-story cottage, built somewhat after the plan of the popular bungalow. In 1913 Mr. Humphries added two brick houses to the town in one of which he resumed business as a general merchant, and he is now operating along that line, as well as keeping up his farming activities.

In addition to his other interests Mr. Humphries in 1908 engaged in banking as one of the promoters of the Farmers and Merchants' State Bank of Edgewood, and was elected president of the bank, in which office he still continues, as well as serving on its board of directors. The bank was incorporated with a capital stock of $10,000, later increased to $20,000 and another increase in the capitalization brought the figures up to $35,000. Its officers are Mr. Humphries, Lee Joyner as vice president, and J. A. Lucas, cashier.

In his financial connections Mr. Humphries has displayed an exceptional ability and his place in circles of business and finance in the city is an unquestioned one. His word or opinion carries weight wherever it is heard and he stands well to the forefront in the ranks of the progressive and prosperous business men of the city.

On January 10, 1892, Mr. Humphries was married in his native state to Miss Mollie Pressley, a daughter of William A. Pressley and his wife, Mary (Boyd) Pressley, she being one of the seven children born to her parents, the others being as follows: Sallie the wife of M. T. Allen, living in Mississippi; Lucia, married to Green Allen of Carthage, Mississippi; Amelia, who died as the wife of Robert Flowers; William J. Pressley of Edgewood, Texas; Ira S. of Dallas, Texas, and Maggie, who died as the wife of Thomas Flowers, in Texas.

To Mr. and Mrs. Humphries two children have been born, James Eldridge and Shelton, both of whom share the family home in Edgewood.

Mr. Humphries is a Democrat in his political faith, but has taken no active part in politics since coming to Texas. He was reared in the atmosphere of a Methodist home and though he is not a member of that church he supports its work and encourages its usefulness in his community.

THOMAS J. CONSIDINE. For a number of years Mr. Considine has had charge of the weather bureau station at Amarillo. He is one of the older men in the service of the weather bureau, having been identified with this branch of the federal service for thirty years, ever since leaving college.

Thomas J. Considine was born at Rochester, New York, a son of Thomas J. and Elenor (Smyth) Considine. The father was a native of Dublin, Ireland, and was a man of unusual education and attainments and for a time was connected with the teaching force in the University of Dublin. After coming to America he located at Rochester, New York, where he was principal of the high school, and spent the rest of his career in that city. He died in 1862, at the age of fifty-six. The mother was born in New York State, and was married there. Her death occurred in 1862 at the age of forty-nine. There were four children, of whom Thomas J. was the oldest.

He obtained his education in the Rochester schools, finishing at the high school, and then entered the School of Technology at Boston, Massachusetts, where he was graduated in 1883. He almost immediately entered the government service in the weather bureau department, and his first post was at Mobile, Alabama, where he remained a year and a half. He was then transferred to Washington, D. C., for four years, spent seven years at Tampa, Florida; nine years in Erie, Pennsylvania, and then came to Amarillo to take charge of the station in this city.

Mr. Considine is affiliated with the Masonic order, with the Royal Arcanum, and the Knights of Pythias. He has membership in the Episcopal church. In 1885 at Mobile he married Miss Angeline Boulemet, a daughter of Augustus and Cornelia (Kimball) Boulemet, of an old and well-known family of Mobile. The one child born to their union is now Mrs. Clifford Braly, who was born in Washington, D. C., and is the wife of a well-known attorney of Dalhart. Mr. and Mrs. Braly have one child.

EDWARD P. BECTON, M. D. Representative of a family that was founded in Texas nearly three-fourths of a century ago and one whose name has been most worthily linked with the civic and industrial development and upbuilding of this commonwealth, it was given to Dr. Becton to mark the passing years with large and noble achievement and to gain precedence as one of the distinguished members of the medical profession. He was an influential figure in public affairs in the state that represented his home during virtually his entire life and his course was marked by lofty integrity, ideality of thought and motive, and by a sincere desire to be of use to his fellow men. He made his life count for good in its every relation and left a definite and benignant impress upon the history of the Lone Star state, where he served for a number of years as superintendent of the Texas institution for the blind. He represented his state as a surgeon in the Confederate army in the Civil war; he was a valued member of the state legislature; he was a man of fine intellectual and professional attainments; and as a loyal citizen he did all in his power to further those measures that make for social, moral, educational and material advancement. He was one of the pioneer physicians and surgeons of Texas, and labored with all of self-abnegation and devotion in the alleviation of human suffering and distress. His memory is revered by all who came within the compass of his benign influence, and this publication may well accord to him a tribute of honor in the offering of the brief memoir here presented.

Dr. Edwin Pinckney Becton was born in Gibson county, Tennessee, on the 27th of June, 1834, and was summoned to eternal rest when in the fullness of years and well earned honors. He was a son of Rev. John May Becton and Eleanor Emeline (Sharp) Becton, the former of whom was born in Craven county, North Carolina, on the 8th of January, 1806, and the latter of whom was born in Rutherford county, that state, a daughter of James Sharp; she passed the closing years of her life at Fort Worth, Texas, where she died at an extremely venerable age. Rev. John M. Becton, a son of Frederick Edwin and Fannie (May) Becton, was about one year of age at the time of the family removal from Craven county to Rutherford county, Tennessee, in which latter he was reared to adult age and received such educational advantages as were afforded in the schools of the locality and period. He was actively identified with agricultural pursuits until he entered the ministry of the Presbyterian Church, in 1835, his regular ordination as a clergyman of that denomination having occurred in 1841, in November of which year he removed with his family to the Republic of Texas, which did not become a commonwealth of the United States until 1845. He established his home at San Augustine, where he preached and taught school until 1844, when he removed to Nacogdoches county. Later he removed to Rusk county and established his home at Church Hill, where he continued to reside until his death, which occurred July 14, 1853. He was one of the most zealous pioneer clergymen of Texas and it is credited him with having organized in the state more churches than any other clergyman of his denomination in the pioneer era of Texas history. He is said to have been an elegant and fluent writer and an eloquent pulpit orator, and concerning him the following statements have been made: "He was broad and liberal in his views and, being a leader in church affairs in those days, drew about him a large following and a wide circle of friends and supporters. He was survived by three sons and one daughter, and the only daughter, Isabella, died in 1862. The eldest son, Joseph S., was a gallant soldier of the Confederacy and sacrificed his life in the cause, having been fatally wounded in a skirmish at Spanish Fort, Alabama, on the 9th of April, 1865—the very day which marked the final surrender of the Confederate forces. John A. Becton, the second son, was an influential citizen of Sulphur Springs, Texas, at the time of his death; and the youngest of the sons was he to whom this memoir is dedicated.

Dr. Becton was about seven years of age at the time of the family removal to Texas, and his early education was acquired in the common schools of the pioneer days, after which he attended for a time Austin College, at Huntsville, this state. At New Danville he began reading medicine under effective private preceptorship, and in the winter of 1855-6 he attended lectures in a medical school in the city of Nashville, Tennessee, later continuing his studies under the direction of able and representative physicians of that state, and finally completing a full course of lectures in the medical department of the University of Tennessee, in which he was graduated as a member of the class of 1857, with the highest honors of his class. He forthwith engaged in the practice of his profession at New Danville, Texas, and his high ideals in regard to his chosen vocation were manifested in his having later taken effective post-graduate courses in the medical departments of the University of Louisville, Kentucky; the University of Maryland, at Baltimore; Tulane University, in the city of New Orleans, and the New York Polytechnic. He continued in practice at New Danville, Rusk county, until April, 1862, when he subordinated all other interests to tender his aid to the Confederate cause. He enlisted as a private in the regiment commanded by Colonel Waterhouse, and soon afterward was appointed assistant surgeon in Fitzhugh's Texas Regiment. Within a short time thereafter he was promoted to the rank of surgeon and assigned to duty with the Twenty-second Texas Infantry, commanded by his warm personal friend, Colonel R. B. Hubbard, who later served as governor of Texas and as United States minister to Japan. Dr. Becton remained at his post, ever faithful and loyal, until the close of the war, when he returned to his home in Texas. In 1866 he located at Tarrant, Hopkins county, where he followed the work of his profession until 1874, when he removed to Sulphur Springs, the judicial center of that county, which continued to be the headquarters of his professional activities until he was appointed superintendent of the state institution for the blind, a position of which he continued the able and honored incumbent until the time of his death.

Though thoroughly en rapport with his profession and considering the same worthy of his undivided allegiance, Dr. Becton took a lively interest in civic affairs and was broad in his views and opinions touching matters of public polity. He was a staunch adherent of the Democratic party and, while he had no desire for public office, he consented to become a candidate for the lower house of the state legislature, to which he was elected by a large majority and in which he served with distinction as a member of the Twelfth General Assembly. He was an implacable adversary of the liquor traffic and in the campaign of 1887 he delivered many effective speeches in favor of the prohibitory amendment to the state constitution. He was a stickler in the observance of the high ethical code of his profession and held the highest vantage-ground in the confidence and esteem of his medical confreres. He served as president of the Texas State Medical Society and, with all of his splendid powers, he labored earnestly to bring his profession up to a high standard in his home state, the while he was an influential and honored member of the American Medical Association.

Dr. Becton had high reputation as an orator, and his services as a public speaker were much in demand, as his earnestness, beauty of diction, and sincerity marked his every utterance, and made his addresses singularly attractive and instructive, for he drew from the great resources of his broad mental reserve and from the experiences of a singularly active and productive career. He was also a frequent and valued contributor to the periodical literature of his profession, and he was long known as one of the leading physicians and surgeons of the state. In January, 1895, Dr. Becton was appointed, by Governor Culberson, to the responsible office of superintendent of the state institution for the blind, and his administration was marked by characteristic zeal, devotion and efficiency, as the records of the board of trustees fully indicate. The Doctor was affiliated with the Masonic fraternity, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Knights of Pythias, and both he and his first and second wives were earnest members of the Presbyterian Church.

On the 17th of November, 1857, was solemnized the marriage of Dr. Becton to Miss Mary Eliza Dickson, who was summoned to eternal rest in 1866 and who is survived by three children—Mrs. L. J. Wortham, Mrs. J. J. Nunnally, and Dr. Joseph Becton, concerning the last mentioned of whom individual record is given on other pages of this work. In 1867 the Doctor wedded Mrs. Olivia L. Smith, widow of Dr. P. L. Smith, and she passed away, at Sulphur Springs, in 1891. Of the three children of this union Mrs. Mary A. Chandler is deceased, and the two surviving are Mrs. Ellie Y. McDaniel and Edwin P. A man of great mind and great heart, Dr. Becton will long be remembered in the state which figured as the stage of his earnest endeavors and which he dignified and honored by his character and exalted services.

ANDREW J. POPE, M. D. A young physician who has done much to win the confidence and patronage of his community, and now enjoys a splendid practice, Dr. Pope has been a resident of Abilene since 1907, having come to this city soon after graduating from medical college and his experience as hospital interne.

Dr. Andrew J. Pope was born in Leon county, Texas, December 9, 1880, a son of James J. and Martha (Berry) Pope. His parents were also natives of Texas, and his father for many years was prominent as a ranch and cattle man of Leon county. He now resides in Normangee, Leon county, where he still carries on large operations in stock raising, is a director in the Normangee State Bank, and an influential factor in the up-building of his town and county. The mother's death occurred at Normangee on March 20, 1911. There were three children in the family, and the other two are mentioned as follows: Alice Pope is now Mrs. Frank Hopkins, of Cleburne, Texas, and Walter E. Pope is a prominent attorney at Corpus Christi, being city attorney and also having held the office of district attorney for Madison county.

Dr. Pope as a boy attended the public schools of Leon county, and, after finishing at the high school, entered Fort Worth University, in the academic department, and Southwestern University, Georgetown, and finished his professional studies in the medical department of the University of Texas, at Galveston, where he was graduated M. D. with the class of 1906. During the following year he served out an appointment as interne in the Seely Hospital, and then in 1907 located at Abilene, and has since maintained his office in this city. He gives all his time to his professional duties and has a large practice both in the city and country.

Dr. Pope is a member of the State Medical Society and the American Medical Association, and at the present time is a member of the Board of Pension Examiners at Abilene, is railroad surgeon for the Texas & Pacific Railroad Company, and is examiner for a number of the leading life insurance companies operating in West Texas.

On February 12, 1908, he married Miss Ruth Taylor, who was born in Nebraska, a daughter of W. F. Taylor. Her father is now deceased and her mother resides in Abilene. The one son of the Doctor and his wife is Joseph Baylor Pope. Dr. Pope, besides his successful medical practice, is the owner of ranch lands in Andrew county and has a pleasant home in Abilene.

WILLIAM D. HUTCHINSON. Among the progressive and successful business men of Merkel, Texas, is William D. Hutchinson, a member of a family that has long been prominent in the annals of Taylor county. Mr. Hutchinson is a comparatively young man, but he has had many years of practical experience, especially in his own line of business. He is a firm believer in modern methods of business and the success with which he has applied them to his own business has acted as a spur to others. He is always ready to give his services or his money to any movement which has the public welfare as its end, and is one of the most ardent advocates of better social and political conditions in the city of Merkel.

William D. Hutchinson is the son of D. Carrio and Mary J. (Dean) Hutchinson, both of whom are natives of Tennessee. The elder Hutchinsons settled in Texas in the early '70s, first locating in Tarrant county. For seven years they lived in that locality and then sold the farm which they had been operating there and moved to Denton county, where Mr. Hutchinson became a prosperous farmer and stock raiser. After seven years in Denton county they again moved, this time to Taylor county, where they located near Merkel. Here Mr. Hutchinson began farming operations on a large scale. He owned from four to six sections of land and had part of it under cultivation, raising cotton and grain. He was thus engaged until 1900, when he retired from active life. He was one of the leading men of Taylor county and his influence did not wane after his retirement. He is one of the wealthy and influential men of Western Texas today, and the entire family are widely known throughout the section. Eight children have been born to the elder Mr. Hutchinson and his wife, and five are still living. T. Hutchinson married J. T. Skillern, a merchant of Trent, Taylor county, Texas. Addie became the wife of John Campbell, who is a prosperous farmer of Taylor county. Mattie is Mrs. William Warren, her husband being a prominent farmer of Hunt county, Texas. Charles Hutchinson, who was formerly a merchant of Merkel, is now a farmer of Taylor county.

William D. Hutchinson was born on the 16th of September, 1878, in Denton county, Texas. He received his education in the public schools of Merkel and in Professor Collier's College in Buffalo Gap, Texas. He left school at the age of eighteen and engaged in the hardware business in Merkel, in partnership with his father and his brother, Charles Hutchinson. This business was continued for five years, and he then sold his interest and engaged in farming. This occupied him until 1901, his farm being located in Taylor county. He next went to Rotan, Texas, where he opened a hardware store. His past experience helped to make this venture a success, and he was doing a very profitable business, but he received a most advantageous offer for the business, and so sold out the store and stock to good advantage. After selling his business at Rotan he moved to Trent. During his residence at Trent he was one of the men who organized the Farmers' State Bank, and for two years he served as active vice-president of this institution, which proved a successful venture.

After selling his hardware business he decided that before going into the mercantile business again he would learn more of the practical selling end. He therefore secured a position as traveling salesman for the National Packing Company and was with them for eight months, his duties carrying him over a portion of the state. At the end of this time he resigned and he went to Southern California, where he spent the time in travel and observation and in study of mercantile methods as practiced in that wideawake coast state.

Returning to Merkel, Mr. Hutchinson proceeded to organize the Crown Hardware Company, the firm being formed in December, 1912. Its members are William D. Hutchinson, H. L. Propst, and Seth Hamilton. The company deals in all kinds of hardware, and in vehicles and implements as well, and has grown to be one of the leading concerns of its kind in Merkel, doing an increasing business each year. Mr. Hutchinson, himself, is secretary and treasurer, as well as an active manager of the concern, and all the experience and observation of the years in which he has been away from Merkel are now brought to his aid in making his business a success. He attributes his success to the training which he received from his mother and father and to their encouragement and substantial aid but his own energy and the strength of his personality have had a large share in making him the leading business man which he has become. In addition to his business he is the owner of a number of valuable pieces of real estate in Merkel, among these being his own attractive home.

In the fraternal world Mr. Hutchinson is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. His wife is an active member of the Methodist Episcopal church.

Mr. Hutchinson married on the 12th of June, 1900, Miss Oda Noble, a daughter of P. and Jessie Noble, the former being a pioneer rancher and a prominent man of Western Texas. Mr. and Mrs. Hutchinson are the parents of five children, as follows: Vivian H., Chester, William Jerome, Floyd A., and Mary.

STEPHEN D. REAVES, a retired lawyer and capitalist of Tyler, Texas, is a son of the late Judge Stephen Reaves, whose identity with this locality began back in pioneer times when Tyler was nothing but a log hut and a tent. The senior Reaves was born in Hancock county, Georgia, September 3, 1816, and was one of a large family whose father died in early life. Among the family were a number of sons, some of whom became prominent in the localities in which they spent their lives. John Reaves made his home at Wedonia, Alabama, where he was a conspicuous lawyer, and Rev. Benjamin Reaves was a Baptist minister in Alabama. Other members of the family maintained themselves as honorable citizens and followed various vocations, all being residents of the South.

Stephen Reaves, the father of Stephen D., was in his educational advantages limited to the popular schools. He crossed the threshold of no high institution of learning and the circumstances of the family ordered that he should win his spurs as a self-made man. Early in life he chose the law and his preparation for the profession devolved upon himself. He moved from his native state in 1839 and took up his residence in Alabama, where he continued for seven years. Then, in the spring of 1847, he came to Texas, landing at Tyler on the 4th of April. The rest of his life he was a citizen of this place. He at once became a member of the Smith county bar, and that same spring took part in the court held here. He proved himself a learned and capable lawyer; was a reliable counsellor, and established a confidence that maintained him as an authority upon intricate questions of law. He was not an orator, but his plain English and his "sledgehammer" blows helped to build a professional prestige second to few lawyers in East Texas. Also he was a good business man. He accumulated considerable property and at his death left a valuable estate. He left also the heritage of a Christian faith. For many years he had been a worthy member of the Baptist Church and had not an enemy on earth. Such was his sterling worth as a man that men like Governor Hubbard and Governor Roberts held it an honor to have him as their friend. He was elected to the State Senate in 1852 and took a prominent part in framing a code of good laws for the state. His service attracted the attention of Governor Bell, who offered him a commission at Supreme Court, but he declined the place, preferring to remain among his friends and serve them in other ways. He continued the practice of law until blindness afflicted him, some ten years before his death, and he feared death only because of the pain incident to it. During the Civil war he was a strong secessionist, he was a life-long Democrat, and he practiced politics as an aid to securing policies in harmony with his convictions. As indicated in the opening paragraph of this sketch, when he landed in Tyler it contained only one house and one tent. The house was at what is now the corner of College and Ferguson streets, and the tent was pitched near the present railroad crossing of the city.

Judge Reaves married, at Newman, Georgia, some time in the '30s, Miss Georgiana Walker, a daughter of William S. Walker and wife, Amy G. Walker. Mrs. Reaves' death preceded that of her husband; he died in 1905. Like him, she was a devoted Christian, and in her daily life exemplified the teachings and faith she professed. Their children were: Texana, who married D. G. Fones and spent her life in Little Rock, Arkansas; William L., a business man of Little Rock; Stephen D., the direct subject of this sketch; Edwin T., a banker of Little Rock; Algernon Sidney, a wholesale commission merchant of Little Rock, and Emma, wife of J. M. Oden, of Tyler, Texas.

Stephen D. Reaves was born in Tyler, Texas, April 13, 1856. After his graduation in 1877, from the law department of the Cumberland University, Tennessee, he formed a partnership with his father and Captain Thomas W. Dodd, as junior member of the firm of Reaves, Dodd & Reaves. It was not long before he was elected city attorney of Tyler, and after having filled that office a year he was appointed clerk of the Supreme Court of the state, Tyler division, and served until the legislature consolidated the court at Austin in 1892. He was subsequently appointed clerk of the Court of Civil Appeals at Galveston and, when the work of the office was properly organized, he resigned and returned home, and became junior member of the law firm of Reaves, Walker & Reaves. A few years later he was appointed referee in bankruptcy by Federal Judge Bryant, a Republican and one of the eminent jurists of this state. In this capacity Mr. Reaves served six years, at the end of that time resigning in order to engage in business as a banker.

He promoted the State Bank and Trust Company of Tyler, with a hundred thousand dollars capital, and was elected one of its officers. The following year, however, he disposed of his interests in this institution and retired from further active business. He is a large property owner in Tyler and has endeavored to maintain the attitude of his father in his relation to his community.

Politically, Mr. Reaves has always been an earnest Democrat and has seldom missed being a delegate to the state convention of his party. He helped nominate Governor Roberts in the famous contest between Hubbard and Throckmorton, and did a like service for every other gubernatorial nominee of the state till 1906.

In January, 1880, Mr. Reaves married Miss Bengie Abbott, a daughter of Dr. S. F. Abbott, who came to Texas from Virginia, where, at Appomattox, Mrs. Reaves was born. Their only child is James Gould Reaves.

This son was born in Tyler, and at the age of fifteen, without the consent of his parents, left home, and is to-day winning his way, independently, to the forefront of "big business" in the United States. He manifested a strong tendency as a man of wonderful initiative and he entered the field of business as a promoter of oil companies for the Purified Petroleum Products Co. of Kansas City. At this writing he is on the Pacific Coast, seeking to bring about a consolidation of the independent oil interests there. Fraternally, he is an Elk and a thirty-second degree Mason, having membership in these organizations at Kansas City.

REV. OTTOMAR E. SCHMIDT. The days of the hard-working pioneer churchman in Texas are not yet passed, in spite of the fact that railroads have opened up nearly every county to settlement. Out on the western borders of the Panhandle, where congregations are small and widely separated, comparatively few of the churches are able to support a resident minister, and in consequence the pastoral duties require the most strenuous kind of traveling and incidental labors.

It is in that field that Rev. Schmidt, a vigorous and devoted young minister of the Lutheran faith, has been appointed, and he has the distinction of being the first resident preacher in Parmer county, his home being at Rhea. Fresh from college and theological seminary, he went out to that country in 1911, and that great personal sacrifice has performed a valuable service for a large community. Mr. Schmidt lives twenty miles from a railroad, and as he serves a number of different churches, it is necessary for him to be on the road, driving, or on railroad cars a large part of the time. To some of the towns where he has congregations, he drives with team and buggy and pieces out some of his journeys with the aid of railroad schedule. His different charges are located in the northern part of the Panhandle, and some of the towns are Friona, in Parmer county; Hereford, in Deaf Smith county; Canyon, in Randall county; and Grady, across the line in New Mexico.

Ottomar E. Schmidt was born in Saginaw, Michigan, January 28, 1887. He is a son of Professor Joseph M. and Sarah (Tyson) Schmidt. His father has for many years been one of the prominent ministers and teachers in the Lutheran church, and both father and son pursued practically the same course of instruction and are graduates of the same schools. The father was born at Altenburg, Perry County, Missouri, while the mother was a native of Liverpool, Ohio, and raised in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. The father grew to manhood in his native town, received a common school education as preliminary to his life work, and then entered Concordia College at Fort Wayne, Indiana. After his graduation there, he was a student in the Concordia Seminary at St. Louis, and finished his courses in preparation for the Lutheran ministry in 1868. For twenty-six years he was an active minister to his people at Saginaw, Michigan. In 1894 he was appointed a director and superintendent of the college, and held that chair for nine years. He is at present professor of Hebrew, Latin, and History at Concordia College, and he and his wife still live at Fort Wayne. They were the parents of twelve children, nine of whom are still living, and Ottomar E. was ninth in order of birth.

Like his father, after finishing the common schools of Fort Wayne, he entered the Concordia College of that city, and followed that by attendance at the Concordia Seminary in St. Louis, entering the latter school in 1906 and remaining there three years. In order to pay his own way, he then left school, and for two years was teacher in Madison county, Nebraska. Returning to Concordia Seminary in 1910, he finished his studies there in 1911, and almost at once was appointed to his arduous labors in northwest Texas.

Rev. Schmidt is unmarried and all his thoughts and labors are directed to the high calling which he has chosen for his life work.

ROBERT Y. LACY, M. D., on both his paternal and maternal sides comes from pioneer Texas families, both his grandsires having settled in Anderson county as emigrants, founding and giving the first spark of urban life to the city of Palestine. His paternal grandsire, William Young Lacy, was a native of Virginia, who drifted south into Tennessee and stopped for a time in the county in which General Houston was a coming young man, even before he became Governor of that commonwealth. The maternal grandfather was a native of France, a member of the DeBard family who were of the peerage. He was a student in medicine when he found it convenient to exile himself from his native land as a result of having fought a duel in the stead of the principal whose second he was to be. He reached America at some point in Virginia and appeared in Tennessee about the same time that Mr. Lacy first located in that state, and there he became the associate of Lacy, Houston and John H. Reagan, all of whom came later to Texas and established themselves at Palestine at the same time. Dr. DeBard brought out a young French Surveyor who platted the town of Palestine, and its principal streets were named in honor of Lacy, DeBard, Reagan, Yeager, McCray, and after other members of their families. All made that community their final home with the single exception of General Houston, and all performed important service in business or professional ways as makers of the city and upbuilders of the country thereabouts.

Chief among these, perhaps, was William Young Lacy, grandfather of the subject. He was ever an effective force in business in Palestine, and likewise demonstrated in no uncertain manner his ability as a financier. He was mayor of the city for fourteen years and finally died here when he was seventy-six years old. One of his sons was William Martin Lacy, the father of Dr. Lacy.

William Martin Lacy was born at Alto, Texas, in 1849. He was given a liberal education, and took his Bachelor of Laws degree from the Louisiana University, after which he practiced law in Palestine and Groesbeck for a brief period and then engaged in the mercantile business in Palestine. He became a prominent figure in Democratic politics of the state, as well as in local politics, and like his father before him, served his city several years as mayor, and also as county treasurer. He was appointed by Governor Sayers as superintendent of Penitentiaries, from which office he resigned and engaged in banking in Abilene, as the organizer of the Commercial National Bank, of which he was its president when he died. His interest in the politics of his party carried him time and again to state conventions, and won him a place on the Texas delegation to the National Democratic Convention in Chicago in 1884, where Mr. Cleveland was nominated for president. He appeared in the state convention from Abilene as a supporter of Mr. Campbell for governor and aided in bringing about his nomination as manager of his campaign. He was a Knights Templar Mason, an Elk and a Knight of Pythias, and a deacon of the Presbyterian church. His death occurred on December 28, 1910. In 1870 Mr. Lacy married Miss Mary DeBard in Palestine, Texas. She was a daughter of Dr. E. J. DeBard, previously referred to in this review, and who died in Palestine in 1883. The genial doctor went through the Indian troubles as a defender of the settlers of Texas, and did his full part in the work of maintaining a semblance of civilization on the frontier, in those early days when Texas was in the throes of a turmoil resultant from conditions existing without her borders, as well as within. Mrs. Lacy died in 1879, the mother of four children, two of whom died in childhood, and the others being Robert Yeager Lacy of this review, and Julia, who died in Denton, Texas, as Mrs. Sidney J. Carroll. Mr. Lacy married a second time, Miss Mattie Moore becoming his wife. She was a native of Carthage, Texas, and she died in early life, leaving three children. Hensley, the eldest, was graduated from the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis in 1902, and is now a senior lieutenant in the Navy. Walter H. is cashier of the Commercial National Bank of Abilene, and Frank is a traveling salesman in Lower California. Mr. Lacy's third wife, who was Mrs. Elia Epperson, bore him no issue.

Robert Yeager Lacy was born in Palestine on January 1, 1875. He spent his childhood and youth in the town of his birth and prepared himself for the Southwestern University at Georgetown in the city schools of that place. He left the University in his junior year, after which he took up the study of medicine in the University of Texas, where he spent three years in his preparation for his profession. He then entered historic old Jefferson Medical at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and in 1901 was graduated from that institution. After a brief service as a hospital-interne in Palestine he located in Pittsburg, Texas, his present home, and here is enjoying an ever increasing practice. In 1905 Dr. Lacy took post-graduate work in the New Orleans Polyclinic and in 1913 he attended the Chicago Post-Graduate school of Medicine. He is a member of the county, district and State Medical societies and of the American Medical Association. His fraternity affiliations are with the Alpha Mu Pi Omega (Med.) and he is a Scottish Rite Mason of the Dallas Consistory.

Dr. Lacy married Miss Florence Harmon of Bryan, Texas, on October 30, 1901. She is a daughter of Judge Harmon, for many years county judge of Brazos county and an A. B. graduate of Seoul College. To Dr. and Mrs. Lacy have been born two children: William Martin, Jr., born in 1903, and Julia Eugenia, born in 1906.

JAMES SHIELS. That Texas resources and opportunities and personal enterprise harmonize and produce splendid results both for the individual and the community, is well illustrated in the career of James Shiels who came to the northeastern section of the state about forty years ago, a young Scotchman without capital and with little experience in things which would be considered essential in Texas, and who is now the leading dry goods merchant and one of the most influential factors in the commercial life of Leonard in Fannin county.

James Shiels was born in Scotland, December, 1850, a son of Alexander Shiels, who was born in Berwickshire, Scotland, in 1818, was a stock commission man and long identified with the stock business of his country. He was a Presbyterian, a man of education, and a useful factor in his community. He died in 1868. The maiden name of his wife was Sybilla Smith, who died December 10, 1850. The father married again, and among his other children was one who is now a business man in Dallas, Texas.

James Shiels was reared in Scotland, and received education chiefly in the noted institution of the University of Edinburgh. He was trained for a mercantile career, and his education, his experience in mercantile affairs, and his industry comprised his capital when he ended his journey from Scotland at Bonham, Texas, in 1873. To maintain himself while seeking larger opportunities, he obtained a clerkship in a local store. He next tried farming, but discovered that he was not fitted for that industry, and after one season returned to merchandising. He came to Leonard, and in 1887 became a partner of the well known old merchant Wm. W. Yates, now of San Antonio. With the capital which he had accumulated during his years of industry on American soil he bought a half interest in the Yates store, and the partners had a stock worth thirty-five hundred dollars. The firm continued in business in a frame building on the site now occupied by Mr. Shiels' brick establishment until the disastrous fire during the nineties cleaned up the entire plant. Mr. Yates retired after this fire, and Mr. Shiels settled with the Insurance Company, bought the ground and rebuilt with a two-story brick structure. He then resumed the dry goods business with a modest stock, and since then has extended his trade and his facilities until every inventory finds his stock now worth about twenty-five thousand dollars. Until 1905 he carried on the establishment alone, and that year admitted to partnership his son Ernest, under the firm name of James Shiels & Son, and together they are energetically extending their trade throughout the surrounding countries.

Mr. Shiels has exercised good judgment in investing a large part of the profits of his mercantile business in the Texas black land. He foresaw a number of years ago that the black land belt of Texas would in time be the agriculture center for the entire state, and put his money into this form of property when it could be bought comparatively on easy terms. Since then he has accumulated several tracts in Collin, Fannin and Hunt counties, now aggregating more than six hundred acres. He has improved this land, built homes for tenants, fenced all the cultivated fields, and to a large extent his land is under the plow, and each season produces splendid crops from the old hog-wallow soil. Mr. Shiels believes in improving every piece of property, and in directing his enterprise to his personal comforts and the benefit of his community, and besides the brick store building which is one of the most conspicuous features in the town of Leonard he is owner of a comfortable home of his own and of several residences in Leonard. He and his son are stock-holders in the First National and the First State Banks of Leonard, and his son Frank is a director in the First State Bank of Leonard, Texas.

Mr. Shiels has offered his services to the community when business would permit and has served on the school board. His early training and environments made him a strong advocate of higher education, and he is prompt to seize every opportunity to give his town better school advantages. The Shiels family for many years have been among the most prominent supporters of the local Presbyterian church, and Mr. Shiels has always been an active member in the lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and of the Knights of Pythias. Mr. Shiels is a man of strong and unimpaired physique, has never required the services of a doctor, his eyesight is still normal, and almost every day he may be seen about his business and he buys and grades cotton along with the experts of the Leonard market, and without hazard or fault.

Mr. Shiels was married near the town of Leonard to Miss Jane Sudderth, a daughter of the pioneer Abe Sudderth, who came to Texas from Georgia. Mr. Shiels and wife are the parents of the following children: Thomas, who died at the age of thirty-one and by his marriage to Kate R. Ruff, left two sons, Frank, who is active in the real estate and insurance business in Leonard; Earnest of Colorado Springs, Colorado; Henry, who died at the age of eighteen; Robert, who is with the General Electric Company at Chicago, as one of the department managers; and Albert, a lad of fifteen years and who has the distinction of being called the youngest merchant in Leonard. Mr. Shiels thoroughly approves the progressive political principles which have been so much in evidence within recent years, and is an ardent follower of Woodrow Wilson and supported the Democratic ticket in the last campaign.

THE LAMAR FAMILY. The Lamar name has many memorials in Texas—one county; probably every city has a Lamar street—and even to those unacquainted with Texas history and the conspicuous part played by the original bearer of this name here, the word is as familiar as Houston, Crockett, and other similar titles. Called the "Chevalier Bayard of Texas," and president of the Texas Republic from 1838 to 1841, Mirabeau B. Lamar has his own peculiar place and distinguished role of action in the creation of Texas as a nation and state. His descendants still live to do him honor, and through collateral lines other Lamars have likewise made illustrious this name. Without the necessity for even this preface, it is singularly appropriate to include in this publication the following brief outline of the Lamar family in America, and a more extended sketch of the career and achievements of General Lamar himself.

In the various family records, after its settlement in America, and prior to 1697, the name appears under different forms, as Lemare, Lemaire, Lamore, DeLamaire, Lemar, Lemarre, LaMar and finally Lamar. One ancestor, Edes Le Maire, of Champagne, in 1085, made a journey to the Holy Land on foot in place and instead of Philippe 1st. The founder of the family in the United States was Thomas Lamar, of Wicre, Flanders, and of France, a French Huguenot. In the Annapolis land records of November 17, 1663, there appears the following: "Whereas, Thomas and Peter Lamore, late of Virginia, and subjects of the Crown of France, having transported themselves into this province, here to abide, have besought us to grant them, the said Thomas and Peter Lamore, leave to here inhabit as free denizens and freedom land to them and their heirs to purchase," etc. Patents of naturalization were granted Thomas and Peter Lamore in 1663. "Thomas Lamore settled upon fifty acres of land, known as 'fishing place,' Calvert county, Maryland, situated on the west side of the Patuxent River and the north side of Trent Creek, which adjoined other land on that creek already in his possession." The records prove that prior to 1696 Thomas Lamore owned much property in the province and he must also have had landed possessions in England, since such were willed to his wife during her widowhood. When coming into Maryland from Virginia, Thomas Lamore made application for land, for transportation of himself and his wife Mary, so that he must have been married prior to entering the province. He must have been married twice—first to Mary, and, second to Ann, who survived him and was his executrix, and whose maiden name was Pottinger, a descendant of Sir Thomas or Sir William Pottinger. He (Thomas Lamar) died in Maryland and his will was probated May 29, 1714. He was buried near Fishing Place in Calvert county. In 1696 Fishing Place was thrown into Prince George's county. The records of the county prove that Thomas Lamore had large landed interests prior to 1696. His will refers to him as of Prince George's county.

From the emigrant Thomas Lamore to the present time the interests of the family have lain more in the open country than in crowded cities. The Thomas Lamar who died in 1748, owned at that time about three thousand acres of land in the section about Rockville, Maryland, Gaithersburg and Hunting Hill. These include a tract called Joseph and James, of a thousand acres; also Conclusion, The Pines, Two Brothers, Hunting Hill and others. Shortly after the death of Thomas Lamar and the division of the estate, his heirs removed from Maryland and settled in South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama. Their going appears to have been a veritable family heira, participated in by sons and daughters and by the husbands of the latter. Some are recorded as going to Beaufort county, South Carolina, to Edgefield county, Georgia, and to Richmond county, Georgia.

Thomas Lamar, who married Eleanor and who was a son of Thomas Lamar 2nd, had valuable tracts of land on the Savannah River. Elizabeth Lamar, the latter's youngest sister, who married in 1747, Joseph Wilson, never left Montgomery county, Maryland, and her descendants still live there. Another brother had a grant of three hundred acres of land on Beaver Dam Creek, South Carolina. Most of them were prosperous planters and slave owners before the Civil war.

Records of the family prove that the Revolutionary war, the War of 1812, the Civil war, the Texas revolution against Mexico, and the Mexican war, the Lamars rendered brave services, and most of them ranked as officers—Major Maren Lamar, killed at Parle Tavern; Col. William Lamar; General Maximilian Lamar, killed at Saratoga, and Captain Abraham Lamar, with others, all served in the Revolutionary war. Col. William Lamar was one of the distinguished officers. At the siege of "Ninety-six" the immortal Kosciuszko was his fellow-soldier and served under him for a while. Many of the daughters of the house of Lamar married into families distinguished for Revolutionary and Civil war records.

The glory of the military heroes of the family is fully equalled by the attainments of others who have wielded the pen in even mightier strength than the sword. Judge L. Q. C. Lamar, Sr., was prominent both as a lawyer and on the bench; Judge Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus Lamar, of the United States Supreme Court; Judge Howell Cobb, and Judge Andrew J. Cobb were grandsons of Zacharias Lamar, and their sister, Mary Ann Cobb, married Judge Alexander S. Erwin. Prudence Lamar, daughter of Basil Lamar, of the fourth generation, married the son of the founder of Winnesboro, South Carolina, and Dr. Jabez Lamar Curry, of Washington, District of Columbia, is a descendant from her.

The direct line of descent from the founder of the family in America to General Mirabeau B. Lamar is stated as follows: Thomas (1) by his first wife had Thomas (2); John, a son of Thomas (2) had some five children. Of these were John (2) and Thomas, John (3), a son of John (2), married Rebecca, his cousin, a daughter of Thomas last named. John (3) and Rebecca, were the parents of Mirabeau B. Lamar.

Mirabeau B. Lamar was born in Louisville, Georgia, August 15, 1798. In 1828 he established the Columbus Inquirer, a state's rights paper, to which he contributed many splendid essays upon the government of the United States. When young he married Tabitha Jordan, daughter of Burnwell Jordan, by whom he had one child, Rebecca Ann. The loss of his first wife and later his young daughter cast a cloud over the early years of General Lamar's life.

In 1835 he visited Texas in search of health, obeying in his travels the dictates of an adventurous spirit, which seemed ever to have possessed him. He found the Texans suffering under Mexico's oppression. Lamar was an eloquent speaker, and though he was a stranger, his interest and sense of justice were so stirred that he was asked to express himself at a public meeting in the little town of Washington. His speech was one of fiery eloquence, carrying all before it. His was the first voice publicly to declare for independence. "My advice," he cried, "is to strike for independence and for that alone. Some are in favor of proclaiming for the restoration of the constitution of 1824. What shall we gain by this? The same blood and treasure which it will cost to re-establish that authority will secure our nationality. Better first dethrone the usurper, and then we shape our own destiny. He is already on our borders, and do you tremble at the disparity of the two forces? That might be well if it were not for the justice of our cause. He alone is strong who draws for the right and feels no fear. He is not only strong within himself but doubly so within the sympathy of others. Then 'throw the banner on the outer wall' and let the wind that sports in its flowing folds waft the glad tidings to the chivalry of our native land."

Lamar had not come to Texas prepared to remain, but he saw that there was a struggle imminent and he longed to be in it. So he returned to the States to make preparations to locate permanently in the new country. On learning that Santa Anna had begun his invasion of the land, he did not wait to settle his own affairs but hastened back eager to offer his services in the cause of freedom. In the meantime San Antonio had been captured, Milam had been killed, the Georgian Battalion had met its terrible fate at Goliad; the tragedy of the Alamo had been enacted.

The next sight we have of him is at the famous and decisive battle of San Jacinto. He had arrived at Velasco by sea, and finding no means of conveyance to the interior, had tramped the long distance between that seaport and Groce's Crossing, where he found the army and enlisted as a private. The army had, unaccountably, retreated from the Colorado, fifteen hundred strong, before an enemy with half that number, occasioning untold loss of property and suffering to the western settlers, who were obliged to abandon their homes to the desolating invader, and doing much to destroy the soldiers' faith and confidence in their leaders. Such was the condition of things when Lamar arrived upon the scene.

He was a stranger and he enlisted as a private, but it was not long before his metal and value to the army were discovered. The day before the great battle there was a preliminary skirmish, Col. Lane was surrounded by a body of Mexican Cavalry, and was in imminent peril for his life. Lamar saw the officer's danger, and dashed to his rescue, overturning one Mexican, killing another, disarming a third. His efforts were successful. Lane was saved. For this act of daring bravery, which forms the subject of one of the large oil-paintings adorning the walls of the senate chamber in the capitol at Austin, Lamar was forthwith unanimously elected to the command of the cavalry. In this capacity he so distinguished himself at the battle the next day as to win the praiseful mention of his name and conduct in General Houston's official report. Says the report: "Our cavalry, sixty-one in number, commanded by Colonel Mirabeau B. Lamar (whose gallant and daring conduct on the previous day had attracted the admiration of his comrades and called him to that station) placed on our extreme right, completed our line. Our cavalry had charged and routed that of the enemy upon the right, and given pursuit to the fugitives, which did not cease until they arrived at the bridge."

Lamar's popularity was so great and his value as a soldier so generally recognized that after the battle of San Jacinto, he became a member of Provisional President Burnet's Cabinet, as secretary of war. A few months later he was elected vice-president, with Houston as president, and two years later the second president of the young Republic. Truly a phenomenal rise! Private one day, Colonel of Cavalry the next, Secretary of War within a few weeks, vice president within a few months, president at the next election—two and a half years after his unassuming introduction to the country!

As a member of Burnet's Cabinet, Lamar strenuously and consistently opposed the ratification of the Treaty by which Santa Anna was set free, feeling that the Mexican president had, by his violation of his country's contracts with the American settlers and by his brutal butchery of the garrisons at San Antonio, Goliad, and elsewhere, more than forfeited his freedom. He strongly advocated his execution, but his sense of loyalty to the government was such that when the obnoxious treaty had been signed he used his eloquence in defense of the president, and the other authors and advocates of the treaty, with telling effect, successfully stemming the tide of popular indignation and opposition which threatened nothing less than the court-martial of the president and the overthrow of the government.

The main feature of Lamar's administration, which lasted from 1838 to 1841, are thus catalogued by the Texas Almanac for 1858: "The policy of Lamar's administration embraced four leading objects: First—The defense of the country, and especially that of the frontier, which was crying aloud for protection against the merciless savages. Second—The obtaining of the recognition of our independence by the principal maritime powers of Europe, and of establishing with them the best commercial relations. Third—The purification of the different departments of government, and establishing a rigid responsibility among public officers of every grade and class. Fourth—The creation of an educational fund by adequate appropriations of land for that purpose. These ends were not only carried out effectually by Lamar, to the honor of himself and glory of the nation, but the blessings which flowed from them were immediately felt by the peace and safety that reigned at home, as well as by the character and importance which the country acquired abroad."

The provision for the future maintenance of public schools was perhaps the greatest of the many great accomplishments of his administration. "Perhaps," says a critical writer of a later day, "there is no one part of Lamar's administration that reflects more credit on his patriotism and foresight than his increasing efforts to secure a permanent support to the cause of education by a liberal appropriation of the public lands. This object he finally accomplished during the second session of the congress in Austin by procuring the passage of a law setting apart fifty leagues of land as an endowment for a university. This measure, notwithstanding its manifest importance, met with the strongest resistance from a large minority of Congress, who, after the passage of the law, succeeded in defeating a bill authorizing the survey of these lands, but nevertheless, Lamar assumed the responsibility of ordering the survey to be made, and it was accordingly done, and by this means, these lands were secured for the purposes intended. It would seem but an act of justice that the State University now established should," he adds, "bear the name of the man by whose efforts this ample endowment was thus provided."

In the course of an address before the State Teachers' Association, the late President Prather, of the State University Board, referred to Lamar as a scholar, a patriot and a statesman, "to whom the cause of State education in Texas owes more than to any other man," and quoted from Lamar's first message to Congress in 1839, urging the establishment of a general system of education in obedience to the command of the first constitution of the Republic of Texas. "If we desire," said President Lamar, "to establish a Republican Government upon a broad and permanent basis, it will become our duty to adopt a comprehensive and well regulated system of mental and moral culture. * * * It is admitted by all that cultivated mind is the guardian genius of democracy, and while guided and controlled by virtue is the noblest attribute of man. It is the only dictator that freemen acknowledge and the only security that freemen desire. The influence of education in the moral world is like light in the physical, rendering luminous what was before obscure. * * * Without its aid how perilous and insufficient would be the deliberations of a Government like ours! How ignoble and useless its legislation for all the purposes of happiness! How fragile and insecure its liberties! Cultivation is as necessary to the supply of rich, intellectual and moral fruits as are the labors of the husbandman to bring forth the valuable productions of the earth. * * * Lose not the present auspicious opportunity to provide for literary institutions with an influence commensurate with our future destinies. * * * Our young Republic has been formed by a Spartan spirit. Let it progress and ripen into Roman firmness, and Athenian gracefulness and wisdom. Let those names which have been inscribed on the standard of her national glory be found also on the page of her history, associated with that profound and enlightened policy which is to make our country a bright link in that chain of free states which will some day encircle and unite in harmony the American continent. * * * The present is a propitious moment to lay the foundation of a great moral and intellectual edifice which will in after ages be hailed as the chief ornament and blessing of Texas. A suitable appropriation of lands for the purpose of general education can be made at this time without inconvenience to the government or the people; but defer it until the public domain shall have passed from our hands, and the uneducated youths of Texas will constitute the living monuments of our neglect. To commence a liberal system of education a few years hence may be attended with many difficulties. The imposition of taxes will be necessary. Sectional jealousies will spring up, and the whole plan may be defeated in the conflict of selfishness, or be suffered to languish under a feeble and inefficient support. A liberal endowment which will be adequate to the general diffusion of a good rudimental education in every district of the Republic and to the establishment of a University where the highest branches of science may be taught, can now be effected without the expenditure of a single dollar. Postpone it a few years and millions will be necessary to accomplish this great design."

"That message of President Lamar to Congress," comments President Prather, "was a trumpet call to duty, and they responded by passing an act providing for a general system of education, and set apart from the virgin soil of Texas four leagues of land for the establishment of an academy in each county then or thereafter organized and fifty leagues for the establishment of two colleges or universities."

Another has left on record this tribute to Lamar's statesmanship: "Corruption and disorder reigned in many of the departments, and a swarm of insatiable land speculators were leagued together to plunder the infant Republic of large tracts of her public domain—her only source of future wealth or means of paying the public debt. Lamar punished the department with a vigorous hand and established order and responsibility in all the branches of the government. There were men in his cabinet, as there have been in other cabinets, who were willing to grow rich on the plunder of the public lands, and in Texas, as elsewhere, a venal press could be bought up to aid and share in the plan of spoliation; but the inflexible integrity of the president defeated all their plans. His firm defense of the public interests made the whole body of disappointed speculators his inexorable enemies, but all their efforts could not swerve him from his purpose."

"The scheme of land plunder and President Lamar's opposition to it is one of the chapters of unwritten history which may never be put wholly on record, but it is well worth the trouble for the lesson it would convey. The land he saved from these harpies now forms the noblest educational fund ever possessed by any state, and for this wise provision for a superior and universal system of instruction, the youth of Texas is indebted to the care and efforts of Mirabeau B. Lamar. But for his firm measures, which in their day many condemned as too vast and visionary, Texas would not be in a condition to create at her own expense, or provide the means, as she has done, for the Southern Pacific Railway Company to construct a railroad for eight hundred miles of the best route to the Pacific, years in advance of any other possible and paying mode of opening a national highway from ocean to ocean. Present space does not permit the details of the bold, clear, comprehensive policy of Lamar, which included, besides the protection of the public domain, an inflexible persistence in sustaining the originally-claimed boundaries of Texas, which included New Mexico."

"The Union is much indebted to the far-sighted policy of President Lamar and to his resolute determination never to recede from the Brazos and if possible to press beyond it, and finally bring benighted California under the light of the single star. But for his broad, well-defined and consistent measures, Texas would have been cut down and complicated into a situation that would have materially lessened the extent and value of the new state, if it had not rendered the annexation altogether undesirable to the Union."

Another of the notable events of Lamar's administration was the unsuccessful expedition to Santa Fe. The object of this expedition was to obtain a friendly interview with the authorities of the state, with a view to bringing about its peaceful annexation. Should the people of that territory be averse to the plan, friendly commercial relations were to be proposed. The failure of the expedition is attributable to opposition to the measure on the part of the Texas government, which, according to Kendall, the historian of the expedition, first delayed it to an unseasonable time of the year, and then did not properly provide the necessary supplies. Lamar was severely censured for the failure, but the fault was not his. It was simply that his policy was in advance of the times. Had he had the loyal support and ready co-operation of the government, the negotiations would have successfully and economically accomplished what the Federal government has since brought about by an enormous expenditure of money. "When Lamar came into office the nation had neither credit nor money, yet it had the frontier to protect—the seat of government to remove—to erect all necessary public buildings—to support the government, pay the foreign ministers—provide for the army—keep the navy on the Gulf—establish extensive mail routes—and to meet a multiplicity of demands incidental to the condition of the country; and yet he contrived to achieve all these ends without exceeding in a single instance, to the amount of one cent, the annual appropriations made by congress for the support of the government, including even the expenses of the Santa Fe expedition, the surveying of the University lands, and other heavy disbursements which he was compelled to assume the responsibility of making. It may safely be asserted that no chief magistrate ever effected so much with so little expense to the nation he ruled, and that he should have accomplished so much in so short a period and secured so many blessings with such limited resources, must ever be a matter of surprise and cannot fail to place General Lamar among the wisest statesmen and the purest patriots of the age." (The Texas Almanac, 1858.)

During these years public duties had crowded so fast upon him Lamar had had no time or opportunity for his private affairs in Georgia, which, in his anxiety to hasten back to serve Texas in her hour of need, he had, in 1836, left unsettled. The duties and anxieties of his office, the strain of maintaining a government without money or credit, the opposition of his political enemies, his private affairs in chaos for lack of personal attention—these things were not likely to prove beneficial to a man who had come to Texas in search of health. In 1841 Gen. Lamar's health failed completely and he retired from office before his term expired, but not before he had effected every object and fulfilled every promise of his administration. After the annexation of Texas, he served the Federal government, both in the Border War against the Mexicans and also against the Indians, while Post Commander at Laredo. His varied official career was finally brought to a close with his appointment as United States minister to the Argentine Confederacy, an office he filled, as all other offices held by him, with conspicuous ability.

Lamar was not only a soldier and a statesman; he was also an accomplished poet and prose author, publishing during his lifetime a substantial volume of poems, under the title of "Verse Memorials," copies of which (it is long since out of print) are jealously treasured by the few who own them; and leaving behind him many unpublished examples of his literary talent in both poetry and prose.

Among his unfulfilled ambitions seems to have been the writing of a history of the country he fought for and loved. The state of Texas recently acquired from his heirs a wooden chest (strongly bound with iron and secured with heavy, old-fashioned locks) full of miscellaneous manuscripts collected by him and treasured by his family. The chest measured 15x18x33 inches and was filled to bursting point with priceless treasures. They consist of over forty documents in Spanish, dealing with the early history of Texas and Mexico, and dating from the beginning of the eighteenth century; pages upon pages of data, about the early American settlers in Texas, and the prominent men (Spanish, French, Mexican and American) who figure in the history of the times, and between one and two thousand letters bearing the signatures of the leading history-makers of the country; in addition to numerous diplomatic papers, speeches, addresses, etc.

We cull this sympathetic portrait of the general two years before his death, from a brief biography written by Rev. Edward Fontaine, who was for some time his private secretary: "General Lamar is now fifty-nine years of age and is yet in his prime. He has been twice married. He lost his first wife in early life. Many of the most beautiful stanzas in his 'Verse Memorials' commemorate her worth and evince his devotion to her memory. His second wife is a beautiful, accomplished and amiable lady, with whom he has lived happily several years. He has been fortunate in his domestic relations in securing the warm attachment of those who have known him best. He is warm-hearted and affectionate in his disposition, and unalienable in his friendships. He shows the refinement of true gentility in his scrupulous regard for the sensibilities of his associates, and the unselfishness and amiability of his nature, by sacrificing his own comforts and wishes for their gratification. This makes him a pleasant companion and a welcome guest wherever he is known. His personal appearance indicates a love of ease, but great strength, activity and powers of endurance when called into action. He is heavily set, but not corpulent, weighing about 168 pounds, below the medium height, with round, massive features, well represented in the portrait prefixed to the small volume of his poems recently published. The most remarkable and finest of his features is a large, deep blue eye, which expresses every shade of feeling which floats along the current of his soul. His temper is quick and fiery, but under excellent control. Though disposed to be inveterate in his enmities, he is yet magnanimous and chivalrous towards his enemies. His manners are simple and unostentatious, always modest and unpretending and retiring. * * * It is difficult to employ any other language than that of eulogy in describing a man whose virtues and talents are all conspicuous and of the highest order, who has proved himself the dauntless hero, the skillful general, the wise statesman, the incorruptible patriot and the true friend; who is at once soldier, orator, painter and poet; whose common sense equals his brilliant accomplishments; whose private life is amiable as his public career is faultless; and whose whole conduct has been based upon the most exalted principles of honor."

General Lamar for his second wife married at New Orleans, Louisiana, about 1851, or 1852, Henrietta Maffit, who was born in Tennessee in 1835, a daughter of the celebrated Rev. John Newland Maffit, who was born and educated at Dublin, Ireland. Henrietta Maffit was a sister of Commodore Maffit of the Confederate navy. Rev. John Maffit, whose name is also sometimes spelled Moffit, Moffitt or Moffett, was born December 28, 1794, and married Ann Carnie, by whom he had several children besides those just mentioned. The only child of General Lamar by his second wife was a daughter, Loretto Evelina Lamar, who was born at Macon, Georgia, and was educated in the Ursuline Convent at Galveston, and the Locquett Institute at New Orleans. Her marriage on June 5, 1872, to Samuel Douglass Calder united two of the distinguished pioneer families of Texas and the South.

Samuel Douglas Calder, who was born November 18, 1848, was educated in Harris county, Texas, and lived first at Richmond and later at Galveston in this state. He was a man of high principles and lofty ideals, greatly respected by all who knew him, a lover of home and family, caring little for worldly honors, faithfully filling those positions of trust to which his high character and reputation for equitable dealings brought him. He was the son of Robert J. Calder, who was born in Baltimore, Maryland, July 17, 1810, and the grandson of James H. and Jane E. Calder. James H. Calder, of Scotch descent, was a merchant in Baltimore, and died when his son Robert J. was two years old. Robert J. Calder was reared by his maternal uncle, Major James P. Caldwell (a physician and planter of the Eastern shore of Maryland, noted for his culture and his generous hospitality), until he reached manhood. He lived in Baltimore until he was nine years of age, and from 1819 until 1832 had his home in Christian county, Kentucky, whither his uncle and mother had moved. From 1832 to 1846 his home was in Brazoria, Texas. His mother died September 21, 1833, and his uncle in 1856. Robert James Calder held many positions of trust in the civil service. In 1836 he was appointed Marshal of the Republic by Provisional President David G. Burnet. In 1837 he was elected first sheriff of Brazoria county, being re-elected to that office three successive terms. Once, when seeking to protect a prisoner at the risk of his own life, he was overpowered by a mob and locked up; one of the mob who was binding him pleaded, "Calder, don't think hard of us for this; it is for your good." From 1844 to 1846 Robert J. Calder was chief justice and probate judge of Brazoria county. From July, 1866, to 1869, he was judge of probate and chief justice of Fort Bend county, from which position he was removed by military authority as "an impediment to reconstruction." He was mayor of Brazoria in 1838, and of Richmond in 1859.

In the early days, Robert J. Calder was active in the struggle against Mexico, was one of the first to volunteer, was with Fannin at the battle of Conception, and at San Jacinto Captain Calder commanded Company K in Burleson's regiment. After the battle of San Jacinto he, with Judge Franklin, carried the news and official dispatches to President Burnet at Galveston. Only an old skiff, unwieldy and leaky, could be found in which to make the trip, which occupied four days. The trip was an eventful one, full of hardships. Captain Calder's account, written by request for Thrall's History of Texas, is most interesting. Captain Calder married December 27, 1836, Miss Mary Walker Douglas, a native Georgian of Scotch ancestry, born in Richmond county, Georgia, November 15, 1815. Her mother was Miss Phoebe Criswell, of Georgia. She was a niece of General Ballantine Walker, also of Freeman Walker, member of Congress. Her cousin, W. H. T. Walker, was a distinguished officer in the Florida war, in the Mexican war, and in the Civil war. He was an officer in the Confederate service and was killed at Atlanta. Her cousin, David Walker, fell at the head of his regiment, while serving in the Confederate army in Virginia.

To the marriage of Loretto Evelina Lamar and Samuel Douglas Calder were born a large family of children, several of whom died in infancy, the others being mentioned as follows: Henrietta Lamar, Robert James, Carrie Budd, Loretto Una, Elizabeth Youree, all of them born in Richmond and Galveston, educated in private and public schools of Galveston and under private tutors. Robert also was a student in the University of Texas, while the two younger girls graduated at St. Katherine's School in Tennessee. Henrietta Lamar married Rev. Ethelbert Andrews, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, an able clergyman and writer, and an enthusiastic worker among boys. Mr. Andrews is an Englishman by birth, but his home is in America. Robert James Calder, manager of the International Company, with headquarters at Galveston, married Mrs. Willen Groce Billingsley, of Houston, Texas, a great-granddaughter of Col. Jared E. Groce, and niece of Gen. William H. Wharton. They have one daughter, Kate. Robert J. Calder lives at League City, Texas. Loretto Calder married Mallory C. Gordon, in Galveston, in October, 1905, and now lives in El Paso, where Mr. Gordon is traveling auditor for the Southwestern Railroad company. The literary mantle of the Lamars has descended upon two members of the family, Henrietta Lamar and Elizabeth Youree, both of whom have published some charming verse and stories in the best magazines.

JUDGE REID RIKARD. Among the helpful citizens of Grimes county, one who has made his influence and activities felt in various lines of endeavor is Judge Reid Rikard, county judge of Grimes county, president of the Farmers State Bank of Shiro, and a citizen who has ever held the welfare of his community at heart. Judge Rikard was born near Shiro, Grimes county, Texas, September 27, 1876. His father was John H. Rikard, who died in 1887 as a farmer near Shiro. He came to Texas from South Carolina, near Akin, where he was born in February, 1852, and was a small boy when he came to this state with his mother and stepfather, John J. Franklow. He grew up about Shiro, receiving the advantages of the public schools, and early took up his life work of farming, in addition to which he operated a gin and gristmill for several years near this place. Mr. Rikard was married in the fall of 1875 to Miss Mary A. Driscoll, daughter of John Driscoll, who came to Texas from Tennessee about the date of the Civil War. He was also a farmer, and Mrs. Rikard was one of a large family of children. Three children were born to John H. and Mary A. Rikard: Reid; Elford T. and Miss Hermine, all of Shiro.

Judge Rikard was a lad of but eleven years when his father died, but he continued to attend the public schools until he was fourteen, at which time he laid aside his books to become a worker on a farm. This he continued until he became a clerk in Shiro and later in Navasota, and when he had accumulated sufficient capital he embarked in a general mercantile business on his own account, at Shiro, under the firm style of Rikard Mercantile Company. He continued to be so occupied for four years, when he was elected cashier of the Farmers State Bank of this city, acting in that capacity for five years and then being elected president, an office which he still capably fills. He has placed this institution upon a firm basis, has popularized its coffers and won public confidence, and continues to serve the best interests of its depositors. The First State Bank was organized in 1907, with a capital of $10,000, and in 1911 it was succeeded by the Farmers State Bank with a capital stock of $20,000. The present cashier is P. B. Parten and the vice-president is J. B. Sandel. Judge Rikard is interested in cotton gins at Anderson, Shiro and Richards, and gives some of his time to the management of a part of these interests.

Judge Rikard served as deputy tax collector for two years under Col. Gary Thomas, and was a candidate for the nomination for county judge without a competitor, being elected in 1912 as the successor of Judge Hood Boone. Under his regime the bonds voted for good roads to the amount of $125,000 have been issued and sold and the actual work of building the roads has begun.

Judge Rikard was married at Shiro, May 28, 1893, when less than seventeen years of age, to Miss Rennie Norman, a daughter of John L. and Berennice (Quinn) Norman, farming people of Grimes county. Six children have been born to this union, namely: Lorena, Amelia Reid, Norman, Mavonee, Bernice and John Hampton. Judge Rikard is a Blue Lodge and Chapter Mason at Shiro, and was one of the organizers of the Masonic order here. He is past master of the lodge and is past high priest of Jerusalem Chapter No. 3, of Anderson, Texas, and has been a member of the Grand Lodge. He also holds membership in the Knights of Pythias at Navasota, and his religious connection is with the Methodist church.

WALTER M. CURRY. It takes a good deal of moral courage today to fill any public office and not succumb to the temptations that beset one, in spite of the fact that sooner or later the offender is found out and loses the confidence of the people. Therefore when one finds a public official in whom people can put their trust and who is honest, it is worth mentioning. Such a man is Walter M. Curry, the tax collector of Scurry county, Texas. Mr. Curry is a young man yet and the future looks bright for him for he is not only a man of character, but of many friends.

Walter M. Curry is the son of John W. Curry and Nannie F. Curry. John W. Curry was born in Tennessee and lived in that state until after the Civil war, coming to Texas in 1869. He was a farmer in his native state and continued in this occupation after coming to Texas. He located in Ellis county and here he resided until his death in 1905. His widow is still living, aged sixty. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Curry, two daughters and five sons.

Of these children, Walter M. Curry was the third in age and he was born on the 25th of August, 1876, at Waxahachie, in Ellis county, Texas. He received his education in the public schools of Ellis county, Texas, and when it came time for him to enter the lists for himself he naturally followed in his father's footsteps and became a farmer. For seven years he devoted himself to farming in this county and then he gave up this occupation and in 1906 came to Snyder, Texas, where he lived for a short time, going thence to Hermleigh, Texas, where he went into journalism and published the Hermleigh Herald. In 1911 he sold his newspaper and returned to Snyder and in 1912 he was elected to the position which he now holds, that of tax collector of the county.

Mr. Curry is a member of the Democratic party and has always worked in behalf of his party. He belongs to the Woodmen of the World, this being his sole fraternal allegiance. In the religious world he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, and has always taken a prominent part in church affairs, being at present a member of the teaching force of the Sunday school.

Mr. Curry was married on the 20th of June, 1906, to Miss Effie Ward, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Ward, of DeSoto, Dallas county, Texas. Mr. Ward came to Texas from Mississippi seven years ago and located in Dallas county. He was a farmer and a successful one, and his death occurred in April, 1912, depriving Dallas county of one of her finest citizens. Mrs. Ward is still living and makes her home with her daughter, Mrs. Higginbotham. Mr. and Mrs. Curry have had three children born to them, two boys and a girl. Miss Willie Fern, the eldest, is six years old, Walter Herbert is aged four, and the baby of two months, Robert Wood Curry.

Mr. Curry comes of a family well known in Tennessee, there being a large family of them. Several of Mr. Curry's uncles came to Texas and here reared large families. His uncles, Samuel, Thomas, Al, Charles and David Curry all settled in Ellis county, and their descendants are scattered throughout the state. Samuel Curry went to California several years ago and has since made the latter state his home.

THOMAS JEFFERSON MOORE. Tom Moore lived in Texas from 1855 until his death on May 31, 1911. He was a Southern soldier during the war, had a youth, trained by the experience of hardships rather than by the schools, spent many years on the open range as a cattle man, and accumulated not only a large share of this world's goods, but also the inestimable riches of character, influence, and friendships numbered by the hundreds.

When a boy of eight years he rode a mule from Alabama to Texas in company with his parents. He was born in Tuscaloosa county, Alabama, May 31, 1847, and his death occurred on the same date just sixty-four years later. He was largely self-taught, at the age of twelve years was working as driver of an ox-team, gave most of his earnings to his parents, and at the age of sixteen enlisted in the Confederate army. He exchanged the life of a soldier for that of a cowboy in Blanco county, and his work as an employee of a number of well known cattle companies took him into several western states. His independent career as a cattle man began about 1870. Tom Moore was a Texan who in the early days frequently took his cattle north over the great cattle trails, buying his stock in Texas in the spring, feeding them on the Southern ranges during the summer, wintering them in Kansas and finally disposing of his herds at the Northern markets. When the days of free range were ended, he leased and became owner of large tracts of land, divided into several ranches, and for a number of years his herds of cattle were numbered by the thousand. His land and cattle interests extended also into Old Mexico, and some large properties in that republic are still a part of the Moore estate.

Tom Moore was one of the charter members of the Cattle Raisers Association of Texas, and his individual influence did much to extend the operations of that organization over the entire cattle raising area of Texas.

Mr. Moore is survived by a wife and a daughter. His wife was Miss Caroline Roberts, daughter of Captain Alexander Roberts of Blanco county, where she married Mr. Moore August 10, 1875. The daughter is Miss Edna J. Moore, and both live in the old home at Llano.

Tom Moore was in many ways a remarkable man. He is remembered for his fine independence of character and his broad-minded, vigorous citizenship, and his undoubted ability and capacity for hard work made him invaluable in the world's business. Of a genial, generous disposition, he was always ready to do practical charity. Many men in West Texas have been set on their feet and started on the road to prosperity through the practical assistance and counsel of the late Tom Moore. Though reared in the faith of the primitive Baptist church, he was a liberal giver to every benevolence and assisted in the building of many churches. On one occasion when a collection was being taken up for foreign missions, Mr. Moore contributed not only to that purpose, but also quietly directed another collection in order to buy a new suit of clothes for the preacher. This was a small incident, and is only mentioned as significant of the quickness in Mr. Moore to respond to a deserving need wherever he observed it. While he never had any schooling in the ordinary sense of the term, he readily passed for a man of education, and really possessed a broad information and understanding of men and affairs. His language was perfect and well considered in diction and thought, and he could mingle on equal terms with the scholar or the man of daily toil. His ability to handle men and large affairs was gained through sympathy and understanding of human nature, evolved from an early career of hardship, during which he was dependent entirely upon his own efforts for support. The activities of his business took him constantly into the open, and for many years he was as much at home under the open sky as under a roof.

In the cemetery at Llano over his last resting place rises a shaft of native granite, twenty-seven feet high, which in quality and design appropriately commemorates the simplicity and solidity of his character. This monument was erected by his wife and daughter, and its chief inscription is significant of the general feeling and expression voiced in the community at his death, "Beloved by his family and friends—revered by all—a good and great man rests here."

WILLIAM McDONALD. San Augustine county, as all who are familiar with early Texas affairs are aware, is one of the most historic communities of the state. Among the old families which have made history in that vicinity, probably none has been identified for a longer time nor with greater usefulness and more conspicuous service than the McDONALDs. Three generations have lived there and left the impress of their individuality and citizenship. One of the ablest lawyers of the San Augustine bar is William McDonald, who is a former county judge, and has also taken much part in politics.

The origin of the family in East Texas was due to Donald McDonald, grandfather of Judge McDonald. Donald McDonald was a noted pioneer character. He was of pure Scotch stock, and possessed all the thrift and hardihood and intelligence of his race. His career in life connected him strangely with different periods of American history. Born in Quebec, Canada, a British subject, he fought on the British side in the war of 1812, serving at Quebec and at Lundy's Lane. Soon after the close of the war, his great admiration for the valor and fighting qualities of the American led him to cross the boundary line and become an American citizen. After that his various wanderings have not been clearly followed, and though there is no definite knowledge as to the year in which he crossed the Sabine and settled in what was then the eastern portion of the Province of Texas still under the dominion of Mexico, the date must have been in the early twenties. Locating in what was later San Augustine county, he thenceforward took a prominent part leading up to the independence of Texas in 1836. When the Mexican army began advancing from San Antonio and with the slow retreat of Houston and the Texas forces, he and his family were among those who participated in what is known in history as the "runaway scrape," and he was so busy looking after his own folks and other fugitives that he did not reach the field of San Jacinto in time to participate in the battle which finally won Texas from Mexico. After the organization of San Augustine county, he became one of the early sheriffs and served efficiently for several years. Although a Catholic in religion he became a prominent Mason, and was one of the charter members of Redland lodge No. 3, A. F. and A. M. of San Augustine. Throughout his career he was a leader in politics and public affairs.

In the next generation following Donald McDonald was Alexander McDonald, father of Judge William McDonald. Alexander McDonald was born in the town of San Augustine, at the same place now occupied by his son, the judge. Throughout his active life he was a farmer, having a plantation eight miles south of town on the bayou. During his later years he suffered greatly from impaired health. He was born in 1838 and died in 1912. During the war he saw four years of service in the Confederate army. Alexander McDonald married Ellen Crow, who was born at San Augustine, and who died in 1894. Her parents were J. M. and Susan (Brown) Crow, the latter of whom is still living. The Crow family is likewise of long standing in San Augustine county. J. M. Crow, who died in 1898, having for a period of sixty years lived on the same farm, situated eight miles south of San Augustine, was born in Tennessee in 1818, and was twenty years old when he settled in San Augustine county in 1838. For some years he served as a sheriff of the county, and was a man prosperous in business and prominent in public life. He was also a charter member of Redland lodge No. 3, A. F. and A. M., one of the oldest lodges of Masonry in Texas.

Judge William McDonald was born on his father's farm, eight miles south of San Augustine, in 1877. Though reared on the farm he has during most of his active career had his home in San Augustine. About the time he reached manhood he took up the study of law, pursued it until his admission to the bar in 1900, and after serving two years as county judge in 1902, entered upon a general practice at San Augustine. He is an able lawyer, and has enjoyed a large practice during the last ten years. Since entering practice he has served as county attorney, and has also been chairman of the Democratic Executive Committee for San Augustine county.

Judge McDonald married Miss Sallie Lewis, who was born in San Augustine county, a daughter of the late Henry Lewis, a pioneer settler, and at one time sheriff. They are the parents of three children: Bettie D., Eleanor Earl and William A. Judge McDonald, like his father and grandfather before him, is affiliated with Redland lodge No. 3, A. F. and A. M., and has also taken the Royal Arch Degrees.

H. D. SLATER, editor of the El Paso Herald, comes from two generations of newspaper men; his grandfather was an editor and printer on the old National Intelligencer in Washington, D. C., eighty-five years ago in Andrew Jackson's time, and his father was assistant editor of the old National Republican, successor of the National Intelligencer, in the late seventies, and then editor of the National Tribune.

H. D. Slater was born at Marion, Smythe county, Virginia, April 12, 1874. His father, a western New Yorker of Anglo-Dutch stock that had been "American" soon after the Mayflower colonists came, had fought as a mere boy in the Union army, at nineteen had been wounded almost to death, had recovered, and had then engaged in campaigns under Gen. George Crook against the Sioux and Blackfeet Indians in Montana and Wyoming, 1866-69, holding a captain's commission in the Montana territorial troops. Returning east, he married a woman of Welsh and French blood and part southern ancestry, and entered upon the practice of law in Virginia, where three children were born. Hughes D. Slater (named after his father's most valued friend, Judge Robert W. Hughes of the federal court, son-in-law of General John B. Floyd) was one year old when the family moved to Washington, D. C.

Hughes D. Slater spent his childhood and school days in Washington, graduating from the Washington high school in 1891. He had previously begun work on the old Public Opinion, now merged in the Literary Digest, but at that time a national weekly of importance. He kept employed at various things while attending night college classes during one year, studying science and engineering. Later was employed as assistant in the mineral laboratory of the National Museum and in private laboratories.

He soon drifted into permanent newspaper work with Public Opinion. Under the careful training of Frank S. Presbrey and Wesley N. Oler he rose rapidly in the organization and went through the various positions from office boy to business manager. In 1894 he moved to New York with the paper and was given direction of the editorial department of the paper (1894-96) succeeding Ernest E. Russell, who retired on account of illness.

His editorial work on Public Opinion made him intimately familiar, through constant reading, with 600 daily newspapers of the United States, Canada, England and Mexico, with 100 weekly technical and class periodicals, and with more than fifty monthly and quarterly magazines of two continents.

Mr. Slater cast his first vote in 1895 for a reform mayor of New York City. While in New York he busied himself with public questions and affairs, and read continually.

Resigning his work in 1896 on account of broken health, Mr. Slater went to El Paso, Texas, where he quickly recovered his health and entered the engineering corps of the Rio Grande, Sierra Madre & Pacific Railway (now the Mexico & Northwestern) which was then just beginning construction out of Juarez, Mexico, on the Rio Grande, south to the Sierra Madre. After some months spent as assistant in the construction engineering corps, Mr. Slater was employed to make a reconnaissance of the Sierra Madre country of Northern Mexico; he spent nearly a year in the mountains investigating and reporting upon the natural resources, and mapped a region until then almost unexplored, 150 miles by 100 miles in area.

Returning to El Paso in February, 1898, he bought an interest in the El Paso Herald with money he had saved, and became its editor. Soon after he acquired the controlling interest in the paper, and since then has actively directed the El Paso Herald as editor, president and general manager, owning more than half the stock of the corporation. Mr. Slater succeeded in enlisting the financial co-operation of outside people in a real estate project, and in 1908 he organized and financed the Herald Building Company, which bought a large tract of real estate at the business center of El Paso and provided buildings for the use of the newspaper. Mr. Slater is president of the Herald News Company, publishing a thoroughly metropolitan daily newspaper of 17,000 circulation, and president of the Herald Building Company, owning the Herald building. The combined investment of outside and local capital in the two companies is nearly $500,000, and the payroll is the fourth largest industrial payroll in El Paso.

Mr. Slater married in 1899 the daughter of Colonel John McElroy of Washington, D. C., and has had two children, one, a boy, now living. He is not a member of any church, though he works with them in movements for civic and human betterment. He is a member of the two principal social clubs of El Paso, also a member of the Chamber of Commerce and the City Club, but he has no lodge affiliations. In politics he is thoroughly independent, acknowledging no binding party allegiance, but believing in the fundamental principles of the party of Abraham Lincoln and William McKinley; is thoroughly progressive, yet conservative in not urging change for the sake of change, and in refusing to be stampeded by clamor; believes in a national government and a national policy concerning national affairs; always favored the gold standard, and the protective principle reasonably and equitably applied in framing tariff acts; holds that "conservation" means, not hoarding, but beneficial use. In local affairs he is a strong home ruler; believes in choosing always the best men for office regardless of party; has never voted a straight party ticket in his life, has voted for as many Democrats as Republicans, and voted for Woodrow Wilson for president in 1912.

His newspaper has always been a strong advocate of law enforcement and human betterment. The El Paso Herald, as its motto declares, is "dedicated to the service of the people, that no good cause shall lack a champion, and that evil shall not thrive unopposed." The policy of the El Paso Herald is exactly expressed by Abraham Lincoln in his declaration, "I must stand with anybody that stands right, stand with him while he is right, and part with him when he goes wrong." The Herald is absolutely independent in every way, fearless and impartial in printing the news, fair in criticism, honest in praise.

Mr. Slater has been active in public affairs ever since he became a citizen of El Paso. He took a leading part in the long fight against the gambling evil that resulted in 1904 in abolishing public gambling. He planned the basis on which the public charity work was organized under the Woman's Charity Association. He was one of the organizers of the Citizens' League and the City Club. He is an officer or director in numerous local companies and institutions, including schools, hospitals, and charities, and is chairman of the Park Commission; introduced into El Paso the plan of wide parking and narrow paved roadways in improving residence streets. He has been one of the most active workers for the reclamation of the valley by irrigation and the construction of the $10,000,000 Elephant Butte dam and subsidiary works, and he is the author of the treaty with Mexico by which the international difficulties of twenty years standing were finally adjusted.

He is a member of the Associated Press, American Newspaper Publishers' Association, American Civic Association, National Geographic Society, Texas State Historical Society, and National Press Club of Washington. He has never been a candidate for public office by election or appointment, and never expects to be. He has read widely in philosophy, science, history, biography, economics, politics, government, law, foreign relations, finance, sociology, religion, education, charities, civic art, sanitation and child conservation, and has traveled in every state of the union but three, and in Mexico. He is an enthusiastic amateur photographer, specializing in flower photography, and is a lover of good music.

He believes that the only true purpose of life is to help to better the conditions of living for the masses of the people. He bears no grudges, plays no favorites, and keeps clear of entangling alliances, and the title which he esteems most honorable is that of "news-paper man."

HENRY CAMP HARRIS. Supervisor in Texas for the Reliance Life Insurance Company of Pittsburg, Henry C. Harris in ability and by practical achievements is a leader in the insurance field of the South, and occupies a place of large influence in the organized bodies of insurance men. He is a young Texan who has had an unusual career of work and experience, has been in the newspaper field, and has done a great deal of effective work in publicity and political campaigns.

Henry Camp Harris was born at Henderson, Texas, January 10, 1885, a son of Edwin W. and Margaret (Camp) Harris. Both of his grandfathers served with the Confederacy, Thomas Camp as colonel, and both families came from Virginia. The late Edwin W. Harris, who died January 5, 1913, was a distinguished citizen of Texas, was owner and editor of the Greenville Herald, formerly president of the Texas Press Association, was a member of the Texas senate, and throughout his career whether as journalist or public leader, steered a course by high ideals and was always ranged on the moral side of any movements.

Henry C. Harris finished the high school at Greenville with honors, in 1901 entered the University of Texas at Austin, was a student there two and a half years, until the failing health of his father caused him to leave college to take charge of the elder's business. Mr. Harris is a charter member of the Phi Kappa Psi Chapter at the University of Texas. In school and college Mr. Harris showed himself a young man very much alive to the modern world of affairs, exhibited ability as a writer, was also a keen manager in business, and had opportunity to use both these talents while part owner of the Greenville Herald with his father. At the age of twenty-one Mr. Harris entered the life insurance field, and since then has done much special newspaper and publicity work. As local agent for the American National Life of Galveston he wrote his first policies, and in 1908 was made state manager of the U. S. Annuity and Life of Chicago. In 1910 he was elected secretary of the National Temperance Life of Dallas. Mr. Harris in 1912 became agency director for the Great Southern Life of Houston, and in that capacity made an enviable record both as an organizer and as an individual producer in the Dallas office of the company. Mr. Harris by his work became eligible for the company's Two Hundred Thousand Dollar Club. In April, 1914, the Reliance Life Insurance Company of Pittsburg appointed him its supervisor in Texas, a position he now holds. In 1912 Mr. Harris was secretary of the Texas Life Convention of Texas Life Insurance Companies, and at present is secretary of the Texas Association of Life Underwriters. He is a regular contributor to national and insurance journals such as the Independent of New York, and the Insurance Educator.

His work as a political campaigner has made his name as well known as his insurance record. In 1906 Mr. Harris conducted the newspaper campaign for Judge M. M. Brooks in his race for governor. He conducted the press work for Cone Johnson, now solicitor for the State Department, in his memorable campaign against Joseph W. Bailey as delegate to the National Convention. In 1908 Mr. Harris handled the newspaper campaign for Governor T. M. Campbell in his successful Campbell-Williams race. He was secretary of the Fort Worth convention that first urged the submission of a prohibition amendment to the constitution. He handled the publicity work in this connection. He was active in four successful campaigns of C. B. Randell for Congress, and in 1910 handled the publicity work for Cone Johnson in his race for governor.

At Dallas Mr. Harris has an active part in business, social, religious and club affairs. He is steward in the Munger Place Methodist church, a member of the Merchants and Manufacturers Club, of the Press Club, of the Ad League, the Lakewood Country Club, and others.

On April 29, 1908, Mr. Harris married Miss George Roberts Brown, of Commerce, Texas. Her father, Dr. S. W. Brown, is still living at the age of seventy-nine, came to Texas from Kentucky, and was a pioneer physician of that state. Mrs. Harris was born in Bourbon county, Kentucky, was educated in St. Mary's college at Dallas under Bishop A. C. Garrett. They have one son, Henry Camp Harris, Jr., born May 31, 1910.

MRS. JULIA A. BROWN. It must not be forgotten that not only men but also women endured the responsibilities, the hardships and the dangers of pioneer existence in every part of America. Texas is proud to honor its pioneer women, and there are a number of venerable and noble characters whose lives did much to sweeten existence in the hard and rough earlier years, and who now enjoy the esteem and respect of their families and of all loyal Texans.

At Midland resides Mrs. Julia A. Brown, now past eighty-five years of age, and one of the few native daughters of Texas whose birth antedated the foundation of the Texas Republic, born in Nacogdoches county, Texas, on the 22nd of October, 1827. As students of Texas history are aware, that was only six years after the establishment of the first Austin colony, and was eight years before the outbreak of the Texas revolution, which led to the liberation of Texas from Mexican dominion. Mrs. Brown was born Julia A. Norris, and her parents were John and Sarah Norris. Her father's family moved from Maryland to Texas in 1804, one of the very earliest Americans to cross the line and take up his home in the border city of Nacogdoches. Under the Spanish government he was granted a four league and labors of headright land north of Nacogdoches, extending to the Atoyache river, her grandfather settling twelve miles north of Nacogdoches on a small tributary to Nacognich creek. Under the Spanish laws of that day and country people had to go to the Alcalde to obtain a permit to plant a certain amount or less of seed of the different kinds of garden and field crops. In itemizing the various kinds and amounts to be planted Mr. Norris came to tobacco, and he was put down to a peck or less seed. It will thus be seen the early settlers were well versed in agricultural pursuits. There were ten children born in the family of Mr. and Mrs. Norris, and Mrs. Brown was the first born.

In the years when she was growing up the country about Nacogdoches was little cultivated in the modern sense of agriculture, and a great part of the food supply of the people consisted of deer and other wild game, and hunting was a very important vocation at that time.

It was many years before the danger of Indian raids ceased, and members of Mrs. Brown's family participated in the Cherokee war against the Indians of that tribe in Northeastern Texas during the republic period. Many of the families in the vicinity of the Norris home while Mrs. Brown was a girl still depended upon the old Indian fashion of making cornmeal, by beating it up in a mortar, and there were very few steel mills in all Texas at that time. Schools were also absent, and her only education was largely such as she could obtain by home instruction. The family were all Democrats in politics, and Mr. Brown was a member of the Masonic Order. Mr. and Mrs. Brown were married in 1843, after the Cherokee disturbance, and after the independence of Texas was established he was promoted captain of a militia company to protect the settlers of his section. His brother, Daniel Brown, took part in the battle of Monterey under Jackson, and his death occurred in Nacogdoches after returning from Mexico. James W. Brown, after a varied career as a farmer and stock raiser and after service in the Civil war, went to Old Mexico about April, 1866, during the revolution of that time in the southern republic, and never returned, the supposition being that he was killed in one of the battles. After his death Mrs. Brown moved to McCulloch county, on the Colorado river, where she remained until 1889, and then moved to Coke county, and from there in 1905 established her home in Midland county, where she still resides. She became the proud mother of eight sons, of whom one is living in McCulloch county, two in Midland and the remaining five are deceased. She and her sons have engaged in ranching and stock raising, and the aggregate success of the Brown family is very large indeed. The sons are married.

Mrs. Brown has had a vast range of experience in frontier life. During the Texas revolution of 1836, when she was a girl less than ten years of age, the family had to move to the state of Louisiana for protection, and they loaded their goods upon pack horses and had to accomplish a very rough and difficult journey of forty-five miles before they reached their place of refuge where they could remain until the war was over. Mrs. Brown grew up at a time when there were very few churches for religious service in Texas, although most of the people were God-fearing and possessed the religious spirit. The first sermon which she ever heard was at the age of twelve years, and the preacher was an old hard-shell Baptist minister in Rusk county. Mrs. Brown is now a member of the Methodist church, South, though some of her sons belong to the Baptist denomination. Her husband and four of her brothers, also her oldest son, Elias R. Brown, were all soldiers of the Confederate army, and one of her brothers died in the service, the rest returning home after the war. Mrs. Brown has not only had a long lifetime of interesting experiences, but is also the venerable head of a family of which she may well be proud. Besides her sons, she is the grandmother of fifteen children, and has twelve great grandchildren. The two sons living in Midland county are engaged in ranching and the stock business. Mrs. Brown has a strong and vigorous constitution and preserves an excellent memory, and she relates in a charming manner many incidents and experiences of her own and her family's early career in Texas, also of the days of reconstruction or commonly known in that day as the "Regulators and the Moderators," the Regulators taking the law in their own hands, as it seemed that there was an element that could not be reached by a lettered law. They would catch such characters, string them on logs and lath them with hickory withes—then give them time to locate in parts unknown. Then there was another element perhaps opposite to Regulators, organized in what they called themselves Moderators, so they caused much uneasiness, anxiety and fear with those that stood on neutral soil, but time being a great healer, in a reasonable time this disturbance was a thing of the past and went down in history. Peace and harmony reigned supreme until the disturbance of Secession, war between the states, known as the Civil war, of which we will not make further mention here.

WILLIAM R. BOYD, JR. Engaged in business at Dallas as an investment broker, associated with Mr. John W. Philp of that city, Mr. Boyd is best known in Texas, especially among bankers, on account of his relations with the National Citizens League. This league was organized in 1911 for the promotion of a sound banking system and currency reform. Its national president was John V. Farwell of Chicago. Beginning in December, 1911, Mr. Boyd undertook the organization of the Texas section of this league, composed of leading bankers and business men in every section of the state. Robert J. Kleberg of Kingsville was president of the Texas section. In the course of his work Mr. Boyd visited and made addresses to associations of bankers and other business organizations throughout Texas and this was to arouse interest in behalf of the organization. The National Citizens League should properly be credited with a large share of the currency and banking legislation formulated during the special session of Congress in the fall of 1913. After its essential purpose had been largely accomplished, the organization went out of existence in the fall of 1913.

William R. Boyd, Jr., was born in Freestone county, Texas, in January, 1885, a son of William R. and Lizzie (Self) Boyd. Both parents are now living at Teague in Freestone county. The mother was born in Georgia, and the father in DeSoto parish, Louisiana, coming to Texas as a young man after the war and settling in Freestone county. For many years he was engaged in the practice of law, and soon after Teague was founded following the completion of the Trinity and Brazos Valley Railway established his home at that place, and is now one of the town's lawyers. During his residence at Fairfield, the county seat, he was clerk of the district court twelve years, and was also a presidential elector.

William R. Boyd, Jr., was educated in the public schools of Fairfield, and had two years of experience in Washington City as private secretary to Congressman Scott Field. Returning to Freestone county, and being admitted to the bar in 1904, he began the practice of law at Teague, and served the town one term as mayor. For two years he was in the banking business at Eddy, McLennan county, and in December, 1911, moved to Dallas, where he has since been engaged as an investment broker, handling stocks and bonds, farm and city loans. Mr. Boyd married Miss Gertrude Watson, a native of Freestone county. They have one son, Field St. Clair Boyd. Mr. Boyd and wife are members of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, he is a Knights Templar Mason, belongs to the York Rite bodies, also to the Mystic Shrine, and other affiliations include the Woodmen of the World, the Modern Woodmen of America and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

SANDERS WALKER. Sanders Walker, mayor of Electra, and member of the firm of S. S. Walker & Sons, dealers in lumber and builders' supplies, is one of the more alert, progressive and withal, successful business men of Electra, where he has been established in his present enterprise since 1907. Theirs is a general retail business, wide in its scope and one of the most important concerns in the city. In addition to their offices and yards at this place, the firm maintains a yard at Groesbeck, Texas, and the two distributing points touch a wide strip of territory in the conduct of the business of the firm.

Mr. Walker was born in Mexia, Texas, on September 29, 1875, and is a son of S. S. Walker and his wife, Mollie A. Crabb. Both are native born Texans, and they were married in Limestone county, where the mother now resides. S. S. Walker was born in Texas when it was yet a republic, and all the years of his life have been devoted to the lumber industry. He served in the Civil war, in the secret service department under General Greene, and all his maturer years was active in politics, wherever he found himself, though he ever consistently declined to hold office. He died in 1911 at the age of sixty-seven years, and is buried in Limestone county, where, as has already been stated, his widow still lives. The mother is an active member of the Methodist church and is a devout Christian woman, possessing many of those excellent qualities that make for the most perfect womanhood. Her father was a minister and physician, and in his dual capacity of healer of the soul and body, performed a mighty work during his active years. Four children were born to these parents, of which the subject is the youngest. The others are Jackson L., who has charge of the yard at Groesbeck, Texas, and who, with the subject, is a member of the firm of S. S. Walker & Sons.

Sanders Walker began his education in the public schools of Texas, and followed his common school training with a course in the Southwestern University at Georgetown. This, however, did not complete his education, for he has been a student all his life, and is today one of the best educated men in the state, possessing a magnificent private library which he makes daily use of. He was eighteen years old when he assumed the duties of his first independent position, securing a place in a lumber office, a business with which he was more or less familiar because of his association with his father. He has continued in that line, and thus it may be said that all his life he has been identified with the lumber business, in one phase or another. In 1907 he came to Electra and established the present business, under the firm style of S. S. Walker & Sons, and from then until today the firm has been one of the busiest and most prosperous in the state. A full line of lumber is carried, with all kinds of building materials, including cement, brick, etc., and a general retail business is done by the firm. Since the death of the father, the business has been continued under the same name.

Mr. Walker was married on November 11, 1896, to Miss Ida M. Oliver, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Oliver of Groesbeck, in Limestone county, Texas.

Mr. Walker is a Mason, having attained the thirty-second degree in that order, and also has membership in the Knights of Pythias. He and his wife are members of the Methodist church, and he is a Democrat, and although he makes no noise in politics, he exercises a healthy interest in local affairs and plays well his part as a citizen of the highest type. He was elected to the office of mayor, and is yet serving in that position. He is a man of the greatest civic pride and firmly believes that a man should support the institutions of his home community and of his state. His standing in business and social circles is of the highest, and in every way commensurate with the splendid integrity and character of the man, whose career has been an open book to all, and whose success has come as the result of fair and honorable dealing all along the line. He has done much in the way of developing the community wherein he resides, and his influence and good works extend beyond the confines of his own community, and are felt in a goodly measure throughout this section of the state.

ALPHEUS HANKS. One of the enterprising members of the banking fraternity of Navarro county, Alpheus Hanks assisted in the organization and is now cashier of the First State Bank of Emhouse. This is one of the solid institutions of the county, and was organized in June, 1909, and besides Mr. Hanks, others associated at the beginning were J. A. Thompson of Corsicana, G. G. Owen, M. Montgomery, N. Tinkle and Charles H. Lafosse. At the beginning the bank was started with a capital of ten thousand dollars, and from its earnings in the past five years the capital was increased to thirty thousand dollars in 1914.

Representing one of the old and substantial families of Northeastern Texas, Alpheus Hanks was born in Anderson county, September 30, 1879, and was reared at Montalba in that county. His education came from the public schools, and at the age of twenty he took up work as a teacher and was first employed in a rural school in his native vicinity. His home has been in Navarro county since 1901, and for nine years he taught in the Emhouse community, originally known as Kingwillow. He left his work as a teacher to engage in banking at Emhouse.

Mr. Hanks comes from a family of farmers. His grandfather was George W. Hanks, who was an early settler in Anderson county, and who died before the war, leaving a family of children by two marriages. The father was George W. Hanks, Jr., of Emhouse, and a lifetime farmer. He was born in Anderson county in 1851, and has followed the quiet lines of agricultural industry. George W. Hanks, Jr., married Mollie Carter Jackson, whose father was a Texas soldier and died with the Confederate army. Mrs. Hanks died at the age of thirty-four, leaving the following children: Alpheus Harold, a farmer; Clyde W., cashier of the Royal National Bank of Palestine, one of the leading financial institutions of East Texas; Walter, a farmer; Maud, who married Ralph Davis, of San Antonio; Lilla, who is a teacher in Anderson county.

Alpheus Hanks has had some public experience, and was a member of the board of examiners of Navarro county for two years while engaged in teaching. His first experience in banking was with the Royal National Bank of Palestine, in which his brother is now cashier. Mr. Hanks is a Democrat, and is affiliated with the Masonic lodge, the Woodmen of the World, the Modern Woodmen of America, and the Modern Order of Pretorians. His family are Baptists, though he is not a member of any church. Mr. Hanks was married at Emhouse May 9, 1906, to Miss Ethel Elrod, daughter of A. B. Elrod. Their children are Doris, George and Herman.

J. R. WOOTEN. When J. R. Wooten came to Texas in 1881 he had only one hundred dollars as capital. His first two years were spent as clerk in a store at Eagle Lake. The year following he clerked at Abilene, then one of the far Western towns. His next enterprise was in the mercantile business on his own account at Spanish Camp. After six months he sold out and engaged in business at Eagle Lake, conducted a prospering establishment there until 1892, and since then has been identified with Columbus and Colorado counties, chiefly in farming. Few men have had a more successful record during the past thirty years than Mr. Wooten. He is a man of many talents, a lawyer by profession, has been honored in public affairs, as frequently as he could be urged to accept, is a student and original thinker, and altogether a man of distinctive leadership in the state.

He comes of a good old Southern family. He was born in Livingston, Alabama, March 22, 1866, a son of Richard and Lavine (Arrington) Wooten. His parents were both natives of North Carolina, but were married in Alabama. The father of his mother, General Joseph Arrington, was one of the prominent men of North Carolina, serving as adjutant general of the state, and also as state senator and representative for a number of years. A large slave holder and planter, he moved from North Carolina in 1835, and purchased a plantation on the Tom Bigbee river in Alabama. There he set up a large establishment with a household of forty members and forty slaves to do the work of the farm. On both sides the family were slave holders before the war, and he spent most of his life at Livingston, Alabama, where he died when the son, J. R. Wooten was eighteen months of age. Mr. Wooten was reared in the home of an aunt, having had a common school education in Livingston county, and afterwards attended the State University at Mississippi. He was nineteen years old when he came to Texas and in ten years time had made himself a prosperous and influential citizen. In 1894 he took up the study of law, and later was licensed to practice. However, Mr. Wooten has never built up a clientele as a lawyer, though his knowledge of the law has been very valuable in the management of his extensive farming and other interests. He maintains an office in Columbus, but more as headquarters for his own private affairs than for the benefit of his clients.

In Colorado county, Mr. Wooten has the reputation of having done more than almost any other man for the advancement of agriculture. It was he who introduced the long staple cotton, and he grows it most successfully. At this writing, he has only just completed the only gin in South Texas for the exclusive ginning of this grade of cotton. He is the owner of eighteen hundred acres of fine land, in Colorado county, and besides his agricultural products he gives much attention to the breeding of fine coach horses from imported stock. In 1902 Mr. Wooten was elected to represent the county in the Twenty-eighth Legislature. He has often been honored by the bar by being selected as special judge for the district and for senator and congressman, but has refused on account of his large agricultural interests. While in the Legislature he introduced and championed many wise and good laws. He was the first man to bring in a bill providing for the referendum and recall in the Texas Legislature. Mr. Wooten is a reader along many lines, though especially in economics and civics, and has a many-sided character. To fully appreciate him it is necessary to know him, since he is very modest of his true worth, and inclined to belittle his achievements. Although he has never written for publication, he is a writer of excellent prose and verse, and such of his writings as have escaped his rigid private censorship have gained many high commendations from good judges of literary excellence.

In 1887 Mr. Wooten was united in marriage with Miss Pearl Harcourt, a native of Texas and a daughter of Webb and Lona (Harbert) Harcourt, both natives of Tennessee, and early settlers of Texas. The Harcourts are descended from the old English family of that name. The family settled in Texas early in the fifties. To Mr. and Mrs. Wooten have been born three children; James H., who is superintendent of public schools at Patonia; C. Harcourt, a student in the Rice Institution at Houston, and Mary Olivia. Both Mr. and Mrs. Wooten are members of the Episcopal church. He is fraternally especially well known in the Knights of Pythias circles, having been a member of the Texas Grand Lodge, and having served as chief tribune of the Grand Tribune for several years. He is also affiliated with the Knights and Ladies of Honor, the Woodmen of the World, the Modern Order of Pretorians, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Mrs. Wooten belongs to the United Daughters of the Confederacy and the Civic Club.

RUFUS J. BYERS. All the life thus far of Rufus J. Byers has been spent in Texas, his native state, and if he prospers in future in the same praiseworthy manner that has characterized his business enterprise of late, it is more than probable that he will continue to make a home in these parts. Since he was nineteen he has been identified with the hardware business, taking a position in a capacity of lesser importance, and he has advanced in that business with every passing year, so that he is at present the owner of a controlling interest in the firm with which he took employment a few years ago. His rise has been exceedingly rapid, and too much could not be said in praise of the integrity and singleness of purpose that the young man has brought to bear upon his business career thus far in life.

Born in Willbarger county, Texas, on November 9, 1891, Rufus J. Byers is a son of Lon and May (Harvey) Byers, natives of Texas and Mississippi, respectively. The father has followed farming activities all his life and is one of the popular men of his county. A member of the Christian church, he is active in church work, and he is also especially active in educational circles, displaying an intense interest in the school system of the county. He has served a number of times on the school board of the county, and has in other ways manifested a wholesome interest in affairs pertaining to the best interests of his district. He is an Odd Fellow. Mrs. Byers' parents were pioneer citizens of Texas, coming to this state in the days prior to the advent of the railroad. She also is a member of the Christian church and a devout and wholly admirable Christian character is hers. They are the parents of nine children, of which goodly number Rufus J. of this brief review is the second born child.

Rufus J. Byers attended the common schools of his native community. He was then nineteen years of age, and he instituted his independence by taking a position with a hardware firm in Oklaunion, Texas, where he worked for wages for a few years, first as a clerk and later as a manager of the establishment. His rise in the business was rapid and pleasing to those who witnessed the manner in which he applied himself to his work, and he had only been with the firm one year when he bought a controlling interest in the concern, which became known then as the Byers Hardware Company, and he has since continued as the head of the firm, and as active manager of the same. A full line of hardware, building materials, farming implements, buggies, wagons, etc., comprise their line, and a general retail business is carried on by the firm throughout the county and other counties adjoining. Mr. Byers has amply demonstrated his business capacity, and has proved that he was better fitted for the mercantile business than for the farm, and his advance in material prosperity has been a source of gratification to all.

Mr. Byers and his wife are members of the Christian church, wherein they are active and prominent, and he is a member of the Woodmen of the World as well. A Democrat, he gives his moral support to the party and votes the ticket preferably, conditions being equal, but he is not a political man, and has no time to devote to politics from that standpoint.

On November 12, 1911, Mr. Byers was married in Vernon, Texas, to Miss Rena Ladd, the daughter of J. W. Ladd and wife, of Vernon. Mr. and Mrs. Byers, as well as the parents of both, take an active part in the representative social activities of the city, and their standing in and about the county is exceptionally high, all of them being blest with an unusually worthy list of good friends.

Mr. Byers is staunch in his devotion to his mother state, and will respond to any inquiries directed to him in relation to the opportunities and advantages offered by the great state of Texas.

EDMUND PRUETT, of Dayton, who has devoted his life to farming and the raising of stock, and who is numbered among the most extensive and successful agriculturists and stockmen of Liberty county, was born at Dayton (then West Liberty), Texas, March 22, 1846. His father, Beasley Pruett, Jr., settled here as a young man with his father, Beasley Pruett, Sr., from Alexandria, Louisiana, where the father was born.

The birth of Beasley Pruett, Sr., occurred in Kentucky, and he came into Louisiana on horseback, bringing with him and behind him on the saddle his negro slave. The members of his family were born in Louisiana, where it is believed he was married, and among them were: Edmond, who died in Liberty county; Beasley, Jr., the father of Edmund of this review; "Riley," who married (first) William Everett and (second) B. M. Green, and lived and died here; and Jesse, who also spent his life in Liberty county and left a family. The wife of Beasley Pruett, Sr., was a widow Rogers, who had four children: Robert; James; Mary, who married James Howell; and Patsy, who married Reason Green. James passed his life in this vicinity and died single, as did Robert.

Beasley Pruett, Jr., the father of Edmund Pruett, was born at Alexandria, Louisiana, and died in September, 1874. He had been granted but little education in his youth, but displayed his ability as a farmer, and was known as a steady, reliable and industrious man. He owned a few slaves and favored the movement for secession of the South, but did not enter actively into the Civil war, although he had an experience in the war for Texas independence as one who participated in the battle of San Jacinto. For this service he was given a grant of land, a league and labor, and this he located in Montgomery county, Texas. He had no connection with official service of his county, was not a professed church member, and belonged to no organization of a fraternal character. He was married in Montgomery county, Texas, to Miss Rebecca Linney, daughter of Michael Linney, who also came from Louisiana, and was a stock farmer. Mrs. Pruett was the mother of seven sons and a daughter, as follows: Edmund, of this review; "Riley," who married William Simpson and finally settled in Llano county, Texas, and died there; William, who died in childhood; Colbert F., who passed away here and left a family; James, who died single; and Henry and Price, who reside in Harris county.

Edmund Pruett was given a public school education of a limited nature, and grew up amid rural surroundings, being trained to the duties of the home farm. He was but fifteen years of age when, in August, 1861, he joined Company F, Fifth Texas Regiment, Colonel Bryant, this regiment forming a part of Hood's Brigade and going directly to Virginia. Mr. Pruett was disabled early and was discharged after nine months without taking part in any engagement. He then returned to his home, where he remained until 1864, and in that year joined Company F, of Colonel Spaight's Regiment of Texas Infantry, with which he served in Texas along the coast until the regiment was disbanded at the close of the war. After the completion of his military service, Mr. Pruett engaged in the stock business at his old home. He had made no money prior to the war, and had none after it to begin business with, and the nineteen-year-old youth really got his start by working for wages as a farmer and by cropping for himself. He worked for as low as fifty cents per day and invested his small savings in cattle, horses and land, paying at that time about $2.50 a head for cattle and about $5.00 a head for horses. For land he paid from fifty cents to a dollar an acre, that being the outside limit. In comparison with the prices of each of these commodities today, it can be seen that a man with his resources would have had a difficult time in getting a start now.

Mr. Pruett purchased his first land from the Thomas J. Haggerty heirs, in the Haggerty survey, and he still owns that land which continues to be used as a ranch. During the panicky conditions of 1886-7-8, Mr. Pruett weathered the storm, but for three years he sold nothing, and when he finally did find a profitable market his ranch was covered with stock. He has been a shipper for the past thirty-five years, and before the coming of the Southern Pacific drove his stock to Louisiana and peddled the cattle to the planters. He has accumulated here about 11,300 acres, which still comprises one vast stock hacienda. He has introduced the Burmah cattle into his herd and has crossed them with the native stock with good success, it making the best cross possible and producing an animal of 1,000 or 1,100 pounds and a fine, healthy range brute. Mr. Pruett has kept his horse department confined to range horses and these he uses chiefly for range work himself. Truly there is something encouraging in Mr. Pruett's career. It clearly illustrates the possibi-ties that are open in this country to earnest, persevering young men who have the courage of their convictions and are determined to be the architects of their own fortunes, for, although conditions are somewhat different now than they were in his youth, paths are still open to those who have the mind to direct, the ambition to make possible and the will to do. In politics a Democrat, Mr. Pruett has served his county as a member of the board of commissioners for eight years. He has never been a convention man save in the convention at which Governor O. M. Roberts was nominated in the early eighties. All matters of civic virtue and civic pride have been of interest to him and his co-operation has been given to many measures which have been directly beneficial to the city of Dayton and the surrounding country in the line of its material, intellectual and moral progress. He has never joined a fraternal organization nor a religious body.

Mr. Pruett was married (first) in April, 1866, to Miss Lucinda Abshier, a daughter of Asa Abshier, who came into Texas from Louisiana. Mrs. Pruett died in May, 1889, leaving no children. Mr. Pruett was married again in March, 1890, to Miss Minnie Day, daughter of William Day, who was a resident of Memphis, Tennessee. Of this union there is a son, Edmund Day, who received his education here and is engaged in the cattle business with his father. He married Ethel Littler.

BURR GAMMILL WARD, M. D. Engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery at Marlin since 1896, Dr. Burr Gammill Ward has steadily advanced in the ranks of his profession through individual merit and ability. His position in his chosen vocation is firmly established. Doctor Ward has spent his entire professional career in Marlin, where he was born November 13, 1876, a son of John and Georgia (Gammill) Ward. The family is an old and honored one of Texas, Doctor Ward's father having been born in Limestone county in 1851. He is now a resident of Marlin, living somewhat retired after many years spent in agricultural pursuits. A veteran of the Civil war, through which he fought as a soldier of the Confederacy, he is well known and highly esteemed, and a full sketch of his career will be found on another page of this work. Mrs. Ward was born in Alabama, in 1850, and died January 30, 1913, at Marlin, having been the mother of four children: Julia, who is now Mrs. Seth Mooring, of Bryan, Texas; Burr Gammill, of this review; Stephen J., a stockman of Rosebud, Texas, and John J., who is manager of the Gulf Refining Company, of Marlin.

Burr G. Ward attended the public and high schools of Marlin, and, having fully decided upon a career in medicine, entered Davis Military Academy at Winston-Salem, North Carolina. After some preparation there, he became a student in the Marmaduke Military Academy, at Sweet Springs, Missouri, following his graduation from which he attended Baylor University for six months. Not yet satisfied with his training, he attended the medical department of the State University at Galveston for two years, and Bellevue Hospital Medical College, New York City, and was graduated from the latter with the class of 1896. He at once returned to Marlin, fully prepared to practice medicine and surgery. He soon attracted attention and a large practice in the latter branch. Dr. Ward belongs to the various organizations of his profession, and spends a great deal of his time in study and research. He is a member of the Board of Health of Marlin, and has taken a keen interest in all that affects the welfare of his city. His confidence in its future prosperity has led him to invest in realty. As physician, man and citizen he has always been held in the highest esteem, and his friends are legion.

Dr. Ward was married at Marlin, May 15, 1896, to a Marlin lady, Miss Aline Oltorf, daughter of Cliff Oltorf, one of the earliest settlers of Falls county. To this union there has come one child: Thomas Clifton, born March 14, 1897.

JUDGE THOMAS MOORE PASCHAL of San Antonio, Texas, as counsel, judge and congressman, has made a name and a record for himself that is worthy of a place on the page of history.

Judge Paschal was born in Alexandria, Louisiana, December 15, 1845, and through his paternal ancestry claims a strain of French Huguenot blood. His great-grandfather, William Paschal, was a son of Huguenot exiles to North Carolina, where he was born, lived and died. William Paschal's son, George, was born in Granville, North Carolina, in 1760, and died in Augusta, Georgia, in 1832. Both served in the Revolutionary War. George married Agnes Brewer, who lived to the advanced age of ninety-four years, and died in Savannah, Georgia. She was in many respects a remarkable woman, a strong character, and exemplified in her life many of the best traits found in the Scotch-Irish stock to which she belonged. One of her sons, the late George W. Paschal of Texas, was the author of a small volume, a memoir of her life. This George W. Paschal was judge of the supreme court of Arkansas. He removed to Texas in 1846, became widely known as a lawyer, and also as the author of a voluminous digest of the laws of Texas, "Paschal's Annotated Digest of Our Supreme Court Decisions." He died in Washington about 1877, while extending his labors in legal literature. Other sons of George and Agnes Paschal were Franklin L. and Isaiah Addison Paschal. The former was a resident of San Antonio, Texas, for forty years. Isaiah A. was the father of the subject of this sketch. He was born in Auravia, Georgia, in 1807, and died in San Antonio in 1869. For a number of years he practiced law at Alexandria, Louisiana, and served successively as district attorney, state senator and probate judge. There, in the spring of 1844, he and Mary C. Richardson were united in marriage. She was a daughter of William Richardson, of Fredericksburg, Virginia, who died in 1837; her mother died in San Antonio in 1840. In 1867, Judge Isaiah A. Paschal removed with his family to Texas, and from that time until his death in 1869 was a distinguished member of the San Antonio bar. During this time he served a number of years as a member of the Texas senate. He was a man of superior qualities of both mind and heart—able, eloquent, genial, kind, generous. To him and his wife were given three children: Florence, who died in San Antonio in 1868; Emmett, born in 1855, and now a resident of San Antonio, and Thomas M. Their venerable mother, greatly esteemed, is still living in San Antonio.

In 1861, Thomas M. Paschal entered Central College, Danville, Kentucky, where he graduated in 1866. After his return from college he studied law under his father's instructions and in July, 1867, was admitted to the bar. He was United States commissioner two years in the West Texas district, a justice of the peace, and city attorney in 1869, and in 1870 he became judge of the Criminal District Court of San Antonio, but resigned the last named office in 1871 and accepted the position of attorney for the Twenty-fourth District, west of San Antonio, which caused his removal to Castroville. At the succeeding election, in a triangular race, he was defeated for the same place. He then removed to Brackett, and continued to practice law until his election as judge of the same district in 1875. That year he returned to Castroville. He was re-elected in November, 1880, 1884 and 1888, and made a record of continuous service of over twenty years on the district bench. In 1892 he was elected to the Fifty-third Congress, in which he served with distinction, but he was defeated for renomination, partly on account of the fact that his high sense of duty forbade his coming home from the session of Congress when necessary to look after his interests, and partly owing to the abolition of the time-honored two-thirds rule of the Democratic party. Since his voluntary retirement from public life, besides being a student of his profession, Judge Paschal has made a close study of the socio-political economic questions of the day. He was one of the first citizens in the country to bring to public attention the necessity for conserving the forests and preventing their denudation, in order to insure a continued supply of water to the headwaters of western rivers. He first became interested in this subject upon a visit to the San Francisco mountains in Southern New Mexico, when he noted the effect of the torrential summer rains on the headwaters of the Pecos and other West Texas rivers. And while on the bench, examining applicants for citizenship he became greatly interested in the laws of naturalization. These subjects he brought so vividly before the legislative body that as a result the national government set aside immense tracts of forestry in Southeastern New Mexico along the Sacramento Mountains, and the amendment to our immigration and naturalization laws was due in large measure to his persistent work as a member of the Committees on Immigration and Naturalization, on which he served at his own request. "His celebrated decision while on the bench in the Sauer case in refusing to naturalize him, was an epoch-making departure in the judicial interpretation of hitherto loose and dangerously administered naturalization laws, and the wide and favorable comment it received led to the amendments referred to; such a decision and such wise forethought upon the great questions named, leading up to such results, is indeed esteemed an honor to Texas and the South." From 1877 to 1879, Judge Paschal served as extradition agent of the United States under the treaty with Mexico. This position he resigned in 1879. During his active life he came in touch with all classes of people. On one occasion he came near losing his life at the hands of a sneaking horse thief. He had just sentenced the man to the penitentiary at Eagle Pass for horse stealing, and the thief attempted to destroy him and the other officers of the court by putting strychnine in their drinking water. He did not accomplish this, but poisoned himself, causing death in a short time.

On the expiration of Judge Paschal's term in Congress in 1894, he removed from Castroville to San Antonio, which has since been his home and where he has continued with success to practice his profession of law.

In Masonry, Judge Paschal has taken both the chapter and council degrees, and he has been identified with this organization since 1873. Politically, he has always been a Democrat; religiously, while not a member of any church, his inclinations are toward the Presbyterian faith, in which he was reared, his parents having been worthy members of that church.

April 13, 1871, at San Antonio, Judge Paschal and Florida A. Mays were united in marriage, and to them have been given five children, as follows: Mary Natalie, Lenore, Pauline, Harold Addison and Thomas L. M. Mary Natalie is the wife of Captain C. E. Hampton, U. S. Army, retired, and they have three children: Dorothy, Helen and Carmen. Pauline is the wife of Charles H. Benson. Mrs. Paschal's father, William Douglas Mays, of Gallatin, Tennessee, died in San Antonio in 1873, at the age of seventy-three years. Her mother, Mary A. (Cotton) Mays, was a native of North Carolina, born in 1820.

JOHN A. HARDY, M. D. Success in his profession and influential activity as a citizen have marked the career of Dr. Hardy during his residence and practice at Alpine, and few physicians of Brewster county have accomplished so much and gained such high recognition in the professional and in special affairs as Dr. Hardy.

John A. Hardy is a native of Virginia, born in Lancaster county, November 12, 1875, being the second child and only son of Andrew and Arabella (Treakle) Hardy. The father was also a native of Virginia, and now lives retired at Niagara Falls, New York. The mother, who was born in Virginia, died in 1903 at the age of about sixty. She was a devout member of the Baptist faith.

Dr. Hardy spent the first twenty-three years of his career in Virginia, where he obtained an education in the public schools, and after leaving high school entered the noted old college of William and Mary at Williamsburg. On being graduated from that school he engaged in teaching for two years in his native state and at the same time pursued his studies in medicine. With the earnings of this occupation he attended the University College of Medicine at Richmond, where he was graduated M. D. in May, 1899. He began practice in West Virginia, where he remained for six years, and in January, 1906, came to Alpine and established his office, since which time he has acquired a position as one of the most successful physicians and surgeons in Brewster county. Besides his large private practice he is local surgeon for the Orient Railway and is county health officer.

At Williamsburg, Virginia, April 28, 1901, Dr. Hardy married Miss Virginia Travis Armistead, daughter of Robert Armistead of Williamsburg. They are the parents of one daughter, Virginia Hardy. The family worship in the Episcopal faith, and Mrs. Hardy is one of the very active and influential members of that church and a member of the Ladies' Guild. Dr. Hardy is an active member of the Masonic order, and both he and his wife belong to the Eastern Star Auxiliary. He is also affiliated with the Elks, the Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias. His college fraternities are the Pi Kappa Alpha and the Phi Chi, the latter being a medical branch of college fraternalism. He has membership in the El Paso County Medical Society, and the Texas State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. His local civic relations are with the Alpine Commercial Club. Since his college days Dr. Hardy has continued an active interest in all the wholesome outdoor sports, and, as he says, is a thirty-third degree fan in baseball. He is a man of broad training and reading, he continues his interest in the world's affairs, and knowledge through good books and all the sources of local entertainment. He is an enthusiastic citizen of Texas, and says that the citizenship in this state is of splendid quality, the climate unsurpassed, the natural resources only in the infancy of their development, the people broad-minded and hospitable, and opportunities still awaiting for the progressive man.

ARTHUR N. BROWN, M. D. The second oldest resident of Richland, Dr. Arthur N. Brown has been engaged in the practice of medicine here since 1887. His career is one that should prove of a nature encouraging to young men who are starting out in life without educational, financial or other advantages, for under the most discouraging circumstances he has brought himself advancement and position, and solely through the force of his own unaided efforts has won respect and esteem in professional, business and social circles. Dr. Brown is a native of Lauderdale county, Mississippi, born April 23, 1860, and is a son of A. Foster and Jane (Harvey) Brown.

Arthur Brown, the paternal grandfather of Dr. Brown, was born in Scotland and upon emigrating to the United States located in Alabama, but subsequently moved to Mississippi and died near Meridian, where he had been a large planter and slaveholder. His children comprised Randolph, Dr. William, Jasper N., A. Foster, Franklin P., Mrs. Jane Green and Margaret. A. Foster Brown was born in Alabama, and was a child when he went with his parents to Mississippi, where he grew to manhood and became a merchant. At the outbreak of the Civil war he enlisted in the Confederate Army and met a soldier's death at the siege of Vicksburg, being there buried. Mrs. Brown subsequently married C. W. Edgar, who brought the family to Texas in 1870, settling in Titus county and remaining there until 1876, when removal was made to Navarro county.

The circumstances of Dr. Brown's boyhood were such that he acquired only a desultory education, but after locating in the Angus neighborhood, where he became a farm hand, he acquired sufficient information to become a teacher and for one term had charge of a country school as assistant teacher. Subsequently, he clerked in a store at Angus, then tributary to Corsicana, but it was his ambition to become a physician, and every spare moment found him applying himself assiduously to his medical studies. As a clerk he was able to earn and save enough money to attend lecture courses, although these came spasmodically, until he finally secured a license and began to practice on a certificate. In 1887 Dr. Brown graduated at the Washington University, then known as the Missouri Medical College, and in that year came to Richland, where he has since continued in practice. He did not cease to be a student, however, at the close of his college career, for later he took post-graduate work at Fort Worth University, and at all times he has kept fully abreast of the advances made in his calling, through membership in the various organizations of the profession. He affiliated with the State Medical Association of Texas during its earlier life, and his diploma is the first one on record in Navarro county. Aside from his calling, which is a large and representative one, as is but natural, considering his high attainments, Dr. Brown has had other interests, having been the founder of the Brown Drug Company, at Richland, now the business of his son, as well as being interested in agricultural pursuits for some years, his farm being operated with tenant labor.

Dr. Brown was married (first) in Richland, in April, 1889, to Miss Willie Patrick, a daughter of Judge Patrick. She died in 1895, having been the mother of the following children: Janie, a teacher in the public schools and a student of the Southwestern University of Georgetown, Texas, class of 1916; and William P. and Arthur N., engaged in the drug business at Richland. Dr. Brown was married (second) in November, 1896, to Miss Eliza Shelton, a daughter of Mrs. Sallie Shelton, who came from Tennessee, where, in Franklin county, Mrs. Brown was born, the youngest daughter of a family of eleven children. Dr. and Mrs. Brown have had five children, namely: Jewell, Beryl, Ruby, Baudy and Electa. Dr. Brown is a strong Prohibitionist, a supporter of Tom Ball for governor, and one of the two original Woodrow Wilson men of Richland, and as such was sent as a delegate to the county convention.

OSCAR L. JOHNSON. Since 1881 a resident of Van Zandt county, Mr. Johnson got his start in material prosperity as a farmer, and for a number of years past has been prominent in furnishing a service to Wills Point and vicinity through his large cotton gin and the electric light plant. His home has been in Wills Point since 1897. He is regarded as one of the most prosperous men in the locality, though thirty years ago he came to this locality with very meagre capital, and farmed on rented land for a time until he had accumulated enough to engage in business for himself.

Oscar L. Johnson was born in Limestone county, Alabama, January 16, 1856, a son of Andrew J. Johnson, and a grandson of Rev. Adkinson Johnson. Rev. Adkinson Johnson, who died in Alabama when past eighty years of age, was one of the men of strong convictions, and incessant activities who did much to mould opinions and perform useful parts in their communities in the life of the old south. He was devoted to the southern cause, both before and after the war, and such were his prejudices against the North that after the war he refused to buy any goods or tool made or sold by a house north of Mason and Dixon's line, and manufactured his own tools rather than patronize a northern industry. Adkinson Johnson was born in one of the Carolinas, and was one of four brothers, all of whom were preachers. Adkinson was the only "hardshell" of the four, and combined the occupation of a primitive Baptist preacher and a mechanic. The other brothers of this quartet were: Felix, who died in Paris, Texas, where he was one of the able citizens of the county, was a man of more than ordinary education, and did much to aid in the work of education. His church in which he preached was the Cumberland Presbyterian. Rev. Alva Johnson, who died in Alabama, was a preacher of the same faith, and was the father of Dr. Luther Johnson, who died as president of the Trinity University of Tehuacana, Texas. Rev. James Johnson, whose ministry was with the Cumberland Presbyterian faith, died in West Tennessee. There were some sisters in this family, also, but no information is at hand concerning them. Adkinson Johnson married Martha Martin, and their children were: George, who served in the Confederate army, and died in Alabama; Elizabeth, who married Henry Graham; Jane, who married Thomas Graham, and died in Alabama; Mary, who married Dan Morrison, and died in Alabama; Andrew J., who died in Greenville, Texas, and Martha, who married her cousin, a Mr. Martin, and died in Alabama.

The father of Oscar L. Johnson was Andrew J. Johnson, a millwright and mechanic, who was born in Collard's Valley in Morgan county, Alabama, in 1831. During his boyhood he was limited as to educational advantages, and early in life applied himself to a mechanical trade. As a mechanic he was exempt from military duty during the war, since his services were more valuable as a worker with tools, than as a bearer of a musket. He moved out to Texas in 1881, locating in Greenville. He lived at peace with all people, was unambitious for the accumulation of wealth, had no aspiration for office, voted the Democratic ticket, studied the Bible diligently, but never joined any church. He married Mary E. Witty. His death occurred in 1907, while his wife passed away in 1901. She was a daughter of George Witty, who was the first male child born in Limestone county, Alabama. The children of Andrew J. Johnson and wife were: Ophelia, who died unmarried; Oscar L.; Alice, who died in childhood; George E., of Alabama; Eulalie, wife of P. C. Averett of Greenville, Texas; Lawrence A. of Greenville; Cleveland W. of Greenville; Nina, who died in childhood; and Macklins of Greenville.

A public school education gave Oscar L. Johnson his book equipment for a career, and his early life was spent in his native state. When he reached the age of twenty-one, he came to Texas in order to seek out a future home, and spent some time in Hunt and Fannin counties. During the two years of his residence there he engaged in farming. Returning to Alabama, he helped to arrange the family affairs before leaving that state, and all of them came to Texas in 1881. The parents and the younger children went to Greenville, but Oscar established himself on a farm six miles west of Wills Point. There he rented land, and with the slowly accumulating profits, invested in property, and continued as a prospering farmer for sixteen years. He still owns a farm in that part of Van Zandt county. When Mr. Johnson moved to Wills Point in 1897 he built a cotton gin. Two of his gins were destroyed by the elements, but he has always rebuilt and has performed a large service to the agricultural community through his regular operation of this institution. While he owned the gin he also spent nine years as superintendent of the Broadmoor ranch for C. E. Brown of Chicago, the Broadmoor being one of the most important ranch properties of Van Zandt county. The manufacturing plant, of which Mr. Johnson is proprietor, is a large and well equipped one, consisting of seven stands of eighty stalls of the Pratt type. In 1904 to his gin he added an electric light plant with two thirty-kilowatt dynamos. The plant was subsequently burned, and when rebuilt he enlarged the power by five kilowatt per dynamo. This plant now serves Wills Point with electric light, both day and night. Besides his mill property, Mr. Johnson has erected one of the fine homes of Wills Point, which is another contribution to its substantial development. This is a beautiful home, a two-story residence, surrounded by large grounds, and everything has the air of open-heartedness and liberality and good cheer.

In politics Mr. Johnson voted the Democratic ticket. Fraternally he is a Master Mason and is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias. Among his other business relations in his community he is a director of the First State Bank of Wills Point. On February 1, 1883, in Kaufman county, Mr. Johnson married Miss Fannie Hill, a daughter of Henry Hill, a Georgia man and a farmer. Their children are: Beulah, who died just when entering womanhood; William L., a farmer, who married Ethel Hamilton, and has one daughter, Charlotte Frances; Oscar L., Jr., the youngest, and assistant to his father in the operation of the light plant.

JOSEPH I. SIDDALL. For many years a well-known resident and manufacturer of Gainesville, the late Joseph I. Siddall lived in Texas from about the close of the Civil war, and was identified with varied lines of enterprise.

He was born in Mississippi, in Tippah county, in 1847, the son of a Mississippi farmer. He was reared in his home state previous to the Civil war and then learned the cabinet maker's trade, which he followed after he attained manhood. In 1867 he came to Texas, first locating at Richmond in Southern Texas, where his first experience was in freighting goods from that place to Dallas. He next went out to Burnet county, where he bought and operated a ranch for a number of years. In that county he reared his family. During his residence there he held the office of deputy sheriff for some time. His next home was in Lampasas county, where he was engaged in the contracting business and built a number of houses and business structures while there. From there he moved to Ballinger, in Runnels county, but the drought of 1887 drove him away from that section of West Texas, and in that year he located in Cooke county, at Gainesville. Here he resumed his business as a contractor, and established a planing mill and cabinet working factory, which he developed into a large and important industry, and continued it successfully until he retired in 1912.

He was married to Miss Barbara Ellen Brymer, who was born in Texas. There were seven children born to them, namely: One that died in infancy; William R., a railroad conductor on the Frisco System, with residence at Sherman; Sarah V., wife of J. E. Dee, in the railroad service and with his home at Stamford; Daniel, concerning whom more is said in the following paragraph; Maude, the deceased wife of W. E. Weeks, of California, and the mother of two children: James E., deceased; Clyde W., a railroad man of Denison.

Daniel Siddall, son of the late Joseph I. Siddall, is one of the leading business men of Gainesville, and has a large drug store there. He married Miss Annie B. Howard, who was born in Cooke county, and her father was one of the early settlers of Texas, both her parents having come originally from Kentucky. Her father was a merchant and cattleman up to the time of his death, which occurred in 1902. Her mother is also deceased. Mrs. Daniel Siddall was one of three children, one of whom died in childhood, and the other is Roy M., of New Mexico. Daniel Siddall and wife were married in 1909. He was reared in Gainesville, studied pharmacy and learned the practical details of the business in the Edwards Drug House, and at the same time attended business college at night. By study and persevering work, he acquired an interest in the Edwards drug business, of which he is now vice president, and has also bought another drug store in Gainesville, being now proprietor of the two leading drug stores in the city. The late Joseph I. Siddall never took any part in politics, and his son is likewise no politician, although a Democratic voter. The father was a member of the Presbyterian church, and Daniel belongs to the Baptist.

JOHN F. RENFRO. One of the best known families in Angelina county is that of Renfro, which has been represented in East Texas since the years of the Republic, and few men have shown greater business ability and have been more successful in building up large landed estates than the Renfros. John F. Renfro is not only a large landowner in Angelina county, but is a minister of the Congregational Methodist church. He is a grandson of a Texas pioneer, and is living within a dozen miles of the place where he was born September 24, 1866.

His grandfather, John F. Renfro, brought his family to Texas in 1839, and after one year in Sabine county, settled on Renfro's prairie, eleven miles south of the village of Huntington in 1840. That was his home the rest of his career, and he did much improvement work on his land. Born in Kentucky in 1797, he was sixty-two years of age at the time of his death on November 24, 1859. In Missouri he married Miss Rebecca Harrison Hicks. Not only in Texas but elsewhere, John F. Renfro and wife were useful workers in their community, and not only contrived to prosper themselves, but helped to smooth the way for other comers in the new country. Their journey to Texas was made by wagon, and their first year in Sabine county was spent near McMehand church, the first Methodist church organized in Texas. John F. Renfro and wife were both devout church people and he was a leader in the work of the Methodist society. Rebecca Renfro died December 23, 1869. The children of this pioneer couple were: Isaac P.; Mary Jane, wife of H. A. P. Berry, died in Hood county, Texas; Benjamin F., who died in Ellis county, Texas; Joseph, who died at the old home at the age of twenty-one; Kate, who married Dick Howard and moved to Mississippi; Margaret, who first married John Brown, who died, and is now Mrs. Hutchinson of Nacogdoches county; James D., now living in Waco; John, who died in the Confederate army; Lucy and Samuel, who died before reaching maturity. The father of John F. Renfro is the venerable Isaac P. Renfro, who, at the age of eighty-four, is still an active farmer in the community where his father settled more than seventy-four years ago. Isaac P. Renfro was born in Washington county, Missouri, March 27, 1829, and was ten years old when the family moved to Texas. A young man of seventeen, in November, 1846, he enlisted for service in the Mexican war. His enlistment occurred in New Orleans, and his service was as a teamster in General Taylor's army, and he was present at the battle of Buena Vista and in other engagements, continuing with the army of the United States until June, 1847. Some fifteen years later when the Civil war came on, he enlisted, in 1862, in the Confederate army, and was a teamster in Governor Hubbard's Twenty-second Regiment of Texas Infantry in General McCulloch's division. Having been trained as a farmer, Isaac P. Renfro, after his marriage, took up that vocation and the live stock industry, and has long since been accounted one of the most successful business men of Angelina county. His accumulations have amounted to fifteen hundred acres, and while in the vigor of life his industry and acumen were unsurpassed, and now at eighty-four he is like the average man of fifty-four. His step is light, his movements brisk, and his purpose as firm as when he had many years ahead of him. Since his wife's death he has kept house and carried on the details of a small farm.

Isaac P. Renfro was married February 13, 1855, to Sarah F. Ainsworth, daughter of Casual and Lizzie Beth (Dean) Ainsworth from Alabama. Mrs. Renfro, who was one of three children, was born in Washington county, Alabama, December 3, 1833, and died November 24, 1904. Isaac P. Renfro and wife had the following children: James Franklin; Ann, wife of John A. Weeks, of Renfro Prairie; Mary Amanda; Lucy, wife of T. J. Treadwell of Burke; Ella, who married Allen Rush, deceased, and is now the wife of John Spillars and lives at Weldon, Texas; John F., of Huntington; Albert P., of Burke; Charles D., of Homer, Angelina county; Sallie, wife of I. O. Warner, of Diball, Angelina county; and Rosie, who married J. D. Cochran, and both are now deceased.

John F. Renfro grew up near the prairie which has the family name, and completed his education at the Sam Houston Normal in Huntsville, which graduated him in 1899. His early experience was that of teaching, and there are a great many of his former pupils who remember him with gratitude and affection. It was his regular vocation for ten years, and in the meantime he spent the intervals of his work in continuing his own schooling. On leaving the schoolroom, Mr. Renfro dropped back to the farm, locating on his grandfather's old estate on Boluxie Creek. His exceptional enterprise and varied activities as a stock man, trader and land dealer, has brought him a place among the most successful and influential men of affairs in this part of the state. He owns seven thousand acres of timber and grazing land in the vicinity that he came to know so well as a boy, and over which he wandered when a beardless youth with only his aspirations and dreams of success. Two hundred and fifty acres of this immense estate are now under cultivation, and there is a large mansion house and quarters for the tenant families. The entire tract is enclosed with wire fencing, and in one quarter of the farm is a large artificial lake, constructed by Mr. Renfro and stocked with bass from the government hatchery. In 1911, Mr. Renfro bought one hundred and fifty-five acres comprising an excellent farm in the school district of Huntington, where his growing family can have good school advantages, and where at the same time his sons can learn the practical lessons of industry on the farm. In 1913, Mr. Renfro built a splendid country home of nine rooms, and that structure is a pioneer of its kind in that vicinity, being a modern country residence, equal in its furnishings and equipment to the best that may be found in the city. In 1914, his property interests were increased by the purchase of eighteen hundred and fifty acres also situated in the Huntington school district, and in and about the town of Huntington.

Mr. Renfro is one of the county trustees of schools in Angelina county. Aside from this office he has had no connection with public affairs. Mr. Renfro was one of the organizers of the Huntington Guaranty State Bank, and served as the second president of that institution.

On December 23, 1891, was celebrated his marriage with Allie D. Sayres, who died September 23, 1892. On November 21, 1893, he married Miss Arkansas Hawkins, a daughter of George M. Hawkins, who was born in Georgia and came to Texas from Columbia county, Arkansas, where Mrs. Renfro was born, October 17, 1877. Her father had four wives and the following children: William; James; Tillman; Jo; R. E.; Dr. J. W., of Lufkin; Mrs. Renfro; Ben; Sudie, wife of T. E. Stewart; Sarilla, wife of A. P. Burris; Sam H.; and Horatio. Mr. and Mrs. Renfro's children are: Preston S.; John Franklin; Bessie; and I. P., Jr. Mr. Renfro has had active membership in the church since he was eighteen years old, and was ordained a minister of the Congregational Methodist church at Beulah Chapel in 1910. He has been an effective worker during his short pastoral career, has organized one church, the Dearmond's Chapel, and devotes much of his time to his ministerial labors.

JAMES M. WILCOX. The first settlers of a new county or city, independently of any intrinsic qualities which they possess, are objects of peculiar interest in succeeding generations. Men delight to read their names and treasure in memory the slightest incidents connected with their persons and their settlement. As the years go by the founders of New England and the colonists of Virginia are being gradually raised from the level of common humanity and placed before our contemplation upon pedestals, challenging the honor and reverence of posterity. Each successive step in the settlement of the country, as adventurous pioneers have pushed out from the populous centers into the wilderness, has brought to notice enterprising men, who have connected their names indissolubly with rising states and embryo cities. While he was not the first inhabitant or the oldest resident of McKinney, the late James M. Wilcox was at the time of his death probably the oldest business man of the city which he had seen grow from a straggling community to a center of commercial and industrial activity. During the next third of a century he was engaged in business here, he rose to a foremost position among the men whose operations gave importance to the city, and his influence, always for good, was felt in every phase of the growing municipality's life. His life was on the whole a fortunate and happy one; he had the esteem of his acquaintances and the love of his friends, and was able at all times to help his city's growth and advancement, along commercial, spiritual and educational lines. A brief review of the salient points of his career will serve to illustrate his character.

James M. Wilcox was born near Columbia, Boone county, Missouri, June 19, 1828, and died at his home in McKinney, March 1, 1912, aged eighty-three years, six months, twelve days. He was the son of Lazarus and Lucy (Helm) Wilcox, natives respectively of Virginia and Kentucky, who emigrated to Missouri in 1820. The father was an elder in the Baptist church of Boone county, and assisted in organizing the Bonne Femme Baptist church of that county, said to have been the first Baptist church organized in the state. James M. Wilcox came to Texas from Missouri, accompanied by his brothers, Joseph and George Wilcox, in 1844, when he was only sixteen years of age. He remained only about a year, when he returned to his native home and entered the State University, from which institution he was graduated with highest honors in 1848. When the gold excitement broke out in California in 1849 he was one of the first to hasten to the land of gold and promise. Remaining there only a short time, he returned to Missouri, where he remained until 1854, in the early part of which year he again came to Texas and permanently settled in Collin county. Immediately after his return to this state and county he embarked in the mercantile business at Weston, twelve miles northwest of this city, his being the first establishment of the kind in that section of the county. The venture proved to be a good one and the young business man prospered.

In the year 1856 Mr. Wilcox was married to Miss Nancy Throckmorton, the ceremony being performed by Rev. Jesse Portman, a pioneer minister of this county. Mrs. Wilcox was the daughter of Doctor Throckmorton, a Texas pioneer, and sister of ex-Governor Throckmorton, deceased. After several years of merchandising at Weston, Mr. Wilcox located on a tract of land at Lebanon until 1872, when he went to Plano to engage in the lumber business. It was during the time of his residence at Lebanon that the struggle between the South and the North came on, and his sympathies being with the South he joined the Confederate army, enlisting in R. W. Carpenter's company and Martin's regiment in 1862. He served most faithfully and valiantly throughout the war, and distinguished himself in many encounters with the enemy. After the war he returned to his home at Lebanon, and became a justice of the peace, Jones C. Moore being the constable of the district. These two officials were the only ones who were allowed to remain in office during the reconstruction days. In 1872 Mr. Wilcox established a lumber business at Plano, his being the first yard to be put in there after the building of the H. & T. C. Railway to that point. It was there, in 1878, that his first wife died, and she was laid to rest at the Rowlett Creek church cemetery. Nine children were born to this union, only five of whom survive, as follows: George, Judge Frank E., Joe and Arthur, all of McKinney, and Mrs. S. W. King, Jr., of Dallas. Only a few months prior to his death Mr. Wilcox had the bodies of his deceased wife and four children removed from the Rowlett Creek cemetery to the family lot in Pecan Grove cemetery.

Mr. Wilcox successfully conducted his lumber business at Plano until 1881, when he removed to McKinney and established a lumber yard here. This business he operated continuously from that time until his death. In 1882 he was married the second time to Miss Sarah J. McAulay, of McKinney, a sister of the late Dr. E. N. McAulay, deceased. The second wife, and the two children born of this marriage, James, Jr., and Miss Eddie, together with the other sons and daughter, above mentioned, survive.

Mr. Wilcox was one of the earliest members of the Rowlett Creek Baptist church, the first organized in the county, and he was, and had been for many years, a member of the First Baptist church of McKinney. He had always been most active in church work, and in the early days had been teacher and superintendent of the Sunday schools at Rowlett, Plano and McKinney, respectively. He had attended all services of the church as long as he was physically able to do so. About four weeks prior to his demise, Mr. Wilcox had the misfortune to slip and fall, resulting in a serious injury to his shoulder. From this injury he never fully recovered, although the immediate cause of his death is said to have been advanced age, supplemented by worry over his enforced inactivity. Although he had been quite feeble for a long time, he would never give up, and continued to go regularly to the offices of his firm, J. M. Wilcox & Son, where he seemed to take a great interest in the management of the affairs of the concern, in every detail of which he was thoroughly posted. He passed away surrounded by his family, at his home at No. 410 South Wilcox street. Mr. Wilcox's funeral was held March 2, 1912, at the Baptist church, burial following immediately after in Pecan Grove cemetery. The ceremonies were attended by people from every walk of life, who had known and revered Mr. Wilcox for his many sterling qualities of mind and heart.

At the time of his death a local newspaper, speaking editorially, said: "In the death of Mr. J. M. Wilcox, there is removed from the business activities of McKinney probably her oldest business man, he having been actively engaged in the lumber business in this city for almost a third of a century. In his younger days, the city or county never had a more active or more progressive citizen and business man, and upon his retirement from active business, on account of his age, the business was carried on for the firm by his son, George Wilcox, the style remaining J. M. Wilcox & Son. Mr. Wilcox was a man of fine business ability, and was always kind, courteous and affable. He has raised a fine family of business and professional men, all having families and doing well. Mr. Wilcox was a successful business man, but the cry of the needy and worthy he never turned down. Probably no man has done more for the advancement of the city or county than he. He was unostentatious but very pleasant, agreeable and entertaining, when once engaged in a conversation. We have talked to him many times, and he always, like a father advising his sons, gave us good fatherly advice and a word of cheer. He was a success in every sense of the term, a high-class, moral, upright Christian gentleman, always and upon all occasions doing right as he saw it. Our city, county and state have been made better and brighter by J. M. Wilcox having lived. Peace to his ashes; his memory we shall revere."

HON. FRANK EDWARD WILCOX. A native son of Collin county, Frank Edward Wilcox has spent his entire career within its borders, and has risen to a place of distinction in business, professional and public life. However prodigal in her gifts, Nature seldom bestows upon an individual the ability, or combination of abilities, that makes for success in more than one field of endeavor, yet Mr. Wilcox during his active life has displayed a versatility of talents that have made him an eminent lawyer, a successful director of large commercial enterprises and a jurist and legislator who has won the confidence of his fellow citizens through his devotion to the highest ideals of public service.

Mr. Wilcox was born December 12, 1865, in Collin county, Texas, and is a son of James M. and Nancy (Throckmorton) Wilcox, a complete review of whose lives will be found on another page of this work. Mr. Wilcox received his early education in the public schools of his native county, and following some preparation entered the University of Missouri, at Columbia, which he attended from 1881 until 1884. During 1886 and 1887 he was a student at the University of Texas, Austin, graduating in the latter year with the degree of Bachelor of Laws, and since that time has been engaged in the active practice of his profession at McKinney. He has risen to an enviable place in the ranks of his calling, and his connection with a number of prominent cases has brought him favorably before the public. Early during his career he entered actively into Democratic politics, and when still a young practitioner was elected city attorney of McKinney. In 1897 and 1898 he was a member of the Twenty-fifth Legislature of Texas, as one of the representatives from Collin county, and while there was a member of the Finance and Judiciary committees. In 1902 he was elected county judge of Collin county, and continued to act in that capacity until his voluntary retirement in 1906, and since that time has continued in general practice. Mr. Wilcox has extensive and important connections with various business concerns, being vice-president and attorney of the Wilcox Lumber Company of McKinney; director and attorney of the Texas Cotton Mill Company of this city; vice president and attorney of the Wood County Lumber Company of Rhonesboro, Texas; and director and attorney of the Continental State Bank of McKinney. He is a member of the Royal Arch Masons, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Knights of Pythias, takes much interest in the work of these organizations, and has numerous friends therein. His religious connection is with the Baptist church.

Mr. Wilcox was married at McKinney, Texas, December 22, 1887, to Miss Jennie Largent, who died in 1904, leaving one daughter: Frances, who lives at home. Mr. Wilcox was married (second) to Rebecca Abernathy, in June, 1907, at Pulaski, Tennessee, and to this union there were born two children: Frank E., Jr., who died aged twenty-one months; and James Andrew, who is four years old. Mr. Wilcox is devoted to his profession, and the duties of his practice are such that he seldom finds leisure to take a vacation. On such occasions as he can slip away, however, he takes his rod and gun and passes his time in seeking out the denizen of the forest and the stream. He has a pleasant home at No. 104 Foot street, and maintains well-appointed offices in the Suttle building, west side of the Public Square.

WALTER H. CALDWELL. Throughout the history of the war between the South and the North there was probably to be found no more famous effective body of men than the Eighth Regiment of Texas Cavalry, known as Terry's Rangers. This organization was made up of skilled and speedy riders, who traveled fast and tirelessly, fought hard and faithfully, and frequently made up for lack of numbers by the rapidity and deadliness of their actions, winning thus the respect and admiration of both the Federal and Confederate armies. When peace had been declared the members of this regiment returned to their homes, and almost without exception in the years that followed became men of substance and importance in their various communities, demonstrating their ability to fight the battles of peace as effectively as they had those of war. One of the members of the Rangers, who in later years became one of his community's substantial farmers and stock raisers, was the late Walter H. Caldwell, whose death occurred at his home in Austin, March 5, 1910.

WALTER H. CALDWELL

J. W. Riggs-

Mr. Caldwell was born in Bastrop county, Texas, January 1, 1842, and was a son of John and Lucinda W. (Haynie) Caldwell, and grandson of the progenitor of the family, who came from Dublin, Ireland, in 1784 and settled at Baltimore, subsequently moved to Kentucky, and died at Nashville, Tennessee, July 12, 1819. John Caldwell, the father, was born at Frankfort, Kentucky, December 10, 1802, and came to Texas from Tuscumbia, Alabama, settling at Novidad, but subsequently moving to Bastrop county in 1834. He was a lawyer by profession, and a man of wide learning and natural talents. He put aside his profession, however, to engage in farming on a large scale, and at one time owned 80,000 acres of land in Travis and Bastrop counties. He was very prominent in public life during the early days of Texas, both as a Republic and a State. He was a member of the Third Texas Congress, having been elected to the Senate of the Republic of Texas in September, 1838, and taking his seat in that distinguished body in the following November, and also was a member of the Texas State Senate in 1857-58. Although he agreed with Gen. Sam Houston, whose intimate friend he was, as to the question of Secession, and as to the probable outcome of the struggle between the states, when Texas joined the Confederacy he gave his unquestioned support to the South and never gave up in his loyalty to the Lost Cause until the Confederacy died in the gloom at Appomattox. That his loyalty was sincere is evidenced by the fact that he gave his four sons to the service: Walter H., of this review; John A., who was a private in the Trans-Mississippi Department, C. S. A., and died in 1870; Charles, resident of Austin; and Oliver B., who served as a mere boy in Col. John S. Ford's Regiment on the Rio Grande river. A more complete review of this sturdy citizen of the Lone Star State will be found in "Indian Wars and Pioneers of Texas," by John H. Brown and L. E. Daniels. Mr. Caldwell married Lucinda W. Haynie, of Knoxville, Tennessee, and in addition to their four sons, they became the parents of five daughters. At the time of his death, October 22, 1870, Mr. Caldwell was accounted one of the richest men in the state.

Walter H. Caldwell was educated at Bastrop Military Academy, where he spent four years, leaving that institution to become a member of the Eighth Regiment, Texas Cavalry. With Terry's Rangers he went to Kentucky and participated in the first battle, at Woodsonville, where the brave and gallant Terry fell, afterwards served with the regiment in all its engagements, was wounded September 7, 1864, in a fight in Northern Alabama, continued with his regiment after his recovery, and was paroled at Meridian, Mississippi, in May, 1865. At that time he returned to his home in Texas, concentrated his energies upon farming and stockraising, and continued to be so engaged until the time of his death, his home having been made in Austin for some years. Mr. Caldwell's war record was an excellent one, his service being always characterized by bravery in the face of danger, faithfulness to every duty, and a cheerful acceptance of whatever conditions the fortunes of war brought about, that won him the admiration of his comrades and the respect of his officers. To this war record he added one in civil life not a particle less meritorious, and the incidents of his entire career stamp him as one of his state's most helpful and useful men.

In 1881 Mr. Caldwell was married to Miss Lou Jones, daughter of Thomas H. Jones, of Travis county, Texas, who survives him and lives at the family residence in Austin, at No. 1009 West Sixth street. Two sons and one daughter were born to Mr. and Mrs. Caldwell, namely: Thomas J., born in Austin, in 1882, educated at the University of Texas, where he was graduated in 1905 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, later took the law course there and was graduated in 1909 with the degree of Bachelor of Laws, was at once admitted to the bar and began his practice at Austin, and since 1910 has been

United States Commissioner, with his office at No. 208 Littlefield Building; Walter D., born in 1884, educated at the University of Texas, and now practicing law with his brother, under the firm style of Caldwell & Caldwell; and Miss Emma Lee, who is residing at home with her mother in Austin.

JOHN E. WHARTON. For many years enjoying a large and successful practice as a lawyer, Mr. Wharton has at the same time taken a prominent part in public affairs in the southwest, and has been particularly identified with the larger public movements in the territory of New Mexico and in his present home city of El Paso, where he has had his offices as a lawyer since 1909.

The Wharton family which he represents came originally from South Carolina, where they were located in the early years of that old colony and where the family were known in the early days as planters and slave owners. The grandfather of the El Paso lawyer came west and settled in Arkansas in 1836 about the time that state was admitted to the Union.

Mr. John E. Wharton was born in Searcy county, Arkansas, February 20, 1854, a son of Wilburn M. and Mary Wharton. The parents lived for many years in Boone county, Arkansas, where the father was a farmer and stock raiser, and where he died in 1872. In addition to carrying on the industry of farming he was also a minister of the Baptist church, and during the early days preached in the local congregation without salary. He was an upright and substantial citizen, and a forceful good in his community. There were eight children in the family, six sons and two daughters, John E. being the second in order of birth.

His early education was obtained in the public schools of Arkansas, and with an ambition for higher professional attainments he entered the Clarke Academy at Berryville, Arkansas. This was one of the most noted schools of the time and was conducted by Captain Isaac A. Clarke, who was prominently known in his time as a splendid educator. Mr. Wharton after leaving the academy taught school and at the same time pursued his law studies until he was admitted to the bar in 1879 at Waxachachie, this state. After practicing in the latter city two years he came west and located at White Oaks, New Mexico, which was the field for his practice until his removal to El Paso in 1909. His professional activities have extended over New Mexico and Arizona, as well as in Texas. During his residence in Mexico he served as district attorney and also for a number of years as attorney for the Southeastern New Mexico Live Stock Association. He was also elected and served as a member of the New Mexico Territorial Legislature. Mr. Wharton has always been interested in politics, is a forceful speaker and a successful campaigner, and for a number of years was a member of the Territorial Committee of New Mexico. In 1899 he was appointed one of the committee of three which was sent to Washington in behalf of the long continued agitation of statehood for New Mexico. Mr. Wharton is affiliated with the Masonic Order.

At Memphis, Tennessee, in January, 1882, he married Miss Sallie M. Gordon, a daughter of John D. Gordon. Her father was a relative of General J. B. Gordon, the noted Confederate leader and the Georgia statesman and lecturer. Mr. and Mrs. Wharton are the parents of four children, one daughter and three sons.

JAMES WYATT RIGGINS. This prominent Waco citizen has long been known for his remarkable genius in commercial affairs. His judgment and foresight as an investor has been almost infallible, and these qualities have been reinforced by a business courage which has never failed him. It is an interesting fact that Mr. Riggins' first experience in a commercial undertaking was really a failure, and though he was not directly responsible for the failure, he suffered from the results of it. Whether that circumstance had anything to do with his almost continuous success since then is a matter of speculation. The city of Waco has many things to be grateful to Mr. Riggins in behalf of his public spirited business enterprise and also his record as a civic leader.

James Wyatt Riggins was born at Jefferson City, Missouri, November 4, 1848. His father, Thomas B. Riggins, who was born in Glasgow, Kentucky, in 1808, was a substantial farmer and died in 1873. The mother, Nancy Wyatt, was born at Jefferson City, Missouri, in 1821, and died in 1906. Their twelve children were: George W., Eli, Martha, Josephine, Napoleon B., Elijah, James W., Sallie, J. Leck, Thomas E., Mollie, and Willie.

The common schools of Missouri and the State University prepared Mr. Riggins until he was about eighteen years of age, and his first responsible work was as financial secretary and treasurer of the Cumberland Presbyterian church in charge of Home and Foreign Missions. The duties of that position kept him for five years with headquarters in St. Louis. The St. Louis Observer, a newspaper, sent him to Texas as a special correspondent in writing brief articles descriptive and otherwise of the state, and when he gave up that employment at the end of thirteen months he elected to remain in the Lone Star State and has been more or less closely and continuously identified with the district of Waco ever since. A hardware business was established under the name of N. B. & J. W. Riggins, his brother having actual management of the store. At the end of two years it became bankrupt, and Mr. Riggins took up the tangled skein and endeavored to straighten out affairs, but lost everything in the venture. He next engaged in real estate, and went along with a fair degree of prosperity for five years. One of his deals gave him a clear profit of fifteen hundred dollars, and that sum was invested in 1882 in five acres of land on North Austin street near 18th street. On that land he subsequently built the residence costing five thousand dollars in which he still has his home, and has sold other portions of the acreage sufficient to net him a profit of fifty-eight thousand dollars, and still has two hundred and fifty feet frontage on Austin street and his own residence ground. In 1887 Mr. Riggins disposed of his real estate business and became superintendent and manager of the Burnham Land & Live Stock Company, and for three years had the actual supervision of more than four thousand acres and a large amount of stock. He resigned that position and bought a half interest in what is now the Waco Transfer Company, paying three thousand dollars for his interest. It was a very small and almost insignificant concern, with a small livery barn and a small amount of stock and equipment. A year later Mr. Riggins bought all the property, and at the end of two years, having stimulated its business to successful proportions, sold out for the sum of eighteen thousand eight hundred dollars. He organized the Waco Transfer Company, put in seventy-five draft horses, and was the first man to place a baggage transfer man on every train going through Waco for soliciting business.

His next venture was the purchase of the Pacific hotel, now the Metropole hotel. His lease on the building expired at the end of ten months, and as he was unable to get a satisfactory renewal he moved his stock of furniture and other equipment to a store and engaged in the second-hand furniture business. His largest asset while running this business was his odd trade-mark, which distinguished all the Riggins' furniture. His career in the furniture line continued for ten years, and for each year netted him an average of about eight thousand dollars profit. His stock he finally traded for one hundred and thirty acres in East Waco, valued at that time at about twenty-two thousand dollars. From this acreage he has since disposed of eighty acres at a profit of sixty-two thousand dollars, and the other fifty acres is now worth probably six hundred dollars an acre.

On disposing of his furniture business, Mr. Riggins became more closely identified with public affairs in Waco. The first commercial club of the city was organized by him, and he served as its president four years. He organized the Texas Cotton Palace of Waco, was its first president and director general for one year, and under his management was built the first cotton palace in the state. While he was president of the Commercial Club he organized the Queen Carnival Association of Waco and provided that the queen should be chosen each year by popular election. During the first year there were seven who aspired to the honor of queen, twenty-seven in the second year, forty-five in the third and seventy-three in the fourth year. The carnival became the one beautiful yearly festival occasion for all central Texas, and his work as president and manager of the association for four years was a great public service to the city and surrounding country. Following this Mr. Riggins was nominated for the office of mayor, was elected in 1900 and again in 1902. During his second term he was removed from office in consequence of his refusal to endorse the policy of the city council in buying and loading upon the city what he considered a worthless waterworks plant.

On leaving public office Mr. Riggins retired to his fifty acres in East Waco, and became the pioneer in the cultivation on a commercial scale of potatoes in central Texas, a crop which up to that time had never been regarded as commercially profitable. The first year he cleared twenty-five hundred dollars on his crop. His next enterprise was in his old line of furniture in Brenham, Washington county. He traded for a stock valued at thirty thousand dollars, moved it to Houston in 1905, and after two years sold out and invested most of his proceeds in twenty-one hundred acres of land in Robertson county. At the end of six months his land was sold at a profit of twenty-one thousand dollars. After another brief stay in Waco he went out west to Los Angeles, bought seven hundred and thirty-five acres near that city, held the property for three and a half years, when he cleared a hundred thousand dollars on selling out. In 1910 Mr. Riggins bought an interest in the J. D. Wheelan Film Company at Dallas, and this also proved a profitable venture, netting him thirty thousand dollars profit at the end of six months. In 1911 he organized the Riggins Investment & Promoting Company of Waco. In the spring of 1912 he declined an offer of an interest in five million acres of land in British Columbia, since the deal appeared a little large for him to handle, and that is said to have been the only time he ever failed to take a chance at a proposition. In the course of 1912 he bought two corners at Eighth and Austin streets, and at the present time is erecting a ten-story fireproof hotel building. The business men of Waco had offered a bonus of fifty thousand dollars for such a building, and had kept the offer before the public and had been negotiating with promoters for some time. After the second advertisement of this bonus had been published, Mr. Riggins accepted the proposition and at a meeting of the Commercial Club and the Young Men's Business League he was given the bonus. The entire cost of the ground, building and furniture of this splendid hotel will be about six hundred thousand dollars, and the entire sum for that investment is now in the bank or in available collateral, and Waco will soon have one of the finest hotels in the state.

Mr. Riggins was married at Waco December 4, 1878, to Locke W. Burnham, daughter of Col. R. E. Burnham, who was a wholesale liquor dealer and distiller in Kentucky. The six children of their marriage are: Leslie B., who married Allie Day, has two children, Leslie, Jr. and Howell, and is a trader and speculator in California; A. Robbie; Eddie Mai; Jimmie G.; Paul W., and Lenora, deceased. Mr. Riggins attends the Methodist church, is a Democrat in politics, and one of the most popular citizens Waco has ever had. He is a business man of high standards of probity and honor, and has for a number of years been one of the hard working members of the Commercial Club and the Young Men's Business League. He is the owner of his residence on Austin street above Eighteenth street, has property in the city valued at about three hundred thousand dollars, besides the fifty acres in East Waco, more than twenty thousand dollars worth of property in Dallas, and all this represents the achievements of a man who started out without capital and with only such influence as he could exercise through the force of his individual character and personality.

ALFRED H. DASHIELL. The Dashiell family is one of the oldest in the South today. Founded in Maryland, in Colonial times, its members have filled prominent places in our country's history from that time up to the present day.

Alfred Henry Dashiell, the subject of this sketch, takes his place in the family as one who has upheld the prestige of his name. His achievements have thus far been of high order, with fine promise of the future.

Alfred Henry Dashiell is the son of Dr. Wickliff B. Dashiell and Catherine A. Greer Dashiell, and he was born in Kaufman County, Texas, in 1886. His mother was a daughter of Colonel John A. Greer, of Shelbyville, Tennessee, who came to Texas about 1839, was a member of Congress while Texas was a Republic, and served as Lieutenant Governor for two terms after it became a State. Greer County, in Oklahoma (formerly Texas), is named for him.

Mr. Dashiell's grandfather on the paternal side was the Rev. Alfred Henry Dashiell, born in Salisbury, Somerset County, Maryland. A man of classical education, graduated from the Baltimore College and the University of Pennsylvania. He became a minister of the Presbyterian Church in 1814, although his father had been an Episcopal clergyman. He also studied law. He married a daughter of Judge Richard Ridgely of the Supreme Court of Maryland. They had ten children, Dr. W. B. Dashiell, the father of the subject of this sketch, being the youngest.

Dr. W. B. Dashiell was born in Shelbyville, Tennessee, in 1835. He also received his higher education at the University of Pennsylvania. He practiced medicine in Tennessee a short while, but after his marriage to Miss Catherine Greer, they moved to Texas, where his wife's father owned large tracts of land. At the opening of the Civil war, Dr. Dashiell entered the Confederate service as a surgeon in Parson's Brigade. He entered the Legislature in 1866. He returned to his farm in 1877, moving later to Terrell.

A. H. Dashiell attended the University of the South, at Sewanee, Tennessee, and was graduated in 1887 with the degree of B. A. He was admitted to the bar in 1892, opened a law office in Terrell, Texas, where he has practiced law ever since, with the exception of the time that he was elected to the office of Prosecuting Attorney in 1896, which office he filled with great distinction. Since his admission to the bar, he has continuously represented the Texas Midland Railroad as its attorney. He is at present the senior member of the firm of Dashiell & Coon.

In July, 1901, in Sewanee, Tennessee, Mr. Dashiell was married to Miss Adelene Wicks, a daughter of Major John W. Wicks, of Galveston, Texas. They have three daughters, Adelene, Catherine and Celeste. The family are members of the Episcopal Church, and take a prominent part in the social activities of the community. Mr. Dashiell has a sister, Mrs. William Abraham, living in Houston, Texas.

MATHEW DEAVENPORT HERBERT. County attorney of Ector county by election in November, 1912, Mr. Herbert not only stands high as a lawyer, but is one of the most influential and able business men and industrial leaders in west Texas. He has had a long and varied career with many vicissitudes, but has always possessed the courage which not only would allow him to venture his all in any undertaking in which he had confidence, but more important still would enable him to begin all over again, once his hopes were dashed down by the failure of the immediate enterprise. Mr. Herbert is prosperous, and although he has seen some hard times he has never confessed defeat, and has always been a hard fighter and willing to accept the blows as well as the favors of fortunes.

Mathew D. Herbert was born in Hardin county, Tennessee, January 9, 1854, being a son of Dr. Calvin L. and Nancy (Johnston) Herbert. This branch of the Johnston family was especially famous in the history of Virginia. The father was born in Huntsville, Alabama, and the mother in Lawrenceburg, Tennessee. Dr. Herbert, who was the son of a wealthy planter and himself a man of generous prosperity and influence, owned a large estate and a number of slaves prior to the war, and during that struggle lost nearly all his property. He brought his family out to Texas in 1871, and in this state resumed the practice of medicine and bought a farm in Denton county. His death occurred twenty years later, when he was sixty-five years of age. Dr. Herbert during the Civil war had served as a surgeon in the Confederate army, and was in many of the leading campaigns of the war, including those about Chickamauga and Atlanta. After one of the battles at Atlanta, Dr. Herbert was searching the field for wounded soldiers, and was accompanied on these rounds, driving an ambulance, by one of his faithful slaves. The slave suddenly discovered a party of Union soldiers hurrying out to capture the doctor, and told the doctor to jump out and get away on one of the mules, which he cut out of the harness, on which the doctor escaped, but the negro, ambulance and the other mule were captured. A few nights afterwards the old slave appeared at the tent of his master and awoke the doctor. The doctor was overjoyed to meet the negro again and asked him to strike a light that he might see his face. The slave demurred for some time, and when a light finally appeared the doctor found his former servant dressed in the uniform of a northern soldier, in which the slave had been ashamed to appear before his master. The doctor advised him to return to his captors, since he ran the risk of being immediately shot, provided he was ever retaken, but the negro would not go, so the doctor sent him away to prevent his capture. The doctor was a very generous and gentle master, and never in his experience as a planter and slave owner did he allow one of his grown negroes to be whipped. Dr. Herbert's widow survived him many years, until the age of eighty-seven, and her death occurred in Denton county, Texas, and her body now rests beside that of her husband. There were six children in the family and four are now living. Calvin L. is a prominent lawyer and former mayor of Denton; William P., the oldest of survivors, is a farmer at Grand Falls, Texas; Ada is the widow of Thomas M. Walden, of Denton; Annie, who is now deceased, was the wife of Hon. A. L. Matlock.

Mathew D. Herbert received his education in the Masonic College at Grapevine, Texas, and when eighteen years of age taught school in Denton and Montague counties for three years. During this time he took up the study of law, and was appointed by Judge J. A. Carroll to the office of district clerk of Montague county, serving as such for four years. In 1879 Mr. Herbert was admitted to the bar, but soon afterwards was stricken with the western fever. After a brief visit home to his mother, he bought a fine team of horses and a good wagon and set out from Denton county for Santa Fe, New Mexico, and thence on to California, where he spent five years in the mountains and mining districts, engaged in prospecting and mining and with the usual variable success. He finally returned home to Denton county, but after a year went back to California, where he entered a new field, the real estate business in Los Angeles. In a few years he had made a fortune, and was offered $100,000.00 for his interests in that city. Six weeks later the level of high prices which had been steadily rising in Los Angeles for some years abruptly declined, and Mr. Herbert was one of those who suffered worst in the bursting of the boom. He then began all over again and joined his brother-in-law on the latter's ranch near Magdalena, New Mexico, where he remained for several years. He then went to the ranch of his eldest brother in Hale county, Texas, where he remained for two years. In 1893 he moved to Ardmore, Oklahoma, where he joined his youngest brother, Calvin L., in the law business, under the firm name of Herbert and Herbert. Their practice grew to large proportions and they opened a branch office at Chickasha, and looked after the interests of a large clientele, representing the best business and individual interests in that section of the territory. Mr. Mathew D. Herbert had charge of the branch office at Chickasha.

During his residence at Chickasha, Oklahoma, he was married in 1895 to Miss Annie Montgomery, a sister of Dr. D. M. and R. L. Montgomery of Marlow, Oklahoma, and Hon. James T. Montgomery, an attorney of Wichita Falls, Texas. After eight years residence in Chickasha, during which he had reached a place of distinction as a lawyer, and had many evidences of his successful work, he lost his eyesight in 1903, and was obliged to give up active practice. He then moved to Odessa, where he was for years engaged in the real estate business. He obtained eight sections of land in Culberson county, and moved to that county in order to give his active attention to its supervision and management. In the meantime his wife's health failed and he and his wife moved back to Odessa, Ector county, and in November, 1912, was elected county attorney of Ector county.

Mr. Herbert has recently organized the Pecos Oil Company, with capital stock of $150,000.00, and himself as president and owner of 80% of the property. This company has made active preparation and will soon become a prominent factor in the oil industry of west Texas. The company owns 3,407 acres of oil and gas lands in Culberson county. Mr. Herbert and wife have four children, named Ada Selma, Loi, Willie Hamilton and Hugh Montgomery. Mr. Herbert, as a resident of Ector county, has studied its resources thoroughly, and believes that in a few years it will be one of the most productive sections of west Texas, being a region which produces the best of fruits and its land being specially adapted to the raising of cotton, corn, kaffir corn, maize and fruit, and with plenty of good water for mixed farming purposes.

DUNCAN GRAHAM MCKELLAR. The late Duncan Graham McKellar was a man whose achievements were such as to place him at the front in the ranks of the leading business men of the county. As a man he was a potent force in the industrial and other fields of activity, and none is more deserving than he of mention in this historical and biographical work, whose aim and intent it is to perpetuate in fitting manner the records of the lives and activities of such men as Mr. McKellar.

Born in Henderson county, Texas, on October 6, 1852, Duncan Graham McKellar was a son of John A. McKellar, whose position as a land owner of Kaufman and Dallas counties made him a conspicuous figure in these parts, and whose connection with commercial pursuits along the Texas & Pacific as it extended its line from Marshall until it reached Forney was a matter of some little moment in the field of merchandise in that time. He amassed a considerable fortune and his sons inherited a position to which they very materially added with the passing years.

Duncan G. McKellar was the second son and the fifth child of his parents, and he passed his boyhood along the line of the Texas & Pacific railroad, the towns of Marshall, Hallville and Longview all being claimed for a time as the abiding place of the family, the father carrying on mercantile operations in those towns. His final education was obtained at Tyler and Fayetteville, in Arkansas, and his initial business venture was a commercial one in Galveston, where his father started him off. This was suddenly terminated by his recall to the parental aid in the management of the vast landed and other interests which his father's failing health rendered him unable to manage alone. From the twenty-fifth year of his life practically to its close, Graham McKellar was a human dynamo of energy in the matter of bringing into subordination the immense lands his father had acquired, building homes for the tenantry required in the business of farm-making, and also in the supervision of his own personal interests after the family estate had been divided among the heirs.

A wonderful combination of business judgment, a quality inherited from his father beyond doubt, together with splendid energy and foresight, made him a safe adviser upon matters of business policy, and he was freely consulted in matters that he seemed especially proficient in by his fellows. He possessed a judicial mind, and although he made a phenomenal success in his chosen field of action, he was of such mental fibre that it cannot be doubted that the sphere of the law missed a singularly shining light when he did not elect to qualify for practice in that profession.

With a fine bent for public affairs, no important campaign found him a silent spectator. In the memorable campaign of Hogg and Clark in 1892 he was an ardent supporter of Governor Hogg and was a delegate to the convention that nominated him the second time. He was a member of the Presbyterian church.

In Galveston, Texas, on November 16, 1880, Mr. McKellar was married to Miss Emma Riddell McCullough, a daughter of Rev. John McCullough, a colleague of David Baker in the propagation of the Gospel in Texas, and a courageous, honest and God fearing man all the days of his life—one whose splendid work in the interests of the church extended from the pioneer days of Texas through its Republic era, and in many of her trials in the years after she entered the sisterhood of the states.

Rev. McCullough was born in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, in 1805 and was a son of Scotch parents. He was educated in Princeton College, and ordained in the ministry of the Presbyterian church at New Castle, Pennsylvania. He came to Texas in about 1835, and all the remainder of his life was spent on the Texas frontier. When Galveston was a mere village he went there and organized the first Presbyterian congregation in that place. He taught in a female seminary there for five years, and he reached San Antonio when it was in its infancy, organizing there as well the first Presbyterian congregation the place knew. It was in that Mexican center that he experienced a number of his many hairbreadth escapes from death, the fury that was roused against him there being because of his insistence in the work of closing the saloons. The lawless element of the city settled upon him as being the one person most responsible for the insufferable (to them) drouth that settled upon the city, and they attacked his house at night, firing into it and forcing him to make his escape by the back way.

Rev. McCullough had much to do with religious education in Texas. He was one of the founders of Austin College, at Sherman, Texas, and he was chaplain of the State Senate when Governor Houston was a factor in public affairs. He knew the General and his family intimately, and other great men of Texas during the formative period of the state who lent him their confidence and material support in his altogether praiseworthy work.

JOHN McCULLOUGH

Dr. J. M. Kellor

For his second wife Rev. McCullough married at Spruce Creek, Pennsylvania, Miss Margaret J. Riddell, a daughter of Margaret (Wigton) Riddell. The final home of the McCullough family was established at Prairie Lea, Texas, where the reverend gentleman was pastor of the church and was also occupied in school work. He died in January, 1870, and his wife passed away in Galveston in 1911. Their children were as follows: Mrs. McKellar; James, of Galveston; William W., of Brownwood, Texas; Annie, now Mrs. Lucian Miner, of Charlottesville, Virginia; Edward J., a traveling salesman of Wichita Falls, Texas; Jennie, the wife of Capt. J. P. Alvey, of Galveston, and Leila and Lulu, twin sisters. Leila married J. J. Parker, and both died in August, 1901, leaving four children; Lulu is the wife of William H. Brown, of New Orleans; Mary B. McCullough, the youngest child of this fine family, makes her home with her brother, James, of Galveston.

The issue of Duncan Graham McKellar and his wife are as follows: John Riddell, who died as a senior student in the University of Texas, at the age of twenty-one years; Edward Duncan is assistant cashier of the City National Bank of Forney; and Miss Lenora, the youngest of the family.

Mr. McKellar died in Forney, October 12, 1903, and his widow still makes her home in the place where her husband gained such prominence as a man of affairs. She occupies the magnificent residence built by her husband here some years ago, the same ranking among the best of the many fine places that mark Forney as an unusual rural center.

REV. JOHN MCCULLOUGH. One of the pioneer missionaries, preachers and teachers in Texas was John McCullough, who came to Texas when it was a province of Mexico, labored faithfully in the cause of Christ and education at Galveston, San Antonio and other localities during the period of the Republic, continued his labors during statehood, and while still active in his plans and in his work as an educator and churchman was called away by death on January 16, 1870, when nearly sixty-five years of age. In his death Texas lost one of its faithful ministers, and the Presbyterian church one of its most active workers and leaders.

John McCullough was born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, April 3, 1805, acquired a collegiate and theological education at Princeton, and was ever afterwards devoted to the doctrines of the Bible as expounded by that seminary. After some years of ministerial experience, he came to Texas in 1835, landing at Galveston, and a little later organized the First Presbyterian church of that city, at a time when the island was just beginning its existence as a town. He subsequently moved to the old town of Columbia on the Brazos river where he preached and taught for about five years. While General Houston was president of the republic, Mr. McCullough was chaplain of the senate in Houston. The most interesting and perhaps fruitful of his experiences were in San Antonio, where he organized the first Presbyterian church of that place and continued for some years as a faithful and fearless minister of Christ. San Antonio was at that time the headquarters of numerous bands of desperadoes, and wickedness of every kind was rife, and it was both a passive and active opposition that was shown to every individual who represented law and order and Christianity and morality. Mr. McCullough feeling that as an ambassador of the King of Kings it was his duty to preach the truth fully and fearlessly, denounced crime and lawlessness boldly and directly. His life was threatened, but fidelity to his religion and Master would not permit him to desist from his course or to leave the town. He continued unafraid in the discharge of his duties. Finally six or eight of the most daring of the desperadoes, heavily armed, went to his house to murder him. Aware of their approach and their design, Mr. McCullough went into the strongest room and barricaded the door. The only weapon he had was a hatchet. With that in hand he stood by the door, ready to deal blows should they succeed in forcing it. The house was surrounded and the men tried to get in through the window. Mr. McCullough stood with his shoulders against the door, and in that exposed position the outlaws fired through the windows and the door six or eight times. Two balls grazed his head and two cut his clothes at his side. The assault continued for some time, but from some cause or other the enemies finally desisted without accomplishing their purpose. It is noteworthy that such was the terror inspired by this gang among the peaceful members of the community that nothing was done to prevent the attack or to relieve the fearless minister from his danger.

It is related, as an illustration of his character and firmness, that on the same day after this attempt to murder him, duty called him during the evening to a place which required him to pass through the streets where the desperadoes had their headquarters. Against the remonstrances of a friend, who declared it madness and certain death to proceed, he replied that he was determined not to be driven from San Antonio and that the proper course was to show himself unafraid of danger. Accordingly he passed right through the crowd of men who had a short time before attempted to murder him and went on undisturbed.

After leaving San Antonio Mr. McCullough was again in Galveston, where he founded a large female seminary. In connection with two sisters he conducted it successfully for five years. The city was then visited by a severe epidemic of yellow fever, and his own two sisters and a nephew and niece fell victims of the scourge. The school was broken up and never resumed.

Mr. McCullough then went to Ohio, spent two years as a preacher in two churches in Muskingum county, and returned to Texas in 1859, settling in Burnet county above Austin. That was then a frontier and desolate region, but he preached as he had opportunity until the time of his removal to Prairie Lea in 1869. He was invited to take charge of the school at that place and preach in the church. His arrangements had been successfully made, both for the school and the church, and there was a prospect of large usefulness and means of support for his family, when death suddenly came to him early in 1870. Mr. McCullough left a widow and nine children, three sons and six daughters, all of them young. His wife was Margaret Jane Riddell, of Coatesville, Pennsylvania, and they were married in Spruce Creek, October 12, 1831. As was the case with most southerners, he suffered heavy damage during the war, and though his work has been one of splendid beneficence, his reward in material goods was very meager.

As to his character and personality it is said that Mr. McCullough was a genial companion, noble and generous in his impulses, full of hospitality, ever rejoicing to meet with Christian brethren. He loved the doctrine of grace and was a rich and instructive preacher. His convictions were strong, and his attachment to principle inflexible. Neither the fear of worldly loss or of life or of anything else could make him swerve from what he felt to be right.

JOHN M. DEAN is prominent as a banker in the old Van Zandt county community of Grand Saline, where he is president of the First State Bank. He has been a resident of Texas over thirty-four years, and during the greater part of that time was identified with educational work, and made a splendid record as a teacher and also as school manager. Mr. Dean has represented his district in the state legislature and has a number of interests that give him prominence in the northeastern section of the state.

John M. Dean was born in Anderson county, South Carolina, November 17, 1859. His father was Robert

B. Dean and his grandfather Moses Dean. The family were established in the Colonial days in Maryland, and moved to South Carolina during the eighteenth century. Moses Dean was born in South Carolina, and married Narcissa Lewis. Their children were: Major J.; Robert B.; Augustus; Waddy T.; Polly, who married Samuel Dean and moved to Smith county, Texas, in 1857; Lou, who married J. H. Jones; Lucy, who married another Samuel Dean and spent her life in South Carolina; Eva, who married Frank Morrow and died in Georgia in 1905; and Annie, wife of Rufus Beatty.

Robert B. Dean was a slave holding planter in South Carolina, and joined the first company that left Anderson county for the Confederate service. His regiment was in the army of Northern Virginia, participated in the first battle of Bull Run, and was in Jackson's army and later under General Lee saw much of the heavy service of all the troops engaged in the Virginia campaigns. Robert B. Dean received a slight wound while a soldier, and surrendered with Lee's army at the close of the war. Robert B. Dean married Amanda Burress, daughter of Reuben and Delilia Burress, who were first cousins. Mrs. Dean died in December, 1894. She and her husband were members of the Baptist church. Their children were: William L., of Anderson county, South Carolina; John M.; Nora, wife of John T. McCown, in South Carolina; Major A., who died in South Carolina in 1908; Amy, who married Hugh H. Russell of Anderson, South Carolina; Luther E., who lives on the old Dean homestead; Annie, Mrs. John C. Allen of Anderson county; and Waddy T., who met death by an accident.

John M. Dean grew up in South Carolina, came to Texas in January, 1881, spent his first year as a farmer, and then took up educational work and followed that for about twenty-five years. As teacher he was identified with the schools at Noondy, Troupe, and at Garden Valley in Smith county, taught in the village of Ben Wheeler ten years and three years in the country schools of the same locality. While pursuing this work he also kept himself trained down to date in educational matters. He was graduated June 10, 1886, from the Sam Houston Normal School at Huntsville. Mr. Dean moved to Grand Saline in December, 1906, and in July of 1907 aided in the establishment of the Citizens National Bank of Grand Saline. In 1912 this bank surrendered its national charter and was incorporated as the First State Bank. Under the national charter its capital was thirty thousand dollars, and at the present time is forty thousand dollars. Mr. Dean has served as president of the bank since its beginning.

In 1898 Mr. Dean was elected to the legislature and was re-elected in 1900, and was a member of both the regular and extra sessions. He was a delegate to the Democratic state conventions of 1898 and 1914 from Van Zandt county. While in the legislature he served on the committee of education as well as others, and took a keen interest in the educational measures passed during that time. Mr. Dean is affiliated with the Lodge and Council of the Masonic Order, and his family are members of the Baptist church.

In December, 1886, Mr. Dean was married in Smith county, Texas, to Miss C. Ellis, daughter of H. T. Ellis. Her father came to Texas from Georgia. Mr. and Mrs. Dean have the following children: Floyd E., who died at Grand Saline aged twenty-two; Amy, who is a teacher, having finished her education in the Denton Normal School; E. Alton; Boyce C.; Luster D.; Major M.; Wayne; L. Alma and John M., Jr.

CHARLES H. LAWRENCE. A little more than thirty years ago on one of the eligible corners of what then constituted the town of El Paso, Charles H. Lawrence presided over what he has since designated as a peanut stand. It was, in fact, just that, peanuts being the principal commodity in which he dealt. The modern residents of El Paso associate the name of Mr. Lawrence with the large wholesale grocery establishment at 715-719 S. El Paso street, one of the largest firms in the wholesale district, and one of the most important commercial establishments of this western city. Mr. Lawrence has had a remarkable business career, one in which abundant success has come after early years of lack of opportunity, and hard and self-sacrificing effort.

Charles H. Lawrence was born on July 16, 1859, at Neversink Flats in Sullivan county, New York, a son of John Lawrence. His father was a farmer in Sullivan county, and the family was of German and English stock, which has long been represented in New York State. The family of the parents consisted of nine children, four sons and five daughters, three of whom are now deceased. Mr. Lawrence, the seventh in order of birth, lost his parents when he was a child, and never attended school as a regular scholar more than a few days at a time. In his subsequent battles with the world, and fortune, he has managed to secure a good practical education and in his varied experience with men and affairs has never felt himself at a disadvantage with any of his competitors. He first came to El Paso about 1880, before the first railroad had been completed through this city. After some work in other capacities in 1882 he set up the little stand which has been mentioned on one of the best corners in town. At that time one could stand on an elevation and count the houses in El Paso. After about two years in this first line of trade, he opened a grocery store at South El Paso street, and by actual experience in the trade learned the business from the ground up. He then moved his business to St. Louis street, where he continued to enlarge the scope of his trade from year to year. The Sheldon Hotel now stands on the site occupied by his business during those years. His next location was at 210 San Francisco street, where he occupied two buildings for more than twenty years. He then moved into the Kepelson Degetau Building at 105 Fifth street. This last move had been necessitated by the owners of the former building raising his rent from $75.00 per month to $10.00 per day. This occurred during the great boom period of 1906 when El Paso was growing rapidly and when all property was in a speculative condition. While located at the building on Fifth Street just mentioned, Mr. Lawrence bought fifty-five feet of frontage at 715 to 719 S. El Paso street and erected the present three-story brick building with basement covering the entire ground space, and moved into those handsome new quarters in 1907. He has there been successfully engaged in a large wholesale grocery trade, and the large enterprise is a monument to his ability and long continued enterprise in this city. Besides his grocery trade, Mr. Lawrence has the patent right on "recorte tobacco," having the exclusive trademark for this brand registered. Mr. Lawrence has for more than twenty years been dealing with the State National Bank of El Paso, one of the oldest and most solid banking institutions in this city. During all this time he has never had a check turned down, and yet has written many large checks and sometimes for as high a sum as $15,000.00. This is a record of financial success and business integrity of which any man might justly be proud. In politics Mr. Lawrence is an Independent, and has never been active in practical politics.

About twenty-seven years ago at Las Cruces, New Mexico, Mr. Lawrence married Miss Bersabe Avila of Las Cruces, Mrs. Lawrence being a member of an old Mexican family. Nine children were born to their marriage, four of whom are deceased, and the five still living are as follows: A. R. Gonzalez, of Albuquerque, New Mexico, and recently a resident of El Paso; Mrs. A. Aquilas, who resides with her husband in El Paso; Charles Lawrence, Jr., who is associated with his father in the store; Beatrice and Isador, who are at home with their parents.

THOMAS J. JONES. In the making of a modern city, with all the varied facilities and conveniences which the term employs no elements are of greater importance than light, heat and power. El Paso in recent years has been fortunate in the acquisition of an expert in the development of these great utilities, and Mr. Jones, vice president and general manager of the El Paso Gas & Electric Light Company, has done more than any other individual to improve and perfect this service for the city and its citizens.

Thomas J. Jones was born July 11, 1870. His birthplace is significant for his infancy and early youth were spent in one of the greatest industrial centers of America, in the Shenango and the Mahoning valleys of eastern Ohio and western Pennsylvania. His parents were Benjamin and Henrietta (Tippitt) Jones, both of whom were born in Wales. During his active life the father was engaged as a skilled operator in rolling and steel mills, partly in Sharon, Pennsylvania, and partly in Youngstown, Ohio, where he now lives in ease and comfort, after a well spent life. There were six children in the family, of whom Thomas J. was the second.

Up to the time he was fourteen years of age, he attended the public schools of Sharon, a noted center for the iron and steel industry and kindred manufacturing. As a boy he went into the rolling mills and during the next nine years worked steadily in all the various departments of the Sharon steel mills. He became an expert mechanic and was advanced to important responsibilities in his work, but when he was twenty-three years of age he realized the necessity of a better education, in order to make the most out of his life and his abilities. He then entered Marietta College at Marietta, Ohio, where at the time his parents were living, and he graduated with high honors from his class in 1898.

It was on leaving college that Mr. Jones first became interested in gas manufacture. At Lansing, Michigan, he established a gas works, and continued in charge of the same until 1901. He was then attracted to the natural gas fields about Noblesville, Indiana, where he soon became general manager of the Noblesville Gas & Improvement Company. Towards the close of 1903 he took the position of general manager for the Chicago Heights Gas Company, remaining there one year. Then in December, 1904, he transferred his field of enterprise to El Paso, with which city he has ever since been identified, and he considers El Paso the finest city in the southwest, and hopes to make it his home during the remainder of his life. He came to El Paso in December, 1904, to take the place of general manager for the El Paso Gas & Electric Company. His broad experience in the industry enabled him to bring special efficiency to the improvement of the business, which up to that time had not been entirely successful. He secured a financial interest in the company, and soon brought about a great change in the company's business and operation. He has devoted much of his attention to keeping the current up with the rapid development of the city, and during his administration many miles of mains have been laid, and likewise many important extensions and improvements in the electrical service.

In October, 1912, Mr. Jones was elected vice president and now holds both offices in the company. He has also interested himself in public and social life of his city. He is a director in the Y. M. C. A., is an elder in the First Presbyterian church, and is the owner of acreage property in the El Paso Valley and a pleasant home in the city. In September, 1900, he married Miss Fay Lawrence, of Lansing, Michigan. Their two children are Lawrence, born in Noblesville, Indiana, and Helen Margaret, born in El Paso. Mrs. Jones is secretary of the Sunshine Club and a member of the Women's Aid Society of the church. Mr. Jones takes much interest in all kinds of athletic sports, and is very fond of outdoor life. As to the future of El Paso, Mr. Jones sees nothing but a great destiny awaiting the city. Its location as the "Pass City" is a factor in the continued prosperity of the city as in ancient days it proved the occasion for the first settlement in this region. With the completion of the great storage dam, two hundred thousand or more acres of good land will be irrigated in the valley and the results of this intensive farming cannot but redound to the splendid prosperity of El Paso.

HUGH REID ROBERTSON. Now serving as assistant United States attorney for the Western District of Texas, with office and residence in San Antonio, Hugh Reid Robertson spent his early life in the cattle and sheep country of Southwestern Texas, and had a hard and long fight with adversity before gaining admission to his profession, in which he has practiced successfully for the past ten years.

Hugh Reid Robertson was born at Glasgow, Scotland, January 15, 1879. His parents were James and Jessie (Reid) Robertson. His father inherited a considerable estate from his father and grandfather, part of which consisted of mansions and tract land, and comprised one of the show places about Glasgow. This estate was sold by guardians, and somewhat later coal was discovered on the land, and it became worth millions. James Robertson engaged with a brother in the manufacturing business in Glasgow, and by that venture lost all his money. After this reverse, he and his family emigrated to America, leaving Greenock, Scotland, in 1886, crossing the ocean to New York, thence by way of Galveston to San Antonio, and out to the frontier of Brackettsville in Kinney county. In that section the father engaged in sheep raising and ranching. About 1890 the family moved to Ulvade, and to Del Rio about 1893.

Hugh Reid Robertson was eight years old when the family came to America, and lived on ranches in the counties of Kinney, Uvalde and Val Verde in Western Texas, going to the public school during the winter seasons. His family were poor, and very early in life he formed an acquaintance with the rugged toil and hardships that characterized ranch life in the early days of Western Texas. He was brought up somewhat strictly by a God-fearing mother of Presbyterian faith. She was an exceedingly courageous woman, and had come from a life of refinement and comfort to one of privation and hardship. As a boy Mr. Robertson was fond of hunting and fishing and all games and sports, but was of reserved and retiring disposition, and evinced a great fondness for reading. From the age of fourteen he lived in Del Rio, and after leaving high school there when about seventeen began working in a store to help the family. He continued in that line of work until he had saved nearly enough to enter the State University at Austin. He entered the law department of the University of Texas in October, 1902, and was graduated with the degree LL. B. in 1904. After graduating Mr. Robertson engaged in practice at Del Rio, at first associated with Mr. Jones, then was alone for a time, and finally with County Judge C. K. McDowell, under the firm name of McDowell & Robertson.

Mr. Robertson served as federal referee in bankruptcy for the Del Rio Division of the Federal Courts for Western Texas from 1906 to 1913. For several years he was a member of the board of school trustees, was mayor of the city of Del Rio from September, 1913, to June 30, 1914, and then resigned his office to take up his new duties at San Antonio. Mr. Robertson was appointed assistant United States attorney for the Western District of Texas on June 8, 1914, and qualified July 1, 1914. He has for a number of years been an active Democrat, was for several years a member of the county executive committee during his residence at Del Rio, and is a strong admirer and supporter of Woodrow Wilson, having been a member of the Wilson Club in Val Verde county. Mr. Robertson is a past master of the Masonic fraternity, a member and elder in the Southern Presbyterian church, and is now a member of the First Presbyterian church at San Antonio. On June 27, 1906, at Del Rio, Mr. Robertson married May Crary of Chicago, Illinois. They have one child, Jeannette, born at Del Rio November 4, 1907.

EUGENE CAMPBELL BARKER, M. A., Ph. D. As professor of American history at the University of Texas, recording secretary for the Texas State Historical Association, and managing editor of the Quarterly of that association, Mr. Barker is a scholar and historian whose attainments and service have had a large scope. He is one of the best known educators in the state, and in his particular field of history has a place of acknowledged leadership throughout the country.

Eugene C. Barker was born near Riverside, Texas, November 10, 1874, a son of Joe and Fannie (Holland) Barker. His grandfather, William Barker, became a member of Houston's army in January, 1836—a private in Captain Splane's company, which, with two others, under the command of Major McNutt, was detailed to guard the hospital and baggage camp near Harrisburg while Houston was fighting the battle of San Jacinto.* Mr. Barker spent his early life in Texas, and his ambition to gain a higher education caused him to put himself to a severe test in self-reliance and economy in order to pay his own way through the higher schools. He was graduated, B. A., from the University of Texas in 1899 and was given the degree of Master of Arts in 1900. He won a Harrison Fellowship at the University of Pennsylvania for 1906-1907, where he specialized in the study of history and received the degree of Ph. D. in 1908. In the meantime he had continued the study of history as Austin Scholar at Harvard University during 1907-1908, serving at the same time as assistant in history at Radcliffe College. He is a member of the Phi Beta Kappa Society and of the Phi Delta Theta Fraternity.

Professor Barker has been connected with the University of Texas as student and teacher since 1895. He served as tutor in history from 1899 to 1901; as instructor in history 1901-1908, though absent on leave 1906-1908; as adjunct professor of modern European history 1908-1910; during the next year he was adjunct professor of American history; from 1911 to 1913 he was associate professor of American history and chairman of the department of history in the university; and since 1913 he has held the full rank of professor of American history.

Professor Barker has membership in the American Historical Association, the Texas State Historical Association, the Mississippi Valley Historical Association—being a member of the first board of editors of the Mississippi Historical Review—and is chairman of the Texas Library and Historical Commission. He has published a number of articles in the Texas State Historical Association Quarterly, and has contributed to the American Historical Review, the Political Science Quarterly, the Mississippi Valley Historical Review, and the New York Nation. In 1904 he compiled and edited, jointly with Herbert E. Bolton, "With the Makers of Texas, a Source Reader in Texas History"; he contributed the chapter on "Texas as a Republic" in "The South in the Building of the Nation" (1909); and in 1912, jointly with C. S. Potts and Charles W. Ramsdell, he published "A School History of Texas," which the Text Book Board adopted as the state text in that subject for Texas schools. Dr. Barker was married August 6, 1903, to Matilda LeGrand Weeden, of Austin.
